

START

Microfilmed By:

NORTHEAST DOCUMENT CONSERVATION CENTER

Andover, MA 01810

OCTOBER 1993

Camera Operator: Kathy Wilder

MICROFILMED
August 1993 - April 1994

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
SCRAPBOOK MICROFILMING PROJECT

Funded in part by

THE NATIONAL ENDOWMENT FOR THE HUMANITIES

Grant No. PS-20709-93

COPYRIGHT

The copyright law of the United States (Title 17, UNITED STATES CODE) governs the making of photocopies or other reproductions of copyrighted materials.

Under certain conditions specified in the law, libraries and archives are authorized to furnish a photocopy or other reproduction. One of these specified conditions is that the photocopy or reproduction is not to be "used for any purpose other than private study, scholarship or research." If a user makes a request for, or later uses, a photocopy or reproduction for purposes in excess of "fair use," that user may be liable for copyright infringement.

This institution reserves the right to refuse to accept a copying order if, in its judgement, fulfillment of the order would involve violation of copyright law.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA MICROFILMING PROJECT

A COOPERATIVE PROJECT BETWEEN THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA ARCHIVES AND THE BOSTON PUBLIC LIBRARY
(AUGUST 1993 - APRIL 1994)

This microfilming project includes two collections of scrapbooks housed in two separate repositories. The first set of scrapbooks (80 volumes) resides within the Allen A. Brown Collection in the Music Department of the Boston Public Library (BPL). Their call number is M.125.5. The second set of scrapbooks (132 volumes) resides within the Boston Symphony Orchestra (BSO) Archives' Press Clippings collection. They have the designation Pres 56.

The BPL scrapbooks begin with the founding of the BSO in 1881 and continue, through 79 seasons, to 1960. Articles consist mainly of reviews and feature stories from Boston and New York newspapers. Occasionally, magazine articles and press releases are also included. The scrapbooks cover most aspects of the BSO.

The BSO scrapbooks run from 1889, the Orchestra's 9th season, to 1973. In addition to local reviews and features, the volumes contain articles culled from national and international publications. The scrapbooks document, in detail, all aspects of the BSO: The Symphony Orchestra (including subscription concerts, tours, and trips), the Boston Pops, the Tanglewood Festival, the Tanglewood Music Center, and Symphony Hall.

The two sets of scrapbooks have been filmed as two separate entities. Researchers wanting to look at specific seasons or subjects must examine both sets of films to ensure full coverage.

The scrapbooks do not represent the complete holdings of either location on the subject of the BSO.

Requests for positive microfilm copies of individual rolls, or of film sets, should be directed to the respective repositories.

Music Department
Boston Public Library
P. O. Box 286
Boston, MA 02117

Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives
Symphony Hall
Boston, MA 02115

*M.125

.5

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SCRAPBOOKS

1881-1882 TO 1959-1960

1181-18 to 1915-16 compiled by Allen A. Brown

1916-17 to 1937-38 compiled by Mary A. Brown

1938-39 to 1959-60 compiled by the Music Department

These scrapbooks contain reviews of concerts, articles concerning the Symphony, its players and conductors, interviews with soloists and composers, occasional letters and notes, an occasional autograph, ticket stubs, pictures of conductors, the Symphony, soloists and composers, and caricatures.

In the scrapbooks compiled by Mr. Brown, it is possible to find articles or reviews pasted on a program which does not have the same date. Mr. Brown used multiple copies of programs for his scrapbook "fillers;" the fillers have no relation to the articles pasted on them. The fillers may be partially to completely covered.

These scrapbooks do not contain the complete programs. For the complete program, the researcher must consult either the hard copies found in either the Boston Symphony Archives or the Boston Public Library's Music Department or the microfilm of programs published by KTO Microform (Millwood, New York) and dating from the 1881-82 season through the 1974-75 season.

Generally, one volume represents one Symphony season; the volume and season should therefore match. Depending upon the compiler and the clippings available, some reviews and articles may be found concerning the Promenade Concerts, Boston Pops, the Berkshire Music Festival and Tanglewood.

The Music Department of the Boston Public Library does maintain other materials concerning the Boston Symphony Orchestra in other scrapbooks and files. Please consult with the Music Librarian for these materials.

VOLUMES 49-50

1929-30 TO 1930-31

THIS REEL CONTAINS MANUSCRIPT MATERIAL.

MANUSCRIPTS MAY NOT

BE REPRODUCED

WITHOUT PERMISSION.

TECHNICAL DATA

IMAGE PLACEMENT: IA IB IIA IIB

REDUCTION RATIO: 1.2X

FILM STOCK:

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
 abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
 abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
 abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

PM-MGP 13"x18"
 METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
 PHOTOGRAPHIC

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
 abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

1.0 mm
 1.5 mm
 2.0 mm
 2.5 mm

PRECISIONSM RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

1303 Geneva Avenue
 St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
 abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

4.5 mm

2.0

MULTIPLE EXPOSURES DUE TO COLOR VARIATIONS
AND OVERLAPPING MATERIAL

VOLUME 49

1929-1930

No. M. 125.5. 49

GIVEN BY

Miss Mary Brown

++ M. 125.6.49

1

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

(110 Musicians)

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor

8010

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

(110 Musicians)

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor

2-10

2

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky

CONDUCTOR

OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

HAS KINDLY CONSENTED TO GIVE A

Double-Bass Recital

IN SYMPHONY HALL

ON TUESDAY EVENING, OCTOBER 22, AT

8.30 O'CLOCK

For the joint benefit of the Elizabeth Peabody House and the Travelers Aid Society of Boston.

Dr. Koussevitzky will be assisted by Mr. Fraser Gange, Basso, an orchestra of twelve players from the Orchestra, and Mr. Pierre Luboshutz, Pianist.

Tickets for reserved seats at $1.50, $2.00, $3.00 and $5.00 are now on sale at the Box Office of Symphony Hall.

Reception to Dr. and Mrs. Koussevitzky in the Foyer of Symphony Hall, after the Concert.

The Steinway Piano Used.

Miss Mary Brown
July 16, 1932

3

SYMPHONY HALL

49th SEASON, 1929-1930

SIX TUESDAY AFTERNOON CONCERTS

December 10 January 7 February 11 February 25 March 11 April 22

SIX MONDAY EVENING CONCERTS

November 11 December 2 January 27 February 17 March 17 April 28

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

(110 Musicians)

Dr. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor

SEASON TICKETS ARE STILL AVAILABLE AT THE SUBSCRIPTION OFFICE

W. H. BRENNAN, Manager

G. E. JUDD, Assistant Manager

The Massachusetts Division of University Extension in coöperation with

The Public Library of the City of Boston

OFFERS DURING 1929-1930

A Series of Lectures, with Music
ON THE Boston Symphony Concerts on the Thursdays preceding the Concerts at 5.15 p.m.

in the Lecture Hall, Boston Public Library
(Boylston Street Entrance)

These lectures are intended for all who wish to gain a keener enjoyment and appreciation of symphonic music whether attending concerts, "listening in," or following phonograph recordings. Based on the programmes of the regular subscription series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the course assures an invaluable introduction to all symphonic repertory, contributing to the understanding of the Monday and Tuesday and Pension Fund series and to other occasional concerts.

Enrollment, $2 for twenty-four lectures; $2 additional for mail notices or thematic outlines; $10 for credit students.

TO OUR SYMPHONY SUBSCRIBERS

It is suggested that subscribers who for any reason find themselves unable to attend the Symphony Concerts, and whose tickets would not otherwise be used, send them in to be sold for the benefit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc. Endowment Fund.

Last season the Endowment Fund received over $7,000.00 from this source.

Kindly send tickets as early each week as convenient to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., Symphony Hall, Boston.

(If it is too late to mail the tickets, kindly telephone their location to Symphony Hall, Commonwealth 1492.)

July 19 32
1 VCont

SYMPHONY HALL, BOSTON

HUNTINGTON AND MASSACHUSETTS AVENUES

Branch Exchange Telephones, Ticket and Administration Offices, Commonwealth 1492

Boston Symphony Orchestra

INC.

Dr. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor

FORTY-NINTH SEASON, 1929-1930

Programme

WITH HISTORICAL AND DESCRIPTIVE
NOTES BY PHILIP HALE

COPYRIGHT, 1929, BY BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, INC.

THE OFFICERS AND TRUSTEES OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Inc.

FREDERICK P. CABOT	President
BENTLEY W. WARREN	Vice-President
ERNEST B. DANE	Treasurer

FREDERICK P. CABOT	FREDERICK E. LOWELL
ERNEST B. DANE	ARTHUR LYMAN
N. PENROSE HALLOWELL	EDWARD M. PICKMAN
M. A. DE WOLFE HOWE	HENRY B. SAWYER
JOHN ELLERTON LODGE	BENTLEY W. WARREN

W. H. BRENNAN, Manager

G. E. JUDD, Assistant Manager

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Forty-ninth Season, 1929-1930

Dr. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor

PERSONNEL

VIOLINS.
Burgin, R. Concert-master Theodorowicz, J.	Elcus, G. Kreinin, B.	Gundersen, R. Kassman, N.	Sauvlet, H. Hamilton, V.
Hansen, E. Pinfield, C.	Lauga, N. Mariotti, V.	Fedorovsky, P. Leveen, P.	Leibovici, J. Tapley, R.
Thillois, F. Mayer, P.	Zung, M. Diamond, S.	Knudson, C. Zide, L.	Gorodetzky, L. Fiedler, B.
Bryant, M. Murray, J.	Beale, M. Del Sordo, R.	Stonestreet, L. Erkelens, H.	Messina, S. Seiniger, S.
VIOLAS.
Lefranc, J. Artières, L.	Fourel, G. Cauhapé, J.	Van Wynbergen, C. Bernard, A.	Grover, H. Werner, H.
	Avierino, N. Gerhardt, S.		Fiedler, A. Deane, C.
VIOLONCELLOS.
Bedetti, J. Zighera, A.	Langendoen, J. Barth, C.	Chardon, Y. Droeghmans, H.	Stockbridge, C. Warnke, J.
BASSES.
Kunze, M. Vondrak, A.	Lemaire, J. Oliver, F.	Ludwig, O. Frankel, I.	Girard, H. Dufresne, G.
KELLEY, A. DEMETRIDES, L.
FLUTES.		OBOES.
Laurent, G. Bladet, G. Amerena, P.		Gillet, F. Devergie, J. Stanislaus, H.
CLARINETS.		BASSOONS.
		Hamelin, G. Arcieri, E. Allegra, E. (E-flat Clarinet)	Laus, A. Allard, R. Bettoney, F.
PICCOLO.		ENGLISH HORN.
Battles, A.		Speyer, L.
HORNS.		TRUMPETS.
Boettcher, G. Pogrebniak, S. Van Den Berg, C. Lorbeer, H.		Mager, G. Voisin, R. Lafosse, M. Perret, G. Mann, J.
TUBAS.		TIMPANI.
Sidow, P. Adam, E.		Ritter, A. Polster, M.
ORGAN.		CELESTA.
Snow, A.		Fiedler, A.
		LIBRARIAN.
		Rogers, L. J.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Forty-ninth Season, 1938-1939

Dr. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor

PERSONNEL

Violins
Violins I	Violins II	Violins III	Violins IV
Shaw, G.	Condit, N.	Shaw, H.	Cherkassky, P.
Shaw, B.	Rosen, N.	Hammond, V.	Ester, D.
Violas
Viola I	Viola II	Viola III	Viola IV
Johnson, N.	Fedorov, P.	Lefkowitz, J.	Jarvis, R.
Johnson, Y.	Lefkowitz, P.	Taylor, E.
Cellists
Cellist I	Cellist II	Cellist III	Cellist IV
Johnson, M.	Knudsen, C.	Gorodetsky, L.
Johnson, S.	Zide, L.	Fleisher, B.
Double Basses
Double Bass I	Double Bass II	Double Bass III	Double Bass IV
Johnson, B.	Stonestreet, L.	Messina, S.
	Erment, H.	Schnitzer, S.
Violoncellos
Violoncello I	Violoncello II	Violoncello III	Violoncello IV
Johnson, J.	Van Wyndeggen, C.	Grover, H.
	Bernard, A.	Werner, H.
Contrabasses
Contra Bass I	Contra Bass II	Contra Bass III	Contra Bass IV
Johnson, N.		Fiedler, A.
Gerhardt, S.		Deane, C.
Woodwinds
Flutes	Flutes	Flutes	Flutes
Larsen, J.	Chapman, Y.	Stuckbridge, C.	Fabrizio, E.
Burns, L.	Drögmann, H.	Ward, J.	Marjoleit, L.
Basses
Bass I	Bass II	Bass III	Bass IV
Johnson, J.	Ludwig, C.	Girard, H.	Kelley, A.
Johnson, F.	Franklin, I.	Dufresne, G.	Demetrides, L.
Clarinets
Clarinet I	Clarinet II	Clarinet III	Clarinet IV
Gillet, F.	Händlin, G.
Day, J.	Arletti, E.
Stanislav, H.	Allegria, E.
Bassoons
Bassoon I	Bassoon II	Bassoon III	Bassoon IV
English Horns
English Horn I	English Horn II	English Horn III	English Horn IV
Speyer, L.
Horns
Horn I	Horn II	Horn III	Horn IV
Valkenier, W.	Mager, G.
Schindler, G.	Voisin, K.
Lannoy, M.	Lafosse, M.
Blot, G.	Perret, G.
	Mann, J.
Trumpets
Trumpet I	Trumpet II	Trumpet III	Trumpet IV
Trombones
Trombone I	Trombone II	Trombone III	Trombone IV
Harp
Harp Zighera, B.
Caughy, E.
Tympani
Tympani
Celesta
Celesta
Fiedler, A.
Percussion
Percussion I	Percussion II	Percussion III	Percussion IV
Librarian
Librarian
Rogers, L. J.

Several years ago, London and Paris became aware of a quite extraordinary Russian conductor. Under the transforming hand of Serge Koussevitzky, a classic symphony would glow with fresh life, a romantic score would sing with a new and unprecedented eloquence, a composition of our own day would reveal an unsuspected creative vitality.

When it was announced five years ago that such a leader would have such an instrument as the Boston Symphony Orchestra to do his bidding, new marvels in symphonic performance were anticipated.

Koussevitzky's first season with the Boston Symphony Orchestra astonished even those who had expected the most from this ideal union. And in succeeding seasons, conductor and orchestra have touched new heights of executive perfection, tonal splendor, and interpretative vision.

In a word, Koussevitzky has once more proven himself the genius to whom an achievement, however great, can only be the starting point towards a still subtler beauty and a still deeper significance.

Thus, a transcendent chapter is being added to the history of what has been, these many years, the finest symphony orchestra in the world. To the forward-looking leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, its fiftieth season (1930-1931) is the next horizon.

WORKS PERFORMED AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS DURING THE SEASON OF 1929-1930

Works marked with an asterisk were performed for the first time at these concerts.
Works marked with a double asterisk were performed for the first time in Boston.
Works marked with a dagger were performed for the first time anywhere.
Artists marked with an asterisk appeared at these concerts for the first time.
Artists marked with a double asterisk appeared for the first time in Boston.
Artists marked with a dagger are members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

- BACH, J. S.: Brandenburg Concerto, No. 3, G major, for strings, December 6, 1929
Prelude and Fugue in E-flat (for organ) (arranged by SCHÖNBERG)*, February 28, 1930, March 28, 1930 . 1337, BAX: Symphony No. 2, E minor and C,† December 13, 1929, January 3, 1930 . 610
BEETHOVEN: Symphony No. 4, B-flat major, Op. 60, December 27, 1929
Symphony No. 5, C minor, Op. 67, October 11, 1929
Symphony No. 6, F major, Op. 68, April 4, 1930
Concerto for pianoforte, No. 4, G major, Op. 58 (ARTUR SCHNABEL), April 4, 1930. Sketch
Overture to "Leonore," No. 3, Op. 72, April 4, 1930
Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," Op. 84, October 11, 1929
BLOCH: "Schelomo" ("Solomon") Hebrew Rhapsody for violoncello (FELIX SALMOND*) and orchestra, December 27, 1929
BORODIN: Symphony No. 2, B minor, Op. 5, November 29, 1929
BRAHMS: Symphony No. 2, D major, Op. 73, March 21, 1930
Symphony No. 1, C minor, May 2, 1930
Symphony No. 3, F major, Op. 90, March 21, 1930
Academic Festival Overture, Op. 80, March 21, 1930
CHADWICK: Sinfonietta in F major, April 25, 1930
DEBUSSY: "La Mer," October 11, 1929
"La Damselle Émue" (Mme. RITTER-CIAMPI; JEAN MACDONALD*; Radcliffe Choral Society), February 14, 1930
"Le Martyre de Saint-Sebastien"* (as a whole) (Mme. RITTER-CIAMPI; The Cecilia Society), February 14, 1930
DE FALLA: Three Dances from "El Sombrero de Tres Picos," January 31, 1930
"Nights in the Gardens of Spain," for piano (Mr. SANROMÁ) and orchestra, February 21, 1930
DVOŘÁK: Symphony No. 5, E minor, "From the New World," December 20, 1929
DUKELSKY: Symphony No. 2,† D-flat major, April 25, 1930
EICHHEIM: "Java," November 15, 1929
"Burma," November 15, 1929
FAIRCHILD: "Chants Nègres,"† December 6, 1929
GALLIARD: Sonata, G major (freely transcribed for small orchestra by STEINBERG), March 14, 1930
GARDNER: "Broadway,"† April 18, 1930
GLAZOUNOV: Symphony No. 6, C minor, Op. 58, January 17, 1930
Concerto for violin, Op. 82 (BENNO RABINOFF), January 17, 1930
"Stenka Razin," Op. 13, January 17, 1930

GOOSSENS: Concertino for Double String Orchestra, January 24, 1930

GRUENBERG: "The Enchanted Isle," November 8, 1929
"Jazz Suite," February 21, 1930

HANDEL: Concerto Grosso for string orchestra, Op. 6, No. 10, October 18, 1929

HAYDN: Symphony, D major (with the Horn Call)—B. & H., No. 31, February 21, 1930, March 28, 1930 . . . 1259

HILL: "Lilacs," May 2, 1930

JOSTEN: "Jungle,"† symphonic poem, October 25, 1929

LAZAR: Concerto Grosso, No. 1, for orchestra, in the Old Style,† February 21, 1930

LISZT: Concerto for piano, E-flat major, No. 1 (JOSÉ ITURBI,* pianist), December 13, 1929

LOEFFLER: Canticum Fratris Solis (after St. Francis of Assisi) for voice (POVLA FRIJSH) and orchestra, January 3, 1930

MARTELLI: Assyrian Bas-Reliefs (first time in the United States), March 14, 1930

MOUSSORGSKY: Prelude to the opera "Khovanstchina," December 20, 1929

MOZART: Symphony, E-flat major (K. 543), November 8, 1929
Symphony, C major, No. 34 (K. 338), April 25, 1930
Overture to "The Magic Flute," December 27, 1929
"Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" (K. 525), January 31, 1930

PICK-MANGIAGALLI: Prelude and Fugue, October 11, 1929

PISTON: Suite for Orchestra,† March 28, 1930

PROKOFIEFF: Scythian Suite, Op. 20, January 31, 1930
Piano Concerto, No. 2, G minor, Op. 16 (SERGE PROKOFIEFF, pianist) (first time in the United States), January 31, 1930

RAVEL: "Ma Mère l'Oye," November 8, 1929
"Bolero," December 6, 1929, January 3, 1930 . . . 52
Orchestral Excerpts from "Daphnis et Chloé" (Second Suite), December 20, 1929
Rapsodie Espagnole, May 2, 1930

RESPIGHI: Symphonic Poem, "The Pines of Rome," December 13, 1929
"Feste Romane," January 24, 1930

RIMSKY-KORSAKOV: Suite from "Le Coq d'Or," November 29, 1929
"Sadko," Op. 5, December 20, 1929

SAINT-SAËNS: Symphony No. 3, C minor, Op. 78, April 18, 1930
Concerto, B minor, for violin (JACQUES THIBAUD) and orchestra, No. 3, Op. 61, November 29, 1929

SCHUMANN: Symphony No. 1, B-flat major, Op. 38, January 24, 1930
Symphony No. 2, C major, Op. 61, December 6, 1929

SIBELIUS: Symphony No. 2, D major, Op. 43, October 18, 1929
Symphony No. 6, Op. 104, February 28, 1930, March 28, 1930 . . . 1380
Concerto, D minor, for violin (RICHARD BURGINT†) and orchestra, Op. 47, February 28, 1930

SPOHR: Notturmo for Wind Instruments and Janissaries Music, Op. 34, November 15, 1929

STRAUSS: Interlude from "Intermezzo," Op. 72, October 18, 1929
"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," Op. 28, November 8, 1929
Symphonia Domestica, Op. 53, November 15, 1929
An Alpine Symphony, Op. 64, March 14, 1930
"Don Juan," Tone Poem, Op. 20, April 25, 1930

STRAVINSKY: Suite from "L'Oiseau de Feu," October 18, 1929
"Apollon Musagète," April 18, 1930

TCHAIKOVSKY: Symphony No. 6, B minor, "Pathetic," October 25, 1929 . . .
Ouverture Solennelle, 1812, December 27, 1929 . . .

TOURNIER: "Féerie," Prelude and Dance for harp (BERNARD ZIGHERA†) with orchestra (first time with orchestra), December 20, 1929 . . .

VIVALDI: Concerto in D minor for orchestra, with organ (edited by SILOTI), October 25, 1929 . . .

WAGNER: A Faust Overture, January 24, 1930
Prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan und Isolde," February 28, 1930 . . .

WALTON: Overture, "Portsmouth Point," January 3, 1930 . .

WEBER: Overture to "Euryanthe," December 13, 1929 . . .
Overture to "Oberon," May 2, 1930 . . .

WETZLER: Symphonic Dance in Basque Style, from the opera "The Basque Venus," Op. 14, November 29, 1929 . .

GUEST CONDUCTORS

BURGIN,† RICHARD, conducted the concerts of November 29, 30, 1929: Rimsky-Korsakov, Suite from "Le Coq d'Or"; Borodin, Symphony No. 2, B minor; Saint-Saëns, Violin Concerto, B minor, No. 3 (JACQUES THIBAUD); Wetzler, Symphonic Dance in Basque Style, from "The Basque Venus."

EICHHEIM, HENRY, conducted his symphonic poems, "Java" and "Burma," at the concerts of November 15, 16, 1929.

GARDNER, SAMUEL,* conducted his "Broadway"† on April 18, 19, 1930.

GLAZOUNOV, ALEXANDER, conducted the concerts of January 17, 18, 1930: Glazounov's Symphony No. 6, Violin Concerto (BENNO RABINOFF, violinist), and "Stenka Razin."

GOOSSENS, EUGENE, conducted the concerts of January 24, 25, 1930: Wagner, a Faust Symphony; Schumann, Symphony No. 1, B-flat major; Goossens, Concertino for Double String Orchestra; Respighi, "Feste Romane."

PISTON,* WALTER, at the concerts of March 28, 29, 1930, conducted his Suite for Orchestra.†

THE FOLLOWING ARTISTS HAVE APPEARED AS SOLOISTS
THIS SEASON

BURGIN,† RICHARD, concert master (Sibelius's Violin Concerto),
February 28, 1930. Sketch
FRIJSH, POVLA, soprano (Loeffler's "Canticum Fratris Solis"),
January 3, 1930
ITURBI,* JOSÉ, pianist (Liszt's Concerto in E-flat major, No. 1)
December 13, 1929. Sketch
PROKOFIEFF, SERGE, pianist (Prokofieff's Piano Concerto, G minor, No. 2—first time in the United States), January 31, 1930. Sketch
RABINOFF, BENNO, violinist (Glazounov's Violin Concerto),
January 17, 1930
SALMOND,* FELIX, violoncellist (Bloch's "Schelomo"), December 27, 1929
SANROMÁ, JESÚS MARÍA, pianist ("Nights in the Gardens of Spain"), February 21, 1930. Sketch
SCHNABEL, ARTUR, pianist (Beethoven's Piano Concerto, G major,
No. 4), April 4, 1930. Sketch
THIBAUD, JACQUES, violinist (Saint-Saëns's Concerto in B minor,
No. 3), November 29, 1929. Sketch ZIGHERA,†* BERNARD, harpist (Tournier's Prelude and Dance, for harp with orchestra), December 20, 1929. Sketch .

Singers: Soprano, Povla Frijsh
Violinists: Richard Burgin,† Benno Rabinoff, Jacques Thibaud Pianists: José Iturbi,* Serge Prokofieff, Jesús María Sanromá,
Artur Schnabel
Violoncellist: Felix Salmond
Harpist: Bernard Zighera†

THE FOLLOWING HAVE ASSISTED IN PERFORMANCES

February 14, 15, 1930. Mme. RITTER-CIAMPI, soprano; JEAN MACDONALD, contralto, and the RADCLIFFE CHORAL SOCIETY, in Debussy's "La Damselle Édue." Mme. RITTER-CIAMPI and the CECILIA SOCIETY in Debussy's "Le Martyr de Saint-Sebastien."* The RADCLIFFE SOCIETY trained by its conductor, G. WALLACE WOODWORTH; the CECILIA by its conductor, ARTHUR FIEDLER.†

April 18, 1930. ALBERT SNOW,† organist, Saint-Saëns's Symphony
No. 3, C minor.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

THE FOLLOWING ARTISTS HAVE APPEARED AS SOLOISTS
THIS SEASON

BURGIN,[†] Richard, concert master (Sibelius's Violin Concerto,
February 28, 1930. Sketch.
FRIDLI, POVLIA, soprano (Loeffer's "Canticum Francis Solis"
January 3, 1930.
FRUMI,[†] Josef, pianist (Liszt's Concerto in E-flat major, No. 1)
December 13, 1929. Sketch.
PROKOFIEFF, SERGEI, pianist (Prokofiev's Piano Concerto, G
minor, No. 2. First time in the United States, January 31, 1930. Sketch.
RABINOFF,[†] BENNO, violinist (Glagourov's Violin Concerto,
January 17, 1930.
SALMOND, FELIX, violoncellist (Bach's "Solos" December 27, 1929.
SANROMA, JESUS MARIA, pianist "Nights by the Gardens of Spain", February 21, 1930. Sketch.
SCHNADT, ARTHUR, pianist (Bach's Piano Concerto, G major,
No. 1, April 4, 1930. Sketch.
TUDAT, JACQUES, violinist (Saint-Saens's Concerto in D major,
No. 3, November 29, 1929. Sketch.
ZICHORA,[†] BENNY, hornist (Toscanini's Prelude and Dance for horn with orchestra December 29, 1929. Sketch.

Singers: Soprano, Paula French
Vocalists: Richard Burgin, Benno Rabinoff, Jacques Tudat.
Pianists: Josef Frumi, Sergei Prokofiev, Jesus Maria Sanroma, Arthur Schnadt.
Violoncellist: Felix Salmond.
Hornist: Benny Zichora.

THE FOLLOWING HAVE ASSISTED IN EVERY DANCE

February 10-15, 1930. Music: Max Baer, Conductor. Team: Maynard, conductor, and the 12 dancers. (Dance: S. T. P. in Moscow, 8-10-1929. Team: Maynard, conductor, and the 12 dancers. (Dance: S. T. P. in Moscow, 8-10-1929.
Solos: Maynard, conductor, and the 12 dancers. (Dance: S. T. P. in Moscow, 8-10-1929. Team: Maynard, conductor, and
the 12 dancers. (Dance: S. T. P. in Moscow, 8-10-1929.
April 18, 1930. Music: S. T. P. in Moscow, 8-10-1929.
Nov. 1, 1930.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Dr. Koussevitzky Again as Virtuoso

Giving Pleasure as Composer, Transcriber and Player Of the Double Bass

Trans. — Oct. 22, 1929

THE double bass has conquered. Even the outward aspects of a Koussevitzkian concert may now be compared only with those of the best attended Sunday afternoon concerts at Symphony Hall. One remembers when Dr. Koussevitzky gave his first recital in Boston, the audience, so it seemed, was confined to the curious and the well-wishers, and the group of them was none too large. Witness in contrast the scene last night. Every seat taken. On the stage the familiar enclosures making room for two more blocks of seats. But there the comparison stops. For unlike the mixed audiences of Sunday afternoons to hear a Kreisler or a McCormack, society—with a capital S—had taken it over. And the scene which greeted the eye was not too different from that which for two weeks every winter greets it at the Boston Opera House. Fortunate indeed the charity, in this case the Elizabeth Peabody House, which is able to muster such support.

And it is the artist rather than the cause that draws people into concert halls. Worthy charities, popular causes, have gone begging for an audience if the artist does not possess that magnetic power which compels people to leave other things to come to hear him. That Dr. Koussevitzky possesses such power was proved more abundantly than ever last evening. Nor must one forget the presence of that excellent bass, Mr. Fraser Gange.

Mozart twice, Bruch, Brahms, Koussevitzky stood upon the program. From a Mozartian concerto for bassoon, Dr. Koussevitzky made transcription for his favored instrument, added to it a cadenza which explored the heights and the depths of that instrument. The cynic may wave aside the idea of Mozart on a double bass; Mozart, the composer of grace and lightness and fluent utterance. But Mozart from Dr. Koussevitzky and his double bass, last evening sounded more characteristic than it sometimes does from many an instrument which fairly invites Mozartian utterance. Suavity of melody, delicacy of phrasing and nuance, rapidity of speech, none of these could be denied this concerto for the ponderous instrument.

There followed an aria, also of Mozart, for baritone with double-bass obbligato and small orchestra, "Per questa bella mano." This is a concert-aria written by Mozart at Vienna that reason of his personal week. The sang Sarastro in "The to prepare Pischlberger, a cele- at pointing player upon the double a year I been those who have ess a com internal evidence that is some ritten for some higher- ing week than the double bass. Duke as it that he wrote, "Für is for the rger" should be suffi- such theorizing. The what one would expect Mozart wrote for two ad depart, as his opportunity to ning an The music is pleasant. to watchy attention to wander. e Eagles Koussevitzky, and with Luke Ur and a group of Sym- d, is sti, surely at one with Mo- n, which g a yard Koussevitzky's version er. This setting of the ancient other the Kol Nidrei." And with and it is of feeling, beauty of Canisius did not associate with until Dr. Koussevitzky's ift to his years ago. followed his chief opportunity av it will a group of four songs forms of Ernste Gesänge, Op. and side s songs"). More often gainst St to hear these songs. defeated Bible texts, two from w passes, simistic Ecclesiastes, hem. ty; where the writer is ear to b nan is better than the ng to Mo d, in that all die the ered quite he praises death as port from ed than life; from the he entire lesiasticus, a song in lay. The d lastly, as if Brahms ng to the hands of such gloom, famous passage from "If I spake with the nd angels and had not ahms himself, from the s giving the answer to re much- preacher of the Old. out they e perfect expression of stance in olemn texts. They are, d with a gems of the first order ne. And Happily, one can con- d is that st Mr. Gange was high included ple of Brahms and the i "Steam. y and intelligence with vens and dom matched.

Putnam Koussevitzky and his quarter been heard before at Mays, the too is pleasant and of the Team music. It ranges wide re, Sam abilities of the instrutheir prob- plete exposition of the observer of the double bass— be horse more than is usually ood, Dev urse Dr. Koussevitzky st Dart kill; of course, as per- ble first much as composer, he s as re ected from his bass; of demand music and instrument could be the ardent touch. And course of applause was deafening dered by A. H. M.

OCTOBER 19, 1929

OCTOBER 19, 1929

pretation

ector's Degree from se, Hitherto
on

Dr. Koussevitzky Again as Virtu

Giving Pleasure as Comp Transcriber and Play Of the Double Bass

Trans. — Oct. 22.

THE double bass has conquered.

the outward aspects of a K vitzkian concert may now be pared only with those of the best a ed Sunday afternoon concerts at phony Hall. One remembers whe

Koussevitzky gave his first recit

Boston, the audience, so it seemed confined to the curious and the wishers, and the group of them

none too large. Witness in contr scene last night. Every seat taken the stage the familiar enclosures m room for two more blocks of seats.

there the comparison stops. For the mixed audiences of Sunday

noons to hear a Kreisler or a M mack, society—with a capital S taken it over. And the scene greeted the eye was not too dif

from that which for two weeks

winter greets it at the Boston

House. Fortunate indeed the chari

this case the Elizabeth Peabody H which is able to muster such supp

And it is the artist rather than cause that draws people into co halls. Worthy charities, popular ca have gone begging for an audience artist does not possess that mag power which compels people to leave things to come to hear him. That Koussevitzky possesses such power proved more abundantly than ever evening. Nor must one forget the ence of that excellent bass, Mr. F

Gange.

Mozart twice, Bruch, Brahms, K

vitzky stood upon the program. Fr

Mozartian concerto for bassoon, Dr. I sevitzky made transcription for hi

vored instrument, added to it a cad which explored the heights and the d of that instrument. The cynic may aside the idea of Mozart on a d

bass; Mozart, the composer of grace lightness and fluent utterance.

Mozart from Dr. Koussevitzky and double bass, last evening sounded characteristic than it sometimes from many an instrument which invites Mozartian utterance. Suavi melody, delicacy of phrasing and nu rapidity of speech, none of these cou denied this concerto for the pondero

strument.

There followed an aria, also

Mozart, for baritone with double obbligato and small orchestra.

questa bella mano." This is a cert-aria written by Mozart at Vi

in 1791 for two of his personal friends: Gerl, who sang Sarastro in "The Magic Flute"; and Pischlberger, a celebrated Viennese player upon the double bass. There have been those who have tried to prove by internal evidence that the obbligato was written for some higher-pitched instrument than the double bass. The fact, however, that he wrote, "Für Gerl und Pischlberger" should be sufficient answer to such theorizing. The piece is exactly what one would expect of an air which Mozart wrote for two friends. Each has his opportunity to show his skill. The music is pleasant. It does not allow attention to wander. Mr. Gange, Dr. Koussevitzky, and with them Mr. Burgin and a group of Symphony men, were surely at one with Mozartian desires. Came next Dr. Koussevitzky's version of Max Bruch's setting of the ancient Hebrew melody, "Kol Nidrel." And with none too large. Witness in contrast it came warmth of feeling, beauty of tone, such as one did not associate with the double bass until Dr. Koussevitzky's first concert two years ago.

For Mr. Gange had his chief opportunity of the evening in a group of four songs of Brahms: "Vier Ernste Gesänge, Op. 121" (four "serious songs"). More often one would like to hear these songs. They are set to Bible texts, two from the cynical, pessimistic Ecclesiastes, where all is vanity; where the writer is not certain that man is better than the beasts of the field, in that all die the same death; where he praises death as more to be desired than life; from the apocryphical Ecclesiasticus, a song in the same vein; and lastly, as if Brahms were washing his hands of such gloom, a song on the famous passage from First Corinthians, "If I spake with the tongue of men and angels and had not love. . . ." Brahms himself, from the New Testament, is giving the answer to the doubt-laden preacher of the Old.

And the songs are perfect expression of the ideas of the solemn texts. They are, purely as music, gems of the first order of magnitude. Happily, one can continue, and say that Mr. Gange was high priest in the temple of Brahms and the Book. His artistry and intelligence with his songs are seldom matched.

Finally came Dr. Koussevitzky and his concerto. It has been heard before at his concerts. It too is pleasant and often expressive music. It ranges wide through the possibilities of the instrument. One would not go far wrong in calling it a complete exposition of the many capabilities of the double bass—and they are far more than is usually realized. Of course Dr. Koussevitzky played it with skill; of course, as performer quite as much as composer, he drew the unexpected from his bass; of course he gave music and instrument the loving and the ardent touch. And also, of course, applause was deafening and long-continued.

A. H. M.

OCTOBER 19, 1929

OCTOBER 19, 1929

pretation

ector's Degree from se, Hitherto
on

Dr. Koussevitzky Again as Virtu

Giving Pleasure as Comp Transcriber and Play
Of the Double Bass

Trans. — Oct. 22.

THE double bass has conquered. the outward aspects of a K vitzkian concert may now be pared only with those of the best a ed Sunday afternoon concerts at phony Hall. One remembers whe Koussevitzky gave his first recit Boston, the audience, so it seemed confined to the curious and the wishers, and the group of them none too large. Witness in contra scene last night. Every seat taken the stage the familiar enclosures m room for two more blocks of seats. there the comparison stops. For the mixed audiences of Sunday noons to hear a Kreisler or a M mack, society—with a capital S taken it over. And the scene greeted the eye was not too diff from that which for two weeks winter greets it at the Boston House. Fortunate indeed the chari this case the Elizabeth Peabody F which is able to muster such supp And it is the artist rather than cause that draws people into co halls. Worthy charities, popular ce have gone begging for an audience artist does not possess that mag power which compels people to leave things to come to hear him. That Koussevitzky possesses such power proved more abundantly than ever evening. Nor must one forget the ence of that excellent bass, Mr. F Gange.

Mozart twice, Bruch, Brahms, K vitzky stood upon the program. Fr Mozartian concerto for bassoon, Dr. I sevitzy made transcription for hi vored instrument, added to it a cad which explored the heights and the d of that instrument. The cynic may aside the idea of Mozart on a d bass; Mozart, the composer of grace lightness and fluent utterance. Mozart from Dr. Koussevitzky and double bass, last evening sounded characteristic than it sometimes from many an instrument which i invites Mozartian utterance. Suavi melody, delicacy of phrasing and nu rapidity of speech, none of these cou denied this concerto for the pondero strument.

There followed an aria, also Mozart, for baritone with double obligato and small orchestra, questa bella mano." This is a cert-aria written by Mozart at Vi

in 1791 for two of his personal friends: Gerl, who sang Sarastro in "The Magic Flute"; and Pischlberger, a celebrated Viennese player upon the double bass. The tried to p the obbli pitched in The fact, Gerl und cient ans piece is e of an air friends.

show his

It does r

Mr. Gang

them Mr.

phony me

zartian d

Came n

of Max I

Hebrew n

it came tone, such

the doubl

first conce

Mr. Ga

of the eve of Brahm

121" (four

one woul

They are the cyni

where all not certai beasts of same deat

more to apocryphi

the same

were wast

a song o

First Cort

tongue of love. . .

New Test

the doub

And the s

the ideas

purely as of magni

tinue, and priest in

Book. Hi

his songs

Finally

concerto.

his conce

ten expre

through t

ment. Or calling it many car and they realized.

played it

former qu

drew the course he

the loving also, of co

and long-continued.

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 19, 1929

Koussevitzky on Interpretation

The Conductor Acknowledges His Doctor's Degree from Harvard with a Brief Discourse, Hitherto Only Privately Printed, on His Art

A. H. M.

Oct 10, 1929

with many an item to whet anticipatory interest. Mr. Koussevitzky, like most of us, believes in Hindemith and gives him a room. . . . Prokofiev will be guest of the orchestra, with this new Symphony, produced in Paris last spring, in his portfolio. . . . No other American conductor lends an ear to Schönberg and his disciples; but here, warrantably, are "the master's Variations that got Berlin by the ears last winter, along with Berg's three pieces. Not since Dr. Muck's time has Schönberg figured at the Symphony Concerts as composer in his own right."

Bax, Roussel and Enesco are established composers whose new work conductors in London, Paris and American cities receive gladly. . . . Hauer, out of Central Europe, has made some stir at the festivals of the Society for Contemporary Music. . . . Krein and Pick-Mangia are respectively a Russian and an Italian deserving to be heard. . . . To Lazar, Roumanian of Paris, Mr. Koussevitzky once before gave place. . . . Wetzler's "Baskische Venus," music upon motive from the Basque country, is going the rounds of Germany. . . . Strauss recommended to Mr. Koussevitzky the half-forgotten Spohr—a hundred years ago a high-reputed composer. . . . There are still humors to be discovered in Satie's posthumous scores. . . .

Again Mr. Koussevitzky keeps the faith. For it is the bounden duty of the conductor of the Boston Orchestra to inform its audiences about the music of the day; to choose that music far and wide, from old and young; from many faiths and practices. . . . Add the promised performance of Strauss' "Don Quixote" with which the conductor should excel; the possible production of the concert version, choruses included, of Debussy's music to d'Annunzio's play, "The Martyrdom of St. Sebastian"—work of the composer's prime—and the prospect again widens. Where Mr. Koussevitzky is, there is vitality and not routine.

Berg: Three pieces for String Orchestra
 Epohr: Suite for Wind Orchestra
 Bax: Symphony No. 2
 Prokofiev: Symphony No. 3
 Hindemith: Concerto for Wind Instruments
 Wetzler: "Baskische Venus"
 Hauer: Sinfonietta
 Pick-Mangiagalli: Prelude and Fugue
 Enesco: Suite
 Roussel: Suite (first performance)
 Krein: "Chant de David"
 Martelli: Bas-Reliefs
 Satie: Five Grimaces
 Lazar: Concerto Grosso
 Schoenberg: Variations

Again a characteristic, justifiable list

be brought into closest union with one another. Such a connection is surely well-founded, for at the beginning poetry and music formed a united and indivisible whole. In remote times they existed in a united and indivisible tonal art, and their separation took place rather late. One cannot, on a sound basis, consider painting as the mother of poetry, or affirm that literature gave birth to architecture. To admit that would seem—if not an obvious absurdity—in any case a great paradox. But, if we make a parallel between poetry and music, the situation changes. Between these two arts there is an extraordinary relationship and an astonishing nearness.

(Pushkin: "Mozart and Salieri.") to not intend to make a parallel a poetry and music in order to out their common features, but r to distinguish one fundamental ity which divides them: poetry t music. Its meaning is in the un-ied and untold. Music is the sing-ice of poetry: Let us again re-r the poet's verses:

Keep still thy voice and disappear
and hide thy heart and dreams."

(Tutchev: "Silentium.")

is the real reciprocal relation between poetry and music. When they are incorporated in concrete words, their relation becomes as if inverse. As much as they attract each other before their incorporation in form and images, when they are still dwell in the state of element, as much do they repulse each other and when taking a literary or tonal form. This erotic union and disjunction which reminds one of the myth of Eros and Psyche (see above) is like a symbol eternally ing itself and calling to rememthe bygone existing unity and the e which once occurred.

n poetry incorporates itself into it needs tranquility: it seems to amed of its literary nudity and ds silence. On the contrary, munism it takes a concrete shape, ap-to be chained by quietness and vio-claims to be expressed in real Only bad verses aspire to be proded, playing with the sonority of good verses are fond of stillness dence. In music, we observe the te phenomenon; only bad music ile to its tonal expression—that is, to its final expression—that is, which contents itself with its output (Papiermusik). Good music re- to be unchained in reproduction. d poetry nearly always sound- cal; therefore good verses must be to oneself, and not aloud. ic which does not sound appears a dead world and loses its signifi- its meaning dwells only in the realization. Verses which are not read (let alone not pronounced) do se their active power, but keep in stertuous manner the ascendancy try. Goethe and Petrarch do not heir power and strength, but are ndent of the fact whether they are bled and read.

music it is quite different. Upper- l works form dead layers, which vered with more dead layers, and porary errors are often explained orance and by not listening to the

"New, First Times"

FROM Mr. Koussevitzky's ever-courteous hands, in sign of the beginning of a new musical year, comes a list of the new pieces upon his study-table or in mind for performance at the Symphony Concerts. The American items are:

Mason: "Chantecler" (Overture)
Gardner: "Broadway"
Copland: Symphony Sessions: Symphony
Fairchild: "Chants Nègres" Gruenberg: "Enchanted Isle"
Josten: "Jungle" (Poem for Orchestra)

A promising list! Mr. Mason's overture, produced last winter, runs in animated vein, everywhere has pleased exacting and unexacting ears. . . . "Broadway," tone-poem or tone-picture, composed by the former violinist, ranked second in the prize-competition won by Bloch's "America." . . . Mr. Copland and Mr. Sessions are the "rising hopes" of the younger generation of American composers. Steadily and with reason Mr. Koussevitzky has encouraged them. More than once at the Symphony Concerts they have justified this fostering. Mr. Blair Fairchild, American composer with a light hand who prefers Paris as dwelling place, is new to Symphony Hall. So also is Mr. Grünberg, though Bostonians have heard elsewhere one or two of his experiments in jazz and other idioms. Mr. Josten of Smith College proved his deserts at the Symphony Concerts late last season; increased them by the setting of Dryden's "Ode for St. Cecilia's Day," produced last week at Worcester. So does Mr. Koussevitzky find room for American composers, in particular, for the young and ripening men. It is the obligation of a conductor, the honor of an artist, so to do.

Next the Europeans' share:

Berg: Three pieces for String Orchestra
Spohr: Suite for Wind Orchestra
Bax: Symphony No. 2
Prokofiev: Symphony No. 3
Hindemith: Concerto for Wind Instruments
Wetzler: "Baskische Venus"
Hauer: Sinfonietta
Plick-Manglagalli: Prelude and Fugue
Enesco: Suite
Roussel: Suite (first performance)
Kreln: "Chant de David"
Martelli: Bas-Reliefs
Satie: Five Grimaces
Lazar: Concerto Grosso
Schoenberg: Variations

Again a characteristic, justifiable list

with many an item to whet anticipatory interest. Mr. Koussevitzky, like most of us, believes in Hindemith and gives him room. . . . Prokofiev will be guest of the orchestra, with this new Symphony produced in Paris last spring, in his portfolio. . . . No other American conductor lends an ear to Schönberg and his disciples; but here, warrantably, are "the master's Variations that got Berlin by the ears last winter, along with Berg's three pieces. Not since Dr. Muck's time has Schönberg figured at the Symphony Concerts as composer in his own right. Bax, Roussel and Enesco are established composers whose new work conductor in London, Paris and American cities receive gladly. . . . Hauer, out of Central Europe, has made some stir at the festivals of the Society for Contemporary Music. . . . Kreln and Plick-Manglagalli are respectively a Russian and an Italian deserving to be heard. . . . To Lazar, Roumanian of Paris, Mr. Koussevitzky once before gave place. . . . Wetzler's "Baskische Venus," music upon motifs from the Basque country, is going in rounds of Germany. . . . Strauss recommended to Mr. Koussevitzky the half-forgotten Spohr—a hundred years ago a high-reputed composer. . . . There are still humors to be discovered in Samuel posthumous scores. . . .

Again Mr. Koussevitzky keeps the faith. For it is the bounden duty of the conductor of the Boston Orchestra to inform its audiences about music of the day; to choose that music far and wide, from old and young; to many faiths and practices. . . . At the promised performance of Strauss' "Don Quixote" with which the conductor should excel; the possible production of the concert version, choruses included, of Debussy's music to d'Annunzio's play, "The Martyrdom of St. Sebastian"—work of the composer's prime—and the prospect again widens. Where Mr. Koussevitzky is, there is vitality and routine.

Oct 10.

OF all the arts, are pre-eminent be brought with one another. Poetry is surely well-fitted to begin poetry and united and indivisible times they existed in visible tonal art, and took place rather late. a sound basis, consider, mother of poetry, or it. ture gave birth to archi- mit that would seem—its absurdity—in any case. Put, if we make a poetry and music, the sil- Between these two arts, extraordinary relationship ing nearness.

Contrary to artistic theory, one may on an equal rise of poetry out of or consider the inverse—sic from poetry. Both lead us to the same den- conclusions. Neither col- ology nor contemporary cepting a few individuals are endowed with the sci- proving the priority, that- cy, of one of these arts.

But both modern philo- musical research agree h- and music formed one; that dwelt in the mid- element. The disjunction music happened a long each of these arts led e and developed independe- but their passionate att- forever. Poetry always l- to music, so that it tri- time to become music; incarnate itself into it, e case with the symbolist ago. ("De la musique choses."—Verlaine.)

Music, in its manifesta- ward poetical expressio- indispensable both for poetry. The loss of lyric and deprives of its soul, is bi the same measure. much they have soug- course of their history, w- of each other, yet th- doomed to the same na- and not only to the sa- ture but to the material by chance that the tech- strumentation have been come so commonly neces- be doubted whether any- nores them. The same reference to poetical r- nics of which are near the construction of mus- of the meaning of po- which again is nearly s- intonation.

he ma- mother- bridge brother Pond, mother football ing the Mr. mer a where

Won

Miss

com

Edn

Mrs street ding a Bo- Willey home

The

at the been s

iness

both active eated

try an

Boston

Assoc

Wom

Lamb

presid

Assoc

Club

Calun

Shrin

M

Miss

day

Fost

Edn

night

ple, ne

thor a parent

at 132

C. A.

ning

Abou

attend

which sister and W man.

the br

in Nev

The School

the so

It is easy to bring together music and poetry. Both have one aim, if you remember the poet's words:

"Go on and hasten
To fill again my hungry soul
With music."

(Pushkin: "Mozart and Salleri.")

We do not intend to make a parallel between poetry and music in order to talk about their common features, but in order to distinguish one fundamental peculiarity which divides them: poetry is silent music. Its meaning is in the unexpressed and untold. Music is the singing voice of poetry: Let us again remember the poet's verses:

"Keep still thy voice and disappear
And hide thy heart and dreams."
(Tutchev: "Silentium.")

This is the real reciprocal relation between poetry and music. When they are incorporated in concrete words, their relation becomes as if inverse. As much as they attract each other before their incarnation in form and images, when they still dwell in the state of element, so much do they repulse each other and part, when taking a literary or tonal shape. This erotic union and disjunction (which reminds one of the myth of Androgene) is like a symbol, eternally repeating itself and calling to remembrance the bygone existing unity and the rupture which once occurred.

When poetry incorporates itself into verses, it needs tranquillity: it seems to be ashamed of its literary nudity and demands silence. On the contrary, music, when it takes a concrete shape, appears to be chained by quietness and violently claims to be expressed in real tones. Only bad verses aspire to be pronounced, playing with the sonority of words; good verses are fond of stillness and silence. In music, we observe the opposite phenomenon; only bad music is hostile to its tonal expression—that is, music which contents itself with its outlines (Papiermusik). Good music requires to be unchained in reproduction. Recited poetry nearly always sounds rhetorical; therefore good verses must be read to oneself, and not aloud.

Music which does not sound appears to be a dead world and loses its significance; its meaning dwells only in the tonal realization. Verses which are not even read (let alone not pronounced) do not lose their active power, but keep in a mysterious manner the ascendancy of poetry. Goethe and Petrarch do not lose their power and strength, but are independent of the fact whether they are remembered and read.

In music it is quite different. Upper-formed works form dead layers, which are covered with more dead layers, and contemporary errors are often explained by ignorance and by not listening to the past. That is why poetry and music, being so much akin one to another, part off the basis of some fundamental feature. Music gave birth to the art of interpretation, creating it in its own sphere, as a second and auxiliary art, which poetry does not know at all. In poetry, interpretation is very artificial and changes into dramatic pose—a pose because it appears an imitation of theatrical art, from which poetical interpretation must borrow, for, in its sphere, as an organic art, it cannot arise.

As an auxiliary art, interpretation is, above all, most closely connected with music. Interpretation manifests itself in two directions. On one side, it serves as a link, becomes the intermediary step between hearer and author. Its most important aim, here, is the creation of a contact between author and public. In this direction, interpretation only then reaches its goal when it produces a real, living contact, when it becomes that vehicle through which the aesthetic value established by the author is transmitted to the public directly and with a greater power. The greater receptivity the interpretation arouses in its listeners, the more perfect will it be. The power of conviction will dominate in the struggle and victory over indifference, and passive receptivity peculiar to the public, generally formed of a casual assembly of people of heterogeneous culture, different tastes, and artistic habits.

Good interpretation leads the public to one denominator, seeming to make homogeneous the mixed crowd, bringing it to one level of receptivity. The impression is that the mass is transformed into one single listener. The first instant of contact created by the good interpreter is the moment of smoothing, of bringing the listeners' minds to some single artistic level. It is the gathering of all the heterogeneity and motley of artistic tastes into one focus, which, in this meaning, resembles the interpreter himself. If that aim is not immediately reached, one must consider the interpretation to have failed and all that follows later is destined also to failure—the contact cannot arise.

The performance will go in one direction. The listeners' receptivity, instead of yearning toward unity, will diverge more and more from the interpretation and will be scattered in the audience itself, provoking, at last, a complete discordance between interpreter and audience. What is called mutual misunderstanding will then happen. The reason is not at all in the fact that the performed music or the interpreter is bad. The cause is quite different: It is the absence of a will in the interpreter, the absence of that power which urges the public to submit itself willingly, or even necessary. The performance will be excellent, but the will of the interpreter is lacking.

Lecture

J., prefect of the performed piece, Provincial artistic quality, but if a series of obvious the con-scholarshiners will arise in any ent of the t. Newtoncond moment in inter-lis subtraction toward the in-Russia. steners brought to one m 1922 t. This attraction must can Rellen strength that, in the leaders of the hearer to a com-includinon. If this complete ers of threached, it gives birth i informan immediate receptiviapplyin on the peculiar, profes-on street at is, puts the listeners he day ote contact with living pression. This is the in-are Mrs victory—creating such bottomle part of the audience. Edward C the "awaking"—the liss Alic return to his customary lek, Mrs easy for him, the whole vin, Mr ded; if the return to the C. Kiley becomes difficult, some-D. Mag possible, then a very im-s. Georg has happened. Awaking ast, Mis sleep, the listener faces Stantor takes a new shape, an is if the world had partly ossesses a new value. A ment has taken place. For this is the highest re- step to which interpreta-

Wed

ember

ing of interpretation in Fowler we mentioned the listen-l Brook and unwilling submission. of their mission arises when the owler, tates a contact between gh, Scot thor, in conditions habitu-ers—this means when the the late performance of a work does of Bos the opinion which the Winso ready formed about it. davor in submission occurs when ee from ses, not between author ne com between the public and Ph.D. if himself, independently of she at against the public's will, cal Connditions, when the per-she mette new to the audience, delegateditions referring to the this work are broken. Northernmission is, of course, the ment andThis is individual inter-boundary distinction to the first, the Belonsider as objective. Had of Edine question in favor of his de matter of principle and ring the would, of course, vote Scots Inverful, individual inter-and late than for a weak, help-with the at Heuten's not an art by itself, one, greatly dependent on the general conditions of musical cre-hed such fruition that they may, justice, be considered an indepen-musical science. Wagner and Berliad one to judge by the testimony of contemporaries, were excellent con-pris; but both, trying to confine to finite theory the technics of orches-conducting, could only write a few e about it. Now, the development ese technics, and their explanation, d need the writing of great scien-and theoretical works. e technics of a modern conductor not less complicated and precise the technics of a modern virtuoso, the quality of orchestral playing does depend any less on the fingers, wrist hand of the conductor than a violin-a pianist depends on his instru-The art of a virtuoso is in the mission to himself only of one instru-on which he plays, and in his with it. The conductor's technics not connected immediately with the aments, but with two groups of liv-nen, toward whom his will is direct-His art is to transform the first p into one vibrating instrument, ling as if he played on it, not con-onally, but with his own hands and rs; and the second group, which is public, the conductor yearns to ge into one listener. us, in the form in which it now ex-interpretation is a new kind of art. a product of our time, appearing to e of the achievements of the twen- century. The conductor's creation, y, is an offering to the treasury of al values of mankind, on an equal with the work of the scientist, the tect, and the painter-creator. The cian interpreter causes the fusion of the manifestations of the modern s activity, out of which modern re is built. Being a painter, he is he same time an organizer and an ator in the world of the beautiful. belongs to those happy promoters of kind who help to vanquish everyday existence, lifting it to the ideals to- is which life tends.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY.

A good interpreter commands not only the styles of different epochs, but also the composer's styles of one period. At the same time he does not copy anything at all. An interpreter, who possesses a style of his own, creates his performance by uniting past traditions in the shape they reached us with the technics of our time. Neither Bach's nor Beethoven's tempi and dynamics are in accordance with our tempi and dynamics, and to copy servilely the previous performance would mean to retard modernity forcibly and artificially, achieving only dullness; for it is not possible to turn life backward. In a performance of classical work, seeming sometimes free, the departure from the past serves more to transmit the character and meaning of the work than a servile imitation of this past.

To speak the truth, one must consider interpretation a very young art (in the sense of orchestral conducting). It was born at the end of the nineteenth century and really flourished only in our time. It is a mistake to think that the great conductors of the past were better than the contemporary ones. There is much more solid ground to suppose that such excellent conductors of the nineteenth century as Hans von Bülow or Hector Berlioz would be unable to do anything with the modern orchestra and modern music. Their technics are indivisibly connected with the romantic period, and in our time they would be weak, helpless, just as some winner at a London derby in the nineteenth century, were he even the most marvelous jockey of his time, would not be able to use an aeroplane instead of his horse and replace Lindbergh.

If in Wagner's and Berlioz's time the technics of orchestral conducting were not clear, in such measure as it was then possible to contest the independent part played by a conductor, now these technics of orchestral conducting have past. That is why poetry and music being so much akin one to another, on the basis of some fundamental nature. Music gave birth to the art of interpretation, creating it in its sphere, as a second and auxiliary which poetry does not know at all. poetry, interpretation is very artistic and changes into dramatic pose—a because it appears an imitation of atrical art, from which poetical interpretation must borrow, for, in its sphere an organic art, it cannot arise.

As an auxiliary art, interpretation above all, most closely connected music. Interpretation manifests in two directions. On one side, it serves as a link, becomes the intermediary between hearer and author. Its most important aim, here, is the creation of contact between author and public. In this direction, interpretation only reaches its goal when it produces a living contact, when it becomes a vehicle through which the aesthetic established by the author is transmitted to the public directly and with a great power. The greater receptivity the interpretation arouses in its listeners, the more perfect will it be. The power of conviction will dominate in the struggle and victory over indifference, and give receptivity peculiar to the public generally formed of a casual assembly of people of heterogeneous culture, different tastes, and artistic habits.

Good interpretation leads the public to one denominator, seeming to make homogeneous the mixed crowd, bringing one level of receptivity. The impression is that the mass is transformed into a single listener. The first instance of contact created by the good interpreter is the moment of smoothing, of bringing the listeners' minds to some single artistic level. It is the gathering of the heterogeneity and motley of artistic tastes into one focus, which, in meaning, resembles the interpreter himself. If that aim is not immediately reached, one must consider the interpretation to have failed and all that follows is destined also to failure—the contact cannot arise.

The performance will go in one direction. The listeners' receptivity, in spite of yearning toward unity, will draw more and more from the interpreter and will be scattered in the audience itself, provoking, at last, a complete concordance between interpreter and audience. What is called mutual understanding will then happen. The result is not at all in the fact that the formed music or the interpreter is The cause is quite different: It is the presence of a will in the interpreter, the absence of that power which urges the public to submit itself willingly, or unwillingly if this is necessary. The performed work may be excellent, but the contact does not arise if the will of interpretation is absent in the interpreter. And the inverse: The performed piece may be of a low artistic quality, but if the interpreter's will is obvious the contact with the listeners will arise in any circumstance.

The matter of second moment in interpretation is the attraction toward the interpreter of the listeners brought to one level of receptivity. This attraction must increase with such strength that, in the end, it has brought the hearer to a complete subordination. If this complete subordination is reached, it gives birth to what is called an immediate receptivity, which overcomes both satiety and indifference and even the peculiar, professional feeling—that is, puts the listeners into an immediate contact with living music and its expression. This is the interpreter's great victory—creating such receptivity on the part of the audience.

Then happens the "awakening"—the listener trying to return to his customary state. If this is easy for him, the whole matter is concluded; if the return to the previous state becomes difficult, sometimes quite impossible, then a very important thing has happened. Awakening from his musical sleep, the listener faces reality, which takes a new shape, an unusual one. As if the world had partly changed, life possesses a new value. A spiritual enrichment has taken place. For the interpreter this is the highest reward, highest step to which interpretation may ascend.

When speaking of interpretation in this direction, we mentioned the listener's willing and unwilling submission. The willing submission arises when the interpreter creates a contact between hearer and author, in conditions habitual to the listeners—this means when the interpreter's performance of a work does not contradict the opinion which the listener has already formed about it.

The forcible submission occurs when the contact arises, not between author and public, but between the public and the interpreter himself, independently of the author and against the public's will. In unusual conditions, when the performance is quite new to the audience, when all the traditions referring to the performance of this work are broken. The forcible submission is, of course, the most difficult. This is individual interpretation, in distinction to the first, which we may consider as objective. Had one to settle the question in favor of one of them (a matter of principle and convictions), one would, of course, vote for a bright, powerful, individual interpretation rather than for a weak, helpless, objective one.

Interpretation is not an art by itself, but an auxiliary one, greatly dependent on the general conditions of musical creation in this or that epoch. What we consider a stylistic performance is the link between musical performance and musical creation—this link being determined in relation to some definite epoch. A stylistic performance, of any quality, can always be only more or less precise. There is no solid basis to the argument that this or that style of our period coincides with previous performances. It is always a matter of guess-work and conventions. The quality of a stylistic performance always depends not so much on traditions as on the sagacity and culture of the interpreter himself.

A good interpreter commands not only the styles of different epochs, but also the composer's styles of one period. At the same time he does not copy anything at all. An interpreter, who possesses a style of his own, creates his performance by uniting past traditions in the shape they reached us with the techniques of our time. Neither Bach's nor Beethoven's tempi and dynamics are in accordance with our tempi and dynamics, and to copy servilely the previous performance would mean to retard modernity forcibly and artificially, achieving only dullness; for it is not possible to turn life backward. In a performance of classical work, seeming sometimes free, the departure from the past serves more to transmit the character and meaning of the work than a servile imitation of this past.

To speak the truth, one must consider interpretation a very young art (in the sense of orchestral conducting). It was born at the end of the nineteenth century and really flourished only in our time. It is a mistake to think that the great conductors of the past were better than the contemporary ones. There is much more solid ground to suppose that such excellent conductors of the nineteenth century as Hans von Bülow or Hector Berlioz would be unable to do anything with the modern orchestra and modern music. Their techniques are indivisibly connected with the romantic period, and in our time they would be weak, helpless, just as some winner at a London derby in the nineteenth century, were he even the most marvelous jockey of his time, would not be able to use an aeroplane instead of his horse and replace Lindbergh.

If in Wagner's and Berlioz's time the techniques of orchestral conducting were not clear, in such measure as it was then possible to contest the independent part played by a conductor, now these techniques of orchestral conducting have reached such fruition that they may, justice, be considered an independent musical science. Wagner and Berlioz had one to judge by the testimony of contemporaries, were excellent conductors; but both, trying to confine to finite theory the techniques of orchestral conducting, could only write a few lines about it. Now, the development of these techniques, and their explanation, need the writing of great scientific and theoretical works.

The techniques of a modern conductor are not less complicated and precise as the techniques of a modern virtuoso, the quality of orchestral playing does not depend any less on the fingers, wrist and hand of the conductor than a violinist or a pianist depends on his instrument. The art of a virtuoso is in the possession to himself only of one instrument, on which he plays, and in his connection with it. The conductor's techniques are not connected immediately with the elements, but with two groups of listeners, toward whom his will is directed. His art is to transform the first group into one vibrating instrument, as if he played on it, not conditionally, but with his own hands and ears; and the second group, which is the public, the conductor yearns to bring into one listener.

Thus, in the form in which it now exists, interpretation is a new kind of art. It is a product of our time, appearing to be of the achievements of the twentieth century. The conductor's creation, in our time, is an offering to the treasury of human values of mankind, on an equal with the work of the scientist, the artist, and the painter-creator. The musician interpreter causes the fusion of the manifestations of the modern age's activity, out of which modern culture is built. Being a painter, he is at the same time an organizer and an actor in the world of the beautiful. He belongs to those happy promoters of existence, lifting it to the ideals to which life tends.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY.

past. That is why poetry and music being so much akin one to another, on the basis of some fundamental nature. Music gave birth to the art of interpretation, creating it in its sphere, as a second and auxiliary which poetry does not know at all. poetry, interpretation is very artificial and changes into dramatic pose—a because it appears an imitation of theatrical art, from which poetical interpretation must borrow, for, in its sphere, an organic art, it cannot arise.

As an auxiliary art, interpretation above all, most closely connected music. Interpretation manifests in two directions. On one side, it serves as a link, becomes the intermediary between hearer and author. Its most important aim, here, is the creation of contact between author and public. In this direction, interpretation only reaches its goal when it produces a living contact, when it becomes a vehicle through which the aesthetic established by the author is transmitted to the public directly and with a great power. The greater receptivity the interpretation arouses in its listeners, more perfect will it be. The power of conviction will dominate in the struggle and victory over indifference, and give receptivity peculiar to the public generally formed of a casual assemblage of people of heterogeneous culture, different tastes, and artistic habits.

Good interpretation leads the public to one denominator, seeming to make homogeneous the mixed crowd, bringing one level of receptivity. The impression is that the mass is transformed into a single listener. The first instant of contact created by the good interpretation is the moment of smoothing, of bringing the listeners' minds to some single artistic level. It is the gathering of the heterogeneity and motley of artistic tastes into one focus, which, in meaning, resembles the interpreter himself. If that aim is not immediately reached, one must consider the interpretation to have failed and all that follows is destined also to failure—the contact cannot arise.

The performance will go in one direction. The listeners' receptivity, in of yearning toward unity, will diminish more and more from the interpreter and will be scattered in the audience itself, provoking, at last, a complete discordance between interpreter and audience. What is called mutual misunderstanding will then happen. The result is not at all in the fact that the performed music or the interpreter is the cause is quite different: It is the absence of a will in the interpreter, the absence of that power which urges the public to submit itself willingly, or unwillingly if this is necessary. The performed work may be excellent, but the contact does not arise if the will of interpretation is absent in the interpreter. And the inverse: The performed piece may be of a low artistic quality, but if the interpreter's will is obvious the contact with the listeners will arise in any circumstance.

The matter of second moment in interpretation is the attraction toward the interpreter of the listeners brought to one level of receptivity. This attraction must increase with such strength that, in the end, it has brought the hearer to a complete subordination. If this complete subordination is reached, it gives birth to what is called an immediate receptivity, which overcomes both satiety and indifference and even the peculiar, professional feeling—that is, puts the listeners into an immediate contact with living music and its expression. This is the interpreter's great victory—creating such receptivity on the part of the audience.

Then happens the "awakening"—the listener trying to return to his customary state. If this is easy for him, the whole matter is concluded; if the return to the previous state becomes difficult, sometimes quite impossible, then a very important thing has happened. Awakening from his musical sleep, the listener faces a reality, which takes a new shape, an unusual one. As if the world had partly changed, life possesses a new value. A spiritual enrichment has taken place. For the interpreter this is the highest reward, highest step to which interpretation may ascend.

When speaking of interpretation in this direction, we mentioned the listener's willing and unwilling submission. The willing submission arises when the interpreter creates a contact between hearer and author, in conditions habitual to the listeners—this means when the interpreter's performance of a work does not contradict the opinion which the listener has already formed about it.

The forcible submission occurs when the contact arises, not between author and public, but between the public and the interpreter himself, independently of the author and against the public's will, in unusual conditions, when the performance is quite new to the audience, when all the traditions referring to the performance of this work are broken. The forcible submission is, of course, the most difficult. This is individual interpretation, in distinction to the first, which we may consider as objective. Had one to settle the question in favor of one of them (a matter of principle and convictions), one would, of course, vote for a bright, powerful, individual interpretation rather than for a weak, helpless, objective one.

Interpretation is not an art by itself, but an auxiliary one, greatly dependent on the general conditions of the situation in this or that epoch. One must consider a stylistic period as a link between musical creation and musical performance—this link being mined in relation to society. A stylistic performance can always be only more or less. There is no solid basis that this or that style coincides with previous ones. It is always a matter of conventions. The quality of performance always depends on traditions as on the nature of the interpreter.

A good interpreter copies the styles of different composers at the same time he does it at all. An interpreter, in style of his own, creates by uniting past traditions they reached us with the time. Neither Bach's tempi and dynamics with our tempi and copy servilely the previous would mean to retard and artificially, achieved for it is not possible. In a performance work, seeming somewhat aparture from the past, transmit the character of the work than a servile past.

To speak the truth, interpretation a very sense of orchestral con born at the end of the tury and really flourish time. It is a mistake great conductors of the than the contemporary much more solid ground such excellent conduct twentieth century as Har Hector Berlioz would be thing with the modern or ern music. Their techni connected with the rom in our time they would just as some winner at in the nineteenth centu the most marvelous jo would not be able to usi stead of his horse a bergh.

If in Wagner's and techniques of orchestral not clear, in such meas possible to contest the played by a conductor nics of orchestral

Miss
ning t ber wh from

Late

In th Thoma
Helen afterno son, s Thomp
Rev. C
Congre
Mr. Pe
riage.

reached such fruition that they may, with justice, be considered an independent musical science. Wagner and Berlioz, had one to judge by the testimony of their contemporaries, were excellent conductors; but both, trying to confine to a definite theory the techniques of orchestral conducting, could only write a few pages about it. Now, the development of these techniques, and their explanation, would need the writing of great scientific and theoretical works.

The techniques of a modern conductor are not less complicated and precise than the techniques of a modern virtuoso, and the quality of orchestral playing does not depend any less on the fingers, wrist and hand of the conductor than a violinist or a pianist depends on his instrument. The art of a virtuoso is in the submission to himself only of one instrument, on which he plays, and in his union with it. The conductor's techniques are not connected immediately with the instruments, but with two groups of living men, toward whom his will is directed. His art is to transform the first group into one vibrating instrument, sounding as if he played on it, not conventionally, but with his own hands and fingers; and the second group, which is the public, the conductor yearns to change into one listener.

Thus, in the form in which it now exists, interpretation is a new kind of art. It is a product of our time, appearing to be one of the achievements of the twentieth century. The conductor's creation, today, is an offering to the treasury of spiritual values of mankind, on an equal basis with the work of the scientist, the architect, and the painter-creator. The musician interpreter causes the fusion of all the manifestations of the modern man's activity, out of which modern culture is built. Being a painter, he is at the same time an organizer and an educator in the world of the beautiful. He belongs to those happy promoters of mankind who help to vanquish everyday gray existence, lifting it to the ideals towards which life tends.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY.

ure. T cipal en and Ber ried pla in the dancing round scenes

Dated Moscow—1914

Koussevitzky in Younger Years

From a Russian Postcard in The Archives of The Transcript

FORTY-NINTH SEASON, NINETEEN HUNDRED TWENTY-NINE AND THIRTY

First Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, OCTOBER 11, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, OCTOBER 12, at 8.15 o'clock

Beethoven Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," Op. 84

Pick-Mangiagalli Prelude and Fugue
(First time in Boston)

Debussy "La Mer," Trois Esquisses Symphoniques
I. De l'aube à midi sur la mer (From Dawn till Noon on the Ocean).
II. Jeux de Vagues (Play of the Waves).
III. Dialogue du Vent et de la Mer (Dialogue of Wind and Sea).

Beethoven Symphony No. 5 in C minor, Op. 67
I. Allegro con brio.
II. Andante con moto.
} III. Allegro; Trio.
} IV. Allegro.

There will be an intermission before the symphony

The works to be played at these concerts may be seen in the Allen A. Brown Music Collection of the Boston Public Library one week before the concert

Dated Moscow—1914

Koussevitzky in Younger Years

From a Russian Postcard in The Archives of The Transcript

FORTY-NINTH SEASON, NINETEEN HUNDRED TWENTY-NINE AND THIRTY

First Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, OCTOBER 11, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, OCTOBER 12, at 8.15 o'clock

Beethoven Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," Op. 84

Pick-Mangiagalli Prelude and Fugue
(First time in Boston)

Debussy "La Mer," Trois Esquisses Symphoniques

- I. De l'aube à midi sur la mer (From Dawn till Noon on the Ocean).
- II. Jeux de Vagues (Play of the Waves).
- III. Dialogue du Vent et de la Mer (Dialogue of Wind and Sea).

Beethoven Symphony No. 5 in C minor, Op. 67

- I. Allegro con brio.
- II. Andante con moto.
- III. Allegro; Trio.
- IV. Allegro.

There will be an intermission before the symphony

The works to be played at these concerts may be seen in the Allen A. Brown Music Collection of the Boston Public Library one week before the concert

BEETHOVEN

Bronze by BOURDELLE

(Courtesy of the Metropolitan Museum of Art, N.Y.)

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The first concert of the 49th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Beethoven, overture to "Egmont"; Pick-Mangiagalli, Prelude and Fugue (first time in Boston); Debussy, "La Mer"; Beethoven, Symphony No. 5, C minor.

Orchestra and audience welcomed Dr. Koussevitzky's return by standing and applauding heartily.

The only unfamiliar composition on the program was Pick-Mangiagalli's Prelude and Fugue. The name of the composer was not unknown here for Mr. Toscanini early in 1921 brought out the Notturmo and Rondo Fantastico when he led La Scala orchestra in Symphony hall. Piano pieces and songs by the Czech-Italian composer have also been heard here.

The announcement that a prelude and fugue for orchestra by any contemporary composer would be played as a rule strikes terror to the stoutest soul, for this form of composition affords turns out to be only a musical exercise to prove that the writer has made sound studies and wishes to be taken seriously; often having few or no ideas, shunning emotion, striving anxiously after unimpeachable conformity to established rules rather than seeking loveliness, or by the pouring of new and sparkling wine into the old bottles of the school to quicken the spirit of the hearer.

And as Pick-Mangiagalli's father was a Czech, his mother an Italian, the question arose by which national inheritance would he be influenced—or by combining what is sometimes described as "German thoughtfulness" and Italian grace and soaring lyricism, would he come to grief, falling between the two. One remembered the sad case of the man who purchased in a second-hand shop a frock coat that had belonged to a clergyman and a pair of trousers that had been cast off by a man given to the races, cards and strong drink. The coat inspired the purchaser with the desire to rescue perishing souls; the trousers urged his feet to tread the paths of sin. Hence a spiritual conflict that was terrible; it turned the wearer into a Laodicean, incapable of good works, held back by pious coat-tails from ruinous diversions and all fleshly lusts.

Pick-Mangiagalli no doubt was not bothered by thought of parentage or early environment. Educated musically at the Milan conservatory, appreciated as a composer first in Germany, he sat down and wrote an interesting, unusual, exciting Prelude and Fugue, which was recognized by the audience, first of all as music. The liveliness of the Prelude was not without classic dignity. There were little episodes in the stirring rush and agreeable orchestral chatter that were suave and beautiful, relieving but not checking by undue sentimentalism the continuous flow. The fugue with its scale subject was daringly planned. Not once was there the thought of perfunctory, obligatory development and filling out of the scheme; the whole movement, exciting, and at the end impressive, was as one spontaneous, mighty musical outburst. The audience felt this at once. Seldom has a composition by a man unknown to the great majority of the hearers been so favorably received and honestly enjoyed.

When Debussy's "La Mer" was first performed here in the consulship of Dr. Muck no hand clapped hand at the Friday afternoon concert. Yesterday the performance deserved heartier applause than it received. Is it not possible that each hearer had his and her idea of what the sea should sound like, and was somewhat disappointed in Debussy's impressions? Did the audience expect to be thrilled by the "spasm of the sky and the shatter of the sea" or to be soothed by lapping waters as in Mendelssohn's "Sea-Calm and Prosperous Voyage," which might be taken for a description of a summer sail on a Nantasket excursion boat?

Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of the music by Beethoven is justly famous. It is not every conductor who can so eloquently reveal the different phases of romanticism illustrated yesterday by Beethoven, Debussy and Pick-Mangiagalli. But suppose Beethoven's fifth symphony were to be performed only once in four or five years? Would it not then gain in majesty? Dwellers near lofty mountain peaks are too familiar with them to realize their sublimity.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week will be as follows: Handel, Concerto Grosso, for strings, op. 6 No. 10. Gregoir Krein "Chant de David," Symphonic poem (first time in the United States), Stravinsky, Suite from "The Fire-Bird," Sibelius, Symphony No. 2, D major.

SYMPHONY BEGINS THE NEW SEASON

Orchestra the Same to a Man as That of
Last Year

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

An orchestra the same to a man and an audience as nearly unchanged as so large a company could well be from one season to the next were certain items on the programme aside from the familiar features of yesterday afternoon's Symphony Concert. The conductor, too, was the same—yet called by a different name. Each of the many references to him in the programme book described him, not as plain Mr., but as Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. Thus has the honorary degree conferred upon him last June by Harvard University been heeded at Symphony Hall.

"EGMONT" OUTSTANDING

Dr. Koussevitzky, as he is henceforth to be, made for this initial pair of concerts a programme that achieved unity after a somewhat unusual fashion. The first piece yesterday afternoon was by Beethoven: the Overture to "Egmont"; and that composer's Fifth Symphony served for ending. Between stood a Prelude and Fugue by Pick-Mangiagalli, new name at the Symphony Concerts, and Debussy's "La

Mer," performed at them now these nine times.

At the outset let it be said that the most arresting performance of the afternoon was that of the "Egmont" Overture. A whole column of newspaper print might be devoted to a summing-up of its many excellencies. Suffice it, however, to say that it was in rare degree vital, elastic, dramatically suggestive, yet always musical. Only an orchestra of the highest attainments could have so vivified and freshened these long familiar measures, while only a conductor of genius as well as of rare skill could have directed it to such a feat. Yet the audience, absorbed for the moment in finding its next-door neighbor once more by its respective side, apparently noticed these marvels but little. A mere ripple of applause served for comment on them.

Pick-Mangiagalli Wins Favor

Far more enthusiastic was the reception accorded the new piece of the afternoon. Riccardo Pick-Mangiagalli, half Italian by blood and wholly so by present residence although a Czech by birth, was introduced to Boston a few seasons ago by Mr. Toscanini and the orchestra of La Scala. As a composer he belongs to the right rather than the left wing. The older principles and procedures suit his requirements.

His Prelude is well designed, sonorous (at times almost to platancy) and melodious; hardly distinctive or distinguished. His Fugue, which has for its subject nothing else than an ascending scale of C major, answered of course by that of G, is ingenious, well planned and ably executed. Not surprising is it that this piece, most brilliantly played, should have found immediate favor.

Debussy on Decline

From the Prelude to the "Afternoon of a Faun" through the Nocturnes and "La Mer" to the final three "Images," Debussy's major orchestral pieces decline steadily in inventiveness, even as they progress in adroitness of workmanship. On some ears "La Mer" already palls, even in a performance as sympathetic as that of yesterday. Finally Dr. Koussevitzky's unorthodox and generally triumphant way with the Fifth Symphony is well-known to Bostonians. The stirring performance of the Finale yesterday afternoon provoked the accustomed storm of applause.

In such wise was the 49th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra begun.

A New Season Opens Well at Symphony Hall

Classics and Moderns from Conductor and Orchestra
At Top of Their Bent

Trans. — Oct. 14, 1929

YEARS AGO when the matinees of the Symphony Orchestra were labelled "Public Rehearsals," the reviewers exercised their pens upon the concerts of Saturday evening. Last week, a holiday, "no paper," permitted return, here and there, to that custom, possibly with advantage to all concerned. Theoretically, for both players and hearers, nerves play a part in concert-halls—and nerves are keener-edged by night than by day. Factually, the usual audience on a Saturday in Symphony Hall is more receptive, quick-spirited, outspoken, than the matinee company of most Fridays. Last Saturday, for example, it welcomed Dr. Koussevitzky to his place thrice as long and thrice as warmly; burst into eager applause at the end of Beethoven's "Egmont" Overture; passed Debussy's "Sea-Sketches" less coldly by; took hearty pleasure in Pick-Mangiagalli's Prelude and Fugue; bade the orchestra to its feet, in round upon round of applause, at the close of the concert. In the auditorium, the matinee seemed tepid, perfunctory beginning of the new symphonic year. In the evening the house was alert and ardent.

On the stage, again, the conductor bettered the performance of the Overture to "Egmont." On Friday, he tended to cut it into vivid paragraphs; on Saturday, sustained its upswelling course. In the "Sea-Sketches" Debussy draws from the wood-winds both his mixed and his clearer colors. With them Mr. Laurent and his companions outdid their Friday prowess. Through Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, nobody, on Saturday, seemed to be thinking of the clock; whereas, on Friday, it often conditions the mood of the audience toward the final piece. Before the first audience, conductor and orchestra are feeling out the "novelty" of the day—this time the Italian's Prelude and Fugue. Before the second, for better or for worse, they can let themselves go—to the gain of Pick-Mangiagalli's animated sonorities. Nearly every old experience confirms the impression. The weekly Symphony Concert not come wholly to pass until Saturday evening.

age to the classics becomingly be a new year—in this instance Beethoven, and in both the chosen pieces the Beethoven. Goethe's play about it is seldom acted nowadays, even German-speaking stages. Few read Otley's or other books about the action of Egmont and Horn by the of Alva for conspiracy, near the ring of the Netherlands' struggle against Spanish tyranny. With scarcely light of the title, or of the program, most listen to the "Egmont" Overture as to so much "absolute" music. As it is just as well, since in these Beethoven is hard-riden by the philosophizing or the poetizing comment from Rolland downwards.) None less, the heroic note is unmistakable, the sombre and portentous introduction of Beethoven's discourse, and free by rebellion gained. Dr. Koussevitzky heard, sustained, deepened this voice. The introductory chords, weighty, sonorous, darksome; the of the Allegro, free, full, supple, ring force, motion, contrast; the alight with rhythm and incandescent Beethoven as Beethoven wrote, a conductor and an orchestra who interpreted than played, of freedom ent.

h were as true to the Fifth Symphony. The heroic Beethoven wrote the movement in passionate concentration, measure against measure, choir against choir, challenge, contest, defeat. the beginnings of "The Eroica" or Fifth Symphony, he lifts and suggests a Titanic speech, the man for the The heroic Beethoven, mantling life in the romantic mystery that his cherished, wrote also the ominous zo; achieved the sultry suspense of transition into the Finale. Then away that mantle and sang again victory of freedom, louder, more tumultuous, more reiterated, than even the of the "Egmont" Overture. True, even whiles, there is far too sentimental a slow movement into which the of time and change steadily gnaws. re long our youngsters—and some older—will be calling it a bore.) It Beethoven's infirmity to follow more one epical beginning with such ed sweetness long drawn out." In Koussevitzky took the composer at word but no more; for compensation the first movement from storm to yet missed no pregnant detail; held the hush above the drum-roll into

SYMPHONY BEGINS THE NEW SEASON

Orchestra the Same to a Man as That of
Last Year

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

An orchestra the same to a man and an audience as nearly unchanged as so large a company could well be from one season to the next were certain items on the programme aside from the familiar features of yesterday afternoon's Symphony Concert. The conductor, too, was the same—yet called by a different name. Each of the many references to him in the programme book described him, not as plain Mr., but as Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. Thus has the honorary degree conferred upon him last June by Harvard University been heeded at Symphony Hall.

"EGMONT" OUTSTANDING

Dr. Koussevitzky, as he is henceforth to be, made for this initial pair of concerts a programme that achieved unity after a somewhat unusual fashion. The first piece yesterday afternoon was by Beethoven: the Overture to "Egmont"; and that composer's Fifth Symphony served for ending. Between stood a Prelude and Fugue by Pick-Mangiagalli, new name at the Symphony Concerts, and Debussy's "La

Mer," performed at them now these nine times.

At the outset let it be said that the most arresting performance of the afternoon was that of the "Egmont" Overture. A whole column of newspaper print might be devoted to a summing-up of its many excellencies. Suffice it, however, to say that it was in rare degree vital, elastic, dramatically suggestive, yet always musical. Only an orchestra of the highest attainments could have so vivified and freshened these long familiar measures, while only a conductor of genius as well as of rare skill could have directed it to such a feat. Yet the audience, absorbed for the moment in finding its next-door neighbor once more by its respective side, apparently noticed these marvels but little. A mere ripple of applause served for comment on them.

Pick-Mangiagalli Wins Favor

Far more enthusiastic was the reception accorded the new piece of the afternoon. Riccardo Pick-Mangiagalli, half Italian by blood and wholly so by present residence although a Czech by birth, was introduced to Boston a few seasons ago by Mr. Toscanini and the orchestra of La Scala. As a composer he belongs to the right rather than the left wing. The older principles and procedures suit his requirements.

His Prelude is well designed, sonorous (at times almost to platancy) and melodious; hardly distinctive or distinguished. His Fugue, which has for its subject nothing else than an ascending scale of C major, answered of course by that of G, is ingenious, well planned and ably executed. Not surprising is it that this piece, most brilliantly played, should have found immediate favor.

Debussy on Decline

From the Prelude to the "Afternoon of a Faun" through the Nocturnes and "La Mer" to the final three "Images," Debussy's major orchestral pieces decline steadily in inventiveness, even as they progress in adroitness of workmanship. On some ears "La Mer" already palls, even in a performance as sympathetic as that of yesterday. Finally Dr. Koussevitzky's unorthodox and generally triumphant way with the Fifth Symphony is well-known to Bostonians. The stirring performance of the Finale yesterday afternoon provoked the accustomed storm of applause.

In such wise was the 49th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra begun.

A New Sea Col Opens W Symphon

Classics and Mod Conductor and At Top of The

YEARS AGO when of the Symph were labelled "I sals," the review

their pens upon the con day evening. Last week, a no paper," permitted ret there, to that custom, po vantage to all concerned.
for both players and hear a part in concert-halls—a keener-edged by night tha tually, the usual audience in Symphony Hall is n quick-spirited, outspoken, née company of most Frid urday, for example, it Koussevitzky to his place and thrice as warmly; bu applause at the end of Be mont" Overture; passed D Sketches" less coldly by pleasure in Pick-Mangia and Fugue; bade the or feet, in round upon round at the close of the concert torium, the matinee seen functory beginning of t phonic year. In the even was alert and ardent.

On the stage, again, the tered the performance of to "Egmont." On Friday, cut it into vivid paragra day, sustained its upswelli
the "Sea-Sketches" Debuss the wood-winds both his r clearer colors. With them and his companions outd prowess. Through Beeth Symphony, nobody, on Sat to be thinking of the clock Friday, it often conditions the audience toward the fir fore the first audience, c orchestra are feeling out of the day—this time the lude and Fugue. Before t better or for worse, they selves go—to the gain of P
It's animated sonorities.

twofold experience confirms the impres sion: The weekly Symphony Concert does not come wholly to pass until Satur day evening.

Homage to the classics becomingly be gins a new year—in this instance Beet hoven, and in both the chosen pieces the heroic Beethoven. Goethe's play about Egmont is seldom acted nowadays, even upon German-speaking stages. Few read in Motley's or other books about the execution of Egmont and Horn by the Duke of Alva for conspiracy, near the beginning of the Netherlands' struggle against Spanish tyranny. With scarcely a thought of the title, or of the program book, most listen to the "Egmont" Over ture as to so much "absolute" music.
(Perhaps, it is just as well, since in these days Beethoven is hard-riden by the philosophizing or the poetizing commen tators from Rolland downwards.) None the less, the heroic note is unmistakable in the sombre and portentous introduc tion; the fervent progress, proud, defiant, angry, glamoured only to darken; the tragic pause; the final shouts of victory.
Egmont is only a text; freedom is the sub stance of Beethoven's discourse, and free dom by rebellion gained. Dr. Kousse vitzky heard, sustained, deepened this heroic voice. The introductory chords were weighty, sonorous, darksome; the course of the Allegro, free, full, supple, gathering force, motion, contrast; the close alight with rhythm and incandescent tone. Beethoven as Beethoven wrote, from a conductor and an orchestra who less interpreted than played, of freedom eloquent.

Both were as true to the Fifth Sym phony. The heroic Beethoven wrote the first movement in passionate concentra tion, measure against measure, choir against choir, challenge, contest, defeat.
As at the beginnings of "The Eroica" or the Ninth Symphony, he lifts and sus tains a Titanic speech, the man for the race. The heroic Beethoven, mantling himself in the romantic mystery that his time cherished, wrote also the ominous Scherzo; achieved the sultry suspense of the transition into the Finale. Then crossed away that mantle and sang again the victory of freedom, louder, more tu multuous, more reiterated, than even the close of the "Egmont" Overture. True, between whiles, there is far too senti mental a slow movement into which the tooth of time and change steadily gnaws.
(Before long our youngsters—and some much older—will be calling it a bore.) It was Beethoven's infirmity to follow more than one epical beginning with such "linked sweetness long drawn out." In it Dr. Koussevitzky took the composer at his word but no more; for compensation drove the first movement from storm to storm yet missed no pregnant detail; held tense the hush above the drum-roll into the Finale; flung up its "repeat" and easily caught proves irresistible. Out wave upon wave of orchestral sound of the mouth of the bass-clarinets. Not to be forgotten were the veiled Fugue solemnly proposes the C-major scale as subject; then bids that hollow-power of the strings in the first instrument retort upon the answering ment; the glow of the brass, rich bassoon with a derisive counter-subject. piercing, toward the end. By all o Clarinet and oboe take up the tale. Of conductor and an orchestra in form. the two subjects go to make the gayest, wittiest, touch-and-go fugue that much enduring form has known in recent days.

The exacting will have it that "The Sea" is the last of Debussy's masterpieces. Even in "Rondes de Printemps" which Dr. Koussevitzky strangely looks, and in "Iberia" they discover of the decline thereafter beginning. the other masterpieces—the Nocturne "The Faun"—audiences now clap hands; for "Pelléas and Mélisande" the Opera House; but as yet they are persuaded of "The Sea." The list of Friday heard the piece coldly; of Saturday were little warmer. What frightens them away? A Debussy is puissant and sonorous than in any of preceding music save only his mad drama? A Debussy more spacious, splendid than elsewhere in all his past. He looked forth upon a sea of waters; saw and heard, musically, a sea of imagination. He wrought the magic of it into his second sketch, "Play of The Waves"—flashes of rhythm, glints of color, a jewelled music, tonal spray in tonal sunshine, fluid, darting and aflame. Hearers recognized a familiar Debussy, more subtle, more magical, snaring sea-sights and sounds into an adept, poetized music.

Yet those same listeners could not, or would not, follow when the orchestra sounded the shadowy, mysterious, beginning of the first sketch ("From Dawn to Noon on the Ocean"), or at the close lifted the sun high above the lonely expanse of shifting, glimmering waters, while sea and sky met and were mingled. "Their" Debussy was doing a strange, new thing. No more would they yield when in the final sketch, the great voices of winds and waves, dialogued or united, rose in a hymn-like music, vast, sonorous, eternal. An exalted Debussy? There was no such a person, though this third sketch is the clearest proof. These twenty years this disposition toward "The Sea" has persisted. Once more, on Saturday, Dr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra strove manfully against it. They outdid themselves in a virtuosity of shifting rhythms and changeable colors, conjured into sound Debussy's imagery; attained splendors of sonority—and few were the ears to hear.

Along came Riccardo Pick-Mangiagalli, usually a Toscaninian protégé, with a Prelude and Fugue up his sleeve. The Prelude is rhythmically animated, full-voiced, warmly colored; with Italian instinct songful at the ripe moment, dominated by a sportive "figure," that once and easily caught proves irresistible. Out of the mouth of the bass-clarinets. Fugue solemnly proposes the C-major scale as subject; then bids that hollow-instrument retort upon the answering bassoon with a derisive counter-subject. Clarinet and oboe take up the tale. Of the two subjects go to make the gayest, wittiest, touch-and-go fugue that much enduring form has known in recent days. There is everything in Pick-Mangiagalli's score, good sport included—songful measures à l'italienne, clangorous measures à la Strauss, salt and spice of modernist dissonance; ancient and orthodox prescriptions, a multifarious modern orchestra harddriven; scholarship and verve; joyous gayety and sardonic humor—all with the broad smile and the hearty speech of a Latin, tossing off a tour de force and more than half suspecting it. What eclectics have composers become in these times, and what an instinct have these Italians for an effect on the instant, straight across the concert-hall!

H. T. P.

BOSTON SYMPHONY BEGINS 49TH SEASON

9:15 — Oct. 12, 1929.
Koussevitzky and Players
Given Cordial Welcome

Conductor Assumes Title of "Dr"
From Harvard Honorary Degree

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its 49th season yesterday afternoon with the first of the 24 Friday subscription concerts, for which every season ticket was, as usual, sold far in advance. The audience gave conductor and players a cordial welcome, applauding warmly at every opportunity before and during the performance of a program which included Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, a new Prelude and Fugue by Pick-Mangiagalli, Debussy's "La Mer" and Beethoven's C minor Symphony.

A glance at the first page of the program disclosed only one remarkable change from last season. The conductor's name is now for the first time given as Dr Serge Koussevitzky. He received an honorary degree last June from Harvard. He also holds an honorary degree from Brown.

The personnel of the orchestra, save for the return of Mr Thillols and the resignation of Paul Shirley, is unaltered from last season, though in several instances the ranking of players is changed.

There were very few new faces in the audience. Anyone who relinquishes season tickets for the Friday concerts does so with the knowledge that it will be difficult to obtain seats for a later season, so greatly does the demand exceed the supply. The Saturday and Monday series are likewise sold out for the season, as the six Tuesday concerts seem certain to be also.

Dr Koussevitzky, returning for his sixth season as conductor of the Boston Symphony, comes back to an orchestra he has molded to his will and made into a superb musical instrument; and to an audience assembled in large measure by the power of his remarkable personality. The present position of the Boston Symphony, as an orchestra again unsurpassed in the world, has been won by his hard and intense effort.

When he came here in 1924 the Boston Symphony had not recovered from the disruptions brought about as an indirect and lamentable consequence of the World War. After five years he has seen it acknowledged everywhere as restored to the front rank among orchestras, though not to its once undisputed preeminence. Something of this may have been in the minds of many of those who rose to their feet to honor him at his first entrance yesterday.

A financial statement from the trustees, inserted in yesterday's programs, bore witness to the high cost of maintaining such an orchestra. The deficit on last season, with every ticket sold, was $145,493.63; of which sum $101,487.67 has been contributed. The trustees conclude their tables of receipts and payments with this appeal:

"We request this year toward deficits $100,000, which comprises the deficit for the ensuing year, plus the $45,000 deficit carried over from last year."

The prices of season tickets for this year have been considerably increased, so that the receipts from concerts will be larger than before. Contributions toward the deficit should be sent to E. B. Dane, treasurer, at 6 Beacon st, Boston. Small as well as large gifts are welcomed.

Three of the four numbers on yesterday's program were from the standard repertory of the orchestra. Of Beethoven's overture and symphony little needs to be said. Dr Koussevitzky's eloquent and individual interpretations of them are familiar to Boston audiences. The orchestra played better than it has usually done at the opening of the season. There were very few details in the performance to indicate that the orchestra had recently re-assembled after being scattered since last May.

Debussy's "La Mer," once regarded as a formless impressionist piece, full of daring, if evanescent harmonies, now seems clear and straightforward, with a simplicity and economy of style which recalls such classics as Mozart. Its melodies are now as obvious as its composer's indebtedness to such Russians as Musorgsky and Rimsky Korsakov. Dr Koussevitzky quite rightly stresses the dramatic vigor of much of this score. Writing about "The Sea" even Debussy could scarce avoid boisterous moments.

The novelty, Pick-Mangiagalli's Prelude and Fugue, proved to be an agreeable trifle, despite the austere suggestions of the title. The subject of the fugue is an ordinary scale, not one of the pregnant motives found in Bach. The prelude is a facile and sentimental rhapsody saved temporarily from banality by its more or less up-to-date harmonies.

The composer, an Italian by tradition and heredity, though born in Czech-Slovakia, has written other sophisticated salon pieces, some of which have been heard in Boston. No doubt he did not take this prelude and fugue with what Arnold called "high seriousness." His music is easy to listen to, but difficult to remember afterward.

The program announced for next week includes a Handel Concerto Grosso, opus 6, No. 10; "The Song of David," by an unknown Russian composer named Krein; the familiar suite from Stravinsky's "Firebird," and Sibellus' Second Symphony. P. R.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA HAS FIRST REHEARSAL

Koussevitzky Greeted Warmly by Musicians—Concert Friday

The Boston Symphony Orchestra assembled yesterday morning in Symphony Hall for the first rehearsal of the season. Serge Koussevitzky, stepping upon the stage, met with prolonged applause from the standing orchestra who greeted him for the first time as "Doctor," since his recent degree was conferred upon him by Harvard University after the conclusion of the past season.

Dr. Koussevitzky, acknowledging this demonstration, said that it made him happy to see the same personnel before him without a single new face. This, he said, augured a closer ensemble than ever before for the 49th season to come.

The rehearsal began with Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, which is also to open the first program of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Other pieces then to be played will be Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C minor; Debussy's "La Mer"; and Prelude and Fugue of Pick-Mangiagalli.

Boston Symphony Season Opened

Monitor Oct. 12, 1929.

WITH a new slogan, "A novelty to a program," Serge Koussevitzky, on Oct. 11, inaugurated the forty-ninth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It was the beginning of the sixth consecutive year of his Symphony Hall regency. He was greeted cordially by a rising audience.

Dr. Koussevitzky had chosen for the first of the season's pieces new to Boston a Prelude and Fugue of Riccardo Pick-Mangiagalli, composed in 1927. This served incidentally to introduce to a Boston Symphony audience this Italian composer who was born in Bohemia and lived for some years in Vienna.

From the testimony of the Prelude and Fugue, Pick-Mangiagalli is not one of those composers who drive conservative hearers from concert halls. The score has a key, and that key is C major. In other respects too, its author is orthodox. His Prelude is based on two very respectable themes, one volant, the other rampant, with pensive episodes. The Fugue, if the reader will believe us, is based on the C major scale, with a counter-figure, and the working-out is expert.

Pick-Mangiagalli's international experience has not been without effect. Like a good modernist, he has been a faithful student not only of Bach but of other great composers. He is a master of contrapuntal technique. His orchestration has a Straussian brilliance. He does not hesitate to glance sidewise at Respighi, as you may observe if you listen reminiscently to the conclusion of the Fugue. The effect is well calculated; the reception of the piece by the Friday afternoon audience was warm.

The fact is, Signor Pick-Mangiagalli is a monstrous clever fellow. He would show us that music depends not so much on the material as on what is done with it; so he chooses the C major scale for a fugue subject, and astonishes us with his virtuosity. He knows all the tricks of manipulation, harmonization, instrumentation, and he dazzles us with them. He is aware of the value of a tremendous climax, so he builds us one worthy of "The Pines of Rome." He is fluent, facile, cool and detached. He stirs our admiration; but we can see his tongue in his cheek.

The Italian item was second on the order of the day. Before it came the "Egmont" Overture and after it Debussy's "La Mer." The second half of the program was given over to Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. We should be too kind if we said the performance of the orchestra was impeccable at this first concert. There were ragged entrances, there were times when the tone of solo instruments was less than pure. Dr. Koussevitzky, filled with interpretative zeal, tended to drag his slow passages, to demand too much volume from his brasses. But on the whole the orchestra, whose personnel has not changed since last year, was an instrument of lovely tone and expressive flexibility. The strings in particular gave forth beautiful sound. There is every indication of a season of surpassing excellence.

L. A. S.

FORTY-NINTH SEASON, NINETEEN HUNDRED TWENTY-NINE AND THIRTY

Second Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, OCTOBER 18, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, OCTOBER 19, at 8.15 o'clock

Handel . . . Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, Op. 6, No. 10
Overture; Air; Lento; Allegro moderato; Allegro.

Strauss . . . Interlude from "Intermezzo": A Domestic Comedy
with Symphonic Interludes, Op. 72
(First time in Boston)

Stravinsky . . . Suite from "L'Oiseau de Feu" ("The Fire-Bird")
A Danced Legend
I. Introduction; Katschei's Enchanted Garden and Dance of the Fire-Bird.
II. Supplication of the Fire-bird.
III. The Princesses play with the Golden Apples.
IV. Dance of the Princess.
V. Infernal Dance of all the Subjects of Katschei.

Sibelius . . . Symphony No. 2, in D major, Op. 43
I. Allegretto.
II. Tempo andante ma rubato.
III. Vivacissimo; Lento e suave.
IV. Finale: Allegro moderato.

There will be an intermission before the symphony

The works to be played at these concerts may be seen in the Allen A. Brown Music Collection of the Boston Public Library one week before the concert

Boston Symphony Season Opened

Monitor Oct. 12, 1929.

WITH a new slogan, "A novelty to a program," Serge Koussevitzky, on Oct. 11, inaugurated the forty-ninth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It was the beginning of the sixth consecutive year of his Symphony Hall regency. He was greeted cordially by a rising audience.

Dr. Koussevitzky had chosen for the first of the season's pieces new to Boston a Prelude and Fugue of Riccardo Pick-Mangiagalli, composed in 1927. This served incidentally to introduce to a Boston Symphony audience this Italian composer who was born in Bohemia and lived for some years in Vienna.

From the testimony of the Prelude and Fugue, Pick-Mangiagalli is not one of those composers who drive conservative hearers from concert halls. The score has a key, and that key is C major. In other respects too, its author is orthodox. His Prelude is based on two very respectable themes, one volant, the other rampant, with pensive episodes. The Fugue, if the reader will believe us, is based on the C major scale, with a counter-figure, and the working-out is expert.

Pick-Mangiagalli's international experience has not been without effect. Like a good modernist, he has been a faithful student not only of Bach but of other great composers. He is a master of contrapuntal technique. His orchestration has a Straussian brilliance. He does not hesitate to glance sidewise at Respighi, as you may observe if you listen reminiscently to the conclusion of the Fugue. The effect is well calculated; the reception of the piece by the Friday afternoon audience was warm.

The fact is, Signor Pick-Mangiagalli is a monstrous clever fellow. He would show us that music depends not so much on the material as on what is done with it; so he chooses the C major scale for a fugue subject, and astonishes us with his virtuosity. He knows all the tricks of manipulation, harmonization, instrumentation, and he dazzles us with them. He is aware of the value of a tremendous climax, so he builds us one worthy of "The Pines of Rome." He is fluent, facile, cool and detached. He stirs our admiration; but we can see his tongue in his cheek.

The Italian item was second on the order of the day. Before it came the "Egmont" Overture and after it Debussy's "La Mer." The second half of the program was given over to Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. We should be too kind if we said the performance of the orchestra was impeccable at this first concert. There were ragged entrances, there were times when the tone of solo instruments was less than pure. Dr. Koussevitzky, filled with interpretative zeal, tended to drag his slow passages, to demand too much volume from his brasses. But on the whole the orchestra, whose personnel has not changed since last year, was an instrument of lovely tone and expressive flexibility. The strings in particular gave forth beautiful sound. There is every indication of a season of surpassing excellence.

L. A. S.

FORTY-NINTH SEASON, NINETEEN HUNDRED TWENTY-NINE AND THIRTY

Second Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, OCTOBER 18, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, OCTOBER 19, at 8.15 o'clock

Handel . . . Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, Op. 6, No. 10
Overture; Air; Lento; Allegro moderato; Allegro.

Strauss . . . Interlude from "Intermezzo": A Domestic Comedy
with Symphonic Interludes, Op. 72
(First time in Boston)

Stravinsky . . . Suite from "L'Oiseau de Feu" ("The Fire-Bird")
A Danced Legend
I. Introduction; Katschei's Enchanted Garden and Dance of the Fire-Bird.
II. Supplication of the Fire-bird.
III. The Princesses play with the Golden Apples.
IV. Dance of the Princess.
V. Infernal Dance of all the Subjects of Katschei.

Sibelius . . . Symphony No. 2, in D major, Op. 43
I. Allegretto.
II. Tempo andante ma rubato.
III. Vivacissimo; Lento e suave.
IV. Finale: Allegro moderato.

There will be an intermission before the symphony

The works to be played at these concerts may be seen in the Allen A. Brown Music Collection of the Boston Public Library one week before the concert

Beginning in Cambridge Oct 6, 1929

INTO Cambridge went the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening for its first concert of the season in the university town. Out of the first two Boston programs, the list of the evening was compounded—Handel's Tenth Concerto Grosso for Strings, to be played in Boston today and tomorrow; Debussy's three sketches "The Sea," and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, out of last week's program. No more receptive audience does the orchestra find than this on the Harvard campus. Twice—in response to a program of three numbers—applause was such as to cause Dr. Koussevitzky to ask the orchestra to rise to its feet in acknowledgment. Both Debussy's sketches and Beethoven's Symphony gave such occasion. But pleasure also came from the Concerto of Handel with its stately, majestic overture; its playful, rollicking fugue; its suave "air" in quasi-sarabande rhythm; its bouncing, roisterous finale.

Would Debussy's music of the sea make its same impression if the composer had not decided to give it a title, had not associated it with the sea, had allowed it to stand as merely three symphonic sketches? It is an idle question perhaps. But certainly the whole is a play of tones as much as it is aural picture of the incessantly varying aspects of a huge expanse of water. And just possibly the subconscious attempt of many a hearer at trying to determine for himself just what particular aspect of the sea the composer had in mind at a given time, keeps him from that fullest surrender to the music, the pure sense impression which these sketches demand. That Debussy had no such definite portrayal in mind is evident from his uncertainty as to titles for the different movements—fully discussed in the program book. For Debussy's "The Sea" is free and untrammelled play of tones, as free and boundless as the sea itself.

One reflects also upon the course which this music—most of Debussy's music—has run in the mind of the concert goer. Time was when it sounded strange, incoherent, baffling. Then came full appreciation. And now one can hear that Debussy is too this, or too that; that qualities which were once denied him reside in him in too great abundance! And yet the searcher for beauty can hardly fail to find it in every measure of this score. But beauty, it has been said, resides more in the eyes of the beholder than in the thing he beholds. Where is there better example than in Debussy? And that the eye (in this case the ear) for beauty was not lacking at Cambridge, applause gave ample proof.

Of the fifth symphony of Beethoven what fresh comment can be made? With a smile one thinks both of the elderly getleman who left the concert before its performance "because he did not like it" and of the university youth who assures one in tones of awed reverence that if all the music in the world were to be destroyed save one piece, he could be content if that one piece were this same fifth symphony! Dr. Koussevitzky's reading of it is an essentially noble one. One thinks about various interpretations of this symphony, both as actually heard, and as at one time or another imagined—including that one of Dr. Koussevitzky with which he began his conductorship here five years ago. But one does not find one to match the superb elevation which clothes these readings of this symphony in the fall of 1923. Small wonder that an audience lingered to do homage to conductor and men. A. H. M.

HANDEL

MUSIC

Symphony Concert Herald By PHILIP HALE Oct 9, 1929

The program of the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, was as follows: Handel, Concerto Grosso for strings, op. 6, No. 10. R. Strauss, Interlude from the opera "Intermezzo" (first time in Boston). Stravinsky, Suite from the ballet "The Fire-Bird." Sibelius, Symphony no. 2. The "Waltz Scene" from "Intermezzo" which had been announced for performance, was not played. Without this piece the concert was too long. Dr. Koussevitzky's reading of the symphony was heard for the first time.

Strauss's "Intermezzo" was suggested by a domestic misunderstanding in consequence of a letter which was intended for a colleague of the same name. Strauss's wife raged and talked of divorce. In the opera—the libretto was written by the composer—Strauss is brought on the stage as Conductor Storch; his wife as Mme. Storch. This was not the first time that Strauss made use of his Pauline for his own musical glorification. In the "Domestic" Symphony he portrays her musically as whimsical, capricious, irritating; now shrewish, now seductive; nor does he hesitate to picture in sensuous strains their reconciliation and fond embracing. What relation this Interlude has to the action of the play is unknown to those who have not heard the opera. It has been said by a German thinking deeply that the "spiritual presentation of the action lies chiefly with the orchestra between acts." The Interlude heard yesterday is suave, melodious, richly colored, without rising to any height of emotion. Whether it portrays Mme. Strauss-Storch after the comforting explanation, or is simply music, must be left to the imagination of the hearer. If it is a musical portrait of Pauline she was evidently in an amiable mood; or, perhaps, the suspected husband was soothing his wife with honeyed words. Whatever the "meaning" of the music, if it has other than musical significance, the audience enjoyed the Interlude which gained in worth by the beauty of the performance.

The "Fire-Bird" selections suffer less than those from other ballets by Stravinsky when the concert hall is substituted for the theatre. The more fanatical Stravinskyites for this reason, and on account of the more orthodox nature of the music, are accustomed to speak lightly, in a condescending manner, of the music; to dismiss it as influenced greatly by Rimsky-Korsakov. They contemptuously characterize "The Fire-Bird" as "academic"; which is in their eyes the unpardonable sin; yet the persistently hammered rhythm in the Infernal Dance of Katschell's subjects is prophetic of rhythms in the "Sacre de Printemps." The former suite is grateful to the ear; interesting without reference to the story on the stage where the attention is more or less concentrated on the movements of mimes and dancers; nor is this music so inevitably associated with action as is the music of "Petrouchka" or of the "Sacre de Printemps." The performance yesterday was brilliant.

It is a question whether Sibelius in his earlier compositions was not injured in the public mind by the insistence of his admirers on his nationality, expressing, they said, the spirit of Finland; melancholy landscapes, the angry sea, the cries of gulls; as though his music had a specific geographical, topographical, botanical, and ornithological value. Some dwelt on Finland groaning and rebellious under the oppression of years. Mr. Schneevoght tells us that the intention of Sibelius in this symphony was to depict the pastoral life of his countrymen; the thought of a brutal ruler that brought timidity; then the awakening of national feeling and at last the entrance of hope and deliverance into their breasts. As the old Frenchman said: "How many things there are in a minuet," so Mr. Schneevoght speaks of this symphony. A composer may be a zealous patriot, but his appeal to the world must be universal, not simply national. When the libretto of "Tosca" was shown to an Italian composer, not Puccini, he turned to the scene in the last act where the tenor should pour out his soul and asked Verdi how he would treat the subject. Verdi smiled and said: "I should write some music." Is it not possible that Sibelius said to himself, "I'll write a second symphony"? Might he not have written it at Vienna, Paris, Milan, even in Terre Haute; for his is a virile, sombre nature, a musician of imposing individuality, who would feel the urge to write whether he were in Telsingfors or Eisleben? It will be observed that in his symphonies he does not make liberal use of folk-music to assert his nationality, and it is fair to believe that in his symphonies he expresses what he himself feels with his stormy nature, his fits of melancholy without the laborious attempt to put Finland on the musical map. One wishes that he would revise, shorten the last movement. The hearer feels at named play. Covent Garden heard it last June.

Roundabout Opera

Continued from Preceding Page

The director of the Opera in Paris lately asked the subscribers to submit lists of the pieces they preferred in the repertoire. Nine operas of Wagner led the poll; "Boris" came next. Among the elder operas, "The Damnation of Faust" and "Don Juan" had honorable place; and "Reyer's" "Salambo" and Massenet's "Faust," "Samson and Delilah," "Romeo and Juliet," "Thais," were not overlooked; Gluck's "Alceste," Rossini's "The Barber of Seville," and "The Barber of Seville" were at least mentioned. Among living composers, Strauss—another German—stood first with "Der Rosenkavalier" and "Salome"; Ravel kept him worthy company with "The Spanish Hour"; Debussy, "Pelleas and Melisande"; and "The Fire-Bird" by Stravinsky. One subscriber, "Vanda," tasted along. One subscriber, "Vanda," tasted along. One subscriber, "Vanda," tasted along.

HANDEL

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

Herald By PHILIP HALE

The program of the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, was as follows: Handel, Concerto Grosso for strings, op. 6, No. 10. R. Strauss, Interlude from the opera "Intermezzo" (first time in Boston). Stravinsky, Suite from the ballet "The Fire-Bird." Sibelius, Symphony no. 2. The "Waltz Scene" from "Intermezzo" which had been announced for performance, was not played. Without this piece the concert was too long. Dr. Koussevitzky's reading of the symphony was heard for the first time.

Strauss's "Intermezzo" was suggested by a domestic misunderstanding in consequence of a letter which was intended for a colleague of the same name. Strauss's wife raged and talked of divorce. In the opera—the libretto was written by the composer—Strauss is brought on the stage as Conductor Storch; his wife as Mme. Storch. This was not the first time that Strauss made use of his Pauline for his own musical glorification. In the "Domestic" Symphony he portrays her musically as whimsical, capricious, irritating; now shrewish, now seductive; nor does he hesitate to picture in sensuous strains their reconciliation and fond embracing. What relation this Interlude has to the action of the play is unknown to those who have not heard the opera. It has been said by a German thinking deeply that the "spiritual presentation of the action lies chiefly with the orchestra between acts." The Interlude heard yesterday is suave, melodious, richly colored, without rising to any height of emotion. Whether it portrays Mme. Strauss-Storch after the comforting explanation, or is simply music, must be left to the imagination of the hearer. If it is a musical portrait of Pauline she was evidently in an amiable mood; or, perhaps, the suspected husband was soothing his wife with honeyed words. Whatever the "meaning" of the music, if it has other than musical significance, the audience enjoyed the Interlude which gained in worth by the beauty of the performance.

The "Fire-Bird" selections suffer less than those from other ballets by Stravinsky when the concert hall is substituted for the theatre. The more fanatical Stravinskyites for this reason, and on account of the more orthodox nature of the music, are accustomed to speak lightly, in a condescending manner, of the music; to dismiss it as influenced greatly by Rimsky-Korsakov. They contemptuously characterize "The Fire-Bird" as "academic"; which is in their eyes the unpardonable sin; yet the persistently hammered rhythm in the Infernal Dance of Katschei's subjects is prophetic of rhythms in the "Sacre de Printemps." The former suite is grateful to the ear; interesting without reference to the story on the stage where the attention is more or less concentrated on the movements of mimes and dancers; nor is this music so inevitably associated with action as is the music of "Petrouchka" or of the "Sacre de Printemps." The performance yesterday was brilliant.

It is a question whether Sibelius in his earlier compositions was not injured in the public mind by the insistence of his admirers on his nationality, expressing, they said, the spirit of Finland; melancholy landscapes, the angry sea, the cries of gulls; as though his music had a specific geographical, topographical, botanical, and ornithological value. Some dwell on Finland groaning and rebellious under the oppression of years. Mr. Schneevoght tells us that the intention of Sibelius in this symphony was to depict the pastoral life of his countrymen; the thought of a brutal ruler that brought timidity; then the awakening of national feeling and at last the entrance of hope and deliverance into their breasts. As the old Frenchman said: "How many things there are in a minuet," so Mr. Schneevoght speaks of this symphony. A composer may be a zealous patriot, but his appeal to the world must be universal, not simply national. When the libretto of "Tosca" was shown to an Italian composer, not Puccini, he turned to the scene in the last act where the tenor should pour out his soul and asked Verdi how he would treat the subject. Verdi smiled and said: "I should write some music." Is it not possible that Sibelius said to himself, "I'll write a second symphony"? Might he not have written it at Vienna, Paris, Milan, even in Terre Haute; for his is a virile, sombre nature, a musician of imposing individuality, who would feel the urge to write whether he were in Telsingfors or Eisleben? It will be observed that in his symphonies he does not make liberal use of folk-music to assert his nationality, and it is fair to believe that in his symphonies he expresses what he himself feels with his stormy nature, his fits of melancholy without the laborious attempt to put Finland on the musical map. One wishes that he would revise, shorten the last movement. The hearer feels at least three times that the great climax is building, that it arrives; and each time is disappointed by the appearance of intermediate measures that seem inconsequential, detrimental to the structure and what should be the final overwhelming effect. Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of the symphony was intensely dramatic.

Strauss, Stravinsky, Sibelius, all fine fellows in their different ways. Yet the concerto of Handel, nearly 200 years old, by the tender beauty, the spiritual and noble sentiment of the Air; by the spontaneous vivacity and fire of the quick movements—the light and frolicsome grace of the final Allegro—revealed the great, superb master. Who dares to prophesy the fate of Strauss, Stravinsky and Sibelius 200 years from now?

The concert will be repeated tonight, the program of Oct. 25, 26, will be as follows: Vivaldi, concerto D minor, for orchestra and organ; Josten, "Jungle," symphonic poem; Tchaikovsky, symphony No. 6 ("Pathetic.")

Second Program of Boston Symphony

FOR the novelty of his second program of the season, Dr. Koussevitzky had purposed to introduce Gregoire Krein, young Russian composer, to Boston Symphony audiences by means of a symphonic poem, "Chant du David." At the tenth hour, this was dropped from the list. The official reason was that the parts were not legible: an explanation susceptible of more than one interpretation. For this piece was substituted the first Interlude from Richard Strauss's opera domestica, "Intermezzo."

These measures were heard for the first time in Boston at the concert of Oct. 18. If they add nothing to our knowledge of Strauss, they are welcome for their familiar aspect. They represent the Viennese, sentimental, uxorious Strauss of the earlier symphonic domestic pieces. Never distinguished for his taste, the composer in this opera has utilized another incident of his home life. The particular interlude played at Symphony Hall represents the faithful wife at home, thinking of her departed consort. The atmosphere is tenderly reflective. The material is worthy of the operetta stage, but in Strauss's handling and Strauss's orchestra it assumes a charming glow. A very successful piece of writing, which was received politely by the audience.

Before this Interlude, the string choirs of the orchestra had proved in a Handel Concerto Grosso—Op. 6, No. 10—that they have lost none of their sheen during the summer. Dr. Koussevitzky proved at the same time that he has not overcome his liking for lingering over each phrase—sometimes over each note—in a slow movement. It was Irving Well, we believe, who said that when slow movements are played slower, Koussevitzky will play them.

Stravinsky's "Fire-Bird" Suite, which followed the Strauss item, was played with that extraordinary lam-bency which this orchestra has achieved under Dr. Koussevitzky. This performance set a new high mark of virtuosity for the season, and roused the Friday afternoon audience to its first real awareness. The men finally shared the applause with the conductor.

There was also a remarkably cordial reception for the Second Symphony of Sibelius, which occupied the second half of the program. Nor was this entirely because of its compelling conclusion. For throughout the orchestra had sung with fervency the lay of the composer. This was Boston's first hearing of the Koussevitzkyan interpretation of this symphony, which was last heard at Symphony Hall more than five years ago from Georg Schnéevoigt, the Finnish conductor who is supposed to speak with authority of Sibelius's scores. So far as recollection of that occasion is reliable, it may be said that without going to Mr. Schnéevoigt's dynamic extremes, Dr. Koussevitzky achieved a performance certainly no less effective. Finland is near enough to Russia, and the Sibelius of the Second Symphony to Tchaikovsky, to be taken to the heart of the Boston conductor. In such music he is not to be surpassed.

L. A. S.

Pleasures of A Melodious Musical Day

Dr. Koussevitzky Leads His Virtuoso Orchestra Into Paths of Song

A TUNEFUL afternoon, said the old ladies, yesterday at Symphony Hall, when they came forth cheerfully from Handel, Strauss, Stravinsky (in young years), even Sibelius, likewise caught young. Their juniors of all ages agreed with them. The outcome was an uncommonly plausible matinée, with the orchestra twice on its feet—after Stravinsky's Suite and Sibelius's Symphony—and plentiful recalls for Dr. Koussevitzky. An afternoon also of rare orchestral virtuosity, were not that happy condition becoming habit at Symphony Hall. In the state's overture to Handel's Concerto-Grosso, No. 10, in D minor, the string choir excelled itself in full-throated, deep-bodied, large-rounded tone. In the succeeding air, it was rich-voiced, plastic, lustrous. Lightly, incisively, in the final numbers, it made play with Handel's figures. The woodwinds clothed beauty with beauty in the Suite from Stravinsky's ballet of "The Fire-Bird." Their tone wound shining through his harmonic mists. Often they gained a roundness of phrase, a softness of accent, magical to hear in the tone-poet's world of enchantment. The whole orchestra smoldered, pulsed, glowed, through the successive stages of the lush Interlude from Strauss's operatic comedy, "Intermezzo"; went stripped, clean-edged, pungent, through the austerer Second Symphony of Sibelius. Not only did virtuosi play, but little masters of style, in tone and recent differentiating composer from composer, piece from piece.

Yet the fates, as their habit is, took a passing penalty. Dr. Koussevitzky hears his orchestra; with reason rejoices in it, as a creator looks upon his creation, tired within, so close is it to his ideal this Overture, dated 1739. Rationally as one plunging a hand into silk and velvet, so his ear feels this sensuous beauty. And Handel unfolds his deep-toned, upswelling, full-spaced melody. Strauss sings luxuriant in curve, texture, color. Or Stravinsky weaves his rainbow webs of fluttering brightness, sings the tender song of girl-princesses, by hand and love both touched. Being of sensitive temperament above most, Dr. Koussevitzky hears such music spell-bound; would prolong the rapture. The consequence is less a sentimentalizing of the composer's page than a unconscious slowing of the pace for a sensuous delight in beautiful sound. The conductor dragged a little Handel's slow progress; held fast to Strauss's standing periods when, for their own sake, they might have been quicker red; drew out the flow of Stravinsky's vivid measures until they became ever little sirupy. For the first time in my hearings of Stravinsky's Suite, it was possible to wish for a quick, rougher section in the midst of this softer of birds and princesses. It is hard to blame the conductor; the wantment of such orchestral song besets him as it beguiles the rest of us. A less lingering pace would dispel risk unfelt.

Have only Strauss's "Interlude," all the pieces were familiar. In fact, though "first times in Boston" stood over this fragment of "Intermezzo," not of us had heard its like before, especially in these, the composer's ageing years. He may invent next to nothing, though this nostalgic meditation, in a plit stillness, of madame over her faded, absent husband. As so much of the substance, it may be little above other "Meditation" which is sweet in Massenet's "Thais." Yet how late and resourceful is the old master's talent! At exactly the right moment, horns enter, or re-enter, to deepen the mounting melody; or the harp thickens; or pace and accent broaden while climax begins to coil. The old, but still the master-hand at every manipulation. For each of us his own sins inst a "pure" or a "classic" taste. There are who have found these mounting, thick-waisted, luxuriant Russian crescendos irresistible from the strains of "Death and Transfiguration," which were the eighteen-nineties to the strains of "Intermezzo" which are these steen-twenties. Again they were unnamed.

Handel must have written these Concerto Grossi with a prideful magnificence. He had turned well into his fifties, yet full was his composing quiver! Our young men and maidens have much to do of sonorities. Though only a choir of angels produce them, they are manifold in bond between modernists and antiquaries. Spare also are these sonorities, with only a little of the harmonic vesture that was to thicken, a later, into romantic luxuriance. Or Stravinsky weaves his rain-

least three times that the great climax is building, that it arrives; and each time is disappointed by the appearance of intermediate measures that seem inconsequential, detrimental to the structure and what should be the final overwhelming effect. Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of the symphony was intensely dramatic.

Strauss, Stravinsky, Sibelius, all fine fellows in their different ways. Yet the concerto of Handel, nearly 200 years old, by the tender beauty, the spiritual and noble sentiment of the Air; by the spontaneous vivacity and fire of the quick movements—the light and frolicsome grace of the final Allegro—revealed the great, superb master. Who dares to prophesy the fate of Strauss, Stravinsky and Sibelius 200 years from now?

The concert will be repeated tonight, the program of Oct. 25, 26, will be as follows: Vivaldi, concerto D minor, for orchestra and organ; Josten, "Jungle," symphonic poem; Tchaikovsky, symphony No. 6 ("Pathetic.")

Second Program of Boston Symphony

FOR the novelty of his second program of the season, Dr. Koussevitzky had purposed to introduce Gregoire Krein, young Russian composer, to Boston Symphony audiences by means of a symphonic poem, "Chant du David." At the tenth hour, this was dropped from the list. The official reason was that the parts were not legible: an explanation susceptible of more than one interpretation. For this piece was substituted the first Interlude from Richard Strauss's opera domestica, "Intermezzo."

These measures were heard for the first time in Boston at the concert of Oct. 18. If they add nothing to our knowledge of Strauss, they are welcome for their familiar aspect. They represent the Viennese, sentimental, uxorious Strauss of the earlier symphonic domestic pieces. Never distinguished for his taste, the composer in this opera has utilized another incident of his home life. The particular interlude played at Symphony Hall represents the faithful wife at home, thinking of her departed consort. The atmosphere is tenderly reflective. The material is worthy of the operetta stage, but in Strauss's handling and Strauss's orchestra it assumes a charming glow. A very successful piece of writing, which was received politely by the audience.

Before this Interlude, the string choirs of the orchestra had proved in a Handel Concerto Grosso—Op. 6, No. 10—that they have lost none of their sheen during the summer. Dr. Koussevitzky proved at the same time that he has not overcome his liking for lingering over each phrase—sometimes over each note—in a slow movement. It was Irving Weil, we believe, who said that when slow movements are played slower, Koussevitzky will play them.

Stravinsky's "Fire-Bird" Suite, which followed the Strauss item, was played with that extraordinary lam-bency which this orchestra has achieved under Dr. Koussevitzky. This performance set a new high mark of virtuosity for the season, and roused the Friday afternoon audience to its first real awareness. The men finally shared the applause with the conductor.

There was also a remarkably cordial reception for the Second Symphony of Sibelius, which occupied the second half of the program. Nor was this entirely because of its compelling conclusion. For throughout the orchestra had sung with fervency the lay of the composer. This was Boston's first hearing of the Koussevitzkyan interpretation of this symphony, which was last heard at Symphony Hall more than five years ago from Georg Schnéevoigt, the Finnish conductor who is supposed to speak with authority of Sibelius's scores. So far as recollection of that occasion is reliable, it may be said that without going to Mr. Schnéevoigt's dynamic extremes, Dr. Koussevitzky achieved a performance certainly no less effective. Finland is near enough to Russia, and the Sibelius of the Second Symphony to Tchaikovsky, to be taken to the heart of the Boston conductor. In such music he is not to be surpassed.

L. A. S.

Pleasu

A M

M

Dr. Kousse
Virtuoso Path

A TUNEFUL

ladies, y Hall, w cheerfully Stravinsky (In yo ius, likewise c juniors of all ag
The outcome was plausible matinée, twice on its feet—a and Sibelius's Syr recalls for Dr. Ko noon also of rare were not that hap habit at Symphon overture to Handel
10, in D minor, th itself in full-throat rounded tone. It was rich-voice Lightly, incisively, it made play w
The woodwinds beauty in the Su ballet of "The F wound shining t mists. Often they of phrase, a softn to hear in the to chantment. The tered, pulsed, glo ressive stages of t Strauss's operatic went stripped, c through the auster Sibelius. Not o
but little masters

ond f

cent differentiat oser, piece from p Yet the fates, as passing penalty. D his orchestra; with is a creator looki fired within, so c
As one plunging a velvet, so his ear beauty. And Hand toned, upswelling, f Strauss sings luxuri
olor. Or Stravins

now webs of fluttering brightness, sings soft the tender song of girl-princesses, by legend and love both touched. Being of responsive temperament above most, Dr. Koussevitzky hears such music spell-bound; would prolong the rapture.

The consequence is less a sentimentalizing of the composer's page than a half-unconscious slowing of the pace for sheer sensuous delight in beautiful sound. The conductor dragged a little Handel's spacious progress; held fast to Strauss's expanding periods when, for their own good, they might have been quicker released; drew out the flow of Stravinsky's liquid measures until they became ever so little sirupy. For the first time in many hearings of Stravinsky's Suite, it was possible to wish for a quick, rougher-coated section in the midst of this soft twitter of birds and princesses. It is hard to blame the conductor; the enchantment of such orchestral song beguiles him as it beguiles the rest of us. Yet a less lingering pace would dispel risk of surfeit.

Save only Strauss's "Interlude," all these pieces were familiar. In fact, though "first times in Boston" stood under this fragment of "Intermezzo," most of us had heard its like before, especially in these, the composer's ageing years. He may invent next to nothing through this nostalgic meditation, in lamp-lit stillness, of madame over her cherished, absent husband. As so much musical substance, it may be little above that other "Meditation" which is sweetmeat in Massenet's "Thais." Yet how astute and resourceful is the old master's treatment! At exactly the right moment, the horns enter, or re-enter, to deepen and gild the mounting melody; or the harmony thickens; or pace and accent broaden, while climax begins to coil. The old hand, but still the master-hand at every manipulation. For each of us his own sins against a "pure" or a "classic" taste. Some there are who have found these slow-mounting, thick-waisted, luxuriant Straussian crescendi irresistible from the days of "Death and Transfiguration," which were the eighteen-nineties to the days of "Intermezzo" which are these nineteen-twenties. Again they were unashamed.

Handel must have written these Concerti Grossi with a prideful magnificence. He had turned well into his fifties, yet how full was his composing quiver! Our young men and maidens have much to say of sonorities. Though only a choir of strings produce them, they are manifold in this Overture, dated 1739. Rationally the bond between modernists and ancients is close. Spare also are these sonorities, with only a little of the harmonic vesture that was to thicken, a century later, into romantic luxuriance. Stately as well—the ear-mark of Handel

(and his Georgian age), ceremoniously marshalling his hearers into his music. The strings sing his Air and to stateliness are added spaciousness and serenity. No less the prideful flow. Like the prayerful noblemen and burghers in old Flemish pictures, Handel must aspire as one with a dignity to keep. Not too much will he relax it, even when he bows his hearers out again to a light-figured, light-rhythmed finale. For Bach the jiggling when a suite must end. Throughout, economy of means—another modernist trait—and a wealth of accomplishment, not always so certain in the younger brethren of these days. A full man was "Mr. Handel," as the Georgians called him, and a various. We should know other sides of his music—say, his dances.

There is a magic in this Suite from "The Fire Bird" that the years and repetition do not lessen. Like the old Handel, the young Stravinsky seems to compose in readiness and ease. What he wills that he may forthwith accomplish. For aught any one knows, he may have "toiled terribly" at this "Danced Legend." Yet the magical quality of it suggests a music passively engendered in the composer for as passive pleasure in the hearer. These sweet-scented, smooth-flowing, diatonic Russian or oriental melodies ooze forth like a perfume or an unguent caressing the senses. The harmonic dress, filtered through the chromatic Skriabin, Rimsky, Wagner, becomes drug-like under this magic of the young Stravinsky; soothes ears, illudes fancy. Luminous glamour over all, in its turn also magical, is the orchestral vesture, sheen upon sheen, as though the choirs or the separate instruments were veils rising or descending. Then of a sudden that drum-stroke at the beginning of the Finale—and forthwith more than hint of the firm-outlined, sharp-edged, high-rhythmed Stravinsky that was to write "Petrushka" and "Le Sacre." The soft visioning is rent; the magic is dispersed; here, at seven and twenty goes Igor trying out his power.

For the first time, yesterday, before an audience in America, Dr. Koussevitzky conducted in Sibelius's Second Symphony. Quickly his version stood characterized. The piece dates from 1902. In the quarter of a century since elapsed, Sibelius has written much in moods and manner of which this Symphony in D major is foreshadowing. Dr. Koussevitzky's predecessors at Symphony Hall, knowing little of that subsequent music, or thinking poorly of it, preferred to disregard it when they played the earlier piece. They related this Second Symphony to past rather than future, proceeding from a Sibelius who had not yet renounced Russian or German models. Or else they played it quite literally in the black and on the H. over, or under-em- ready marking Sibe- dual composer or the full quality of air Sibelius sounded ous close. Any able n into the twentieth written it. In "Fin- self renewed the vein. account they saw the singulari- second move-

y. Throughout at unescapable s as later years apart among ius of stripped oped, abruptly e to another re- d harmonies; of gle instruments d choirs, used pale colors, of acies. Like the gainst the low bitter and mel- sty, moods, light- hinks himself of t is to say, the office upon this he did last year ard and uminates and en- ainst him. quality; at every police thands and sounds und for Ho of the later sym- Departmentratizes withal- ication to th er may fit what vana and this Second Sym- ere." Wavin an be as far apart l to New O the pastoral prog- his right, ram-book. There with the Bo, auty, a darksome ted Press ror; a manner of on the traie other in music did: "I don, elius Dr. Kousse- I am a vi this Symphony in am insure to distinguish any the nerve H. T. P. d last nigh of my fan

STRAUSS' MUSIC BY SYMPHONY

Interlude From Opera "Intermezzo" Gives Pleasure

Post Oct. 19, 1929 BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

With conductor and orchestra at top bent and a programme of uncommon interest, the latter something that may scarcely be said for its immediate predecessor, the Symphony Concert of yesterday proved intrinsically more of an occasion than that of a week ago.

The audience, too, recovered from the apathy or absorption in other concerns that characterized its attitude at the opening concert, applauded throughout the afternoon with a spontaneity and fervor born of genuine pleasure in both music and performance.

FROM STRAUSS' OPERA

Handel of the tenth Concerto Grosso, Handel of stately periods and of vibrant or singing strings, began the concert. To him succeeded, not the new Russian Krein but the familiar Richard Strauss in an unfamiliar piece, an Interlude from his opera "Intermezzo," while Stravinsky's "Fire-Bird" suite in its fourth and most brilliant performance under Dr. Koussevitzky and Sibelius' Second Symphony in its first under his direction concluded the list.

"Intermezzo," last but one of the operas of Strauss, is as yet unknown on this side of the Atlantic, though it enjoys considerable popularity in the Teutonic countries and even the summer visitor to Germany may hear it in the occasional Strauss festival under the composer's direction.

The book, based on an episode in Strauss' life, is also of his own making.

Sibelius' Second

When George Schneevogt, himself a Finn and an intimate of the composer, conducted Sibelius' Second Symphony at a pair of symphony concerts in the spring of 1924 he disclosed to the editor of the programme-book and to an interviewer or two the poetic background of the music.

STRAUSS NOVELTY AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Globe Oct. 19, 1929 "Intermezzo" Interlude Is Heard First Time Here

Suite From Stravinsky's "Firebird" Wins Unusual Applause

Dr Koussevitzky has substituted on the program of this week's Symphony concerts an orchestral interlude from Richard Strauss' opera, "Intermezzo," for the new piece by Krein announced for performance. Nothing from this opera produced in 1924 has hitherto been heard in Boston, though excerpts have been played by other American orchestras.

The rest of the program included a Handel Concerto Grosso, the Suite from Stravinsky's "Firebird," and Sibelius' Second Symphony. It was noteworthy that the conservative Friday audience, to which the music of Stravinsky has usually appeared obnoxious, yesterday recalled the conductor repeatedly after the "Firebird" suite, until he bade the players rise to share in the applause.

"Intermezzo" is an operatic comedy about a misunderstanding between a musician and his wife which threatens to result in a divorce, but ends with a reconciliation. The libretto, written by Strauss himself, is said to be based on an incident in his own family life. His penchant for musical autobiography can be noted also in the tone poems, "Sinfonia Domestica" and "Ein Heldenleben." The fragment played yesterday represents

(and his Georgian age), ceremoniously marshalling his hearers into his music. The strings sing his Air and to staidness are added spaciousness and serene. No less the prideful flow. Like the proud noblemen and burghers in old Flemish pictures, Handel must aspire as with a dignity to keep. Not too much he relax it, even when he bows his hearers out again to a light-figured, lively, rhythmed finale. For Bach the jig when a suite must end. Through economy of means—another modern trait—and a wealth of accomplishment not always so certain in the young brethren of these days. A full man, "Mr. Handel," as the Georgians call him, and a various. We should know other sides of his music—say, his dances.

There is a magic in this Suite from "The Fire Bird" that the years and repetition do not lessen. Like the old Fiddler, the young Stravinsky seems to crouch in readiness and ease. What wills that he may forthwith accomplish. For aught any one knows, he may be "toiled terribly" at this "Danced I end." Yet the magical quality it suggests a music passively engendered in the composer for as passive pleasure of the hearer. These sweet-scented, smoldering, diatonic Russian or oriental melodies ooze forth like a perfume of an unguent caressing the senses. Harmonic dress, filtered through chromatic Skriabin, Rimsky, Wagner becomes drug-like under this magic of the young Stravinsky; soothes ears, lures fancy. Luminous glamour over its turn also magical, is the orchestral vestiture, sheen upon sheen, as though choirs or the separate instruments vibrate rising or descending. Then comes sudden that drum-stroke at the beginning of the Finale—and forthwith remains a sad-struck beauty, a darkness than hint of the firm-outlined, shrouded, high-rhythmed Stravinsky was to write "Petrushka" and "Sacre." The soft visioning is rent; magic is dispersed; here, at seven twenty goes Igor trying out his power white upon the staves. Whichever the method, they passed over, or under-emphasized, the traits already marking Sibelius as highly individual composer or anticipating him in the full quality of his later years. Their Sibelius sounded clearest in the sonorous close. Any able composer of the turn into the twentieth century might have written it. In "Finlandia," Sibelius himself renewed the vein. On the other side of the account they saw "through a glass, darkly," the singularities of the first and the second movement. Not so Dr. Koussevitzky. Throughout the Symphony, save in that unescapable close, he is all for Sibelius as later years and later work set him apart among composers—for the Sibelius of stripped motives, meagerly developed, abruptly put by, from one brief life to another re-creating of thin-spun, acid harmonies; of an orchestra used as single instruments rather than as rounded choirs, used sparingly withal and in pale colors, of well marked idiosyncracies, like the wood-winds plangent against the low whirr of the violins; of bitter and melancholy, or fierce and gusty, moods, light-some only when he bethinks himself of the Finnish folk. That is to say, the conductor does the same office upon this Second Symphony as he did last year upon the Third. He illuminates and enhances its individual quality; at every possible opportunity, finds and sounds clear the Sibelian note of the later symphonies; vitalizes and dramatizes withal. The imaginative hearer may fit what background he likes to this Second Symphony. Such fancies can be as far apart as the nationalistic and the pastoral programs cited in the program-book. There remain a sad-struck beauty, a darkness, a power, a pungent savor; a manner of expression like to none other in music contained. Such a Sibelius Dr. Koussevitzky conjures out of this Symphony in D major. It is enough to distinguish any performance. H. T. P.

For the first time, yesterday, before an audience in America, Dr. Koussevitzky conducted in Sibelius's Second Symphony. Quickly his version stood characterized. The piece dates from 1902. In the quarter of a century since elapsed, Sibelius has written much in moods and manner of which this Symphony in D major is foreshadowing. Dr. Koussevitzky's predecessors at Symphony Hall, knowing little of that subsequent music, or thinking poorly of it, preferred to disregard it when they played the earlier piece. They related this Second Symphony to past rather than future, proceeding from a Sibelius who had not yet renounced Russian or German models. Or else they played it quite literally in the black and

STRAUSS' MUSIC BY SYMPHONY

Interlude From Opera
"Intermezzo" Gives Pleasure

Post ——— Oct. 19, 1929
BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

With conductor and orchestra at top bent and a programme of uncommon interest, the latter something that may scarcely be said for its immediate predecessor, the Symphony Concert of yesterday proved intrinsically more of an occasion than that of a week ago.

The audience, too, recovered from the apathy or absorption in other concerns that characterized its attitude at the opening concert, applauded throughout the afternoon with a spontaneity and fervor born of genuine pleasure in both music and performance.

FROM STRAUSS' OPERA

Handel of the tenth Concerto Grosso, Handel of stately periods and of vibrant or singing strings, began the concert. To him succeeded, not the new Russian Krein but the familiar Richard Strauss in an unfamiliar piece, an interlude from his opera "Intermezzo," while Stravinsky's "Fire-Bird" suite in its fourth and most brilliant performance under Dr. Koussevitzky and Sibelius' Second Symphony in its first under his direction concluded the list.

"Intermezzo," last but one of the operas of Strauss, is as yet unknown on this side of the Atlantic, though it enjoys considerable popularity in the Teutonic countries and even the summer visitor to Germany may hear it in the occasional Strauss festival under the composer's direction.

The book, based on an episode in Strauss' life, is also of his own making.

Sibelius' Second

When George Schneevogt, himself a Finn and an intimate of the composer, conducted Sibelius' Second Symphony at a pair of symphony concerts in the spring of 1924 he disclosed to the editor of the programme-book and to an interviewer or two the poetic background of the music.

STRAUSS NOVELTY AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Globe ——— Oct. 19, 1929
"Intermezzo" Interlude Is Heard First Time Here

Suite From Stravinsky's "Firebird" Wins Unusual Applause

Dr Koussevitzky has substituted on the program of this week's Symphony concerts an orchestral interlude from Richard Strauss' opera, "Intermezzo," for the new piece by Krein announced for performance. Nothing from this opera produced in 1924 has hitherto been heard in Boston, though excerpts have been played by other American orchestras.

The rest of the program included a Handel Concerto Grosso, the Suite from Stravinsky's "Firebird," and Sibelius' Second Symphony. It was noteworthy that the conservative Friday audience, to which the music of Stravinsky has usually appeared obnoxious, yesterday recalled the conductor repeatedly after the "Firebird" suite, until he bade the players rise to share in the applause.

"Intermezzo" is an operatic comedy about a misunderstanding between a musician and his wife which threatens to result in a divorce, but ends with a reconciliation. The libretto, written by Strauss himself, is said to be based on an incident in his own family life. His penchant for musical autobiography can be noted also in the tone poems, "Sinfonia Domestica" and "Ein Heldenleben." The fragment played yesterday represents the wife who thinks herself to have lost her husband's love sitting alone and brooding over her sorrows.

Strauss has written it with the superb musical craftsmanship that lends an air of distinction even to his less inspired work. The themes lack originality, and the harmony is consistently Wagnerian in character, yet this Interlude is effective. It would be more so in its operatic context.

The three numbers by living composers on yesterday's program would suffice to show how mistaken the writers of musical history are when they group composers and works chronologically instead of in accordance with the character of the music itself. Stravinsky's "Firebird" Suite, written before 1909 belongs definitely to the 20th century, despite the many traces it contains of the influence of his teacher Rimsky Korsakov.

Beside it Strauss' Interlude, written within the past decade, seems curiously old fashioned; as indeed it would if compared with Strauss' "Electra," or "Till Eulenspiegel." Sibelius's Second Symphony, which was composed in 1901, though it has the originality of style that characterises nearly all of the great Finnish composer's work, suggests at times too strongly such 19th century writers as Tchaikovsky.

Strauss and Sibelius were born in the 1860s, and Stravinsky in 1882, so that they are chronologically almost contemporaries. But the whole style and mood of "The Firebird" is alien to that of the Strauss and Sibelius works heard yesterday. Stravinsky has his moments of honeyed melody. He does not in "The Firebird" approach the daring polyharmony and polytonality of his later works. But he never indulges in bombast or sentiment.

Now, the secondary 19th century composers, all strongly influenced by Beethoven and Wagner, almost invariably fail to attain the heroic eloquence and the intense emotion of these masters, and fall unawares into bombast and sentimentality. Stravinsky does not in "The Firebird" want to be heroic or intense. He is trying merely to be clever and interesting and original. When he wrote "The Firebird" he was, save for Satie and Ravel, almost alone in cultivating these rather than the characteristic 19th century musical virtues.

Today, 20 years after, nearly the entire younger generation of composers has passed through this phase of cleverness, and entered on the one now in vogue of trying to recapture 18th Century musical moods like those of the Handel concerto which began yesterday's concert.

Dr Koussevitzky and the orchestra gave eloquent readings of all these works. The performance had indeed in the main a clarity and accuracy of style which has not always distinguished the playing of the Boston Symphony in recent seasons. It seemingly represented a highly successful effort on the part of the players to give the conductor exactly what he wanted.

And yet in many places, such as the Lento movement of the Handel, one was actively dissatisfied with the result. Dr Koussevitzky's way of shaping a melody too often smooths or shatters its contours. He likes contrasts between very rapid, very slow tempi, and strongly marked rhythms. Like most performers with a highly personal style he sometimes stresses his qualities until they seem to make his defects more glaring.

There is no questioning that Koussevitzky is a conductor of genius. But one cannot help sometimes questioning his taste.

P R.

FINE PROGRAM BY SYMPHONY

Strauss Interlude Is Heard
For the First Time in Boston

Traveler Oct. 19, 1929

Dr. Koussevitzky opened the second Symphony program of the season at Symphony hall yesterday afternoon with Handel's exquisite Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra. It swept the large audience into a mood that glowed with delight to the end of the last allegro.

Interlude from "Intermezzo" followed, a domestic comedy, according to the program, by Richard Strauss. Boston has not heard this number before, and Dr. Koussevitzky interpreted it charmingly, giving full rein to the dialogue, which is amusingly obvious, and delicately integrating the symphonic interludes.

Stravinsky's suite from "The Firebird" brought warm applause. Founded on an old Russian legend, it provides a colorful and intriguing sequence, with its scenes laid in an enchanted garden. Princesses are at play with golden apples, a magic bird dances, and the finale is particularly interesting and impressive.

Through the four familiar movements of Sibelius's familiar second symphony, the audience followed with pronounced appreciation. Dr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra were heartily applauded.

The program will be repeated this evening.

FORTY-NINTH SEASON, NINETEEN HUNDRED TWENTY-NINE AND THIRTY

Third Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, OCTOBER 25, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, OCTOBER 26, at 8.15 o'clock

Vivaldi Concerto in D minor for Orchestra with Organ
(Edited by A. Siloti)

- I. Maestoso.
- II. Largo.
- III. Allegro.

Josten "Jungle," Symphonic Poem

Tchaikovsky Symphony No. 6 in B minor, "Pathetic," Op. 74

- I. Adagio; Allegro non troppo.
- II. Allegro con grazia.
- III. Allegro molto vivace.
- IV. Finale: Adagio lamentoso.

STEINWAY PIANO USED

There will be an intermission before the symphony

The works to be played at these concerts may be seen in the Allen A. Brown Music Collection of the Boston Public Library one week before the concert

The wife who thinks herself to have lost her husband's love sitting alone and brooding over her sorrows.

Strauss has written it with the superb musical craftsmanship that lends an air of distinction even to his less inspired work. The themes lack originality, and the harmony is consistently Wagnerian in character, yet this Interlude is effective. It would be more so in its operatic context.

The three numbers by living composers on yesterday's program would suffice to show how mistaken the writers of musical history are when they group composers and works chronologically instead of in accordance with the character of the music itself. Stravinsky's "Firebird" Suite, written before 1909 belongs definitely to the 20th century, despite the many traces it contains of the influence of his teacher Rimsky Korsakov.

Beside it Strauss' Interlude, written within the past decade, seems curiously old fashioned; as indeed it would if compared with Strauss' "Electra," or "Till Eulenspiegel." Sibelius's Second Symphony, which was composed in 1901, though it has the originality of style that characterises nearly all of the great Finnish composer's work, suggests at times too strongly such 19th century writers as Tchaikovsky.

Strauss and Sibelius were born in the 1860s, and Stravinsky in 1882, so that they are chronologically almost contemporaries. But the whole style and mood of "The Firebird" is alien to that of the Strauss and Sibelius works heard yesterday. Stravinsky has his moments of honeyed melody. He does not in "The Firebird" approach the daring polyharmony and polytonality of his later works. But he never indulges in bombast or sentiment.

Now, the secondary 19th century composers, all strongly influenced by Beethoven and Wagner, almost invariably fail to attain the heroic eloquence and the intense emotion of those masters, and fall unawares into bombast and sentimentality. Stravinsky does not in "The Firebird" want to be heroic or intense. He is trying merely to be clever and interesting and original. When he wrote "The Firebird" he was, save for Satie and Ravel, almost alone in cultivating these rather than the characteristic 19th century musical virtues.

Today, 20 years after, nearly the entire younger generation of composers has passed through this phase of cleverness, and entered on the one now in vogue of trying to recapture 18th Century musical moods like those of the Handel concerto which began yesterday's concert.

Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra gave eloquent readings of all these works. The performance had indeed in the main a clarity and accuracy of style which has not always distinguished the playing of the Boston Symphony in recent seasons. It seemingly represented a highly successful effort on the part of the players to give the conductor exactly what he wanted.

And yet in many places, such as the Lento movement of the Handel, one was actively dissatisfied with the result. Dr. Koussevitzky's way of shaping a melody too often smooths or shatters its contours. He likes contrasts between very rapid, very slow tempi, and strongly marked rhythms. Like most performers with a highly personal style he sometimes stresses his qualities until they seem to make his defects more glaring.

There is no question that Koussevitzky is a conductor of genius. But one cannot help sometimes questioning his taste.

P. R.

FINE PROGRAM BY SYMPHONY

Strauss Interlude Is Heard
For the First Time in Boston

Traveler Oct. 19, 1929

Dr. Koussevitzky opened the second Symphony program of the season at Symphony hall yesterday afternoon with Handel's exquisite Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra. It swept the large audience into a mood that glowed with delight to the end of the last allegro.

Interlude from "Intermezzo" followed, a domestic comedy, according to the program, by Richard Strauss. Boston has not heard this number before, and Dr. Koussevitzky interpreted it charmingly, giving full rein to the dialogue, which is amusingly obvious, and delicately integrating the symphonic interludes.

Stravinsky's suite from "The Firebird" brought warm applause. Founded on an old Russian legend, it provides a colorful and intriguing sequence, with its scenes laid in an enchanted garden. Princesses are at play with golden apples, a magic bird dances, and the finale is particularly interesting and impressive.

Through the four familiar movements of Sibelius's familiar second symphony, the audience followed with pronounced appreciation. Dr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra were heartily applauded.

The program will be repeated this evening.

FORTY-NINTH SEASON, NINETEEN HUNDRED TWENTY-NINE AND THIRTY

Third Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, OCTOBER 25, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, OCTOBER 26, at 8.15 o'clock

Vivaldi . . . Concerto in D minor for Orchestra with Organ
(Edited by A. Siloti)

- I. Maestoso.
- II. Largo.
- III. Allegro.

Josten . . . "Jungle," Symphonic Poem

Tchaikovsky . . . Symphony No. 6 in B minor, "Pathetic," Op. 74

- I. Adagio; Allegro non troppo.
- II. Allegro con grazia.
- III. Allegro molto vivace.
- IV. Finale: Adagio lamentoso.

STEINWAY PIANO USED

There will be an intermission before the symphony

The works to be played at these concerts may be seen in the Allen A. Brown Music Collection of the Boston Public Library one week before the concert

Symphony Concert

Herall BY PHILIP HALE Oct. 16/23

The third concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. Vivaldi, Concerto, D minor, for orchestra with organ (edited by Siloti. Josten, "Jungle"; symphonic poem (first performance), Tchaikovsky, symphony No. 6, B minor, "Pathetic."

Werner Josten, teacher of fugue and composition at Smith College, wrote "Jungle" last year. The subject was not suggested to him by any tale of adventure; not even by H. M. Tomlinson's famous book of his experiences in Brazil, nor by the marvellous description of the Eastern jungle in "Gai-lion's Reach." Mr. Josten saw a picture by Henri Rousseau, who began to paint when he was 40 years old; he was ridiculed, his exhibited paintings were badly hung; all sorts of obstacles were put in his way; he was wretchedly poor to the day of his death in 1910. And now the once despised pictures command a high price. Rousseau did not find it necessary to visit a jungle. Studies in the Jardin des Plantes at Paris were sufficient for his purpose, as Auber did not visit Naples for "local color" when he wrote characteristically Neapolitan music for scenes in "La Muette de Portici." Mr. Josten informs us that the music of his symphonic poem "tries to portray the emotions and sensations which assail a white man entering the jungle, with its lures, terrors, primitive love and ferocious death." One might reasonably say that no music can give so vivid impressions of jungle life as does the prose of Tomlinson, Paul Morand or Andre Gide; but given Mr. Josten's program, any hearer who is willing to meet him half way will admit that he has written admirably to express in tones that program; and this without any desire to be sensational. His themes are his own with the exception of a Voodoo rhythmic motive; nor does he content himself merely with episodes loosely connected; the work is firmly knit, it has form and substance. Mr. Josten not only has musical ideas in plenty; he has imagination; he realizes in music what he saw in Rousseau's picture. No doubt the music is more picturesque, more impressive than the painting. From the beginning to the end there is the assurance of a savagery, a wildness in tones that does not depend at all on laboriously sought-out dissonances or ear-splitting tonal explosions. A huge orchestra is employed. Probably the instrument "the lion roar" appears for the first time in the orchestra. (It is a greatly enlarged edition of boyhood's plaything, known as "the Devil's Fiddle," by some as "the bull fiddle.") But the effectiveness of Mr. Josten's score does not rest on attempts at realism, any more than the sheep in Strauss's "Don Quixote," are the commanding feature in that tone-poem. As among African tribes, so in this symphonic poem, drums have their meaning, at times sinister and portentous, but the work gives the impression that the melodic figures, the developments, the harmonic schemes, the contrasts—note the haunting sensuality of the love episode—were all conceived as a whole.

"Jungle" is an uncommonly interesting work, none the less so because it comes from a teacher at Smith College who delights in the revival of operas by Monteverde and Handel; finds inspiration in poems by Shelley and Baudelaire; hymns the praise of the "Queen of Paradys" and has not forgotten Dryden's "Ode for St. Cecilia's Day."

Dr. Koussevitzky, as is his habit, took great pains in the preparation of the performance. Although the music presents many technical difficulties, the performance was a brilliant one. The composer was deservedly called to the platform.

Vivaldi's concerto was the first composition conducted by Dr. Koussevitzky in Boston. It is worth hearing more than once if only for the beautiful slow movement. The other movements deserve respectful attention, especially from those who loudly, one might say blatantly, proclaim that the history of music began only with the coming of Stravinsky. Handel, Bach, Beethoven, Schumann, Brahms—they are all "old hat"; though some condescend to speak favorably of Mozart. No doubt these extollers of ultra-modern music, making no discrimination in their wild-eyed eulogy, would sniff disdainfully at the superbly dramatic performance of the "Pathetic" symphony and dismiss the great Russian whose appeal is universal, as a maker of tunes, possibly prefacing "tunes" by the word "vulgar," or saying that this music is "too obvious." It is the fashion in some quarters to extol Rimsky-Korsakov at the expense of Tchaikovsky, but the latter was a man of a far deeper nature who was not ashamed to sound his own joy and unhappiness, his delight in life and his dread of death. So that his own emotions make their way to the hearts of his hearers.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The next concerts will be on Nov. 8 and 9, for the orchestra will be away next week. The program of the fourth pair of concerts will comprise Mozart's Symphony in E flat (K. 543), Gruenberg's Symphonic poem "The Enchanted Isle" (first time in Boston), Spohr's Nocturne, a suite for wind instruments (probably a first performance here) and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel."

"PATHETIC" AN EPIC BY SYMPHONY

Post Oct. 20, 1929

Astounding Performance at Dr. Koussevitzky's Hands

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The memorable portion of the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon was not the playing, notable in kind, of Vivaldi's stately Concerto in D minor for orchestra with organ as edited by Alexander Siloti, or the first hearing of Werner Josten's symphonic poem, "Jungle." It was the astounding performance of Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony.

GRIPS LISTENERS

In this performance Dr. Koussevitzky, with the orchestra to aid him at every turn, exhibited in remarkable degree the ability to make the familiar, even that which has become stale and trite, new and engrossing. Not that in such deeds he necessarily adds to the music anything that legitimately is not in it. Rather he brings to complete revelation and fulfillment intended effects that, by comparison, the ordinary performance merely hints at or suggests. It is the present unwritten law of the Symphony Concerts that no applause shall interrupt the progress of a symphony. But yesterday, as in fact in past performances of the "Pathetic" under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction, the audience could not contain itself when the mounting excitements of the third movement had run their course. Here listeners, gripped and held taut as seldom they may be by any musical performance, had out of sheer necessity to seek release in the clapping of hands. Nor did the conductor show any disposition to curb these plaudits. Incidentally, when this Scherzo-March is played as yesterday it was played, the only possible complement to it is the movement that the composer created for his Finale. Another climax of the conventional sort would have been a psychological mistake if not an esthetic error.

Josten's "Jungle"

As the outstanding figure in the depart of music at Smith College Mr. Josten has earned both the praise and the gratitude of music-lovers by his tastefully prepared and eloquently performed revivals of operas by Handel and Monteverde. That a musician of his leanings should have composed the symphonic poem made known yesterday is a bit surprising. Inspired by a painting, "Foret exotique," of Henri Rousseau, Mr. Josten's piece, by the composer's own confession, seeks "to portray the emotions and sensations which assail a white man entering the jungle, with its lures, terrors, primitive love, and ferocious death."

To this end the composer has assembled a huge orchestra, and in the employment of it relies upon all manner of startling rhythmic, dynamic and percussive effects. A "lion's roar" is listed among the instruments although Dr. Koussevitzky, who cares not overmuch for naturalistic effects, hardly permitted this contrivance to sound its most blood-curdling note.

That Mr. Josten gains here and there an effect of suspensive terror may not be denied. But would not his music serve best as tonal background to a film, a pantomime or some such situation on the spoken stage as Eugene O'Neill has invented in his "Emperor Jones"? As a piece of music "Jungle" has hardly the thematic interest or the organic life to enable it to stand squarely on its own feet.

Mr. Josten, who was present in the hall, was summoned to the stage by Dr. Koussevitzky and was cordially applauded by the audience.

To Chaikovsky Over Vivaldi And a Jungle

Dr. Koussevitzky Transfigures
The "Pathetic" Symphony,
Mr. Josten Falls Short

IF the devotees of Chaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony will pardon the word, it was ever so little amusing to watch the effect of the March Movement upon the audience yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall. Though thirty-odd years have gnawed at the music, though the Anglo-American world that hears it oftenest, has changed to a post-war from a fin-de-siècle mentality (as it used to be called), there is not a little to be said for the other divisions of "The Pathetic." This third movement, however, has dwindled—or rather swelled—into an exhibitional exercise in rhythms and sonorities wherewith conductor and orchestra play upon the nerves of audiences. They stay or speed the pace; tighten or relax the rhythm; now in advance and now in recession, at last attain the climax. And tense and titillating is the excitement of most hearers. This effect, moreover, is intrinsic in the music. Not that Chaikovsky deliberately contrived it. He was too honest and, in composition, too fervid, to do that. There was in him, none the less, a melodramatic instinct; in this March Movement he gave it spontaneous play.

The proof was the stronger on Friday, since Dr. Koussevitzky refrained from every exhibitional stroke. He manipulated neither pace nor rhythm, neither sonorities nor climax. He measured his own zeal more discreetly than in previous performances hereabouts. He eschewed altogether the frenzies of various rivals and predecessors. The whole movement could hardly have been played more simply and straightforwardly. Yet the nervous effect upon the audience was changeless. Excitement loosed applause that no rule or custom might check. The progress of the Symphony was stayed; the clapping was general; with a wave of his hands toward the orchestra, the conductor acknowledged it. Yet had Honegger or Bartók signed these pages, not a few who clapped loudest would called them blatant; while some who put by wit for thrill, would have "The procession is coming, hooray!"

en Dr. Koussevitzky re-played, last Chaikovsky's Fifth Symphony, post the composer's masterwork, a new rance was audible from his version. ke quality distinguishes throughout resent reading of "The Pathetic." was when he prepared obviously trance of the songful theme in the novement; by pace, emphasis and clothed it to the utmost with senti-l melancholy. Yesterday it came rent without exaggeration; diffused n suggestion, not of rankness, but, curve that Dr. Koussevitzky lent a decadent sweetness proper to the ser's time and mood. Similarly he turbulent passages in the move- Though one began with a drum—Mr. Ritter was at the top of his -like a virtuoso pistol-shot, it was e to agitation, not frenzy.

In in the second "five-four" move- how shrewdly Dr. Koussevitzky the main current of the trio in sion, that, beneath, the reiterated beat might haunt it. At the end, e conductor let the measures droop assitude of pace and tone—an- of Chaikovsky's fin-de-siècle moods vices. (Nearer to us nowadays is rill, nervous energy of the ensuing) Rather too much Dr. Kousse- muted the gong-stroke that is sum- of fate in the Finale; while with thetic understanding he tightened ythm and held fast to the loose- melody. And in the end there was ying into a silence of extinction is Chaikovsky's diminuendo trans- into work of imagination.

ome ears at least, "The Pathetic" much by this temperate perform- They were prepared to be bored; found themselves interested and Notoriously Chaikovsky is a loose ctionist in symphonic form. Less eloped his melodies than strung n sequences, to be vitalized by con- Out of devoted instinct for the mu- Koussevitzky veiled this fault and Chaikovsky a semblance of sym- coherence rather than of tone- ke alternations. To equally good e, he clothed the whole Symphony pt that melodramatic March Move- with clear romantic quality. It is to call "The Pathetic" self-revela- usually with "morbid" for prefixed ve. Chaikovsky, however, lived rked in a Russian time and society ill liked to wear, and could wear llusion, the romantic robes that n borrowed from Byron. If Plotyr nfessed himself in "The Pathetic," romanticized himself; so made his

"PATHETIC" AN EPIC BY SYMPHONY

Post ——— Oct. 20, 1929
Astounding Performance at Dr. Koussevitzky's Hands

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The memorable portion of the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon was not the playing, notable in kind, of Vivaldi's stately Concerto in D minor for orchestra with organ as edited by Alexander Siloti, or the first hearing of Werner Josten's symphonic poem, "Jungle." It was the astounding performance of Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony.

GRIPS LISTENERS

In this performance Dr. Koussevitzky, with the orchestra to aid him at every turn, exhibited in remarkable degree the ability to make the familiar, even that which has become stale and trite, new and engrossing. Not that in such deeds he necessarily adds to the music anything that legitimately is not in it. Rather he brings to complete revelation and fulfillment intended effects that, by comparison, the ordinary performance merely hints at or suggests.

It is the present unwritten law of the Symphony Concerts that no applause shall interrupt the progress of a symphony. But yesterday, as in fact in past performances of the "Pathetic" under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction, the audience could not contain itself when the mounting excitements of the third movement had run their course. Here listeners, gripped and held taut as seldom they may be by any musical performance, had out of sheer necessity to seek release in the clapping of hands. Nor did the conductor show any disposition to curb these plaudits. Incidentally, when this Scherzo-March is played as yesterday it was played, the only possible complement to it is the movement that the composer created for his Finale. Another climax of the conventional sort would have been a psychological mistake if not an esthetic error.

Josten's "Jungle"

As the outstanding figure in the depart of music at Smith College Mr. Josten has earned both the praise and the gratitude of music-lovers by his tastefully prepared and eloquently performed revivals of operas by Handel and Monteverde. That a musician of his leanings should have composed the symphonic poem made known yesterday is a bit surprising. Inspired by a painting, "Forêt exotique," of Henri Rousseau, Mr. Josten's piece, by the composer's own confession, seeks "to portray the emotions and sensations which assail a white man entering the jungle, with its lures, terrors, primitive love, and ferocious death."

To this end the composer has assembled a huge orchestra, and in the employment of it relies upon all manner of startling rhythmic, dynamic and percussive effects. A "lion's roar" is listed among the instruments although Dr. Koussevitzky, who cares not overmuch for naturalistic effects, hardly permitted this contrivance to sound its most blood-curdling note.

That Mr. Josten gains here and there an effect of suspensive terror may not be denied. But would not his music serve best as tonal background to a film, a pantomime or some such situation on the spoken stage as Eugene O'Neill has invented in his "Emperor Jones"? As a piece of music "Jungle" has hardly the thematic interest or the organic life to enable it to stand squarely on its own feet.

Mr. Josten, who was present in the hall, was summoned to the stage by Dr. Koussevitzky and was cordially applauded by the audience.

To Chaik Over V And a

Dr. Koussevitzky
The "Pathetic" S
Mr. Josten Fal

IF the devotees of Ch "Pathetic" Symphony word, it was ever ing to watch the eff Movement upon the au afternoon at Symphony thirty-odd years have music, though the Anglo that hears it oftenest, post-war from a fin-de- (as it used to be called), little to be said for the of "The Pathetic." This however, has dwindled— into an exhibitional ex and sonorities wherewith orchestra play upon the ences. They stay or speed en or relax the rhythm; and now in recession, at climax. And tense and excitement of most hear moreover, is intrinsic in that Chaikovsky delibera He was too honest and, too fervid, to do that. T none the less, a melodi in this March Movement taneous play.

The proof was the str since Dr. Koussevitzky every exhibitional strol- lated neither pace nor sonorities nor climax. own zeal more discreetly performances hereabout altogether the frenzies and predecessors. The could hardly have be simply and straightfor rervous effect upon i changeless. Exciteman that no rule or custom progress of the Symp the clapping was gen of his hands toward conductor acknowledg Honcger or Bartók s not a few who clapt.

have called them blatant; while some who now put by wit for thrill, would have said: "The procession is coming, hooray!"

When Dr. Koussevitzky re-played, last year, Chaikovsky's Fifth Symphony, possibly the composer's masterwork, a new temperance was audible from his version. The like quality distinguishes throughout his present reading of "The Pathetic." Time was when he prepared obviously the entrance of the songful theme in the first movement; by pace, emphasis and color clothed it to the utmost with sentimental melancholy. Yesterday it came and went without exaggeration; diffused its own suggestion, not of rankness, but, in the curve that Dr. Koussevitzky lent it, of a decadent sweetness proper to the composer's time and mood. Similarly with the turbulent passages in the movement. Though one began with a drum-stroke—Mr. Ritter was at the top of his form—like a virtuoso pistol-shot, it was prelude to agitation, not frenzy.

Again in the second "five-four" movement, how shrewdly Dr. Koussevitzky held the main current of the trio in suspension, that, beneath, the reiterated drum-beat might haunt it. At the end, too, the conductor let the measures droop into lassitude of pace and tone—another of Chaikovsky's fin-de-siècle moods and devices. (Nearer to us nowadays is the shrill, nervous energy of the ensuing March.) Rather too much Dr. Koussevitzky muted the gong-stroke that is summons of fate in the Finale; while with sympathetic understanding he tightened the rhythm and held fast to the loose-drawn melody. And in the end there was that dying into a silence of extinction which is Chaikovsky's diminuendo transfigured into work of imagination.

In some ears at least, "The Pathetic" gained much by this temperate performance. They were prepared to be bored; they found themselves interested and eager. Notoriously Chaikovsky is a loose constructionist in symphonic form. Less he developed his melodies than strung them in sequences, to be vitalized by contrast. Out of devoted instinct for the music, Dr. Koussevitzky veiled this fault and gave Chaikovsky a semblance of symphonic coherence rather than of tone-poem-like alternations. To equally good purpose, he clothed the whole Symphony—except that melodramatic March Movement—with clear romantic quality. It is custom to call "The Pathetic" self-revelation, usually with "morbid" for prefixed adjective. Chaikovsky, however, lived and worked in a Russian time and society that still liked to wear, and could wear with illusion, the romantic robes that Pushkin borrowed from Byron. If Plotyr Ilich confessed himself in "The Pathetic," he also romanticized himself; so made his Symphony less personal and more poignant. Dr. Koussevitzky caught and communicated this larger note. He also reduced to a minimum the exhibitional element that has become over-much the custom of virtuoso-conductors, each trying to outdo the others, at the expense of the composer. Sensitively, rather than morbidly, Chalkovsky now released his moods of melancholy, transport and despair. It is only the truth to say that with the Fifth Symphony, last year, and now with "The Pathetic," Dr. Koussevitzky restores to Chaikovsky a just romantic stature.

The concert began with Vivaldi's Concerto for Orchestra with Organ, wherein we might know the pleasure of the ancient style as an Italian of the beginning of the eighteenth century practiced it, provided also in the twentieth with a superlative orchestra to give him voice. Vivaldi may take his exercise in a more or less formal counterpoint, or in the virtuoso-display of his choirs; but sooner rather than later, he returns to the warm and full-voiced melody, the suave and courtly progress, the sensuous address that in him were second nature. Easy-going with a good craftsman's skill is this Concerto. Give it a virtuoso-orchestra, at every turn susceptible and glorifying, and it is as easy listening. Let it pass for a light pleasure of the symphonic day. There is room for such.

The middle piece was the new piece—"Jungle: Symphonic Movement for Full Orchestra," written by Professor Werner Josten of Smith College, with good memories of his "Concerto Sacro" in Symphony Hall last spring and of his "Ode for Saint Cecilia's Day," three weeks back at Worcester, to raise expectation. He chanced upon a picture, reproduced in this newspaper on Page Seven of Part Five, painted by the semi-primitive, semi-decadent, peasant-Parisian, Henri Rousseau—sub-normal Baudelaire in grotesque, luxuriant, horrific visioning. He labelled it "Exotic Forest"; into it conjured a jungle of lush, fetid vegetation, uncanny birds and beasts, dim pool and brazen sky. It stirred Mr. Josten's imagination, awakened sensations that he would transmute into tones in this "Symphonic Movement," shapen, freely, to sonata-form. He employs for sonority and color a full twentieth-century orchestra, sufficiently percussive. He proceeds from short motifs. He relies for suggestion upon rhythm and color; enforces contrast and climax. Technically, his "Symphonic Movement" is the work of a well-practised, well-furnished composer, gaining variety in unity. Less than do most of the younger generation, when they would "go" primitive, does he hark back to Stravinsky or "Le Sacre."

ive

lection but in suggestion, under a single hearing, design. Certain of his diffuse the close air, the dripping moisture of the should convey its close-ty holding the wanderer all. Others, again, should us or contentious murder and beast, now seductive. Above all into the the hearer should creep solitary, thus encompals upon him, penetrates obsesses him with foul m, frenetic yet impotent, vertigo of the close. This who has traversed, not but Northern forests, ting and suffocating sensations. To such, hard saying, Mr. Josten xperienced them only at under the lamp, for the Nor does he give that and instant impact upon arer that distinguished, at fields both the "Con the Cecilian Ode. In rowed obsession chokes
H. T. P.

JOSTEN'S "JUNGLE" AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Smith Professor's New Tone Poem Heard

Tchaikovsky's Pathetic Symphony Remarkably Well Performed

"Jungle," a symphonic movement for orchestra by Werner Josten, professor of music at Smith College, was the novelty on yesterday's Symphony concert program. Dr. Koussevitzky again delighted the audience with his remarkably fine interpretation of Tchaikovsky's Pathetic Symphony. The concert began with Vivaldi's D minor concerto.

Mr Josten's program note about his "Jungle" explains that it was written last year, "inspired by a painting, 'Foret exotique,' by Henri Rousseau." Its form is sonata-allegro. Except for a Voodoo rhythmic motive, no native

melodies or themes are used. "The music tries to portray the emotions and sensations which assail a white man entering the jungle, with its lures, terrors, primitive love, and ferocious death."

Those who have not seen the painting which inspired Mr Josten may perhaps form an idea of the Africa he wished his music to suggest by re-reading Joseph Conrad's "Heart of Darkness." Henri Rousseau is said to have gotten his ideas of the jungle from the Jardin des Plantes, the famous botanic garden in Paris. But to Conrad, the African wilderness was a thing remembered as well as imagined.

One missed in Mr Josten's music the intensity of dread and mystery which Conrad's story gives. The subjective impressions of a single listener to music are too much governed by the accidents of memory to be worth much as measures of a new work of art. But the only jungle one listener saw yesterday with the mind's eye was the charmingly artificial and conventionalized one which graced the stage of the Wilbur Theatre here at the first Boston performances of Shaw's "Androcles and the Lion," in 1915.

One noted in Mr Josten's music many suggestions of the music of other present day writers. There were for instance hints of Respighi, and of the Stravinsky rhythms that seemed so startling when one first met their full impact in "Le Sacre." "Jungle" is clearly and simply written, in modernistic musical idiom. The scoring for orchestra could be bettered. There was too much noise and too little sonority. Let Mr Josten study once again the score of "Petrushka."

The general impression left at a first hearing was that "Jungle" is an up-to-date version of the sort of music American college teachers have been writing for half a century or more. Its inspiration is derived with eclectic impartiality, from more than one European model. But it lacks originality and power.

No other conductor known to Boston audiences has been able to equal Dr Koussevitzky in the music of Tchaikovsky. As hitherto, one might justifiably exhaust a dictionary of superlatives in praise of his reading of Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony. He conveys both the letter and the true spirit of this music with overwhelming force. It is music so perfectly attuned to his own temperament that one never for a moment feels the personality of the conductor obtruded between composer and listener.

Dr Koussevitzky, with marvelous musical tact, even contrives to cover up many of the faults and defects in Tchaikovsky's work. Yet, in the face of his genius, and of an audience obviously deeply stirred by music and performance, one can only repeat that this symphony is not to be mentioned in the same breath with the masterpieces of Mozart, or of Brahms, and protest that it is too often played at these concerts.

The Vivaldi concerto, arranged by Siloti, seems to be Dr Koussevitzky's customary choice for beginning a program in a new city. It was the first thing he ever conducted in Boston, Oct 10, 1924. It will next Tuesday be the first piece he conducts at his first appearance in Chicago with the Boston Symphony.

Yesterday's performance displayed the virtuosity of the strings in the orchestra to advantage, though one noticed at least one faulty attack, and other minor flaws. But one felt that an amiable and pleasing ancient piece had been inflated into something it was never meant to be. There should be a smaller orchestra. This concerto is frankly a light piece, written, it would seem, for display of technique rather than to stir the depths of a listener's heart. Siloti and Koussevitzky between them have lent it a spurious eloquence which deprives it of its native grace.

There are no Symphony concerts in Boston until Nov 8 and 9. The orchestra is to visit Buffalo, Chicago, Minneapolis, Indianapolis and Pittsburgh within the next week. P. R.

KOUSSEVITZKY

A very large audience went last night to Symphony hall to hear Mr. Koussevitzky play the double bass, also to help the Elizabeth Peabody House Association and the Travelers' Aid Society.

They had, in some respects, a curious evening of it, for during the first half of the concert they heard musicians of quality in the ungrateful roles of substitutes. Mr. Koussevitzky, for instance, in the opinion of experts a master at the double bass, they heard doing his best with that double bass to make it fill the place of a bassoon. For Mozart, no less, wrote a concerto for bassoon, with accompaniment for instruments in variety—which variety Mr. Pierre Luboshutz, at the piano, supplied as well as he could. Of the solo part Mr. Koussevitzky made something very sweet.

Mr. Fraser Gange, like Mr. Luboshutz, doing his best, drove his nice baritone voice deep down as he could to meet the demands of a low bass voice in Mozart's aria, "Per questa

Symphony less personal and more Not in construction but in suggestion. Dr. Koussevitzky caught and does Mr. Josten, under a single hearing, muncated this larger note. He also fall short of his design. Certain of his duced to a minimum the exhibitional pages should diffuse the close air, the ment that has become over-much the rank heat, the dripping moisture of the tom of virtuoso-conductors, each trjungle. Others should convey its close- to outdo the others, at the expense ofpacked immensity holding the wanderer composer. Sensitively, rather than in oppressed thrall. Others, again, should bidly, Chalkovsky now released his mecho the amorous or contentious mur- of melancholy, transport and despairmur of hidden bird and beast, now seduc- is only the truth to say that with tive, again raucous. Above all into the Fifth Symphony, last year, and now imagination of the hearer should creep "The Pathetic," Dr. Koussevitzky the fear of the solitary, thus encom- stores to Chalkovsky a just rom; passed. It steals upon him, penetrates and shakes him; obsesses him with foul dreads; whirls him, frenetic yet impotent, into the tonal vertigo of the close. This

The concert began with Vivaldi's into the tonal vertigo of the close. This certo for Orchestra with Organ, whone and that who has traversed, not we might know the pleasure of the tropical jungles, but Northern forests, cient style as an Italian of the begin knows the mounting and suffocating de- of the eighteenth century practice lirim of these sensations. To such, provided also in the twentieth withough it be a hard saying, Mr. Josten superlative orchestra to give him v seems to have experienced them only at Vivaldi may take his exercise in a ithe study-table, under the lamp, for the or less formal counterpoint, or in making of music. Nor does he give that virtuoso-display of his choirs; but sc music the direct and instant impact upon rather than later, he returns to the vthe receptive hearer that distinguished, and full-voiced melody, the suave in widely different fields both the "Con- courtly progress, the sensuous adacerto Sacro" and the Cecilian Ode. In that in him were second nature. I "Jungle," a borrowed obsession chokes going with a good craftsman's sk him. this Concerto. Give it a virtuoso-or tra, at every turn susceptible and glorify- ing, and it is as easy listening. Let it pass for a light pleasure of the sym- phonic day. There is room for such for Saint Cecilia's Day," three weeks back at Worcester, to raise expectation. He chanced upon a picture, reproduced in this newspaper on Page Seven of Part Five, painted by the semi-primitive, semi- decadent, peasant-Parisian, Henri Rous- seau—sub-normal Baudelaire in gro- tesque, luxuriant, horrific visioning. He labelled it "Exotic Forest"; into it con- jured a jungle of lush, fetid vegetation, uncanny birds and beasts, dim pool and brazen sky. It stirred Mr. Josten's im- agination, awakened sensations that he would transmute into tones in this "Sym- phonic Movement," shapen, freely, to sonata-form. He employs for sonority and color a full twentieth-century or- chestra, sufficiently percussive. He pro- ceeds from short motifs. He re- lies for suggestion upon rhythm and color; enforces contrast and climax. Technically, his "Symphonic Movement" is the work of a well-practised, well-fur- nished composer, gaining variety in unity. Less than do most of the younger generation, when they would "go" primi- tive, does he hark back to Stravinsky of "Le Sacre."

The middle piece was the new piece—"Jungle: Symphonic Movement for Full Orchestra," written by Professor Werner Josten of Smith College, with good mem- ories of his "Concerto Sacro" in Sym- phony Hall last spring and of his "Ode

JOSTEN'S "JUNGLE" AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Smith Professor's New Tone Poem Heard

Tchaikovsky's Pathetic Symphony Remarkably Well Performed

"Jungle," a symphonic movement for orchestra by Werner Josten, professor of music at Smith College, was the novelty on yesterday's Symphony con- cert program. Dr Koussevitzky again delighted the audience with his re- markably fine interpretation of Tchal- kovsky's Pathetic Symphony. The concert began with Vivaldi's D minor concerto.

Mr Josten's program note about his "Jungle" explains that it was written last year, "inspired by a painting, 'Foret exotique,' by Henri Rousseau." Its form is sonata-allegro. Except for a Voodoo rhythmic motive, no native

melodies or themes are used. "The music tries to portray the emotions and sensations which assail a white man entering the jungle, with its lures, terrors, primitive love, and ferocious death."

Those who have not seen the paint- ing which inspired Mr Josten may per- haps form an idea of the Africa he wished his music to suggest by re- reading Joseph Conrad's "Heart of Darkness." Henri Rousseau is said to have gotten his ideas of the jungle from the Jardin des Plantes, the fa- mous botanic garden in Paris. But to Conrad, the African wilderness was a thing remembered as well as im- agined.

One missed in Mr Josten's music the intensity of dread and mystery which Conrad's story gives. The subjective impressions of a single listener to music are too much governed by the accidents of memory to be worth much as measures of a new work of art. But the only jungle one listener saw yesterday with the mind's eye was the charmingly artificial and convention- alized one which graced the stage of the Wilbur Theatre here at the first Boston performances of Shaw's "An- drocles and the Lion," in 1915.

One noted in Mr Josten's music many suggestions of the music of other present day writers. There were for instance hints of Respighi, and of the Stravinsky rhythms that seemed so startling when one first met their full impact in "Le Sacre." "Jungle" is clearly and simply written, in modernistic musical idiom. The scoring for orchestra could be bettered. There was too much noise and too little sonority. Let Mr Josten study once again the score of "Petrushka."

The general impression left at a first hearing was that "Jungle" is an up-to-date version of the sort of music American college teachers have been writing for half a century or more. Its inspiration is derived with eclectic impartiality, from more than one European model. But it lacks origin- ality and power.

No other conductor known to Boston audiences has been able to equal Dr Koussevitzky in the music of Tchal- kovsky. As hitherto, one might justifi- ably exhaust a dictionary of superla- tives in praise of his reading of Tchal- kovsky's Sixth Symphony. He conveys both the letter and the true spirit of this music with overwhelming force. It is music so perfectly attuned to his own temperament that one never for a moment feels the personality of the conductor obtruded between composer and listener.

Dr Koussevitzky, with marvelous musical tact, even contrives to cover up many of the faults and defects in Tchaikovsky's work. Yet, in the face of his genius, and of an audience ob- viously deeply stirred by music and performance, one can only repeat that this symphony is not to be mentioned in the same breath with the master- pieces of Mozart, or of Brahms, and protest that is is too often played at these concerts.

The Vivaldi concerto, arranged by Siloti, seems to be Dr Koussevitzky's customary choice for beginning a program in a new city. It was the first thing he ever conducted in Bos- ton, Oct 10, 1924. It will next Tues- day be the first piece he conducts at his first appearance in Chicago with the Boston Symphony.

Yesterday's performance displayed the virtuosity of the strings in the orchestra to advantage, though one noticed at least one faulty attack, and other minor flaws. But one felt that an amiable and pleasing ancient piece had been inflated into something it was never meant to be. There should be a smaller orchestra. This concerto is frankly a light piece, written, it would seem, for display of technique rather than to stir the depths of a listener's heart. Siloti and Koussevitzky between them have lent it a spurious eloquence which de- prives it of its native grace.

There are no Symphony concerts in Boston until Nov 8 and 9. The orches- tra is to visit Buffalo, Chicago, Minne- apolis, Indianapolis and Pittsburg within the next week. P. R.

KOUSSEVITZKY

A very large audience went last night to Symphony hall to hear Mr. Kousse- vitzky play the double bass, also to help the Elizabeth Peabody House Associa- tion and the Travelers' Aid Society.

They had, in some respects, a curious evening of it, for during the first half of the concert they heard musicians of quality in the ungrateful roles of sub- stitutes. Mr. Koussevitzky, for instance, in the opinion of experts a master at the double bass, they heard doing his best with that double bass to make it fill the place of a bassoon. For Mozart, no less, wrote a concerto for bassoon, with accompaniment for instruments in variety—which variety Mr. Pierre Lu- boshutz, at the piano, supplied as well as he could. Of the solo part Mr. Koussevitzky made something very sweet.

Mr. Fraser Gange, like Mr. Lubo- shutz, doing his best, drove his nice baritone voice deep down as he could, to meet the demands of a low bass voice in Mozart's aria, "Per questa

In Bruck's "Kol Nidrei" Mr. Koussevitzky tried conclusions with a 'cello. Here he met his most happy results. Low tones abounded, of a glorious richness, and the upper tones, surely not a double bass's best, sounded not amiss in Bruck's sombre liturgical music.

The audience showed pleasure all the evening.

Still Active, the First Conductor of the Boston Orchestra Passes a Birthday

ON Feb. 18 last Sir George Henschel was eighty years old. The day was marked for him by the publication of a new song, "Goncril's Lullaby"—to words from Gordon Bottomley's play, "King Lear's Wife"—which he counts among his best. To his house also came a troop of friends to hand him an address reciting his services to the art of music in London and elsewhere. Sir George warmed to the occasion; sang for his guests; but said not a word about a possible visit to Boston for the jubilee, next year, of the Symphony Orchestra.

Trans. Oct. 30, 1924 Chicago

There was, of course, a formal opening with Vivaldi's Concerto, not all of which it was possible for me to hear, since, alas, other artists were giving concerts on the same evening. The first movement was a striking display of the meticulous precision of the strings that has been developed by that iron discipline. The iron hand within the velvet glove was felt a bit too strongly for the suavity of the old Italian grace. There was, however, no mistaking the fact that a most responsive instrument was in the hands of a master and that what he willed would come forth in tone.

The last part of Debussy's "Clouds" was exquisite in note color with an atmospheric quality of delicate charm. A lovely tone picture, "Fêtes," was brilliant, with vivid contrasts, sprightly rhythms and the sense of gayety. Very fine playing, yet with a little feeling of display. But it was orchestral virtuosity and display was to be expected. Then, too, I had to come in from other sounds and very likely was not fully in the mood.

When it came to Stravinsky's suite from "Petrushka," we were in another world. Here was the music of Russia with a man to conduct it, whose very heart beats were attuned to its lightest pulsations. We were in Russia, outsiders to be sure, but living among people to whom this music was a spontaneous expression and through whom we could be made to feel its power and charm. There was the expansiveness of the Slav, the capacity to forget himself utterly in one mood and in a moment, with no abruptness nor self-consciousness, skip to another mood a thousand miles away, in a manner of speaking. The contrasts of mood, of tone coloring and of rhythmic accent were startling, yet we all passed so spontaneously through these extraordinary experiences that there was no

He was virtuosity, of the conductor of his men, used solely and with e-mindedness to reveal the meaning e music. Because the conductor in eart believed in the beauty and the r of the music and dared set forth elief with frankness. It was ever ic but strange and fragmentary les of which only the Slav can the true meaning. Dr. Kousse- knew it. Whether a plaintive lit rain or a wild swirl of drunken nts he made us feel its power and e in it, too. We of the colder blood ot be able to give way to our feel- o easily yet so whole-heartedly; but ot only can, they actually do, and oussevitzky is the man to prove it. s an interpretative tour de force as we expected from him, having his orchestra before, and it rang A something from a foreign land.

lkovsky's "Pathetic" symphony superb. It was conceived with a of feeling and set forth with a h and dignity that gave an elel power. It had in it nothing of tty nor trivial, nothing of the morthat comes from the individual's ng over his private griefs. Sad it ut with the sorrow that lies deep in part of the poet whose seeing eye nged widely and looked upon griefn men. Not for himself, nor for r for any man, but sad that there o much of pain and hurt in this for which there seems to be no

Koussevitzky believes; this music gives him something that is true and not said as we would say it, but for the one who did say it and for of his blood. So true that we of tent blood can believe it as he tells. The music all meant something. It was magnificent breadth in the outlines, rising to a tremendous and with exquisite refinement in endless variety of details. Yet all together into one complete yet added whole.

Allegro con Grazia was fascinating. The Russians alone naturally exulted in that illusive rhythm. They have it in the folk songs; it is in their bones. The opening of the Allegro sounded dull and thick in the orchestra.

That may have been the effect but it sounded unclear though bright it finally to a climax of great effect.

Perhaps merely a superficial effect. The finale was impressive. A fitting sadness yet with the sense of strength, a something universal for all of man. Superb.

KARLETON HACKETT

bella mano," Mr. Koussevitzky playing a florid obligato. Mr. Burgin led a small orchestra delightfully. It brought refreshment, that orchestra with every instrument holding to its most satisfactory place.

In Bruck's "Kol Nidrei" Mr. Koussevitzky tried conclusions with a 'cello. Here he met his most happy results. Low tones abounded, of a glorious richness, and the upper tones, surely not a double bass's best, sounded not amiss in Bruck's sombre liturgical music.

In the second half of the concert the artists confined themselves more comfortably to the instruments at their command. Mr. Gange, indeed, in Brahms's "Four Serious Songs," found music so nicely adapted to his excellent voice that he might safely have ventured to trust more completely Brahms's vocal line and the biblical texts; they stand in no need of dramatic betterments. And Mr. Koussevitzky played next his own concerto, a work already known and praised for its musical grace and its skilful use of his instrument's capabilities.

The audience showed pleasure all the evening.
R. R. G.

Henschel at Eighty

Still Active, the First Conductor of the Boston Orchestra Passes a Birthday

ON Feb. 18 last Sir George Henschel was eighty years old. The day was marked for him by the publication of a new song, "Goneril's Lullaby"—to words from Gordon Bottomley's play, "King Lear's Wife"—which he counts among his best. To his house also came a troop of friends to hand him an address reciting his services to the art of music in London and elsewhere. Sir George warmed to the occasion; sang for his guests; but said not a word about a possible visit to Boston for the jubilee, next year, of the Symphony Orchestra.

Dr. Koussevitzky Chicago First Impression Symphony Western

Jan. 10, 1930

THE Boston Symphony under their director, Serge Koussevitzky, last evening which their great tradition. sort of program we desired the men under his direction the accent strongly on

There was, of course, with Vivaldi's Concerto which it was possible since, alas, other artists certify on the same even movement was a strikingly meticulous precision of has been developed by pline. The iron hand glove was felt a bit to suavity of the old Italian was, however no mistake a most responsive last hands of a master who would come forth

The last part of I was exquisite in note mospheric quality of lovely tone picture brilliant, with vivid rhythms and the sense fine playing, yet with display. But it was ty and display was too, I had to come in and very likely was mood.

When it came to from "Petrushka," world. Here was th with a man to cond heart beats were att pulsations. We were to be sure, but living whom this music was pression and through made to feel its power was the expansiveness capacity to forget his mood and in a moment ness nor self-conscious other mood a thousand manner of speaking mood, of tone color accent were startling so spontaneously th ordinary experiences shock, but it all seemed like the most natural thing in the world.

Here was virtuosity, of the conductor and of his men, used solely and with single-mindedness to reveal the meaning of the music. Because the conductor in his heart believed in the beauty and the power of the music and dared set forth his belief with frankness. It was ever melodic but strange and fragmentary melodies of which only the Slav can know the true meaning. Dr. Koussevitzky knew it. Whether a plaintive little strain or a wild swirl of drunken peasants he made us feel its power and believe in it, too. We of the colder blood may not be able to give way to our feelings so easily yet so wholeheartedly; but they not only can, they actually do, and Dr. Koussevitzky is the man to prove it. It was an interpretative tour de force such as we expected from him, having heard his orchestra before, and it rang true. A something from a foreign land.

Chalkovsky's "Pathetic" symphony was superb. It was conceived with a depth of feeling and set forth with a breadth and dignity that gave an elemental power. It had in it nothing of the petty nor trivial, nothing of the morbid that comes from the individual's brooding over his private griefs. Sad it was, but with the sorrow that lies deep in the heart of the poet whose seeing eye has ranged widely and looked upon grief-stricken men. Not for himself, nor for you nor for any man, but sad that there was so much of pain and hurt in this world for which there seems to be no answer.

Dr. Koussevitzky believes; this music has for him a something that is true and honest; not said as we would say it, but true for the one who did say it and for those of his blood. So true that we of a different blood can believe it as he tells it to us. The music all meant something. There was magnificent breadth in the main outlines, rising to a tremendous climax and with exquisite refinement in the endless variety of details. Yet all molded together into one complete yet many-sided whole.

The Allegro con Grazia was fascinating. The Russians alone naturally express themselves in that illusive rhythm. But they have it in the folk songs; it is in their bones. The opening of the Allegro Vivace sounded dull and thick in the strings. That may have been the effect desired but it sounded unclear though he brought it finally to a climax of great power. Perhaps merely a superficial flaw. The finale was impressive. A fitting close; sadness yet with the sense of resisting strength, a something universal in the lot of man. Superb.

KARLETON HACKETT

A BRIEF HISTORY OF THE PROGRAMME BOOK

Always associated with the Boston Symphony Concerts is the Boston Symphony Programme Book. And while the great Orchestra has gradually achieved pre-eminence through its long history, this pamphlet has also made its distinctive place among musical publications. It is unique in being more in the nature of a magazine than a mere programme. In advance of the concert, it serves the purpose of an explanatory lecture; afterwards it becomes a record of a particularly readable kind.

In 1886, the single page programme of the Boston Symphony Concerts was experimentally replaced by the "Music Hall Bulletin," containing brief historical and descriptive notes on the music to be played. The "Bulletin" immediately thrived and soon expanded into a thirty-two page pamphlet. In the Season of 1892-1893, G. H. Wilson, who wrote these annotations, was succeeded by the late William F. Apthorp, a noted author of books on musical subjects. Taking his place in 1901, Philip Hale, accomplished musician, editor, contributor to many magazines, musical and dramatic critic of the Boston Herald, has made the Boston Symphony Programme Book what it now is. Owing to the authority of his information and analysis—the fascination of his apt quotations, his anecdotes and his "Entr'actes"—this periodical is sought and read the world over.

W. J. Henderson, veteran critic of the New York Sun, wrote in that paper:—

"IDEAL PROGRAMME NOTES

The greatest author of programme notes in this country, and probably in all countries, is Philip Hale, who makes those for the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Hale's work is issued in the form of a pamphlet of some eighty or ninety pages, of which a considerable part is occupied by advertising. It was never intended that patrons of the concerts in Symphony Hall, Boston, should sit in their seats trying to read all these "ads" and notes while the concert was in progress. The little booklets are obviously designed for preparation and reminiscence. Mr. Hale's system pre-supposes devotion on the part of the music-lover, and it is a devotion richly repaid, for these booklets are mines of history, erudition, anecdote, and human interest. They are the creations of literary art, and when in the course of time Mr. Hale ends his labors, they will remain in libraries an imperishable monument to his learning, his patience, his wide sympathies, and his literary taste."

Privately—from Chicago

THIS department has leave to quote a paragraph or two from a private letter about the visit, last week, to Chicago of Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra. The letter comes from a Chicogean of large experience in opera-house and concert-hall:

I notice that one of the local critics in reviewing the concert of the Boston Symphony here last night spoke of the enthusiasm displayed by the large number of Koussevitzky's compatriots in the audience. Probably so, but I noticed that the persons seated about me—obviously American and excellent Chicagoans unhyphenated—wore their palms red applauding your superb band.

And why not? It was like a breeze of refreshing air on a hot day of summer to hear the Boston men. It was more than good, this vitality, aliveness, and stimulation; while if one is vexed at Koussevitzky for his "readings," no one unbiased can say he puts the auditors to sleep on the safe and sane assurance that bones will not be disturbed.

The evening was a growing triumph. The applause after the Stravinsky number threatened to become an ovation of riotous measure, not due to a handful of Russians only. But the Chaikovsky "Pathetic" became an anti-climax. One regretted that Koussevitzky chose this; for in this day and age the thing is so overdone. Orchestral audiences in cities like this look for something else. He should have given Chicago one of his magnificent Strauss numbers and then there would have been no holding the natives.

A BRIEF HISTORY OF THE PROGRAMME BOOK

Always associated with the Boston Symphony Concerts is the Boston Symphony Programme Book. And while the great Orchestra has gradually achieved pre-eminence through its long history, this pamphlet has also made its distinctive place among musical publications. It is unique in being more in the nature of a magazine than a mere programme. In advance of the concert, it serves the purpose of an explanatory lecture; afterwards it becomes a record of a particularly readable kind.

In 1886, the single page programme of the Boston Symphony Concerts was experimentally replaced by the "Music Hall Bulletin," containing brief historical and descriptive notes on the music to be played. The "Bulletin" immediately thrived and soon expanded into a thirty-two page pamphlet. In the Season of 1892-1893, G. H. Wilson, who wrote these annotations, was succeeded by the late William F. Apthorp, a noted author of books on musical subjects. Taking his place in 1901, Philip Hale, accomplished musician, editor, contributor to many magazines, musical and dramatic critic of the Boston Herald, has made the Boston Symphony Programme Book what it now is. Owing to the authority of his information and analysis—the fascination of his apt quotations, his anecdotes and his "Entr'actes"—this periodical is sought and read the world over.

W. J. Henderson, veteran critic of the New York Sun, wrote in that paper:—

"IDEAL PROGRAMME NOTES

The greatest author of programme notes in this country, and probably in all countries, is Philip Hale, who makes those for the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Hale's work is issued in the form of a pamphlet of some eighty or ninety pages, of which a considerable part is occupied by advertising. It was never intended that patrons of the concerts in Symphony Hall, Boston, should sit in their seats trying to read all these "ads" and notes while the concert was in progress. The little booklets are obviously designed for preparation and reminiscence. Mr. Hale's system pre-supposes devotion on the part of the music-lover, and it is a devotion richly repaid, for these booklets are mines of history, erudition, anecdote, and human interest. They are the creations of literary art, and when in the course of time Mr. Hale ends his labors, they will remain in libraries an imperishable monument to his learning, his patience, his wide sympathies, and his literary taste."

Tran May 1929
Privately—from Chicago

THIS department has leave to quote a paragraph or two from a private letter about the visit, last week, to Chicago of Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra. The letter comes from a Chicagoan of large experience in opera-house and concert-hall:

I notice that one of the local critics in reviewing the concert of the Boston Symphony here last night spoke of the enthusiasm displayed by the large number of Koussevitzky's compatriots in the audience. Probably so, but I noticed that the persons seated about me—obviously American and excellent Chicagoans unhyphenated—wore their palms red applauding your superb band.

And why not? It was like a breeze of refreshing air on a hot day of summer to hear the Boston men. It was more than good, this vitality, aliveness, and stimulation; while if one is vexed at Koussevitzky for his "readings," no one unbiased can say he puts the auditors to sleep on the safe and sane assurance that bones will not be disturbed.

The evening was a growing triumph. The applause after the Stravinsky number threatened to become an ovation of riotous measure, not due to a handful of Russians only. But the Chaikovsky "Pathetic" became an anti-climax. One regretted that Koussevitzky chose this; for in this day and age the thing is so overdone. Orchestral audiences in cities like this look for something else. He should have given Chicago one of his magnificent Strauss numbers and then there would have been no holding the natives.

Fourth Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, NOVEMBER 8, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 9, at 8.15 o'clock

Mozart Symphony in E-flat major (Koechel No. 543)
I. Adagio; Allegro.
II. Andante.
III. Minuetto; Trio.
IV. Finale: Allegro.

Gruenberg "The Enchanted Isle," Symphonic Poem
(First time in Boston)

Ravel "Ma Mère l'Oye" ("Mother Goose")
Five Children's Pieces
I. Pavane de la Belle au Bois Dormant.
(Pavane of Sleeping Beauty.)
II. Petit Poucet.
(Hop o' my Thumb.)
III. Laideronnette, Impératrice des Pagodes.
(Laideronette, Empress of the Pagodas.)
IV. Les Entretiens de la Belle et de la Bête.
(Beauty and the Beast Converse.)
V. Le Jardin Féerique.
(The Fairy Garden.)

Strauss "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," after the Old-fashioned Roguish Manner,—in Rondo Form, Op. 28

There will be an intermission after Gruenberg's "The Enchanted Isle"

The works to be played at these concerts may be seen in the Allen A. Brown Music Collection of the Boston Public Library one week before the concert

MOZART

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fourth concert, which took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, was as follows: Mozart, Symphony, E flat major (K. 543); Gruenberg, "The Enchanted Isle," a symphonic poem (first time in Boston); Ravel, "Mother Goose" Suite; Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

Dr. Koussevitzky wisely reduced the size of the orchestra for Mozart, as he did at the recent Beethoven Festival for that composer's first symphony when he gave a memorable performance. The performance yesterday of Mozart's Symphony is to be ranked with that playing of Beethoven's music, for exquisite proportion, euphony, and above all for creating—to use a phrase of Mr. W. J. Henderson's "The atmosphere of celestial beauty which surrounded the true Mozartian art." It is true that large orchestras were not unknown in Vienna when Mozart lived there. Seven years before the composition of the symphony played yesterday he spoke of one of his symphonies performed by an orchestra in which there were 40 violins, 10 violas, 8 violoncellos, 10 double basses, and wind instruments doubled; an orchestra of 200 took part in a performance of an oratorio by Dittersdorf; but as a rule the orchestras were small and compositions were planned accordingly. There were only twelve violins in all at the Vienna opera house; only six at the opera house in Prague when "Don Giovanni" was produced there.

Yesterday the various walks of the wind instruments were clearly defined, more so than if the instruments had been doubled for playing against 30 odd violins with other members of the quartet in proportion. For once the skill and taste with which Mozart employed the wind was disclosed to even the usually indifferent hearers, who were content enough if they saw "Mozart" on the program, feeling sure that no surprise would rouse them from genteel apathy. Dr. Koussevitzky has conducted many poetic or stirring performances of the old masters—if Mozart can justly be called an old one and not a modern—but never one more charming, more entrancing than that of yesterday. Mozart wished his music to "sound." Yesterday it sang. The finale had the dashing gaiety that characterizes his overture to "Nozze di Figaro."

Mr. Gruenberg wrote to us that having laid aside "The Enchanted Isle," projected during the world war; finding it on his return from Europe, he came across melodies and passages that brought back to him the wistful, romantic days of his youth. He determined to recapture "a whiff of these enchanted islands of memory." And so his isle was not far off in some far sea. Yet as the music was playing one hearer could not help remembering Prospero's Island as described by Caliban:

"The isle is full of noises, Sounds and sweet airs, that give delight, and hurt not.

Sometimes a thousand twangling instruments

Will hum about mine ears; and sometimes voices,

That, if I then had wak'd after long sleep

Will make me sleep again."

(Mr. Gruenberg, though he believes that a composition should stand firmly as music without the aid of any literal, or pictorial association as a prop, will pardon the intrusion here of Shakespeare).

It is no wonder that this symphonic poem, first heard at the recent Worcester festival, delighted the audience. Here is music by a contemporary that is melodious, imaginative, and, when contrast is required, poetically dramatic. Perhaps at the beginning the influence of Debussy is slightly shown; but it is hard for any modern composer with a poetic soul to escape wholly this influence. There is here no imitation; no obvious recollection; only a sympathy in expression. The idiom is modern, but healthily so. There is nothing morbid, naturally or designedly in Mr. Gruenberg's musical thoughts; nothing forced or labored in his expression of the thoughts. Melodically, harmonically and rhythmically the music is his own. Nothing to show mere ingenuity; nothing, by a barren exhibition of technical skill, to impress the pedant. The last pages admit apparently a few superfluous measures. It seems ungracious to say this when the work as a whole gave so much pleasure. This pleasure was enhanced by the modesty with which Mr. Gruenberg responded to the applause. He did not with the last chord jump frantically from his seat and with coat tails flying make a wild rush to the platform. He was slow in rising at Dr. Koussevitzky's invitation; he walked down the main aisle, shook the conductor's hand, bowed to the audience, and then, without grin or smirk, with his chest in his natural position, resumed his seat. And it is not impertinent to say that preparing and interpreting the composition of an American, native or adopted, Dr. Koussevitzky shows the interest, the zeal that he would bestow on a new work by a European or on an important classic, and puts it in the clearest, most favorable light by his genius for interpretation.

The charming suite of Ravel's and the rondo of Strauss brilliant in itself and by the performance completed the program of a most interesting concert. It will be repeated tonight. The program of next week comprises Spohr's Notturmo for wind instruments and Turkish music—to be played as a whole for the first time in Boston; Eichheim's "Burma" and "Java"—first time in Boston; Strauss's Symphonie Domestica.

Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, gave its fourth Friday afternoon concert of the season in Symphony Hall, Boston, Nov. 8. An uncommonly interesting program opened with Mozart's E flat (K.543) Symphony and was carried to the intermission by Louis Gruenberg's symphonic poem, "The Enchanted Isle." The second half of the list was made up of Ravel's "Mother Goose" Suite and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel." The orchestra, inspired perhaps by the encomiums lavished upon it in its recent tour of the middle West, was at the top of its form.

Mr. Gruenberg's symphonic poem, first played at the Worcester Festival of this fall, had on this occasion its initial Boston audition. According to the composer, it "is the second of a series of four tone poems projected during the World War, in an attempt to make a world somewhat pleasanter than the one existing then." Returning recently from a long stay in Europe, Mr. Gruenberg ran across this score, which he had forgotten. "I grew sentimental and determined to recapture a whiff of those enchanted islands of memory, gradually making a complete new score, retaining the emotions . . . but making use of my newly acquired freedom, knowledge of orchestration, harmony and construction." Thus the work represents "a bridge between the old and the new." This anticipates the reviewer. Mr. Gruenberg has shown an extensive knowledge of orchestration and harmony, certainly. There have been many enchanted isles in the musical world. On Friday afternoon we felt we might have been on any one of them. The composer has done a good job with derivative materials and methods. His island would have been even more charming if it had been intensively cultivated over a smaller area.

All the other items of the program had been interpreted in Boston by Dr. Koussevitzky in previous seasons, but all came to our ears Friday with freshness and spontaneity. The conductor displayed again his remarkable catholicity of taste and versatility of interpretive power. To play Mozart, Ravel and Strauss in one afternoon, and leave us with the feeling that we have had the essence of each of those masters, is an achievement. Dr. Koussevitzky accomplished it Friday, together with a devoted reading of the novelty. Never had Mozart sounded more delectable. Yet nothing was lacking in the realization of the witty Ravel pieces. All the Gallic irony, wit and restraint were there. Boaz Piller's was no ordinary Beast, but a fearsome fellow; not because of any blatancy about him, but purely because of the expressive inflection of his voice. Justly Dr. Koussevitzky called this player to his feet at the close; an unusual tribute to a contrabassoonist.

For climax, "Till Eulenspiegel," surely the most endurable of the Strauss repertory and unquestionably one of Dr. Koussevitzky's greatest successes. It is not difficult to pick flaws here and there in "Don Juan," "Tod and Verklärung," "Zarathustra," "Heldenleben," "Don Quixote," "Rosenkavalier"—it is hardly necessary even to mention the others. But what is wrong with "Till"? We are not to expect fastidiousness or restraint or delicacy or nobility in Strauss. Here we have the subject to which he could give himself whole-heartedly. Here the glamorous Straussian orchestration can be devoted to racial horseplay, to caricature, to a dash of incidental wistfulness. It is, for us, the composer's supreme accomplishment, and by this superb orchestra and its brilliant leader it is given incomparable publication.

L. A. S.

The Pleasure Of Outspread Masterpieces

Strauss and Mozart Renewed
At the Symphony Concert,
Two Others Heard

THE ORCHESTRA of power that Dr. Koussevitzky sometimes drives before him was yesterday an orchestra of finesse. As at need he can infuse passion into its tone, so on Friday afternoon it gave him back a poignancy. In "Till Eulenspiegel" are measures of piercing orchestral resonance; but nowhere in that piece does Strauss unroll the thick-bodied, full-throated periods at the close of "Death and Transfiguration" or through the middle section of the "Sinfonia Domestica." Above all else the orchestral voices in "Till" must be plastic and graphic, under which necessity they cannot also be fat. The Suite of Ravel from his ballet, "Mother Goose," is a succession of adroit felicities, finely woven, delicately pointed. Amusing the nursery—with the grown-ups clustering about the door—he does not raise his voice. Mr. Gruenberg's new tone-poem, "Enchanted Isle," containing nearly everything in the common stock of music, did deploy orotund moments. They were not many nor were they over-driven. Mozart's Symphony in E-flat began the concert. Throughout, it asks an orchestral tone that, whether it lightens or darkens, runs fleet or slow, remains limpid, piquant, naturally undulating. The shadows fall as in the Introduction; the skies brighten from moment to moment in the first or the second movement, but the tonal landscape, so to say, is always luminous. Consequently an afternoon of sensibility and virtuosity in the playing; of warm pleasure, in the hearing, that was warmth or piquancy to the soul.

Mr. Gruenberg's scherzo-like pages racing from shimmer to shimmer sounded as in composing imagination near Strauss's rogue is to see him. he may have heard them. The streaming harmonies that suffuse the end of Ravel's Suite were magical in texture and color. Drug-like they beguiled the ear.

Two masterpieces of the day—two of which were Strauss's tone-picture and Mozart's Symphony. When the historical cast up accounts for the end of the nineteenth and the beginning of the twentieth century, they will surely reckon "Till Eulenspiegel" a triumph—perhaps a triumph of objective symphonic writing. In his other tone-poems, Strauss is primarily concerned with the inner emotions and emotions of his personations and external. The descriptive pages are incidental. For the most part he is writing what pedantic Germans call Innigkeit-Musik. In "Till," on the other hand, his composing eyes are tachably fixed upon the object. He permit himself a few introductory measures of the "Listen-my-children-and-shall-hear" sort. He may further template the emptied tonal scene, as in the Introduction; the minor seventh has conducted Till as from moment to moment in the first another world, with a half-gentle, sardonic smile. He may even lift his head for a more sardonic glance, as he is working at his etched tonal fire. Otherwise it, and only it, abates him.

this day—and Till's Rondo is y-four years old—it remains the cle and marvel of delineative music. Near Strauss's rogue is to see him. orchestra does not simulate him. Ear and ination do not pant after a tonal active, clearer unfolded in the prowistful measures of Hop-o'-My went as transparent as the childhood. The woodwinds in the slow movement of Mozart's Symphony were singly sweet; the strings countered finely pointed poignancy. The hess of the little orchestra in the e never once thinned tone or blurred it.

Throughout "Till Eulenspiegel" an orchestra nearly a hundred strong played though the conductor were manipulating an etcher's needle. (Not until the er has heard Strauss's Rondo many does he reflect how little it depends upon harmonic or instrumental how much and how often it is of line and rhythm.) Here also a tone that characterized as though Strauss's notes, generating it, were a zing force. While the ear heard the kindled eye actually saw him ring, striding, sprawling. Indeed only flaw upon the executive and the perfection was the dulled rhythm of the "Pagodes"—wagging silly little as they pitty-patted over a pages of Ravel's Suite. Seemingly at Symphony Hall, only Dr. Muck ht the secret of those grotesque min-

say that preparing and interpreting the composition of an American, native or adopted, Dr. Koussevitzky shows the interest, the zeal that he would bestow on a new work by a European or on an important classic, and puts it in the clearest, most favorable light by his genius for interpretation.

The charming suite of Ravel's and the rondo of Strauss brilliant in itself and by the performance completed the program of a most interesting concert. It will be repeated tonight. The program of next week comprises Spohr's Notturmo for wind instruments and Turkish music—to be played as a whole for the first time in Boston; Eichheim's "Burma" and "Java"—first time in Boston; Strauss's Symphonica Domestica.

Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, gave its fourth Friday afternoon concert of the season in Symphony Hall, Boston, Nov. 8. An uncommonly interesting program opened with Morart's E flat (K.543) Symphony and was carried to the intermission by Louis Gruenberg's symphonic poem, "The Enchanted Isle." The second half of the list was made up of Ravel's "Mother Goose" Suite and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel." The orchestra, inspired perhaps by the encomiums lavished upon it in its recent tour of the middle West, was at the top of its form.

Mr. Gruenberg's symphonic poem, first played at the Worcester Festival of this fall, had on this occasion its initial Boston audition. According to the composer, it "is the second of a series of four tone poems projected during the World War, in an attempt to make a world somewhat pleasanter than the one existing then." Returning recently from a long stay in Europe, Mr. Gruenberg ran across this score, which he had forgotten. "I grew sentimental and determined to recapture a whiff of those enchanted islands of memory, gradually making a complete new score, retaining the emotions . . . but making use of my newly acquired freedom, knowledge of orchestration, harmony and construction." Thus the work represents "a bridge between the old and the new." This anticipates the reviewer. Mr. Gruenberg has shown an extensive knowledge of orchestration and harmony, certainly. There have been many enchanted isles in the musical world. On Friday afternoon we felt we might have been on any one of them. The composer has done a good job with derivative materials and methods. His island would have been even more charming if it had been intensively cultivated over a smaller area.

All the other items of the program had been interpreted in Boston by Dr. Koussevitzky in previous seasons, but all came to our ears Friday with freshness and spontaneity. The conductor displayed again his remarkable catholicity of taste and versatility of interpretive power. To play Mozart, Ravel and Strauss in one afternoon, and leave us with the feeling that we have had the essence of each of those masters, is an achievement. Dr. Koussevitzky accomplished it Friday, together with a devoted reading of the novelty. Never had Mozart sounded more delectable. Yet nothing was lacking in the realization of the witty Ravel pieces. All the Gallic irony, wit and restraint were there. Boaz Piller's was no ordinary Beast, but a fearsome fellow; not because of any blatancy about him, but purely because of the expressive inflection of his voice. Justly Dr. Koussevitzky called this player to his feet at the close; an unusual tribute to a contrabassoonist.

For climax, "Till Eulenspiegel," surely the most endurable of the Strauss repertory and unquestionably one of Dr. Koussevitzky's greatest successes. It is not difficult to pick flaws here and there in "Don Juan," "Tod and Verklärung," "Zarathustra," "Heldenleben," "Don Quixote," "Rosenkavalier"—it is hardly necessary even to mention the others. But what is wrong with "Till"? We are not to expect fastidiousness or restraint or delicacy or nobility in Strauss. Here we have the subject to which he could give himself wholeheartedly. Here the glamorous Straussian orchestration can be devoted to racial horseplay, to caricature, to a dash of incidental wistfulness. It is, for us, the composer's supreme accomplishment, and by this superb orchestra and its brilliant leader it is given incomparable publication. L. A. S.

The Pleasure Of Outspreading Masterpieces

Strauss and Mozart Reunited At the Symphony Concert Two Others Heard

THE ORCHESTRA of Dr. Koussevitzky somewhat before him was yesterday's orchestra of finesse. He can infuse passion into it. On Friday afternoon it gave poignancy. In "Till Eulenspiegel" measures of piercing orchestration; but nowhere in that Strauss unroll the thick-throated periods at the close and Transfiguration" or through the section of the "Sinfonia." Above all else the orchestra "Till" must be plastic and glib which necessity they cannot. The Suite of Ravel from "Mother Goose," is a success of felicities, finely woven, delectable. Amusing the nurse grown-ups clustering about does not raise his voice. Berg's new tone-poem, "Erwartung," containing nearly everything in common stock of music, did moments. They were over-driven. The symphony in E-flat began. Throughout, it asks an end, that, whether it lightens or fleet or slow, remains naturally undulating. Till as in the Introduction; till as from moment to moment or the second movement landscape, so to say, is. Consequently an affability and virtuosity in sensuous pleasure, in warmth or piquancy. Mr. Gruenberg's solo racing from shimmering sounded as in comparison he may have heard the long harmonies that suffused the Suite were magical color. Drug-like they wistful measures of Hop-o'-My head went as transparent as the childhood. The woodwinds in the slow movement of Mozart's Symphony were wistfully sweet; the strings countered with finely pointed poignancy. The fitness of the little orchestra in the finale never once thinned tone or blurred accent.

Throughout "Till Eulenspiegel" an orchestra nearly a hundred strong played though the conductor were manipulating an etcher's needle. (Not until the listener has heard Strauss's Rondo many times does he reflect how little it depends upon harmonic or instrumental color, how much and how often it is music of line and rhythm.) Here also was a tone that characterized as though Strauss's notes, generating it, were a vitalizing force. While the ear heard Till, the kindled eye actually saw him teetering, striding, sprawling. Indeed the only flaw upon the executive and the tonal perfection was the dulled rhythm of the "Pagodes"—wagging silly little heads as they pitty-patted over a dozen pages of Ravel's Suite. Seemingly, at Symphony Hall, only Dr. Muck caught the secret of those grotesque miniatures.

The masterpieces of the day—two of them!—were Strauss's tone-picture and Mozart's Symphony. When the historians cast up accounts for the end of the nineteenth and the beginning of the twentieth century, they will surely reckon "Till Eulenspiegel" a triumph—perhaps the triumph—of objective symphonic music. In his other tone-poems, Strauss is primarily concerned with the inner sensations and emotions of his personages. The descriptive pages are incidental and external. For the most part he is writing what pedantic Germans call an Innigkeit-Musik. In "Till," on the other hand, his composing eyes are undetachably fixed upon the object. He may permit himself a few introductory measures of the "Listen-my-children-and-you-shall-hear" sort. He may further contemplate the emptied tonal scene, after a minor seventh has conducted Till into another world, with a half-gentle, half-sardonic smile. He may even lift his head for a more sardonic glance, while he is working at his etched tone-picture. Otherwise it, and only it, absorbs him.

To this day—and Till's Rondo is thirty-four years old—it remains the miracle and marvel of delineative music. To hear Strauss's rogue is to see him. The orchestra does not simulate him. It calls him into very life. Ear and imagination do not pant after a tonal narrative, clearer unfolded in the program-book. They are caught into it, carried along with it. All this, not in the fitful, fuzzy suggestion of most "descriptive" music, but with the incisive precision of black and white. With what wit Strauss works at his etching, with what enjoyment manipulates his orchestral acid and needle! In those days in Munich his friends used to liken him to a stripped mental and musical athlete all shewn without, all keenness within. "Till" is the enduring masterpiece of that fortunate condition. And Dr. Koussevitzky, now and again reproached as sentimentalist, can bite this etching in as though he had no other temperament.

In turn, the Symphony in E-flat is as clear characterization of the elder Mozart, who wrote it, unsuspecting, with death no more than three years away. He agreed to the conventions, followed the fashions of his musical time. Though one was a genius, one had also to live in the Salzburg of the Prince-Bishop or the Vienna of Emperor Joseph. Therefore the Minuet and the Finale heard yesterday—Mozartian readiness and fecundity, Mozartian deftness and shimmer and style. He must do his technical feat in a Finale that skips about rondo-like within nominal sonata-form. The Minuet, no less, flows and postures and flows again, with a silken elegance.

In these mature days—for him—Mozart lived also an inner life stressed and saddened. He loved beauty—for he made it—yet doubted whether it would endure; loved life, yet by the dread of death was ever haunted. His spiritual sensations were poignant; being such, they cut sometimes to the quick. Hence, the Introduction, the first Allegro, the slow movement of this same Symphony. There is beauty—till it hurts; pleasure but it passes; life—with death at the end. To listen to the darkling, low-voiced Introduction; to the first movement evading and deferring until that principal theme must come back like some dread fate returned; to the sweetness cut by swift poignancy in the Andante—so to hear is to believe and with Mozart imagine. In all his later music the Mozart of passion within, the Mozart of convention without, alternate or would blend. From the twenties onward, most of all in these final years, he was sensitive human being, finding thought and emotion in life—not the "sunny child" of the traditionalists or a "celestial spirit," whatever that may be.

numbers, it was a little why, after Koussevitzky set "se" immediately before. To hear, one has to find the con-Ravel's "Children's cocious infants must birth if the little Jean (for whom they ly enjoyed them!—Pieces" are as precise h the same dry-clear another field; for the and witty; whereas realistic and folk-hu- properly sensitive to composing purpose. Oye wears a salon, a Strauss's Till braves it place. Ravel's music ute felicities oftenest Strauss's cuts sharp. Yet from each the many-sided orchestra open-minded audience ethoven's name stands the proscenium arch at nder it we may also ock of music" is coming reviewers in these mean the procedures of highly individual-izers—say Wagner, or Sibelius—that have common fund of mat-From it less endowed ly draw. From it, in enberg drew liberally e composed his tone-Enchanted Isle." It thing that the listener hile the original and is hard to discover. old, inexhaustible toy r, looking up from the rn virtuoso-orchestra! he can whip it; "try eparate instruments or that for its own ; clothe king-like a n itself is no better oy; touch in and toss impression. What Mr. Gruenberg en-Koussevitzky. The Long and loud, it and maybe slightly while the conduc-oned. . . . It takes ons to make a pro-

H. T. P.

LIGHTER PIECES BY SYMPHONY

Gruenberg's "Enchanted Isle" Given a Hearing

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The unity of effect that Dr. Koussevitzky continually seeks in his programmes (although he may not always gain it), he successfully attained in the list prepared for the concerts of yesterday afternoon and this evening, and this despite a last-minute substitution of Ravel's "Mother Goose" for Spohr's Notturno for wind instruments now put off until next Friday and Saturday.

PLEASING AND LIGHT

As it finally stood, the programme assembled Mozart's Symphony in E flat, Louis Gruenberg's symphonic poem, "The Enchanted Isle," the "Mother Goose" aforesaid and Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," all of them, to speak in paradox, examples of the lighter side of serious music-making. Here was nothing cerebral, nothing to stir the deeper emotions. Here were pieces designed to give, in their diverse ways, a ready pleasure.

Mr. Gruenberg, a Russian born but brought to these shores in infancy, made yesterday his first appearance as composer in Symphony Hall. By token of his brilliant and witty setting for voice and chamber orchestra of Vachel Lindsay's "Daniel Jazz" heard here two seasons ago, Mr. Gruenberg is to be regarded as one of the leading spirits among the younger generation of American composers. But

"Daniel Jazz" is of the mature, full-fledged Gruenberg, whereas the symphonic poem of yesterday is a work of his salad days, his formative and assimilative period, recused from oblivion and remade by the composer in accordance with his more advanced conceptions of harmony and orchestration. But attempts at recapturing in later life a youthful state of mind seldom bear fruit.

"The Enchanted Isle," which had its initial performance at the recent Worcester Festival, emerges as a curious mixture of styles and idioms, a mingling of other men's methods which in the process have lost their rightful savor.

FINE PROGRAM AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Mozart, Ravel, Strauss and Gruenberg Pieces

Koussevitzky's Brilliant Readings
of Modern Music Applauded

Dr Koussevitzky's brilliant readings of Ravel's "Mother Goose," Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel" and Gruenberg's "The Enchanted Isle" made yesterday's Symphony concert unusually interesting. The program, a remarkably fine one, also included Mozart's E flat major symphony, which fared less well than the modern pieces at the conductor's hands.

Mr Gruenberg, whose home in is Brooklyn, was present to hear the first Boston performance of his tone poem, which was produced at the Worcester Festival last month. Dr Koussevitzky beckoned to him to come forward to share in the applause.

Mr Gruenberg, in a program note, explained his conviction that "a composition should stand on its own legs" unaided by verbal description. "The Enchanted Isle" is a revision of a piece written during the World War as a part of a projected series of four tone poems, "in an attempt to make a world somewhat pleasanter than the one existing then." The score has been published by the Juilliard Foundation.

This tone poem, scored for large modern orchestras, is fluent and well-written music, in a style which is suf-

gram-book. They are caught in it, carried along with it. All this, not the fitful, fuzzy suggestion of most "descriptive" music, but with the precision of black and white. What wit Strauss works at his ete with what enjoyment manipulates orchestral acid and needle! In the days in Munich his friends used to lead him to a stripped mental and muscular athlete all sinew without, all keen within. "Till" is the enduring masterpiece of that fortunate condition. Dr. Koussevitzky, now and again proached as sentimentalist, can bite etching in as though he had no other temperament.

In turn, the Symphony in E-flat as clear characterization of the Mozart, who wrote it, unsuspecting, death no more than three years away. He agreed to the conventions, followed the fashions of his musical time. Though one was a genius, one had to live in the Salzburg of the Prince-Bishop or the Vienna of Emperor Joseph. Therefore the Minuet and the First heard yesterday—Mozartian readiness and fecundity, Mozartian deftness, shimmer and style. He must do his musical feat in a Finale that skips a rondo-like within nominal sonata-form. The Minuet, no less, flows and postures and flows again, with a silken elegance.

In these mature days—for him—Mozart lived also an inner life stressed and denied. He loved beauty—for he made it—yet doubted whether it would endure; loved life, yet by the door of death was ever haunted. His sensual sensations were poignant; but such, they cut sometimes to the quick. Hence, the Introduction, the first Allegretto, the slow movement of this same symphony. There is beauty—till it has pleasure but it passes; life—with death at the end. To listen to the dark, low-voiced Introduction; to the movement evading and deferring that principal theme must come like some dread fate returned; to sweetness cut by swift poignancy in Andante—so to hear is to believe with Mozart imagine. In all his music the Mozart of passion within, Mozart of convention without, altered or would blend. From the twenties onward, most of all in these final years, was sensitive human being, first thought and emotion in life—not "sunny child" of the traditionalists "celestial spirit," whatever that may

For the other two numbers, it was possible to wonder a little why, after intermission, Dr. Koussevitzky set Ravel's "Mother-Goose" immediately before Strauss's "Till." To hear, one after the other, was to find the conductor in reason. Ravel's "Children's Pieces"—to what precocious infants must the French give birth if the little Mimi and the little Jean (for whom they were written) really enjoyed them!—Ravel's "Children's Pieces" are as precise as "Till," shine with the same dry-clear light. Yet across another field; for the Parisian is fanciful and witty; whereas the Münchener is realistic and folk-humored, each, indeed, properly sensitive to subject-matter and composing purpose. Ravel's Ma Mère l'Oye wears a salon, a music-room, air; Strauss's Till braves it across the market place. Ravel's music is a music of minute felicities oftenest achieved by color; Strauss's cuts sharp and deep with line. Yet from each the pleasure that a many-sided orchestra should give and an open-minded audience receive. Though Beethoven's name stands on the keystone of the proscenium arch at Symphony Hall, under it we may also trifle.

The "common stock of music" is common phrase among reviewers in these days. By it they mean the procedures and idiosyncrasies of highly individualized modern composers—say Wagner, Strauss, Debussy or Sibelius—that have gradually become a common fund of matter and method. From it less endowed successors now daily draw. From it, in particular, Mr. Gruenberg drew liberally and steadily as he composed his tone-poem of "The Enchanted Isle." It abounds with everything that the listener can remember; while the original and veritable Gruenberg is hard to discover. And what a manifold, inexhaustible toy for such a composer, looking up from the stock-pot, is a modern virtuoso-orchestra! He can caress or he can whip it; "try out" choirs and separate instruments; bring off this stroke or that for its own sake; dash in color; clothe king-like a singing theme that in itself is no better than a little naked boy; touch in and toss off—all for instant impression. What a game it is! How Mr. Gruenberg enjoyed it! And Dr. Koussevitzky. The audience as well. Long and loud, it clapped a modest, and maybe slightly surprised, composer, while the conductor beamed and beckoned. . . . It takes all sorts of compositions to make a program. H. T. P.

LIGHTER PIECES BY SYMPHONY

Gruenberg's "Enchanted Isle" Given a Hearing

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The unity of effect that Dr. Koussevitzky continually seeks in his programmes (although he may not always gain it), he successfully attained in the list prepared for the concerts of yesterday afternoon and this evening, and this despite a last-minute substitution of Ravel's "Mother Goose" for Spohr's Notturno for wind instruments now put off until next Friday and Saturday.

PLEASING AND LIGHT

As it finally stood, the programme assembled Mozart's Symphony in E-flat, Louis Gruenberg's symphonic poem, "The Enchanted Isle," the "Mother Goose" aforesaid and Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," all of them, to speak in paradox, examples of the lighter side of serious music-making. Here was nothing cerebral, nothing to stir the deeper emotions. Here were pieces designed to give, in their diverse ways, a ready pleasure.

Mr. Gruenberg, a Russian born but brought to these shores in infancy, made yesterday his first appearance as composer in Symphony Hall. By token of his brilliant and witty setting for voice and chamber orchestra of Vachel Lindsay's "Daniel Jazz" heard here two seasons ago, Mr. Gruenberg is to be regarded as one of the leading spirits among the younger generation of American composers. But

"Daniel Jazz" is of the mature, full-fledged Gruenberg, whereas the symphonic poem of yesterday is a work of his salad days, his formative and assimilative period, recused from oblivion and remade by the composer in accordance with his more advanced conceptions of harmony and orchestration. But attempts at recapturing in later life a youthful state of mind seldom bear fruit.

"The Enchanted Isle," which had its initial performance at the recent Worcester Festival, emerges as a curious mixture of styles and idioms, a mingling of other men's methods which in the process have lost their rightful savor.

FINE PROGRAM AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Mozart, Ravel, Strauss and
Gruenberg Pieces

Koussevitzky's Brilliant Readings
of Modern Music Applauded

Dr Koussevitzky's brilliant readings of Ravel's "Mother Goose," Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel" and Gruenberg's "The Enchanted Isle" made yesterday's Symphony concert unusually interesting. The program, a remarkably fine one, also included Mozart's E-flat major symphony, which fared less well than the modern pieces at the conductor's hands.

Mr Gruenberg, whose home in is Brooklyn, was present to hear the first Boston performance of his tone poem, which was produced at the Worcester Festival last month. Dr Koussevitzky beckoned to him to come forward to share in the applause.

Mr Gruenberg, in a program note, explained his conviction that "a composition should stand on its own legs" unaided by verbal description. "The Enchanted Isle" is a revision of a piece written during the World War as a part of a projected series of four tone poems, "in an attempt to make a world somewhat pleasanter than the one existing then." The score has been published by the Juilliard Foundation.

This tone poem, scored for large modern orchestras, is fluent and well-written music, in a style which is suf-

Scientifically eclectic to remind the hearer of Richard Strauss, Debussy, Ravel and Stravinsky by turns. There are several finely imagined and eloquent passages, but these pages do not redeem the work as a whole from a certain vagueness and monotony of substance. It lacks dramatic unity. What one recalls afterward is a theme here, and a passage there, not an artistic unit.

One felt in listening to "Till Eulenspiegel" that this, if not the finest thing Richard Strauss has done, is certainly the best of his tone poems, and assured of a permanent place in the repertory. But it is dangerous work guessing at what will turn out to be the classics of our great grandchildren. Dr Koussevitzky's keen feeling for dramatic contrasts, his ability to make music tell a story or paint a picture was admirably illustrated in his reading of this number, in which the orchestra played with splendid clarity and sonority.

Ravel's "Mother Goose," substituted on the program for the Spohr nocturne.

Bruno Walter to realize that the trouble with yesterday's performance was with the conductor.

It is only fair to add that the Boston Symphony has never had a conductor who could do full justice to every composer. Dr Muck, for example, failed with Tchaikovsky and did not excel in modern French music. Dr Koussevitzky yesterday obviously had taken considerable pains with the Mozart. He had reduced the size of the orchestra to that for which Mozart wrote. He treated the whole work too much in miniature, forgetting that Mozart with his few instruments and his lack of sonority and emphasis was far more eloquent and far more profoundly emotional in this symphony than such composers as Liszt ever succeeded in being.

The program announced for next week includes two new pieces by Eichheim, "Java," and "Burma," preceded by Spohr's suite for wind instruments, and followed by Strauss' Symphony Domestica. P. R.

FORTY-NINTH SEASON, NINETEEN HUNDRED TWENTY-NINE AND THIRTY

Fifth Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, NOVEMBER 15, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 16, at 8.15 o'clock

Spohr Notturmo for Wind Instruments and Janissaries
Music, Op. 34
a. March.
b. Minuet.
c. Andante with Variations.
d. Finale.

Eichheim { "Java"
"Burma"
Twilight at Shwe Dagon.
Dance of Prince and Princess.
Dance of Councillors, Grotesquerie.
Dance of Maids of Honor. Finale.
(Conducted by the composer)
(First time in Boston)

Strauss Symphonia Domestica, Op. 53
(In one movement)

STEINWAY PIANO USED

There will be an intermission after Eichheim's "Burma"

The works to be played at these concerts may be seen in the Allen A. Brown Music Collection of the Boston Public Library one week before the concert

ciently eclectic to remind the hearer of Richard Strauss, Debussy, Ravel and Stravinsky by turns. There are several finely imagined and eloquent passages, but these pages do not redeem the work as a whole from a certain vagueness and monotony of substance. It lacks dramatic unity. What one recalls afterward is a theme here, and a passage there, not an artistic unit.

One felt in listening to "Till Eulenspiegel" that this, if not the finest thing Richard Strauss has done, is certainly the best of his tone poems, and assured of a permanent place in the repertory. But it is dangerous work guessing at what will turn out to be the classics of our great grandchildren. Dr Koussevitzky's keen feeling for dramatic contrasts, his ability to make music tell a story or paint a picture was admirably illustrated in his reading of this number, in which the orchestra played with splendid clarity and sonority.

Ravel's "Mother Goose," substituted on the program for the Spohr nocturno for wind instruments, which is now scheduled for next week, also showed Dr Koussevitzky at his best. The brilliance and sonority he demands of the players in this seemingly delicate and tenuous music is quite in accordance with the way Ravel himself interpreted his works when heard here as guest conductor and as pianist.

But one wished yesterday that there had been more glamour and less intensity in the interpretation of the last number in this little suite. It failed to suggest "The Fairy Garden." Perhaps in Russia fairies are more strenuous and robust than they are usually supposed to be elsewhere, and disport themselves in gardens filled with California big trees.

Mozart's E flat major Symphony, the familiar one written in 1788, is a much greater masterpiece than yesterday's superficial and colorless reading of the first two movements would lead one to suppose. The pretty and relatively simple minuet, familiar to most amateur pianists, Dr Koussevitzky interpreted effectively, if without subtlety. But it was surprising to hear from him a reading of so great a work which was so thoroughly dull and mediocre. One often differs with him on details of interpretation, but very few times in the past five seasons has one found any reading of his uninteresting and wholly unimaginative.

The secret of Mozart is, of course, in his melodies, which must be treated with the utmost subtlety of phrasing and dynamics. Read in literal, pedestrian fashion, Mozart's music loses its power. One had only to call to mind the beauty and power of this symphony when Dr Muck conducted it, or to remember the Mozart conducting of

Bruno Walter to realize that the trouble with yesterday's performance was with the conductor.

It is only fair to add that the Boston Symphony has never had a conductor who could do full justice to every composer. Dr Muck, for example, failed with Tchaikovsky and did not excel in modern French music. Dr Koussevitzky yesterday obviously had taken considerable pains with the Mozart. He had reduced the size of the orchestra to that for which Mozart wrote. He treated the whole work too much in miniature, forgetting that Mozart with his few instruments and his lack of sonority and emphasis was far more eloquent and far more profoundly emotional in this symphony than such composers as Liszt ever succeeded in being.

The program announced for next week includes two new pieces by Eichheim, "Java," and "Burma," preceded by Spohr's suite for wind instruments, and followed by Strauss' Symphony Domestica. P. R.

LOEW'S STATE WM. HAINES

IN "THE GIRL SAID NO"

M-G-M's Rollicking All-Talking Com
Screenings at 12.25-2.45-5.05-7.25-9.
Latest Hal Roach All-Talking Come Hearst Metrotone News

NEXT WEEK
VILMA BANK

In Her First All-Talking Picture

"A LADY TO LOVE" with Robt.

LOEW'S ORPHEUM GRETA GARBO TAL

In M-G-M's Adaptation of Eugene O'N

"ANNA CHRISTIE" Screened at A.M., 12:15
6:15, 9:30

LOEW'S GREATER VAUDEVILL

Shown at 11 A.M., 2, 5, 8 P.M.

Anita Stewart Famous Mot
Picture Star

IN PERSON & OTHER BIG ACT

NEXT WEEK
LAWRENCE TIBBET

in "THE ROGUE SONG"

& LOEW'S Vaudeville "DRESDEN CH Road Show

FORTY-NINTH SEASON, NINETEEN HUNDRED TWENTY-NINE AND THIRTY

Fifth Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, NOVEMBER 15, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 16, at 8.15 o'clock

Spohr Notturmo for Wind Instruments and Janissaries
Music, Op. 34

- March.
- Minuet.
- Andante with Variations.
- Finale.

Eichheim } "Java"
 } "Burma"

Twilight at Shwe Dagon.

Dance of Prince and Princess.

Dance of Councillors, Grotesquerie.

Dance of Maids of Honor. Finale.

(Conducted by the composer)

(First time in Boston)

Strauss Symphonia Domestica, Op. 53
(In one movement)

STEINWAY PIANO USED

There will be an intermission after Eichheim's "Burma"

The works to be played at these concerts may be seen in the Allen A. Brown Music Collection of the Boston Public Library one week before the concert

ciently eclectic to remind the hearer of Richard Strauss, Debussy, Ravel and Stravinsky by turns. There are several finely imagined and eloquent passages, but these pages do not redeem the work as a whole from a certain vagueness and monotony of substance. It lacks dramatic unity. What one recalls afterward is a theme here, and a passage there, not an artistic unit.

One felt in listening to "Till Eulenspiegel" that this, if not the finest thing Richard Strauss has done, is certainly the best of his tone poems, and assured of a permanent place in the repertory. But it is dangerous work guessing at what will turn out to be the classics of our great grandchildren. Dr Koussevitzky's keen feeling for dramatic contrasts, his ability to make music tell a story or paint a picture was admirably illustrated in his reading of this number, in which the orchestra played with splendid clarity and sonority.

Ravel's "Mother Goose," substituted on the program for the Spohr nocturne.

Bruno Walter to realize that the trouble with yesterday's performance was with the conductor.

It is only fair to add that the Boston Symphony has never had a conductor who could do full justice to every composer. Dr Muck, for example, failed with Tchaikovsky and did not excel in modern French music. Dr Koussevitzky yesterday obviously had taken considerable pains with the Mozart. He had reduced the size of the orchestra to that for which Mozart wrote. He treated the whole work too much in miniature, forgetting that Mozart with his few instruments and his lack of sonority and emphasis was far more eloquent and far more profoundly emotional in this symphony than such composers as Liszt ever succeeded in being.

The program announced for next week includes two new pieces by Eichheim, "Java," and "Burma," preceded by Spohr's suite for wind instruments, and followed by Strauss' Symphony Domestica. P. R.

"Art of Being Grandfather"

Richard Strauss (Aged 66) and His First Grandchild
(By Courtesy of J. M. Sanroma)

(Setzer—Vienna)

FORTY-NINTH SEASON, NINETEEN HUNDRED TWENTY-NINE AND THIRTY

Fifth Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, NOVEMBER 15, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 16, at 8.15 o'clock

Spohr Notturmo for Wind Instruments and Janissaries
Music, Op. 34

- a. March.
- b. Minuet.
- c. Andante with Variations.
- d. Finale.

Eichheim { "Java"
"Burma"

Twilight at Shwe Dagon.

Dance of Prince and Princess.

Dance of Councillors, Grotesquerie.

Dance of Maids of Honor. Finale.

(Conducted by the composer)

(First time in Boston)

Strauss Symphonia Domestica, Op. 53
(In one movement)

STEINWAY PIANO USED

There will be an intermission after Eichheim's "Burma"

The works to be played at these concerts may be seen in the Allen A. Brown Music Collection of the Boston Public Library one week before the concert

"Eichheim of The Orient"

Composer-Conductor at the Symphony Concerts This Week
He Will Be Heard as Explorer and Translator of The Music of The Far East

MUSIC

Herald, Nov. 16, 1929

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The program of the fifth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, which took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall, was as follows: Spohr, March, Minuet, Andante with variations, and Finale from Notturmo for Wind Instruments and Janissaries Music. Eichheim, "Java," a symphonic poem and "Burma" (conducted by the composer; first time in Boston). Strauss, Symphonie Domestica.

Symphonic and vocal music by Spohr was performed at the symphony concerts with a certain regularity up to the Nineties; but nothing by him has been listed on the programs since 1906 when Willy Hess played a violin concerto. Yet Spohr for many years cut a prominent figure in the musical world as composer and violinist; he was thought to be a mighty fine fellow in the concert halls. He agreed to this in his autobiography. Today he is known only by two or three violin concertos, a few anthems still sung in churches with choir of mixed voices, and, possibly the overture to "Jessinda." Little is known about the origin of his Notturmo, extracts from which were played yesterday. Perhaps the work was composed for some court or other special occasion; perhaps for some orchestra proud of its wind choir.

The Theme with variations (which, transcribed, was performed here 70 years ago by the Mendelssohn Quintet Club) surely tests the proficiency of that orchestral section. Yesterday, it is needless to say, the performance was brilliant; one might justly say unsurpassable. Although the announcement that variations are to be played by an orchestra, violinist or pianist is calculated to strike terror in the soul of any hardened concert-goer. The art of the players yesterday lent interest to the music itself; the hearer refrained from saying aloud or thinking: "Old hat! Hear what Germans, who, Mr. Ludwig insists, are the most musical people in the world, enjoyed in the early years of the 19th century."

Mr. Eichheim, having acquainted the Symphony audience with music of China and Japan, visited Java and Burma for its benefit, studied the music of those countries, and brought with him Javanese instruments, which were added yesterday to those familiar in the West. No doubt this excellent musician, this enthusiastic admirer of

Oriental music, will visit Sumatra and Borneo, and in a symphonic poem entitled "Borneo" will introduce the dance of the celebrated "Wild Men."

"Java" was performed by the Philadelphia orchestra last week. "Burma" is an enlargement of music written for a play by Irene Lewisohn, produced in New York in 1926. In its concert form it consists of three exciting dances.

When Saint-Saens heard Javanese musicians at the Paris exhibition of 1889 he described their music as ravishing: "The little bamboo bells; the gamelang, a series of small tuned gongs struck with sticks enveloped in cotton, charm deliciously the ear. There are unexpected rhythms; it is dream music by which some have been hypnotized. What ought the ancient Hindu music to be, with its complicated and characteristic modes? No doubt the master work of oriental music, of that art which responds to a certain state of mind and civilization from which humanity goes farther and farther day by day."

It was manifestly impossible for Mr. Eichheim to reproduce in his symphonic poem, with a huge western orchestra, even with the addition of the instruments brought from afar, the mood that depends largely on the scene, the native players and even the costumes. He was obliged to westernize the music somewhat; yet the chief themes were unmistakably oriental, and the variations of the charming, wistful, Malayan song did not dispel the illusion, or the mood, inspired by that air. There was nothing incongruously academic in these variations; no attempt to show technical skill as encouraged in conservatories. There was no abandonment of the exotic.

But if the exotic delights the soul in the first moments, the prolongation of the mood is a foe to enjoyment. The most sympathetic hearers wish that the music would at last have a more western, even a more familiar flavor. In plain words, "Java" would gain in picturesqueness and charm if it were shortened. Mr. Eichheim knew what he wanted in the performance; the orchestra eloquently responded to his wishes. Warmly welcomed when he came on the platform, hearty applause recalled him after the performance.

Strauss' Symphony in which he dilates in tones on joyful, also harassing, domesticity is known to all. More or less ingenious commentators have told audiences what they should see and hear in Strauss's home; how he, his wife, their relatives, and the baby behave, in peace and in screaming argu-

"Eichheim of The Orient"

Composer-Conductor at the Symphony Concerts This Week
He Will Be Heard as Explorer and Translator of The Music of The Far East

MUSIC

Herold Nov. 16, 1929

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The program of the fifth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, which took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall, was as follows: Spohr, March, Minuet, Andante with variations, and Finale from Notturmo for Wind Instruments and Janissaries Music. Eichheim, "Java," a symphonic poem and "Burma" (conducted by the composer; first time in Boston). Strauss, Symphonie Domestica.

Symphonic and vocal music by Spohr was performed at the symphony concerts with a certain regularity up to the Nineties; but nothing by him has been listed on the programs since 1906 when Willy Hess played a violin concerto. Yet Spohr for many years cut a prominent figure in the musical world as composer and violinist; he was thought to be a mighty fine fellow in the concert halls. He agreed to this in his autobiography. Today he is known only by two or three violin concertos, a few anthems still sung in churches with choir of mixed voices, and, possibly the overture to "Jessinda." Little is known about the origin of his Notturmo, extracts from which were played yesterday. Perhaps the work was composed for some court or other special occasion; perhaps for some orchestra proud of its wind choir.

The Theme with variations (which, transcribed, was performed here 70 years ago by the Mendelssohn Quintet Club) surely tests the proficiency of that orchestral section. Yesterday, it is needless to say, the performance was brilliant; one might justly say unsurpassable. Although the announcement that variations are to be played by an orchestra, violinist or pianist is calculated to strike terror in the soul of any hardened concert-goer. The art of the players yesterday lent interest to the music itself; the hearer refrained from saying aloud or thinking: "Old hat! Hear what Germans, who, Mr. Ludwig insists, are the most musical people in the world, enjoyed in the early years of the 19th century."

Mr. Eichheim, having acquainted the Symphony audience with music of China and Japan, visited Java and Burma for its benefit, studied the music of those countries, and brought with him Javanese instruments, which were added yesterday to those familiar in the West. No doubt this excellent musician, this enthusiastic admirer of

Oriental music, will visit Sumatra and Borneo, and in a symphonic poem entitled "Borneo" will introduce the dance of the celebrated "Wild Men."

"Java" was performed by the Philadelphia orchestra last week. "Burma" is an enlargement of music written for a play by Irene Lewisohn, produced in New York in 1926. In its concert form it consists of three exciting dances.

When Saint-Saens heard Javanese musicians at the Paris exhibition of 1889 he described their music as ravishing: "The little bamboo bells; the gamelang, a series of small tuned gongs struck with sticks enveloped in cotton, charm deliciously the ear. There are unexpected rhythms; it is dream music by which some have been hypnotized. What ought the ancient Hindu music to be, with its complicated and characteristic modes? No doubt the master work of oriental music, of that art which responds to a certain state of mind and civilization from which humanity goes farther and farther day by day."

It was manifestly impossible for Mr. Eichheim to reproduce in his symphonic poem, with a huge western orchestra, even with the addition of the instruments brought from afar, the mood that depends largely on the scene, the native players and even the costumes. He was obliged to westernize the music somewhat; yet the chief themes were unmistakably oriental, and the variations of the charming, wistful, Malayan song did not dispel the illusion, or the mood, inspired by that air. There was nothing incongruously academic in these variations; no attempt to show technical skill as encouraged in conservatories. There was no abandonment of the exotic.

But if the exotic delights the soul in the first moments, the prolongation of the mood is a foe to enjoyment. The most sympathetic hearers wish that the music would at last have a more western, even a more familiar flavor. In plain words, "Java" would gain in picturesqueness and charm if it were shortened. Mr. Eichheim knew what he wanted in the performance; the orchestra eloquently responded to his wishes. Warmly welcomed when he came on the platform, hearty applause recalled him after the performance.

Strauss' Symphony in which he dilates in tones on joyful, also harassing, domesticity is known to all. More or less ingenious commentators have told audiences what they should see and hear in Strauss's home: how he, his wife, their relatives, and the baby behave, in peace and in screaming argument. The child is put to bed; but there is no passage in which one hears the father like Mr. Babbitt, singing in his bath. Nor is there any table scene, no hint at beer and sausage. In this respect the Ode Symphony, "The Plains," by Jabez Tarbox, produced at San Diego in 1854, is a more realistic work, if the analyst John Phoenix is to be believed. The train has encamped for the night. "The unpacking of the kettles and mess-pans, the unyoking of the oxen, the gathering about the various camp-fires, the frizzling of the pork are so clearly expressed by the music, that the most untutored savage could readily comprehend it. Indeed, so vivid and lifelike was the representation, that a lady sitting near us, involuntarily exclaimed aloud at a certain passage, 'Thar, that pork's burning!' and it was truly interesting to watch the gratified expression of her face when, by a few notes of the guitar, the pan was removed from the fire, and the blazing pork extinguished."

Strauss's themes are commonplace, but the orchestral dress in which they and their combinations are clad is gorgeous. The performance was of the virtuoso order and of the highest rank. The concert will be repeated tonight. The orchestra will give no concerts here next week. Mr. Burgin will conduct on Nov. 29-30 when the program will comprise Borodin's Symphony, B minor, No. 3 (Mr. Thibaud); Schmitt's Study for Poe's "Haunted Palace," and perhaps a suite from Hindemith's ballet, "The Demon."

Monitor Boston Symphony Nov. 16
Dr. Koussevitzky set an oddly assorted bill of fare before his paying guests at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fifth banquet of the season. For opening, he conducted Spohr's "Notturmo for Wind Instruments and Janissaries Music," op. 34. Then he yielded the podium to Henry Eichheim, a former violinist in the Boston band, who now spends much of his time in the Far East. Mr. Eichheim took advantage of the opportunity to conduct his two recent orchestral pieces, "Java" and "Burma." After the intermission, Dr. Koussevitzky, who seems to be having a run on Strauss this year, returned to direct his forces in the "Sinfonia Domestica."

Dr. Strauss, indeed, had a further hand in the proceedings, for it was he, by report, who recommended the Spohr relic to the Boston conductor; hoping perhaps that it might find place on a program with one of his own compositions. Janissaries Music, as readers of Philip Hale's program notes learned, is Turkish music; that is, triangle, cymbals and bass drum. In short, this is military band music. It might well alternate with Beethoven's Turkish March in concerts for children. It is innocent, unpretentious stuff. Its chief interest lies in the variations of the Andante. It was gayly published by the wind choirs and gladly received by the Friday afternoon audience.

Mr. Eichheim has added two souvenirs to his memoirs of eastern travels. In his latest, the "Java," he joins to the usual orchestral instruments of the West those of the Javanese orchestra, including metal tubes, metal bars, marimba and gongs. These inevitably supply a certain color and atmosphere. The themes are native, but their harmonic treatment is that of the French impressionists. There is a great deal of repetition but no apparent development. We had always understood that Eastern music was very monotonous. Mr. Eichheim in "Java" gave us nothing to modify the impression.

The "Burma," written originally for a play, probably would be more expressive if heard in the theater. Of its two sections the first is a tone picture of "Twilight at Shwe Dagon." The impression left by this was not materially different from that made by the "Java." Both, we think, would be more effective if they were shorter. And it is possible that they would have profited if they had been conducted by Dr. Koussevitzky instead of the composer. Mr. Eichheim allowed the bells which accompany the entire twilight picture to be sounded so loudly that in the end they became annoying. Very likely this is the way they sound at Shwe Dagon. But Dr. Koussevitzky no doubt would have realized that, regardless of "realism," considerations of artistic balance required that they should be subdued. By the way, what do they do with sleighbells in Burma?

The remainder of the Burma poem consisted of three dances, making up a "pwé," or entertainment. These were more acceptable than the preceding measures, chiefly because they were shorter and yielded contrast among themselves. On the whole, Mr. Eichheim's impressions of the East are very definitely those of a traveler from the West, and we are not convinced that the attempt to make the twain meet by expressing the musical thoughts of the one in the musical idiom of the other is completely successful.

For conclusion, another nitid revelation of a Strauss score; in this instance, a score which would benefit by pruning—and this is not said because it came at the end of a program which endured for more than two hours. There are stunning pages, there are also dull pages here. But there were few dull moments in this refulgent performance. L. A. S.

STRAUSS DOMINATES SYMPHONY

His "Domestica" Is Played With Uncommon Eloquence

Post Nov. 16, 1939
BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

At the outset of yesterday afternoon's Symphony Concert the stage of Symphony Hall presented a curious picture. Seated in the midst of a forest of unoccupied chairs and useless music-stands were less than a score of wind and percussion players, assembled to perform a resurrected Notturmo of Spohr, while left stage, to speak theatrically, in readiness for Henry Eichheim's "Java" and "Burma," an array of red tables, heaped with glittering gongs, bells and bars, suggested a deserted Oriental bazaar.

ELDERLY AND TINKLING

The music of Spohr, more than a hundred years old but new to the Symphony concerts, proved to be in the last degree tinkling and innocuous. No doubt it pleased our great-great grandparents, who looked upon Beethoven as a dangerous fellow, and for that matter it pleased yesterday's audience, though it is kindest to suppose the applause was intended for the performance rather than for the music itself. And it was good to hear, for once at least, a portion of the wind-choir in isolation. In this the strings habitually receive more than their share.

This week for a third time a pair of Symphony audiences is being regaled with the musical fruits of Mr. Eichheim's Oriental journeys. Beyond that of any other composer is his mastery of translating the music of the East into the musical language of the West.

Slightly Monotonous

In "Java," his latest score, and in "Burma," music derived from a ballet performed not many seasons ago in New York, Mr. Eichheim has done his translating almost too faithfully. By common consent the music of Eastern nations, however seductive and fascinating some may find it, is by our standards monotonous, and the charge of monotony may well be brought against this most recent music of Mr. Eichheim's. Atmosphere he does obtain, however, and "Java" and "Burma" offer in abundance rhythmic and percussive effects, now exhilarating, now entrancing, while here and there they disclose harmonic and orchestral sonorities of singular beauty.

Mr. Eichheim, who again conducted his own music, was liberally applauded by his fellow-townsmen.

Strauss' "Domestica"

After the penny-whistle tunes of Spohr and the intense exoticism of Eichheim, the audience was ready yesterday for music closer to the current norm, and they received it in lavish, almost too lavish, quantity, since the hour was late, in Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica," once maligned and ridiculed, but now an impressive contestant for first place among the Bavarian composer's symphonic poems. In "Till Eulenspiegel" of last week some felt that Dr. Koussevitzky missed in measure the characteristic humor, but of the warm humanity, the rich musical substance, the imposing architectural design of the "Domestica" not an iota escaped him.

The performance was, indeed, one of uncommon eloquence, and the audience showed itself sensible of that fact.

EICHHEIM CONDUCTS "BURMA" AND "JAVA"

Composer Applauded at
Symphony Concert

Spohr Notturmo for Wind Instruments
and Strauss' Symphonia Domestica

Globe Nov. 16, 1929
Henry Eichheim was warmly applauded at yesterday's Symphony concert, where he conducted as guest his musical impressions of the Orient entitled "Burma," and "Java," played for the first time in Boston. Dr Koussevitzky's share of the program included Spohr's Notturmo for wind instruments, and Richard Strauss' Symphonia Domestica.

Mr Eichheim, a violinist in the Boston Symphony from 1891 to 1912, has in recent years made several visits to the Orient, where he has studied the native music of Japan, China, Burma, Java, and India and collected native instruments. His "Oriental Impressions," and "Chinese Legend" have been played by the Boston Symphony in recent seasons.

"Burma" is a symphonic poem made by Mr Eichheim out of the incidental music he wrote for a play by Irene Lewisohn, produced in New York in 1926. It begins with music intended to portray a twilight scene before a temple at Rangoon. Then follows a set of three dances grouped into what in Burma would be called a "Pwe," or entertainment offered in honor of a special occasion. The piece is scored for a large orchestra, to which gongs and percussion instruments brought by the composer from Mandalay and Rangoon were added yesterday.

"Java" is the first movement of an unfinished trilogy. It has an introduction intended to suggest the music by Javanese women on a hollow log, six feet long, used for rice pounding. The sides and ends of the log are struck with heavy clubs in intricate rhythms. Several native themes, with the aid of variations on them, furnish the material for the rest of the piece. In this piece Javanese instruments are added to the orchestra. They do not, however, include one of these rice-logs.

Mr Eichheim, unlike such European writers of pseudo-Oriental music as Rimsky-Korsakov, is thoroughly familiar with actual Oriental music. His themes and his percussion instruments are genuinely Oriental. What is more important, his imagination is saturated with the color and atmosphere of the Orient. No wonder then that his tone poems contain many passages that evoke that atmosphere even for listeners who have never been East of Suez. If they fail on the whole in blending the technique and the instruments of European music and those of the Orient the fault lies in the nature of things.

Suppose a patient and erudite native of Burma or Java, trained in the music of his own country, should come to America and hear the Boston Symphony, and Paul Whiteman's orchestra, then go home with a collection of saxophones, violins, trumpets, and so on, and try to write for a Javanese orchestra a set of musical impressions of such American scenes as the Harvard Stadium on a Saturday in November, or Park-st Subway at 5 p m. adding to his own orchestra his collection of European instruments. Would not the result be an imperfectly fused musical amalgam?

Spohr's Nocturne for wind instruments, probably written in 1812, was commissioned by a rich and presumably eccentric manufacturer. Dr Koussevitzky's revival of it was suggested by Richard Strauss, who called the piece to his attention last Summer. It served yesterday to test the virtuosity of the wood wind and brass players in the Boston Symphony. The suave and spineless character of the music, with its flabby themes and saccharine harmonies, showed clearly enough for Spohr's numerous operas, oratorios, cantatas and symphonies are now never played in public. Only the concert violinists keep his memory green by an occasional revival of one of his concertos, which, after all, are quite as good as the bulk of the violin virtuoso repertory.

Vallantly as Dr Koussevitzky and the orchestra labored yesterday with Strauss' Symphonia Domestica, one could not but feel that it was too long, too elaborate, too pedantic a working out of musical material without profound significance. It is curious that this should be the sort of thing done in the 1900s by the man who in the 1890s could write music so vital, so splendidly dramatic as "Don Juan" and "Till Eulenspiegel." Strauss' music was badly placed on yesterday's program, after the long and exacting novelties by Eichheim and the dull show piece by Spohr.

So elaborate a work should be placed first on a program, even if late-comers had to be excluded for a long time. In New York and Philadelphia late-comers at orchestral concerts are not admitted until there is an intermission. Why are they in Boston permitted to troop into the hall midway in a piece, as they did yesterday during the Spohr, disturbing the 99 percent of the audience which had arrived on time?

P. R.

Old and New, East, West, and Spohr Besides

Strauss of "The Domestica," Eichheim of The Orient,
At Symphony Hall

Trans. Nov. 16, 1929

THE STRANGENESS of the stage to the incoming eye, yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall, matched the subsequent strangeness to the ear of Mr. Eichheim's tone-poems of the Orient. In both "Java" and "Burma" he employed native instruments that he had himself collected—gongs, metal bars and tubs, bells, other means to fine and novel resonance. From front to rear, they filled the right-hand corner of the stage, where usually the harps rise in gilded state. The interlopers were yet more golden; while upon brightly painted or lacquered stands most were disposed. Were the sun permitted to enter the concert room and had it fallen upon what one wit named "the Eichheim Collection," gongs, tubs and tables would have flashed back a manifold radiance. As it was, they gleamed uncommonly bright through the neutral atmosphere of Symphony Hall on a wet November afternoon as though this shimmer was counterpart to their light or gently dissonant tinkle.

To swell this strangeness Dr. Koussevitzky began the afternoon with the Nocturne that Richard Strauss suggested to him as worthy of resurrection from Spohr. It was played upon twenty-odd instruments, woodwind, brass, percussion, clustered and set well back in the center of the stage; while the empty chairs and desks of the string choir yawned about them. Indeed, not until the intermission had cleared the stage of Oriental spoil, did it resume its normal aspect, with the full orchestra of Strauss for the "Symphonia Domestica"—a mere 108—in customary place.

Spohr's Nocturne occupied the listeners, and need occupy the reviewer, only briefly. Taking second thought, Dr. Koussevitzky prudently reduced the six numbers to four, excising an Adagio and a Polonaise, retaining a March, a

(with variations)

as it was, before it ran course, the undiversified choir began to eat little, tame literature not too well. If Spohr began temporary of Beethoven calling as contemporary. Now and again it seemed that it caught, and felicity in uses of the wind, a modicum of interest, lation. Why, for overlook the flutes, st, or his virtuoso, Variations—to the

At moments also in the bass-drum in the background a shallow music. Nocturne for the man of business believed him easily, seemingly, whatever off his pen. To as everything, and turne is apt and in his house-music of Salzburg, has of it. The kindly al note of "quaint" of the afternoon; austere demurred dian of the temple the theater—even ust hear "this sort

Hall, then Kern Strauss, how- the resurrection, eur of wind instru- sten to them," he was conductor at erlin and was plod- ning through "Low tone-poems out measurably renewed and delight of his sions," seven years we listeners with of musical sounds h strange softness ing it with subtle upon it swiftly and e holding imagina- he new pieces are graphic and poet- e Legend" of 1925. er, Mr. Eichheim idiom. It wore not Chinese trappings then dress it. In is relatively little an speech and he as conveyance for escaped, another example, unfolds and noted there or a. From them Mr. eries of variations. come to pass, he aterial. The hearer ing only for the t metal, in gong or by bright-colored, ma" suffers less by se it is briefer and more impressionis- to an outsider, less e motifs.

was plentiful in a thm. Two of the re dances: grotesque auous and spiralling or; while a third— e Princess—goes in itual-like flourishes. are novel and pl ears, giving to the to fancy a new ew the strangeness ental Impressions" omes the notion tal music is not al composers have loy and impart to utset of "Java" is rise. We listen to e swirling rhythmic s are intricate and more gains the ear iscord, the color and subtle timbres. A e answering note is t, clear and sweet. ambon resonator be- e and as musical a native instruments ted, blended. The , super-shaded; lend to the customary in- onic vesture, upon ke little stars. There radiances in these at as yet our ears ven so are surprise Mr. Eichheim dis- ls; thereby enlarges the sensibilities of he adventure on a the introduction to ears are filled with nances and suggest-second part of a nfonia Domestica," newed for Strauss rminating service

EICHHEIM CONDUCTS "BURMA" AND "JAVA"

Composer Applauded at
Symphony Concert

Spohr Notturmo for Wind Instruments
and Strauss' Symphonia Domestica

Globe Nov. 16, 1929
Henry Eichheim was warmly ap-

plauded at yesterday's Symphony concert, where he conducted as guest his musical impressions of the Orient entitled "Burma," and "Java," played for the first time in Boston. Dr Koussevitzky's share of the program included Spohr's Notturmo for wind instruments, and Richard Strauss' Symphonia Domestica.

Mr Eichheim, a violinist in the Boston Symphony from 1891 to 1912, has in recent years made several visits to the Orient, where he has studied the native music of Japan, China, Burma, Java, and India and collected native instruments. His "Oriental Impressions," and "Chinese Legend" have been played by the Boston Symphony in recent seasons.

"Burma" is a symphonic poem made by Mr Eichheim out of the incidental music he wrote for a play by Irene Lewisohn, produced in New York in 1926. It begins with music intended to portray a twilight scene before a temple at Rangoon. Then follows a set of three dances grouped into what in Burma would be called a "Pwe," or entertainment offered in honor of a special occasion. The piece is scored for a large orchestra, to which gongs and percussion instruments brought by the composer from Mandalay and Rangoon were added yesterday.

"Java" is the first movement of an unfinished trilogy. It has an introduction intended to suggest the music by Javanese women on a hollow log, six feet long, used for rice pounding. The sides and ends of the log are struck with heavy clubs in intricate rhythms. Several native themes, with the aid of variations on them, furnish the material for the rest of the piece. In this piece Javanese instruments are added to the orchestra. They do not, however, include one of these rice-logs.

Mr Eichheim, unlike such European writers of pseudo-Oriental music as Rimsky-Korsakov, is thoroughly familiar with actual Oriental music. His themes and his percussion instruments are genuinely Oriental. What is more important, his imagination is saturated with the color and atmosphere of the Orient. No wonder then that his tone poems contain many passages that evoke that atmosphere even for listeners who have never been East of Suez. If they fall on the whole in blending the technique and the instruments of European music and those of the Orient the fault lies in the nature of things.

Suppose a patient and erudite native of Burma or Java, trained in the music of his own country, should come to America and hear the Boston Symphony, and Paul Whiteman's orchestra, then go home with a collection of saxophones, violins, trumpets, and so on, and try to write for a Javanese orchestra a set of musical impressions of such American scenes as the Harvard Stadium on a Saturday in November, or Park-st Subway at 5 p. m. adding to his own orchestra his collection of European instruments. Would not the result be an imperfectly fused musical amalgam?

Spohr's Nocturne for wind instruments, probably written in 1812, was commissioned by a rich and presumably eccentric manufacturer. Dr Koussevitzky's revival of it was suggested by Richard Strauss, who called the piece to his attention last Summer. It served yesterday to test the virtuosity of the wood wind and brass players in the Boston Symphony. The suave and spineless character of the music, with its flabby themes and saccharine harmonies, showed clearly enough for Spohr's numerous operas, oratorios, cantatas and symphonies now never played in public. Only concert violinists keep his memory green by an occasional revival of one of his concertos, which, after all, quite as good as the bulk of violin virtuoso repertory.

Vallantly as Dr Koussevitzky the orchestra labored yesterday Strauss' Symphonia Domestica, could not but feel that it was too elaborate, too pedantic a work out of musical material without found significance. It is curious this should be the sort of thing in the 1900s by the man who in 1890s could write music so vitally splendidly dramatic as "Don J" and "Til Eulenspiegel." Strauss' music was badly placed on yesterday's program, after the long and exciting novelties by Eichheim and the show piece by Spohr.

So elaborate a work should be first on a program, even if composers had to be excluded for time. In New York and Philadelphia late-comers at orchestral concerts not admitted until there is a mission. Why are they in Boston? They are in Boston, as they did yesterday, in a piece, as they did yesterday, in the Spohr, disturbing the 99 per cent of the audience which had arrived on time?

less it is essential for ment of existing under The London Daily that this announcer Malay as virtually cor tion of the Malayan g and comes as a sequel in the price of tin. Cal London report that well ities there expect that Malayan Government w movement for rational regulation of output selling.

Cocoa at Lowest Level

New York, Nov. 16.—Cocoa the severest decline at the New York Cocoa the past week and dropped 39 to 51 points levels of the past four cents a pound, off a sharp downward trend partially in sympathy with the stock market; in part to the heavy interest in buying ket; and by a bearish heavy shipments from the Coast.

Members of the trade, that the last feature a bearish outlook at the year. When the huge A is moving the trade w consume the large vol able of the buying at the ing the past week was ers attracted by what cheap cocoa.

Sees Advance in Wheat Price

In its Nov. 15 review of situation the Department comments as follows on The outlook for wheat price advance within the next The world crop is about bushels short of last year the average of the past five total supply of wheat average season is about 360,000,000 of last year. Relief from pressure appears to be in ing a slackening of shipping gentina and Danube countries slackening of marketings United States and Canada.

Wheat Gluts British Market

London, Nov. 16 (Canadian Press)—A great wheat glut is beginning in the British market.

Minuet, an Andante (with variations) and the Finale. As it was, before these "selections" had run course, the relatively narrow, and here undiversified, timbre of the wind choir began to cloy; while Spohr's neat little, tame little, melodic ideas endured not too well his elegant expansions. If Spohr began music-making as contemporary of Beethoven, he ended that calling as contemporary of Mendelssohn. Now and again the ear caught, or fancied that it caught, a Mendelssohnian finesse and felicity in the elder composer's uses of the wind choir and there was modicum of interest, pleasure—and speculation. Why, for example, did Spohr overlook the flutes and give all his best, or his virtuoso, measures—as in the Variations—to the clarinets or the oboes? At moments also he was ingenious when the bass-drum padded lightly along in the background or the horns deepened a shallow music.

Spohr wrote the Nocturne for the entertainment of a rich man of business in Vienna; evidently believed him easily entertained; utilized, seemingly, whatever matter came slipping off his pen. To him the treatment was everything, and throughout the Nocturne is apt and neat. Yet Mozart, in his house-music for the great and rich of Salzburg, has many times the better of it. The kindly disposed made a mental note of "quaint" against this first item of the afternoon; the more irritable or austere demurred impatiently. One guardian of the temple—and frequenter of the theater—even declared that if she must hear "this sort of thing" at Symphony Hall, then Kern did it better than Spohr. Strauss, however, who brought about the resurrection, always was a connoisseur of wind instruments. "I like to listen to them," he told a friend when he was conductor at the Royal Opera at Berlin and was plodding on a sultry evening through "Lohengrin."

Mr. Eichheim's new tone-poems out of Java and Burma, measurably renewed the illusion, wonder and delight of his first "Oriental Impressions," seven years back. Then he, and we listeners with him, were discoverers of musical sounds touching the ear with strange softness and sweetness, caressing it with subtle dissonance, jangling upon it swiftly and suddenly, by all three holding imagination spelled. Both the new pieces are fresher, more original, graphic and poetized than the "Chinese Legend" of 1925. As occidental composer, Mr. Eichheim tends to a Debussyan idiom. It were not too persuasively the Chinese trappings in which he would then dress it. In "Burma" and "Java" is relatively little an speech and he, as conveyance for escaped, another example, unfolds and noted there or a. From them Mr. series of variations, come to pass, he material. The hearer ning only for the metal, in gong or by bright-colored, ma" suffers less by se it is briefer and more impressionis to an outsider, less e motifs.

was plentiful in a rthm. Two of the re dances: grotesque auous and spiralling or; while a third—e Princess—goes in itual-like flourishes. are novel and pl ears, giving to the to fancy a new ew the strangeness ental Impressions" omes the notion tal music is not al composers have loy and impart to utset of "Java" is rise. We listen to swirling rhythmic s are intricate and more gains the ear iscord, the color and subtle timbres. A e answering note is t, clear and sweet. e and as musical a native instruments ted, blended. The , super-shaded; lend to the customary in- ionic vesture, upon ke little stars. There radiances in these at as yet our ears ven so are surprise Mr. Eichheim dis- is; thereby enlarges the sensibilities of he adventure on a the introduction to ears are filled with nances and suggest-second part of a nphonia Domestica," nnewed for Strauss rminating service

Composer Applauded at
Symphony Concert

Henry Eichheim was warmly and

Mr. Elchhelm, a violinist in the Boston Symphony from 1891 to 1912, has in recent years made several visits to the Orient, where he has studied the native music of Japan, China, Burma, Java, and India and collected native instruments. His "Oriental Impressions," and "Chinese Legend" have been played by the Boston Symphony in recent seasons.

"Java" is the first movement of an unfinished trilogy. It has an introduction intended to suggest the music by Javanese women on a hollow log, six feet long, used for rice pounding. The sides and ends of the log are struck with heavy clubs in intricate rhythms. Several native themes, with the aid of variations on them, furnish the material for the rest of the piece. In this piece Javanese instruments are added to the orchestra. They do not, however, include one of these rice-logs.

important, his imagination is saturated with the color and atmosphere of the Orient. No wonder then that his tone poems contain many passages that evoke that atmosphere even for listeners who have never been East of Suez. If they fall on the whole in blending the technique and the instruments of European music and those of the Orient the fault lies in the nature of things.

Spohr's Nocturne for wind instruments, probably written in 1812, was commissioned by a rich and presumably eccentric manufacturer. Dr Koussevitzky's revival of it was suggested by Richard Strauss, who called the piece to his attention last Summer. It served yesterday to test the virtuosity of the wood wind and brass players in the Boston Symphony. The suave and spineless character of the music, with its flabby themes and saccharine harmonies, showed clearly enough for Spohr's numerous operas, oratorios, cantatas and symphonies are now never played in public. Only the concert violinists keep his memory green by an occasional revival of one of his concertos, which, after all, are quite as good as the bulk of the violin virtuoso repertory.

So elaborate a work should be first on a program, even if comers had to be excluded for a time. In New York and Philadelphia-comers at orchestral concert not admitted until there is an mission. Why are they in Boston to troop into the hall in a piece, as they did yesterday the Spohr, disturbing the 99 cent of the audience which have arrived on time?

Cocoa at Lowest L

Members of the t that the last featu a bearish outlook year. When the hu is moving the trad consume the large able of the buying ing the past week
ers attracted by w cheap cocoa.

Sees Advance in Wh

Wheat Gluts British

anxiety among British loads of cheap wheat from the Argentine, the ready has three times
ply. There is enough it is accerted, to sup mands for three months

Average of Close Twenty Lead York Sto

Friday, Nov. 15, 1929.

Thursday, Nov. 14, 1929

Gain for the day.....

Year ago today.....

Saturday, Nov. 9, 1929.

Loss for the week....

Recent Trend—

Stock Exchange closed—81, 1914, with average Closed, Dec. 31, 1914

Fell, Jan. 17, 1923, to Rose, Mar. 14, 1923, to Fell, May 21, 1923, to Rose, June 9, 1923, to Fell, Oct. 27, 1923, to Rose, Dec. 8, 1923, to Fell, Dec. 18, 1923, to Closed, Dec. 31, 1923

Rose, Feb. 6, 1924, to Fell, Apr. 22, 1924, to Rose, May 7, 1924, to Fell, May 20, 1924, to Rose, Aug. 18, 1924, to Fell, Sept. 6, 1924, to Rose, Sept. 24, 1924, to Fell, Oct. 14, 1924, to
Closed, Dec. 31, 1924.

Rose, Jan. 3, 1925, to Fell, Feb. 16, 1925, to Rose, Mar. 6, 1925, to Fell, Mar. 30, 1925, to Rose, Aug. 22, 1925, to Fell, Sept. 2, 1925, to Rose, Nov. 13, 1925, to Fell, Nov. 24, 1925, to Closed, Dec. 31, 1925

Rose, Feb. 13, 1926, to Fell, Mar. 3, 1926, to Rose, Mar. 12, 1926, to Fell, Mar. 30, 1926, to Rose, Apr. 6, 1926, to Fell, Apr. 14, 1926, to Rose, Sept. 7, 1926, to Fell, Oct. 19, 1926, to Rose, Dec. 24, 1926, to
Closed, Dec. 31, 1926.

Fell.	Jan. 27, 1927,	to
Rose,	Feb. 28, 1927,	to
Fell.	Mar. 7, 1927,	to
Rose,	May 31, 1927,	to
Fell.	June 30, 1927,	to
Rose,	Aug. 2, 1927,	to
Fell.	Aug. 12, 1927,	to trace of that Parisian speech and he resorts to it, primarily, as conveyance for his Oriental discoveries.

Beyond this pitfall escaped, another opens. "Java," for example, unfolds from motifs heard and noted there or elsewhere in Malaysia. From them Mr. Eichheim draws a series of variations. Before they have all come to pass, he has exhausted his material. The hearer catches himself listening only for the strange resonances of metal, in gong or tub or bar, struck by bright-colored, padded sticks. "Burma" suffers less by this limitation—because it is briefer and pithier, because it is more impressionistic and, as it seemed to an outsider, less dependent upon native motifs.

"Burma," moreover, was plentiful in a new interest—of rhythm. Two of the four short divisions are dances: grotesque for the Councillors; sinuous and spiralling for the Maids of Honor; while a third—of the Prince and the Princess—goes in stately motion with ritual-like flourishes. Now these rhythms are novel and piquant to Occidental ears, giving to the music a new beat, to fancy a new compulsion. They renew the strangeness that the first "Oriental Impressions" diffused. Again comes the notion that in this Oriental music is not a little that Occidental composers have yet to discover, employ and impart to audiences. At the outset of "Java" is similar rhythmic surprise. We listen to rice-pounders, and the swirling rhythmic patterns of their blows are intricate and singular.

Elsewhere, "Java" more gains the ear by the concord or the discord, the color and suggestion of novel, subtle timbres. A gong is tapped and the answering note is strangely bright, light, clear and sweet. From a bar and the bamboo resonator beneath proceeds as rare and as musical a sound. Other of these native instruments are touched, contrasted, blended. The notes fall super-subtle, super-shaded; lend a strange, soft glitter to the customary instrumental and harmonic vesture, upon which they are sewn like little stars. There are resonances and radiances in these Javanese timbres that as yet our ears hardly perceive; yet even so are surprise to the imagination. Mr. Eichheim discovers, adjusts, reveals; thereby enlarges less the bounds, than the sensibilities of music. He renews the adventure on a larger, bolder scale in the introduction to "Burma" and listening ears are filled with new resonances, dissonances and suggested mood.

Re-playing, for the second part of a long concert, the "Sinfonia Domestica," Dr. Koussevitzky renewed for Strauss the fine, true discriminating service that he did last month for Chalkovsky in the "Pathetic Symphony." It is easy to deride the tone-poem, when as yesterday, that picturing of Dr. and Mrs. Strauss, of Jacquingasse, 10, Vienna III., follows close upon such musical exoticism as "Burma" and "Java." It is equally easy to emphasize what some call the jocular, and others the vulgar, aspects of "The Domestica." There are German analysts who harp upon "drastic tone-picturing"; English, as well, who profess to know how, when and where the child is bathed and put to bed or husband and wife fall to querulous disputing. There are conductors, no less, who take cue for a similar reading; turn the final fugue into rude din and dissonance; set the clock to striking as though it were alarm for a lumbermen's camp; lard out the songful middle measures thick and greasy; with dull wits and heavy hands, begin and persist turgidly. From such performance the hearer departs ready to agree with the first detractor who happens to flaunt in his face the megalomania, the coarse humor, the tasteless egotism of the composer of "Ein Heldenleben" and this same "Sinfonia Domestica."

Such analysts, commentators and conductors read the tone-poem without the divination which is the only reason for their respective callings. Return to the final fugue and consider it as happy expansion of an awakening, morning mood, to be taken with animation, even exuberance, yet lightly, wittily, fancifully. Open the middle pages and find in them the zest and the passion of living when the artist creates or the man within him loves. Then release these ardent, full-freighted staves. Hark back to the unfolding of husband, wife and child in the motifs of the beginning. They are not semi-literal definitions, but the composer's fancy playing about his imagined household. Follow the course of the succeeding Scherzo and here is no obtrusive fiddle-faddle about "the baby's bath," but Strauss's fantasy upon homely happiness, as dreamful in its way as the sleep-chasings, so called, that link the middle ecstasies to the gay elation of the end. So to read "The Domestica" is to read it for the poetry implicit and discoverable within.

Yesterday, in Symphony Hall, Dr. Koussevitzky opened out such a tone-poem; while the orchestra was its manifold voice. As from one who writes musically, the individualizing themes took shape and substance. Under the conductor's light pace, rhythm and tone, the Scherzo was idyllic. Cleansed of thick-ness and heaviness, distilled into cumu-prices was downward. The season was quiet and easy because of a holiday in Brazil tendency since Thursday phase of unsteady trend. The gone up, in accordance with financial aid for the Brazilian try, and down between times. Today, the New York market heavy net declines for the Rio December was 8.50 cents a week ago; March 8.30 vs. 25 vs. 8.98. In Santos Decem-

week's program at Symphony Hall stand

his latest works, "Burma," originally composed as music for a play by Lewisohn at the Neighborhood House in New York in 1926, later and played by the Chicago, Los Angeles, and Philadelphia orchestras; entirely new, which the composer acted for the first time at Philadelphia on Friday, Saturday and Monday. In them Mr. Eichheim uses the instruments of the Gamelang or Javanese orchestra—the bonang, made of twelve metal tubes; the saron, seven heavy bars on a resonator; the demong, bronze bars each under its own atar; the gender, thirteen metal strung over bamboo resonators; the mba; five tuned gongs. These, by of mouth from Mr. Eichheim, are authentic and used by the natives of Java. They were brought from Samar and Solokarta. In playing them the es sit on the floor." There are also these instruments, "brought from oon and Mandalay." Together these groups of instruments fill most of space where usually the last desks of have place; from there to back of the orchestral platform. To them there will be nine percussionists, drawn from various choirs of orchestra.

"Java" said Mr. Eichheim yesterday, the result of my last trip (1927-28) to Orient, and is the first movement of Oriental Symphony which I am writing. It is dedicated to my wife. The second movement, "Angkor," depicting masses of great temples in Cambodia, dedicated to Dr. Koussevitzky. This Indian architecture includes the impressively beautiful temples in which Indo-China. The building left the Khmers are a fruitful field for artist to dream and think in. The at night of this dead grandeur was towering and fantastic in the expanse and a strange contrast to Chinese as for example the Temple of in Peiping.

The finale of this Symphony, "Ball," is on the brilliant and scintillating of this people. It will be dedicated to Stokowski. Bali is a delightful island sixty by ninety miles in size, six hours by steamer directly east of Java. Its inhabitants are the handsomest, most lovable people on earth. They are all peasants—farmers first of then artists: goldsmiths and silver-smiths, weavers, architects, painters, accompanists, wood-carvers. Their music is of extravagantly brilliant intensity. They use the same instruments as the Javanese, but strike them with harder blows, while the Javanese use softer blows. Hence the brilliance of their music. Javanese music, in contrast, is and golden, the most beautiful in the world. There are in it no joints; it is an unending flowing sound. One never hears a pack of hammers, is never aware of that the music is being made; it is like lovely streams that flow over rocks—coming from nowhere, going where; simply existing as a thing of ceaseless beauty. Intricate rhythmic patterns follow one another with perfect logic. They are a basic principle for this refined, highly organized, art. For this art is the result of tropically warm inspiration of a highly talented race.

On my last trip of mine," continued Mr. Eichheim, "I took me 1500 miles up the Macassar River. While I was there the broke out. More than one bullet from a Mauser rifle passed through my hat on the river-boat. One day, about a hundred miles from nowhere, I read upon the artistic beauty of an inscription in Chinese characters on the wall of a river-bank. What was my surprise when I learned that these characters which I had been admiring spelled 'Kill the foreigners.' I go on my trips, by the way, not as a musician but as a lover of Oriental architecture. Then I hear music; it may be of a village, it may be the song of peasants at work, or of vendors selling their wares on the streets. But when I hear music I make note of them. So this last trip added me about four hundred exam-

On the island of Java I attended a wedding of five princesses at Djokjarta. The beautiful young brides were covered with priceless jewels, in robes of medieval gorgeousness. The ceremony was of great dignity and importance, and ended only when the brides were carried away in their palanquins. Forty days after the wedding was an elaborate ceremonial celebration by a three-day festival, lasting from six in the morning until midnight. There were plays founded on Hindu classics. There were dances and the ceremonial music. As this golden music at its finest, by one of the three best Javanese musicians in the world. Through these hours the orchestra was playing intently, leaving a never-to-be-forgotten impression upon the mind of the Occidental musician.

"Java" begins with the music of gamelans; a hollow log six or seven feet long, used for threshing rice, is played by six women with heavy clubs. The clanging sounds have caused it to be used as a musical instrument. The gamelan are of astonishing intensity and the players weave intricate rhythmic

g that you of gloves at, a hat package of t even repaid for it!
name that

that he did last month for Chail in the "Pathetic Symphony." It is to deride the tone-poem, when as day, that picturing of Dr. and Strauss, of Jacquingasse, 10, III., follows close upon such exoticism as "Burma" and "Java," equally easy to emphasize what call the jocular, and others the aspects of "The Domestica." The German analysts who harp upon "tic tone-picturing"; English, as who profess to know how, where the child is bathed and put or husband and wife fall to que disputing. There are conductor less, who take cue for a reading; turn the final fugue rude din and dissonance; set clock to striking as though it alarm for a lumbermen's camp; lay the songful middle measures thick greasy; with dull wits and heavy begin and persist turgidly. From performance the hearer departs to agree with the first detractor happens to flaunt in his face the lomania, the coarse humor, the ta egotism of the composer of "Eir denleben" and this same "Sinfoni mestica."

Such analysts, commentators and ductors read the tone-poem without divination which is the only reason their respective callings. Return final fugue and consider it as happy expansion of an awakening, morning to be taken with animation, even ex-ance, yet lightly, wittily, fancifully. the middle pages and find in their zest and the passion of living where artist creates or the man within loves. Then release these ardent freighted staves. Hark back to the folding of husband, wife and child i motives of the beginning. They are semi-literal definitions, but the poser's fancy playing about his ima household. Follow the course of the ceeding Scherzo and here is no obt fiddle-faddle about "the baby's bath, Strauss's fantasy upon homely happ as dreamful in its way as the chasings, so called, that link the ecstasies to the gay elation of the So to read "The Domestica" is to re for the poetry implicit and discover within.

Yesterday, in Symphony Hall, Koussevitzky opened out such a poem; while the orchestra was its fold voice. As from one who musically, the individualizing themes shape and substance. Under the ductor's light pace, rhythm and tone Scherzo was idyllic. Cleansed of ness and heaviness, distilled into c

lating passion of musical sound, through the middle pages went the achievement and the affection which are the fulfillment of living. The tonal texture ran rich and clear; the orchestra pulsed and glowed. The dreamful voice again in the transitional passage; the striking of the clock as sounds faintly stirring through this mist. Then with upspringing hand and tone the bright exuberance of the final fugue. The true, universal, enduring "Domestica," the tone-poem as tone-poem, from Dr. Koussevitzky's perceiving mind, divining imagination and ordering hand. These with an orchestra that at the top of its bent, Strauss might, almost, have added to his vision.

H. T. P.

Spoils From The East for Western Ears

To Symphony Hall Eichheim,
Returned Anew, Brings
"Java" and "Burma"

Trans. — Nov. 14, 1929.

OLD HANDS when they read a week ago, Dr. Koussevitzky's program for the Symphony Concerts of today and tomorrow, believed it no more than a preliminary run over the course. It read strangely; was sure to be altered, perhaps more than once. On the contrary it stood, and still stands, firm: Spohr's Nocturne for Wind Instruments as beginning; then Mr. Eichheim's two tone-poems, "Burma" and "Java"; finally Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica," battle-horse that the conductor rides gladly. To the three novel pieces, then—for it contains that unusual number—with what speed and space we may. This article shall traverse the Orient early.

Henry Eichheim will be remembered by some for his "Oriental Impressions" and his "Chinese Legend," played here respectively in 1922 and 1925; by others from the fact that he belonged to the first violins of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1890 to 1912. He is now a world-traveller, though his legal residence is in Santa Barbara, California. As a composer he devotes his energies to the music of the Orient. Upon this week's program at Symphony Hall stand two of his latest works, "Burma," originally composed as music for a play by Irene Lewisohn at the Neighborhood Playhouse in New York in 1926, later enlarged and played by the Chicago, Los Angeles, and Philadelphia orchestras; "Java," entirely new, which the composer conducted for the first time at Philadelphia on Friday, Saturday and Monday last. In them Mr. Eichheim uses the instruments of the Gamelang or Javanese orchestra,—the bonang, made of twelve small metal tubes; the saron, seven heavy bronze bars on a resonator; the demong, seven bronze bars each under its own resonator; the gender, thirteen metal bars strung over bamboo resonators; a marimba; five tuned gongs. These, by word of mouth from Mr. Eichheim, are "all authentic and used by the natives of Java. They were brought from Samarang and Solokarta. In playing them the natives sit on the floor." There are also Burmese instruments, "brought from Rangoon and Mandalay." Together these two groups of instruments fill most of the space where usually the last desks of violas have place; from there to back-center of the orchestral platform. To play them there will be nine percussion-players, drawn from various choirs of the orchestra.

"Java" said Mr. Eichheim yesterday, "is the result of my last trip (1927-28) to the Orient, and is the first movement of an Oriental Symphony which I am writing. It is dedicated to my wife. The second movement, 'Angkor,' depicting the masses of great temples in Cambodia, is dedicated to Dr. Koussevitzky. This Cambodian architecture includes the most impressively beautiful temples in French Indo-China. The building left by the Khmers are a fruitful field for an artist to dream and think in. The effect at night of this dead grandeur was overpowering and fantastic in the extreme and a strange contrast to Chinese ruins, as for example the Temple of Heaven in Peiping.

"The finale of this Symphony, 'Bali,' is based on the brilliant and scintillating music of this people. It will be dedicated to Mr. Stokowski. Bali is a delightful paradise sixty by ninety miles in size, thirty-six hours by steamer directly east of Java. Its inhabitants are the handsomest, most lovable people on earth. They are all peasants—farmers first of all, then artists: goldsmiths and silversmiths, weavers, architects, painters, actors, musicians, wood-carvers. Their music is of extravagantly brilliant intensity. They use the same instruments as the Javanese, but strike them with hard hammers, while the Javanese use soft hammers. Hence the brilliance of their music. Javanese music, in contrast, is and golden, the most beautiful in the world. There are in it no joints; it is an unending flowing sound. One never hears a pack of hammers, is never aware of that the music is being made; is it like lovely streams that flow over rocks—coming from nowhere, going where; simply existing as a thing of ceaseless beauty. Intricate rhythmic patterns follow one another with logic. They are a basic principle for this refined, highly organized art. For this art is the result of a tropically warm inspiration of a kindly talented race.

My last trip of mine," continued Mr. Eichheim, "took me 1500 miles up the Ize River. While I was there the broke out. More than one bullet from a Mauser rifle passed through my on the river-boat. One day, about hundred miles from nowhere, I red upon the artistic beauty of an tion in Chinese characters on the of a river-bank. What was my surprise when I learned that these characters, which I had been admiring spelled 'Kill the foreigners.' I go on trips, by the way, not as a musician but as a lover of Oriental architecture. Then I hear music; it may be of a trass, it may be the song of peasants work, or of vendors selling their on the streets. But when I hear make note of them. So this last added me about four hundred exam-

the island of Java I attended a wedding of five princesses at Djok. The beautiful young brides covered with priceless jewels, in robes of medieval gorgeousness. The ceremony was of great dignity and importance, and ended only when the carried the brides away in their Forty days after the wedding was an elaborate ceremonial celebration by a three-day festival, lasting day from six in the morning until night. There were plays founded Hindu classics. There were and the ceremonial music. as this golden music at its finest, by one of the three best Javanese as in the world. Through these the orchestra was playing intensely, leaving a never-to-be-forgotten ion upon the mind of the Occidental musician.

"Java" begins with the music of anders; a hollow log six or seven ing, used for threshing rice, is by six women with heavy clubs. ulting sounds have caused it to as a musical instrument. The are of astonishing intensity and the players weave intricate rhythmic

that he did last month for Chail in the "Pathetic Symphony." It is to deride the tone-poem, when as day, that picturing of Dr. and Strauss, of Jacquingasse, 10, III., follows close upon such exoticism as "Burma" and "Java," equally easy to emphasize what call the jocular, and others the aspects of "The Domestica." The German analysts who harp upon "tic tone-picturing"; English, as who profess to know how, where the child is bathed and put or husband and wife fall to que disputing. There are conductor less, who take cue for a reading; turn the final fugue rude din and dissonance; set clock to striking as though it alarm for a lumbermen's camp; lay the songful middle measures thick greasy; with dull wits and heavy begin and persist turgidly. From performance the hearer departs to agree with the first detractor happens to flaunt in his face the lomania, the coarse humor, the ta egotism of the composer of "Eir denleben" and this same "Sinfoni mestica."

Such analysts, commentators and ductors read the tone-poem without divination which is the only reason their respective callings. Return final fugue and consider it as happy pansion of an awakening, morning to be taken with animation, even eance, yet lightly, wittily, fancifully. the middle pages and find in their zest and the passion of living whe artist creates or the man within loves. Then release these ardent freighted staves. Hark back to the folding of husband, wife and child i motifs of the beginning. They are semi-literal definitions, but the poser's fancy playing about his ima household. Follow the course of the ceeding Scherzo and here is no obtr fiddle-faddle about "the baby's bath; Strauss's fantasy upon homely happ as dreamful in its way as the chasings, so called, that link the ecstasies to the gay elation of the So to read "The Domestica" is to re for the poetry implicit and discove within.

Yesterday, in Symphony Hall, Koussevitzky opened out such a poem; while the orchestra was its fold voice. As from one who w musingly, the individualizing themes shape and substance. Under the ductor's light pace, rhythm and tone Scherzo was idyllic. Cleansed of t ness and heaviness, distilled into c lating passion of musical sound, through the middle pages went the achievement and the affection which are the fulfillment of living. The tonal texture ran rich and clear; the orchestra pulsed and glowed. The dreamful voice again in the transitional passage; the striking of the clock as sounds faintly stirring through this mist. Then with upspringing hand and tone the bright exuberance of the final fugue. The true, universal, enduring "Domestica," the tone-poem as tone-poem, from Dr. Koussevitzky's perceiving mind, divining imagination and ordering hand. These with an orchestra that at the top of its bent, Strauss might, almost, have added to his vision.

H. T. P.

Spoils From The East for Western Ears

To Symphony Hall Eichheim,
Returned Anew, Brings
"Java" and "Burma"

Janus. — Nov. 14, 1929.

OLD HANDS when they read a week ago, Dr. Koussevitzky's program for the Symphony Concerts of today and tomorrow, believed it no more than a preliminary run over the course. It read strangely; was sure to be altered, perhaps more than once. On the contrary it stood, and still stands, firm: Spohr's Nocturne for Wind Instruments as beginning; then Mr. Eichheim's two tone-poems, "Burma" and "Java"; finally Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica," battle-horse that the conductor rides gladly. To the three novel pieces, then—for it contains that unusual number—with what speed and space we may. This article shall traverse the Orient early.

Henry Eichheim will be remembered by some for his "Oriental Impressions" and his "Chinese Legend," played here respectively in 1922 and 1925; by others from the fact that he belonged to the first violins of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1890 to 1912. He is now a world-traveller, though his legal residence is in Santa Barbara, California. As a composer he devotes his energies to the music of the Orient. Upon this week's people the two of b inally co

Irene L
Playhous enlarged Angeles,
"Java," e conducted phla on last. In t struments orchestra small meta bronze bar seven bron resonator;
bars strung marimba; f word of mo
"all authent of Java. Th rang and Sol natives sit o Burmese in Rangoon and two groups the space wh violins have center of th play them th players, dray the orchestra
"Java" as "is the result the Orient, ar an Oriental S ing. It is de second mover the masses of is dedicated to Cambodian a most impressi
French Indo-C
by the Khmer an artist to di effect at night overpowering
treme and a st ruins, as for Heaven in Pelpi
"The finale of based on the l music of this pe to Mr. Stokows paradise sixty thirty-six hours of Java. Its im sorest, most lo
They are all pe
all, then artists
smiths, weavers, tors, musicians,
music is of extra sity. They use th the Javanese, but hammers, while hammers. Hence music. Javanese good shoes is know that a name is inevi

pair of shoe ality, for co
alue.

ard
e

Women and STREETS,

in New Eng

Thursday, 7:30

SH, WTIC, V

B. &

$3,

In

Co

sion main River Junc chester an building of ing of all grade rev line betwe Junction.

This fur Maine's rated by was plann out under

liquid and golden, the most beautiful music in the world. There are in it no edges or joints; it is an unending flow of entrancing sound. One never hears the impact of hammers, is never aware of the fact that the music is being made; rather is it like lovely streams that flow out of rocks—coming from nowhere, going nowhere; simply existing as a thing of sourceless beauty. Intricate rhythmic patterns follow one another with extreme logic. They are a basic principle for this refined, highly organized, perfected art. For this art is the result of the tropically warm inspiration of a profoundly talented race.

"This last trip of mine," continued Mr. Eichheim, "took me 1500 miles up the Yangtze River. While I was there the war broke out. More than one bullet from a Mauser rifle passed through my cabin on the river-boat. One day, about five hundred miles from nowhere, I remarked upon the artistic beauty of an inscription in Chinese characters on the grass of a river-bank. What was my surprise when I learned that these characters which I had been admiring spelled the words, 'Kill the foreigners.' I go on these trips, by the way, not as a musician, but as a lover of Oriental architecture: Then I hear music; it may be of orchestras, it may be the song of peasants at work, or of vendors selling their wares on the streets. But when I hear them I make note of them. So this last trip yielded me about four hundred examples."

On the island of Java I attended a royal wedding of five princesses at Djok-jakarta. The beautiful young brides were covered with priceless jewels, in costumes of medieval gorgeousness. The ceremony was of great dignity and impressiveness, and ended only when the grooms carried the brides away in their arms. Forty days after the wedding there was an elaborate ceremonial celebrated by a three-day festival, lasting each day from six in the morning until ten at night. There were plays founded on the Hindu classics. There were dancing and the ceremonial music. Here was this golden music at its finest, played by one of the three best Javanese orchestras in the world. Through these long hours the orchestra was playing incessantly, leaving a never-to-be-forgotten impression upon the mind of the Occidental musician.

"My 'Java' begins with the music of rice-pounders; a hollow log six or seven feet long, used for threshing rice, is struck by six women with heavy clubs. The resulting sounds have caused it to be used as a musical instrument. The sounds are of astonishing intensity and the players weave intricate rhythmic patterns of asymmetric design. I use four of these rhythms in the introduction. Then after a transition there is a melody of five notes which I heard in the theater at Djokjakarta, which is the basis of the entire piece. There are also two counter-melodies heard in the courts of Djokjakarta. 'Java' ends with a section depicting the calm of early morning at the Borobudur, the largest Buddhist shrine in the world."

"Burma" is divided into two main parts: (1) Twilight at the Shwe Dagon; (2) a Pwé. A Pwé consists of three dances: I. The prince and princess, personages taken from the Hindu classics and appearing as principal figures in Burmese and Javanese stage plays. II. Grotesquerie. Grotesque figures which are part of all theatrical performances in Java and Burma. They relieve the tension of tragedy with their clowning add contrast. III. A final dance of the maids of honor. Said Mr. Eichheim: "The beginning of 'Burma' pictures twilight on the platform of the Shwe Dagon, the most beautiful Buddhist shrine in Burma, a huge golden spire. This twilight mood brings the peasants, the priests, the musicians, the boys playing ball, the water-carriers, the aged and the young, into the sacred precincts of this holy shrine. This teeming life is soon engulfed in the night and ends with the tinkling of the little bells that are suspended from the pagoda, swayed by the wind. The second part is composed of three dances and is called a Pwé. It is a form of entertainment common throughout Burma in which musicians and dancers and singers play their grotesque or serious music on platforms before a newly opened store, or at the house of a merchant who is celebrating the birth of a son, or some other festive occasion in Burmese life." A. H. M.

Introduction for New-Old Composer

Dr. Koussevitzky Presents
Herr Ludwig Spohr to Audiences of 1929

THE third novel number on the program for the Symphony Concerts this week—the other two are described elsewhere on these pages—is a piece for wind choir by Ludwig Spohr, composer once often heard at these concerts. In the days of Henschel, Gericke, Nikisch and Pauer, the Overture to his opera, "Jessonda," was played seven times; the eighth Violin-Concerto, thirteen times, the ninth, nine times. Eight

Out

"North"

8 3

K

K J 7

K 10 9 8 6 3 2

s. J. Munce

"East"

7 4

7 3 2

9 6 5 3 2

A J 5

Bruehlheide

tween the old and new romantic schools" in German music. Like Schubert he had a taste for harmonic color. Chromatic modulations, often (to modern ears, at least) sweetish in flavor, abound in his works. This first definite step in the direction of chromaticism was, of course, eventually to result in a "Tristan." But his style was prolix and amiable, circumlocutory and excessively mellifluous. Perhaps Schumann's dictum—"As he looks at everything as though through tears, his figures run into each other like formless, ethereal shapes, for which we can scarcely find a name"—would make him, also an unconscious prophet of modern impressionism!

Upon the title-page of the piece to be played tomorrow stand these words: "Notturno für Harmonie-und Janitscharen-Musik; Sr. Durchlaucht Herrn Gunthera Friedrich Carl, regierenden Fürsten zu Schwarzburg-Sonderhausen, unterthänigst zugeeignet von Louis Spohr." An obviously literal translation of this title would be, "Nocturne for Harmony-and Janissary-Music," etc. Symphony Hall has translated it "Nocturne for Woodwinds and Turkish Music." A little research will be to the point. Grove's Dictionary of Music and Musicians, under Janissary, says, "See Turkish music"; and under that caption writes, "(Turkish of Janitscharen-Musik)—term which was once used to describe the percussion instruments in the orchestra, base-drum, cymbals and triangle. The band of the Janissaries, abolished in 1825, is said to have comprised a piccolo and oboes in addition to the percussion instruments named." So far, so good. Spohr first heard "Janissary" music at a popular festival held in honor of the birthday of his prince. There was dancing. He writes in his autobiography: "In answer to my question as to where so many musicians would be found, I learned that the 'Janitscharen-Musik' would play for the peasants . . ."

To Spohr then, in agreement with Grove above, "Janitscharen-Musik" was a kind of band rather than a type of composition. Final confirmation of this view comes from Meyer's [German] Lexikon, which under Janitscharen-Musik refers to Militär-Musik and there writes: "A type of music, or a reference to the kind of orchestra which accompanies troops. One distinguishes: Infantry (Harmonie-formerly Janissary-) Music, consisting of woodwinds, brass, percussion, also glockenspiel; Hunting (horn-) Music, consisting entirely of brass, with doubled French horns; Cavalry (trumpet-) Music, in which woodwinds are lacking, alto-horns replace French horns, trumpets stand in the foreground and drums are added. Each of these types has its peculiar tone-color. Infantry-music with its high woodwinds is suitable for modern music; Hunting music is well for song-like cantabile melody; for Cavalry music with its piercing trumpets and resounding drums these are most effective." From which it is apparent that Spohr's Nocturne might well be entitled in English, "Nocturne for military band." Dr. Koussevitzky in Berlin last year recommended the Nocturne. It is divided into six divisions—march, minuet, waltz, polonaise, a polonaise, and a finale. The score calls for a trill, bass drum and cymbals, piccolo, oboes, clarinets horns, trumpets, double-bassoon and trombone. The polonaise adds a "corno di posta."

Nov 23, 1929
Koussevitzky's "Till"

ON Thursday and Saturday last, Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra were heard for the first time this season in New York. On the evening program stood Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel." In The Sun Mr. Henderson praised the performance warmly, saying:

What was more impressive was the magnificent performance of the tone-poem. There was not a thematic fragment that did not seem to fall spontaneously and perfectly in to its place in the shimmering web of orchestration. Such a fastidious observance of proportion is not common and it bespoke not only earnest rehearsal but ideal communication between conductor and players. The scheme of development carried the interpretation from a whispering pianissimo to the thunderous and crushing forte which sent Till squeaking to his doom.

All was luminous and vivid, vital and yet touched with that strain of tenderness without which any reading of "Till Eulenspiegel" must fall short of the composer's intent. In short, it was a masterly presentation of a composition which has often been played admirably, sometimes superlatively, but assuredly never with a more sweeping gamut of orchestral splendors, never with a firmer outlining of its design, than last evening. The Boston Symphony Orchestra not only returned to town but to its golden era.

And Ravel

For his part, Mr. Thompson of The Evening Post was more pleased with Dr. Koussevitzky's version of Ravel's "Mother-Goose" pieces: "If it's modern music—that is, modern French music—or, to be more patterns of asymmetric design of these rhythms in the tion. Then after a transition a melody of five notes which I the theater at Djokjakarta, while the entire piece. The basis of the entire piece. The also two counter-melodies heard courts of Djokjakarta. 'Java' e a section depicting the calm morning at the Borobudur, the Buddhist shrine in the world.

"Burma" is divided into two parts: (1) Twilight at the Shwe (2) a Pwé. A Pwé consists dances: I. The prince and prince sonages taken from the Hindu and appearing as principal figures Burmese and Javanese stage plots. Grotesque figures are part of all theatrical performance in Java and Burma. They tension of tragedy with the ing add contrast. III. A final the maids of honor. Said Mr. E

"The beginning of 'Burma' twilight on the platform of the Dagon, the most beautiful shrine in Burma, a huge gold This twilight mood brings the the priests, the musicians, the ing ball, the water-carriers, the the young, into the sacred pre this holy shrine. This teeming soon engulfed in the night with the tinkling of the little are suspended from the pagoda by the wind. The second part posed of three dances and is Pwé. It is a form of entertainment throughout Burma in which clowns and dancers and singers grotesque or serious music on before a newly opened store, house of a merchant who is on the birth of a son, or some other occasion in Burmese life."

Introduction for New-Old Com

Dr. Koussevitzky P
Herr Ludwig Spohr
Audiences of 192

THE third novel number on gram for the Symphony was a pioneer. This week—the other two numbers mount to nearly one hundred piece for wind choir by Ludwig and fifty. Best known among them was composer once often heard at a symphony with title, "The Consecration of Tones"; the opera, "Jessonda"; Nikisch and Pauer, the Overture the oratorio, "The Last Judgment"; the opera, "Jessonda," was played eighth Violin-Concerto. Historically he times; the eighth Violin-Concerto stands in the van-guard of romanticists. Indeed he has been called a "link be-of his compositions had distinct place in the repertory—four of them violin-concertos, two overtures, two symphonies. The last Spohr performance occurred Oct. 20, 1906, when Willy Hess played the ninth Violin-Concerto and Dr. Muck conducted at his second pair of concerts in America. More recently, if memory does not slip, Albert Spalding, the violinist, has played pieces by Spohr in recital, possibly in Boston. In his time and long after there was no doubting his vogue.

Spohr was a contemporary of Beethoven for no less than forty-three years. For Spohr's birth occurred in 1784, Beethoven's death not until 1827. But the two men did not meet until late in Beethoven's life. It is said that Spohr never fully understood or appreciated either Beethoven or Weber. But he was among the first to champion the cause of Wagner, giving early performances of "The Flying Dutchman" and "Tannhäuser" against much opposition. He was also greatly interested in Schumann.

Spohr himself was violinist, conductor, composer of powers in his day considered extraordinary. As violinist he played one of his own duos concertante with Paganini in Rome; was the teacher of many of the noted violinists of the succeeding generation; wrote a "violin-school" which long remained a classic in pedagogical literature. As a conductor he was famous all over Europe. Like Haydn before him, he was once guest of the London Philharmonic Orchestra. "It was at that time still the custom there," according to his autobiography, "that when symphonies and overtures were performed, the pianist had the score before him, not exactly to conduct from it, but only to read after and to play in with the orchestra at pleasure, which when it was heard [nota bene!] had a very bad effect. The real conductor was the first violin, who gave the tempi, and now and then when the orchestra began to falter, gave the beat with the bow of his violin." This was the state of orchestral performance only a hundred years ago. There was actual conducting only "when the orchestra began to falter"! It was with some difficulty that Spohr persuaded the directors of the Philharmonic Society to allow him to conduct with a baton, in which method of conducting he was a pioneer.

Spohr composed in all forms. His opus numbers mount to nearly one hundred and fifty. Best known among them was a symphony with title, "The Consecration of Tones"; the opera, "Jessonda"; the oratorio, "The Last Judgment"; the eighth Violin-Concerto. Historically he stands in the van-guard of romanticists. Indeed he has been called a "link between the old and new romantic schools" in German music. Like Schubert he had a taste for harmonic color. Chromatic modulations, often (to modern ears, at least) sweetish in flavor, abound in his works. This first definite step in the direction of chromaticism was, of course, eventually to result in a "Tristan." But his style was prolix and amiable, circumlocutory and excessively mellifluous. Perhaps Schumann's dictum—"As he looks at everything as though through tears, his figures run into each other like formless, ethereal shapes, for which we can scarcely find a name"—would make him, also an unconscious prophet of modern impressionism!

Upon the title-page of the piece to be played tomorrow stand these words: "Notturno für Harmonie-und Janitscharen-Musik; Sr. Durchlaucht Herrn Günther Friedrich Carl, regierenden Fürsten zu Schwarzburg-Sonderhausen, unterthänigst zugeeignet von Louis Spohr." An obvious literal translation of this title would be, "Nocturne for Harmony-and Janissary-Music," etc. Symphony Hall has translated it "Nocturne for Woodwinds and Turkish Music." A little research will be to the point. Grove's Dictionary of Music and Musicians, under Janissary, says, "See Turkish music"; and under that caption writes, "(Turkish of Janitscharen-Musik)—term which was once used to describe the percussion instruments in the orchestra, base-drum, cymbals and triangle. The band of the Janissaries, abolished in 1825, is said to have comprised a piccolo and oboes in addition to the percussion instruments named." So far, so good. Spohr first heard "Janissary" music at a popular festival held in honor of the birthday of his prince. There was dancing. He writes in his autobiography: "In answer to my question as to where so many musicians would be found, I learned that the 'Janitscharen-Musik' would play for the peasants . . ."

To Spohr then, in agreement with Grove above, "Janitscharen-Musik" was a kind of band rather than a type of composition. Final confirmation of this view comes from Meyer's [German] Lexikon, which under Janitscharen-Musik refers to Militär-Musik and there writes: "A type of music, or a reference to the kind of orchestra which accompanies troops. One distinguishes: Infantry (Harmonie-formerly Janissary-) Music, consisting of woodwinds, brass, percussion, also glockenspiel; Hunting (horn-) Music, consisting entirely of brass, with doubled French horns; Cavalry (trumpet-) Music, in which woodwinds are lacking, alto-horns replace French horns, trumpets stand in the foreground and drums are added. Each of these types has its peculiar tone-color. Infantry-music with its high wood-winds is suitable for modern music; Hunting music is well for song-like cantabile melody for Cavalry music with its piercing trumpets and resounding drums are most effective." From which session it is apparent that Spohr's might well be entitled in English, "turne for military band."

Dr. Koussevitzky in Berlin last recommended the Nocturne. It turns into six divisions—march, minuet, waltz, polonaise, a polonaise, and his figures run into each other like formless, ethereal shapes, for which we can scarcely find a name"—would make him, also an unconscious prophet of modern impressionism!

polonaise adds a "corno di posta." square-cut eight-and-sixteen-measure movements pre- of course, the meandering style has been charged against Spohr Friedrich Carl, regierenden Fürsten zu Schwarzburg-Sonderhausen, unterthänigst zugeeignet von Louis Spohr." An obvious literal translation of this title would be, "Nocturne for Harmony-and Janissary-Music," etc. Symphony Hall has translated it "Nocturne for Woodwinds and Turkish Music." A little research will be to the point. Grove's Dictionary of Music and Musicians, under Janissary, says, "See Turkish music"; and under that caption writes, "(Turkish of Janitscharen-Musik)—term which was once used to describe the percussion instruments in the orchestra, base-drum, cymbals and triangle. The band of the Janissaries, abolished in 1825, is said to have comprised a piccolo and oboes in addition to the percussion instruments named." So far, so good. Spohr first heard "Janissary" music at a popular festival held in honor of the birthday of his prince. There was dancing. He writes in his autobiography: "In answer to my question as to where so many musicians would be found, I learned that the 'Janitscharen-Musik' would play for the peasants . . ."

20-23, 1929
Koussevitzky's "Till"
ON Thursday and Saturday last, Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra were heard for the first time this season in New York. On the evening program stood Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel." In The Sun Mr. Henderson praised the performance warmly, saying:

What was more impressive was the magnificent performance of the tone-poem. There was not a thematic fragment that did not seem to fall spontaneously and perfectly in to its place in the shimmering web of orchestration. Such a fastidious observance of proportion is not common and it bespoke not only earnest rehearsal but ideal communication between conductor and players. The scheme of development carried the interpretation from a whispering pianissimo to the thunderous and crushing forte which sent Till squeaking to his doom.

All was luminous and vivid, vital and yet touched with that strain of tenderness without which any reading of "Till Eulenspiegel" must fall short of the composer's intent. In short, it was a masterly presentation of a composition which has often been played admirably, sometimes superlatively, but assuredly never with a more sweeping gamut of orchestral splendors, never with a firmer outlining of its design, than last evening. The Boston Symphony Orchestra not only returned to town but to its golden era.

And Ravel

For his part, Mr. Thompson of The Evening Post was more pleased with Dr. Koussevitzky's version of Ravel's "Mother-Goose" pieces: "If it's modern music—that is, modern French music—or, to be more patterns of asymmetric design of his compositions had distinct place in four of these rhythms in the the repertory—four of them violin-con- tion. Then after a transition certos, two overtures, two symphonies. a melody of five notes which I The last Spohr performance occurred the theater at Djokjakarta, whi Oct. 20, 1906, when Willy Hess played basis of the entire piece. T the ninth Violin-Concerto and Dr. Muck also two counter-melodies hear conducted at his second pair of concerts courts of Djokjakarta. 'Java' eir America. More recently, if memory a section depicting the calm does not slip Albert Spalding, the violin- morning at the Borobudur, the ist, has played pieces by Spohr in recital, Buddhist shrine in the world possibly in Boston. In his time and long "Burma" is divided into tw after there was no doubting his vogue.

parts: (1) Twilight at the Shwe Spohr was a contemporary of Beet- (2) a Pwé. A Pwé consists hoven for no less than forty-three years. dances: I. The prince and princ For Spohr's birth occurred in 1784, Beet- sonages taken from the Hindu hoven's death not until 1827. But the and appearing as principal fi two men did not meet until late in Beet- Burmese and Javanese stage pl hoven's life. It is said that Spohr never Grotesquerie. Grotesque figure fully understood or appreciated either are part of all theatrical perfo Beethoven or Weber. But he was among in Java and Burma. They rel the first to champion the cause of Wag- tension of tragedy with the ner, giving early performances of "The ing add contrast. III. A final Flying Dutchman" and "Tannhäuser" the maids of honor. Said Mr. B against much opposition. He was also "The beginning of 'Burma' greatly interested in Schumann.

twilight on the platform of t Spohr himself was violinist, conductor, Dagon, the most beautiful B composer of powers in his day considered shrine in Burma, a huge gold extraordinary. As violinist he played This twilight mood brings the one of his own duos concertante with the priests, the musicians, the t Paganini in Rome; was the teacher of ing ball, the water-carriers, the many of the noted violinists of the suc- the young, into the sacred pre ceeding generation; wrote a "violin- this holy shrine. This teemin school" which long remained a classic in soon engulfed in the night pedagogical literature. As a conductor with the tinkling of the little he was famous all over Europe. Like are suspended from the pagoda Haydn before him, he was once guest of by the wind. The second part the London Philharmonic Orchestra. "It posed of three dances and is was at that time still the custom there," according to his autobiography, "that mon throughout Burma in wh when symphonies and overtures were cians and dancers and singers performed, the pianist had the score be- grotesque or serious music on fore him, not exactly to conduct from it, before a newly opened store, but only to read after and to play in house of a merchant who is c with the orchestra at pleasure, which the birth of a son, or some oth when it was heard [nota bene!] had a occasion in Burmese life."

Introduction for New-Old Com

Dr. Koussevitzky P
Herr Ludwig Spohr
Audiences of 192

THE third novel number on gram for the Symphony- this week—the other two scribed elsewhere on these pa numbers mount to nearly one hundred piece for wind choir by Ludwig and fifty. Best known among them was composer once often heard at a symphony with title, "The Consecra- certs. In the days of Henschel, tion of Tones"; the opera, "Jessonda"; Nikisch and Pauer, the Overtu the oratorio, "The Last Judgment"; the opera, "Jessonda," was playe eighth Violin-Concerto. Historically he times; the eighth Violin-Conce stands in the van-guard of romanticists. teen times, the ninth, nine time Indeed he has been called a "link between the old and ne in German music. I a taste for harmonic modulations, often (least) sweetish in fl works. This first direction of chroma eventually to result his style was prolix locutory and excessi haps Schumann's di at everything as th his figures run into e less, ethereal shapes scarcely find a name also an unconscious impressionism!

Upon the title-pag played tomorrow stan turno für Harmonie- sik; Sr. Durchlaue Friedrich Carl, regle Schwarzburg-Sonderl igst zugeeignet von I viously literal trans would be, "Nocturne Janissary-Music," etc translated it "Noctu and Turkish Music."

be to the point. G Music and Musician says, "See 'Turkish that caption writes, scharen-Musik)—terr used to describe the ments in the orchest bals and triangle. T saries, abolished in comprised a piccolo a to the percussion in So far, so good. Spo sary" music at a por honor of the birthday was dancing. He w raphy: "In answer where so many music I learned that the would play for the p

To Spohr then, Grove above, "Janit a kind of band rat composition. Final view comes from Me kon, which under Ja fers to Militär-Musl "A type of music, o kind of orchestra troops. One distir (Harmonie-formerly consisting of woodw sion, also glockensp Music, consisting en doubled French ho pet-) Music, in wh lacking, alto-horns r trumpets stand in drums are added. has its peculiar music with its high able for modern m

Spa
Hea
Diar
Club

Spa
Hea
Diar
Club

Add

Twelve added to fares in the Traff of Chah traffic is street.

Norma Green st Pitts s street.

West Rever s Spruce nut street Joy st bridge st Hancock Mt. Verr Branch street.

Pinckn street.

Myrtle Hancock Comm

from Ch ton-Bost

South avenue t

Birch Corinth

The co heavy tr Charlesto Warren

Indust

sounds well for song-like cantabile mel- eles; for Cavalry music with its pierc- ing trumpets and resounding drums marches are most effective." From which discussion it is apparent that Spohr's piece might well be entitled in English, "Nocturne for military band."

Herr Doktor Richard Strauss, encoun- tering Dr. Koussevitzky in Berlin last June, recommended the Nocturne. It falls into six divisions—march, minuet, andante with variations, a polonaise, an adagio, finale. The score calls for a tri- angle, bass drum and cymbals, piccolo, flutes, oboes, clarinets horns, trumpets, bassoons, double-bassoon and trombone. The polonaise adds a "corno di posta." The square-cut eight-and-sixteen-measure rhythms of most of these movements pre- clude, of course, the meandering style which has been charged against Spohr as his worst fault. Per contra, except in the variations and adagio he does not rise above the style of military band music. The Nocturne was popular in Spohr's day. In Boston, the Andante with variations was played in 1859 by the Mendelssohn Quintet.

20-23, 1929
Koussevitzky's "Till"

ON Thursday and Saturday last, Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Or- chestra were heard for the first times this season in New York. On the evening program stood Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel." In The Sun Mr. Henderson praised the performance warmly, saying:

What was more impressive was the magnificent performance of the tone- poem. There was not a thematic fragment that did not seem to fall spontaneously and perfectly in to its place in the shimmering web of or- chestration. Such a fastidious ob- servance of proportion is not com- mon and it bespoke not only earnest rehearsal but ideal communication be- tween conductor and players. The scheme of development carried the in- terpretation from a whispering planis- simo to the thunderous and crushing forte which sent Till squeaking to his doom.

All was luminous and vivid, vital and yet touched with that strain of tenderness without which any reading of "Till Eulenspiegel" must fall short of the composer's intent. In short, it was a masterly presentation of a composition which has often been played admirably, sometimes superla- tively, but assuredly never with a more sweeping gamut of orchestral splendors, never with a firmer outlin- ing of its design, than last evening. The Boston Symphony Orchestra not only returned to town but to its gold- en era.

And Ravel

For his part, Mr. Thompson of The Eve- ning Post was more pleased with Dr. Kous- sevitzky's version of Ravel's "Mother- Goose" pieces: "If it's modern music—that is, modern French music—or, to be more

Henry Eichheim is the son of Meinhard Eichheim, the leading violoncellist in Chicago thirty-five years ago, and a member of Theodore Thomas's Orchestra. A student of Carl Becker and of S. E. Jacobsohn at the Chicago Musical College, the son received the first prize for violin playing and appeared as soloist at the commencement concert of that institution, June 24, 1890. He also studied with Leopold Lichtenberg. For a year he was a member of Theodore Thomas's Orchestra in New York, but in 1890-91 he was one of the first violins of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Eichheim left this orchestra at the end of the season of 1911-12 to devote himself to composition, concert playing, teaching and conducting. For four years he was conductor of the Winchester (Mass.) Symphony Orchestra. In 1915 Mr. Eichheim visited Japan and other Eastern countries, returning to Japan in 1919. He remained in that country more than a year, making a careful study of Oriental music. Another visit was made to the Orient in 1922, and in 1927-28 he visited Java, Bali, and Angkor in Indo-China, and made a journey 1,500 miles up the Yangtze-Kiang, collecting musical material and adding to his large collection of Oriental instruments.

specific, the music of Maurice Ravel—provided the particular Ravel work is none other than 'Ma Mere l'Oye'—give us the Boston Symphony conducted by Serg Koussevitzky, just as we had it in the first of the ten concerts Boston is contributing to the welfare of those who congregate in Carnegie Hall. Momentarily, we may not be quite so sure about Beethoven, and even less certain about Richard Strauss.

"But when Mr. Koussevitzky was fairly into the 'Pavane of the Sleeping Beauty,' that is the first of the 'Mother-Goose' pieces, there was never a doubt with us as to the pre-eminence of the Bostonians in this music. Perhaps it is not the most difficult music in the world to play. But such gossamer delicacy as that which whispered the spell about 'La Belle au Bois Dormant' is certainly not easy of attainment, or it would not be such a rarity in the concert-halls. It is permissible to be a little weary of 'The Conversations of Beauty and the Beast,' but 'Le Jardin Féerique' regained a charm that, for us, had all but vanished from it until the Boston conductor waved his thaumaturgic wand and bade it return."

Also Beethoven

The concert ended with Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. Hearing it, Mr. Perkins of The Tribune Herald was quick with praise. In preceding concerts [he writes] Mr. Koussevitzky showed that he could avoid the risk of treating Beethoven's Fifth Symphony as a matter of course, and did so again in a vigorous, fresh performance of marked color and no lack of brilliance. There was much contrast, with assertive climaxes and, occasionally, a touch of stridency, but it was a vivid interpretation, suggesting that the Russian conductor and his musicians were offering this Symphony owing to their interest in it, rather than from a sense of duty.

But Hardly Gruenberg

On Saturday afternoon, Mr. Grünberg's tone-poem, "The Enchanted Isle"—the one novel number at the two concerts—had none too good a press. Only The Times thought highly of the piece. The other reviewers of a Sunday were lukewarm—as witnesses this paragraph from The Herald Tribune: "Listening to Mr. Grünberg's work one could not but fancy that his enchanted island had been visited before he arrived there. One has heard accounts suspiciously like that of Mr. Grünberg concerning an enchanted island known to Ravel and to Debussy. But this is not to be wondered at. As a great philosopher once observed, 'our new thoughts have thrilled dead bosoms.' Mr. Grünberg's thoughts, as expressed in this music, are often beautiful and poetic and are set forth by an orchestra that knows how to make the sense of enchantment audible and persuasive. Mr. Grünberg is an able craftsman and his instruments obviously tell us what he wished them to say to us. Mr. Koussevitzky gave the work a devoted and eloquent performance, and at its conclusion he summoned the composer to the stage to share with him the plaudits of the audience."

Sixth Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, NOVEMBER 29, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 30, at 8.15 o'clock

RICHARD BURGIN will conduct these concerts

Rimsky-Korsakov . . . Suite from "Le Coq d'Or"

- I. King Dodon in his Palace.
- II. King Dodon with the Queen of Shemakha.
- III. Wedding March and Lamentable End of King Dodon.

Borodin . . . Symphony in B minor No. 2, Op. 5

- I. Allegro moderato.
- II. Molto vivo.
- III. Andante.
- IV. Allegro.

Saint-Saëns . . . Concerto in B minor for Violin and Orchestra, No. 3, Op. 61

- I. Allegro non troppo.
- II. Andantino quasi allegretto.
- III. Molto moderato e maestoso: Allegro non troppo.

Wetzler . . . Symphonic Dance in Basque Style from "The Basque Venus," Opera (after Prosper Mérimée), Op. 14

Fandango—Zortziko—Espatadantza—Ariñ-Ariñ

(First time in Boston)

SOLOIST

JACQUES THIBAUD

There will be an intermission after the symphony

The works to be played at these concerts may be seen in the Allen A. Brown Music Collection of the Boston Public Library one week before the concert

Henry Eichheim is the son of Meinhard Eichheim, the leading violoncellist in Chicago thirty-five years ago, and a member of Theodore Thomas's Orchestra. A student of Carl Becker and of S. E. Jacobsohn at the Chicago Musical College, the son received the first prize for violin playing and appeared as soloist at the commencement concert of that institution, June 24, 1890. He also studied with Leopold Lichtenberg. For a year he was a member of Theodore Thomas's Orchestra in New York, but in 1890-91 he was one of the first violins of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Eichheim left this orchestra at the end of the season of 1911-12 to devote himself to composition, concert playing, teaching and conducting. For four years he was conductor of the Winchester (Mass.) Symphony Orchestra. In 1915 Mr. Eichheim visited Japan and other Eastern countries, returning to Japan in 1919. He remained in that country more than a year, making a careful study of Oriental music. Another visit was made to the Orient in 1922, and in 1927-28 he visited Java, Bali, and Angkor in Indo-China, and made a journey 1,500 miles up the Yangtze-Kiang, collecting musical material and adding to his large collection of Oriental instruments.

specific, the music of Maurice Ravel—provided the particular Ravel work is none other than 'Ma Mere l'Oye'—give us the Boston Symphony conducted by Serg Koussevitzky, just as we had it in the first of the ten concerts Boston is contributing to the welfare of those who congregate in Carnegie Hall. Momentarily, we may not be quite so sure about Beethoven, and even less certain about Richard Strauss.

"But when Mr. Koussevitzky was fairly into the 'Pavane of the Sleeping Beauty,' that is the first of the 'Mother-Goose' pieces, there was never a doubt with us as to the pre-eminence of the Bostonians in this music. Perhaps it is not the most difficult music in the world to play. But such gossamer delicacy as that which whispered the spell about 'La Belle au Bois Dormant' is certainly not easy of attainment, or it would not be such a rarity in the concert-halls. It is permissible to be a little weary of 'The Conversations of Beauty and the Beast,' but 'Le Jardin Féerique' regained a charm that, for us, had all but vanished from it until the Boston conductor waved his thaumaturgic wand and bade it return."

Also Beethoven

The concert ended with Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. Hearing it, Mr Perkins of The Tribune Herald was quick with praise. In preceding concerts [he writes] Mr. Koussevitzky showed that he could avoid the risk of treating Beethoven's Fifth Symphony as a matter of course, and did so again in a vigorous, fresh performance of marked color and no lack of brilliance. There was much contrast, with assertive climaxes and, occasionally, a touch of stridency, but it was a vivid interpretation, suggesting that the Russian conductor and his musicians were offering this Symphony owing to their interest in it, rather than from a sense of duty.

But Hardly Gruenberg

On Saturday afternoon, Mr. Grünberg's tone-poem, "The Enchanted Isle"—the one novel number at the two concerts—had none too good a press. Only The Times thought highly of the piece. The other reviewers of a Sunday were lukewarm—as witnesses this paragraph from The Herald Tribune: "Listening to Mr. Grünberg's work one could not but fancy that his enchanted island had been visited before he arrived there. One has heard accounts suspiciously like that of Mr. Grünberg concerning an enchanted island known to Ravel and to Debussy. But this is not to be wondered at. As a great philosopher once observed, 'our new thoughts have thrilled dead bosoms,' Mr. Grünberg's thoughts, as expressed in this music, are often beautiful and poetic and are set forth by an orchestra that knows how to make the sense of enchantment audible and persuasive. Mr. Grünberg is an able craftsman and his instruments obviously tell us what he wished them to say to us. Mr. Koussevitzky gave the work a devoted and eloquent performance, and at its conclusion he summoned the composer to the stage to share with him the plaudits of the audience."

Sixth Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, NOVEMBER 29, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 30, at 8.15 o'clock

RICHARD BURGIN will conduct these concerts

Rimsky-Korsakov Suite from "Le Coq d'Or"

- I. King Dodon in his Palace.
- II. King Dodon with the Queen of Shemakha.
- III. Wedding March and Lamentable End of King Dodon.

Borodin Symphony in B minor No. 2, Op. 5

- I. Allegro moderato.
- II. Molto vivo.
- III. Andante.
- IV. Allegro.

Saint-Saëns Concerto in B minor for Violin and Orchestra, No. 3, Op. 61

- I. Allegro non troppo.
- II. Andantino quasi allegretto.
- III. Molto moderato e maestoso: Allegro non troppo.

Letzler Symphonic Dance in Basque Style from "The Basque Venus," Opera (after Prosper Mérimée), Op. 14

Fandango—Zortziko—Espatadantza—Ariñ-Ariñ
(First time in Boston)

SOLOIST
JACQUES THIBAUD

There will be an intermission after the symphony

The works to be played at these concerts may be seen in the Allen A. Brown Music Collection of the Boston Public Library one week before the concert

JACQUES THIBAUD

Herald Nov. 30, 1924
SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the sixth concert of its 49th season yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Richard Burgin, the concert master, conducted. Jacques Thibaud was the solo violinist. The program was as follows: Rimsky-Korsakov, suite from "Le Coq d'Or"; Borodin, Symphony, B minor, No. 2; Saint-Saens, Violin Concerto No. 3, B minor; Wetzler, Symphonic Dance in Basque style from "The Basque Venus," an opera based on a story by Merimee. (First time in Boston.)

Some dismiss Borodin as an amateur in music; accomplished in his own profession; no doubt "fond of music", but far inferior to the other members of the "Big Five". Thus they do him gross injustice, as Handel unjustly slighted Gluck, saying that his own cook knew more about counterpoint. Borodin had not the academic training of Balakirev and Rimsky-Korsakov, but he wrote songs of exquisite beauty; there is the symphony played yesterday; there are pages of "Prince Igor"; there is a charming string quartet. No doubt in all these works, except the songs, a learned professor could point out some technical flaws, shortcomings and so on, but Borodin had musical ideas, imaginative, poetic; he was not slavishly bound to the theory that extreme nationalism is all-important; he knew and was proud of his country's history; he realized the value of Russian and Asiatic folk-songs; but he knew that music to endure for a time must pass national boundaries; that oriental flavoring must be for orthodox forms to please western ears; for nothing in music so quickly palls on the so-called civilized world as extreme and obstinate exoticism. Take the symphony in B minor, for example, of which The Finale is the least important section.

Only a composer of a poetic nature, a lover of the beautiful which includes fancy, could have written the Scherzo, the Andante, and much of the opening Allegro. In these pages there are fine harmonic and instrumental expressions that are Borodin's, not another's. The Suite from "Le Coq d'Or" preceded, delightful music in large part, but chiefly so by reason of piquant instrumentation. The difference does not lie in the fact that Rimsky-Korsakov's music is for the opera house; Borodin's for the concert hall; it lies in the musical nature of the two men. Borodin while he was writing his symphony was also at work on his opera. It is not surprising that there are measures in the symphony that recall the Polovtsian dances with chorus in "Prince Igor"; but there is nothing in the symphony that can be called strictly operatic; nor is Rimsky-Korsakov in his happiest mood when he attempts in any one of his works to be strictly symphonic, although he put himself under a rigorous course of counterpoint, when he found out that he needed this instruction.

Mr. Wetzler, knowing that the scene of Merimee's "La Venus d'Ille" is not far from the Basque country, helped himself reasonably to Biscayan rhythms. He chose the Fandango, though it is especially a Spanish dance; the Zortzico, a complicated dance in which many join toward the end; Espatadantz, a Basque sword dance that admits pantomime; and for a Finale the Arin-Arin, the last figure of the Zortzico.

The suite derived from the opera was first performed at Hamburg under Dr. Muck's leadership. The Chicago orchestra gave the first performance in this country last February. The opera itself was produced at Leipsic last November.

As is the case with most suites when the dances are not in strong contrast, the earlier pages of Mr. Wetzler's symphonic dance are the most striking, the most musically interesting. When he comes to the furious pages of the Finale, there is chiefly a monstrous din in which distinctive rhythms are lost. The Fandango and the Zortziko are those portions of the work which are the most pleasing to the hearer; those which are most creditable to the composer. How closely this music expresses the Biscayan spirit and emotions is not for a New Englander who knows that land only through tales of travellers and novelists, and through illustrated print, to say. Ten years ago last April Mr. Laparra's "Basque Sunday" was performed here at a symphony concert. The composer was the pianist. The Scherzo was suggested by the game of Pelote. In the last movement there were allusion to the "Arin-Arin" and the "Espatadantza," but Mr. Laparra said that his aim was not so much to reconstitute the rhythms as to express the musical sentiment evoked in him by certain Biscayan aspects and customs. In Pierne's suites from his music for Coti's "Ramuntcho," selections played at a symphony concert early in 1922—"Rhapsody" was first performed here by the Boston Orchestra Club as early as 1910—there are Biscayan dance rhythms. Laparra's music is picturesque, worthy of the man that wrote the opera, "La Habanera." But the simple measure in which Azucena, when she is dragged by Ferrando before the Count di Luna, sings of her homeland bring Biscay nearer to us.

Saint-Saëns is held in slight repute by the young lions who today roar their opinions about music, but he wrote an effective violin concerto, three piano concertos out of his five that are worth hearing, chamber music of excellent quality, a witty opera "Phryne" and other music that is not negligible. His third violin concerto still gives pleasure especially when it is played by Mr. Thibaud, the most aristocratic of violinists now before our public. Yesterday he was recalled many times.

Mr. Burgin had firm control of the orchestra. He conducted tastefully, with spirit, with authority. The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week will be as follows: Bach, Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 for strings, Fairchild, "Chants Negres" (first time in Boston), Ravel, Bolero (first time in Boston), Schumann, Symphony, C major, No. 2.

THIBAUD SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Wetzler's "Basque Venus" an Orchestral Treat

Post Nov. 30, 1929
BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

To set forth facts, the Symphony concert of yesterday afternoon brought in Richard Burgin, concert master and assistant conductor, the first leader thus far to replace Dr. Koussevitzky this season, and in Jacques Thibaud, eminent French violinist, the first soloist to be heard in this first quarter of the 24 pairs of Symphony concerts. And to express an opinion, it also brought, in the symphonic dance from Hermann Hans Wetzler's opera, "The Basque Venus," the most arresting new piece of the year.

ENTHUSIASM IN AUDIENCE

Mr. Burgin's task in the pair of concerts he annually conducts is a difficult one. Audience and orchestra alike are more easily impressed by an "outsider" when it comes to the filling of Dr. Koussevitzky's shoes. Yet Mr. Burgin came through yesterday with flying colors. His programme, which, in addition to Wetzler's piece, listed the suite from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "Le Coq d'Or," Borodin's Second Symphony and Saint-Saëns' Third Violin Concerto, was shrewdly chosen. From first to last the orchestra responded nobly to his efforts, and the audience, as it chanced, was more consistently enthusiastic than it has been at more than one of the preceding concerts.

A goodly portion of this applause went, of course, to Mr. Thibaud, playing with familiar artistry, elegance, taste, musicianship and technical skill, the adroitly fashioned, superficially attractive music of him who has been called the French Mendelssohn.

Wetzler's Group Liked

But there was applause aplenty at the end of the concert for Wetzler's group of dances, a masterly symphonic development in the Straussian manner of tunes from the Basque country. After this brilliant, formidably difficult composition, most brilliantly played, Mr. Burgin, more than once recalled to the stage, bade his fellow musicians rise and share in the plaudits.

Cordial, too, was the reception accorded the suite in which, with Mr. Burgin as his spokesman, the grave-faced, bearded and be-spectacled Professor Rimsky narrated with the skill peculiarly his own these portions of a fable out of Russian legend, displaying to his enraptured listeners the magical and manifold tints of his orchestral palette.

Borodin's Symphony

Indeed, it was in a way no kindness to Borodin to put his symphony of Russian chivalry after the music of his more accomplished, more resourceful and musically more erudite confrere. Heard with that of Rimsky fresh in the ear, Borodin's instrumentation sounded opaque, seemed lacking in contrasts, while there is in the score little symphonic manipulation of the themes, striking enough in themselves. Only the Andante, with its haunting song of the old troubadours, harp-accompanied, today holds fast the attention.

The Russian Five were not meant to write symphonies. In the opera, the symphonic poem, the orchestral suite and the song lay the fields for their talents.

Matinee Of Thibaud And Lesser Lights

A Master-Violinist, A Lacking
Conductor, New Piece
Mishandled

UNMISTAKABLY it was Mr. Thibaud's concert at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. While the audience was cordial to Mr. Burgin, conducting as Dr. Koussevitzky's deputy, it was doubly warm toward the violinist. He was the first "assisting artist" of the season, and for such, though Dr. Koussevitzky usually banishes them, many still hanker. The Parisian, moreover, was remembered figure. Nearly every one recognized the tall, gaunt, life-worn presence when he came unobtrusively to his place beside the conductor's stand. In Saint-Saëns's Concerto in B minor—the chosen piece—the violin enters immediately. Mr. Thibaud had not played twenty measures before the familiar fineness of tone, the musical sensibility, the clear exposition, pleased and absorbed the hearer. At each pause the applause was eager; at the end long and hearty; while in it the string choir—audience of connoisseurs—quickly joined. The merciless program-book recorded the violinist as in his fiftieth year. Yet ear and hand on the one side, musical susceptibility and stylistic felicity on the other gave no sign of waning. Unlike many a violinist at middle age, Mr. Thibaud neither overdoes nor underdoes. At the golden mean he still sits in Gallic poise.

At first thought, the choice of concerto seemed disappointing. Three years ago, in Symphony Hall, Brahms's Concerto engaged Mr. Thibaud; five years back, Lalo's "Spanish Symphony"; in 1921 a Concerto of Mozart. Now he was returning to the Concerto of Saint-Saëns, in which he made his début at the Symphony Concerts, ten years since. And in these days Saint-Saëns is a demodé composer, not too often heard in his own Paris. Readers of the program-book may have smiled doubtfully when it quoted some nineteenth-century German about the "stormy" or the "intensified here and there in this Concerto minor. At the end of the nineties neither passion nor deep—as the cited Teuton also imprecisely the quality to be in Saint-Saëns's music. Yet other lasting traits still animate this Violin-Concerto.

Saint-Saëns's hand the orthom is plant not cribbing design. After measure, page after page, forward, never faltering, never. The musical content may not be able or impressive, but economical means, astute the workman. Here a scholarly detail pleases; an agreeable fancy; yet again an adroit turn or an adroit euphony. The violin shines out of the first; in the second, moves the velvet background of the finale, gives the command to the whole orchestra; there is not; but through sentiment, tempered elegance, sense of style.

Saint-Saëns put to music-paper Thibaud called to life in the concert. His tone is fine-textured, and there rough measure in the whole. His ear and hand are quick to euphonies; on Saint-Saëns's pages bound. He shades and accents sensibility and a subtlety alert to imposer's every exercise in fancy or His clearness of mind—and tone mirror to substance, shape, sentiment expanding and diversified. He the composer's economy and apt. Where Saint-Saëns writes the just Mr. Thibaud plays it with as just imposer's precision and elegance; makes both less bloodless, since in e, as so much musical sound, there giving beauty, a gently radiant measure now worn or that progression now run. And brittle never.

A better days of the Comédie-Française when a tragedy of Racine was acted, the golden mean he still sits in Gallic poise.

At first thought, the choice of concerto seemed disappointing. Three years ago, in Symphony Hall, Brahms's Concerto engaged Mr. Thibaud; five years back, Lalo's "Spanish Symphony"; in 1921 a Concerto of Mozart. Now he was returning to the Concerto of Saint-Saëns, in which he made his début at the Symphony Concerts, ten years since. And in these days Saint-Saëns is a demodé composer, not too often heard in his own Paris. Readers of the program-book may have smiled doubtfully when it quoted some nineteenth-century German about the "stormy" or the "intensified other numbers of the afternoon as fortunate. There was the new

"Symphonic Dance," for example, Wetzler's opera, "The Basque," current show-piece in many concert halls. Dr. Muck's audience in Hamburg to cheer it. Mr. Toscanini's in New York to cheer it. A showman, however, requires showmanship, who projects it—minor quality, eminences as the German or the conductor, present and serviceable, the less. It is altogether lacking in Burgin, intelligent, capable, symphonic conductor that he proved himself companionable with Saint-Saëns Thibaud.

In Basque dances, Wetzler for motifs; and they are vivid, modernist energy, he whipped the rhythm to rhythm; diversified the measures to suggest the spell, fatal, irresistible, of Venus the Peacock. He dressed these motifs, repeated, developed, in the multifarious of the modern orchestra. He polished that development in progressions, biting harmonies, discords, flicking timbres, nerve climaxes. The outcome is undoubted show-piece, but also current sense, half the concert-halls of Europe and America. We Bostonians deserved our excitement, but Mr. Burgin could not dance no displayful, nervous, vibrating will. A laggard orchestra played unjustly to composer and to audience whole went for naught.

Like misfortune overtook the personal movement from the Suite of Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "The Cockerel." The composer flings rhythms; sets instrumental colors for the more incisiveness, glare and the better. The showman's hand is essential and, for fault or merit, Mr. Burgin can not ply it. Therefore the dancing March came tamely off, while the orchestra inertia sat plain. Near the music was the deputy conductor's version of the drowsy scene in Dodon's courtyard, broken now and by distant sounds of war. Rimsky-Korsakov was master, at will, of drum harmonies, lazy rhythms, somnolent bres. He could perfume measures the heavy scents, the thick senseness, the languorous dalliance of Orient. In such music he clothes the slumbrous noontide court, dresses the queen of Shemakha, and Mr. Burgin a viable notion of it.

Again with Borodin's Second Symphony much depends upon the conductor. It was no master of symphonic development. Visions of a primitive, feudal, oriental, Russia floated in his imagination, sounded in his ears, saw boyards in concourse and at heard the chants of minstrels above the throbbing guzzli. An opera, a ballet, even a symphonic suite, might contain and unfold this dreaming. Borodin preferred a symphony, repeating the chosen motifs; making heavy-handed play with them; depending for a motion, body, surface, suggestion, upon emphatic rhythms, changing harmonies and timbres. By reiterated beat, by diversified color he would prevail. Now Borodin, with all his passionate conceiving, is no Rimsky and no Ravel at such imaginative, resourceful workmanship. He remains half-articulate and muscle-bound. The conductor must release the voice, set free the movement, disperse the monotones. In their time Dr. Muck and Dr. Koussevitzky have done what man may with this Second Symphony of Borodin. Mr. Burgin, intelligent and able musician though he is, lacks the vitalizing force, the projecting imagination to impose such a laboring music upon orchestra and audience. His error throughout the afternoon—the Concerto only excepted—was to play conductors', not composers', music.

H. T. P.

BURGIN CONDUCTS SYMPHONY CONCERT

Thibaud Applauded in Saint-Saëns Concerto

Globe — Nov. 30, 1929

Richard Burgin, concert master of the Boston Symphony, conducted yesterday's Symphony concert, making what has come to be his annual appearance in that capacity. In January, Eugene Goossens, and the Russian composer Glazunov will, it is reported, each conduct a pair of Symphony concerts as guest leaders. Dr. Koussevitzky's contract is reported to permit him to entrust not more than three of the 24 pairs of concerts to other leaders.

Yesterday the appearance as soloist of the distinguished French violinist, Jacques Thibaud, offered some compensation for the absence of Dr. Koussevitzky to those who think of concerts in terms of the notable personalities to be seen and heard. To those for whom the music is the chief thing at a concert, the admirable playing by the great orchestra under Mr. Burgin's unassuming yet thoroughly competent leadership of an interesting program was wholly satisfactory. One noted with interest, however, that a very large number of Friday subscribers had given their tickets to friends.

Mr. Thibaud's interpretation of Saint-Saëns' B minor concerto was warmly applauded. The violinist played with the type of sentiment and the suavity of style this music, essentially a salon piece, demands. For its technical exactions he was, of course, more than adequate. But Mr. Thibaud's playing of Beethoven and Brahms on former occasions, has, however, roused more heartfelt admiration in the listener.

A suite of dances from Wetzler's opera "The Basque Venus" the novelty of the afternoon proved to be effective treatments of Spanish rhythms, scored for large modern orchestra, and given a highly spiced modern harmonic flavor. The composer, who was long a resident of New York, has not heretofore been represented on Boston Symphony programs.

The dances heard yesterday are drawn from an opera based on Merimee's story "The Venus of Ille." They may well take their place in the repertory with the many pseudo-Spanish works such as Rimsky-Korsakov's "Spanish Caprice," Chabrier's "España," and Bizet's "Carmen" whose vivid rhythms and coloristic orchestration so delight audiences. Genuine Spanish music, from Vittoria to de Falla, is curiously somber and serious in tone compared to the non-Spanish composer's notions of what Spanish music should be like.

Yesterday's concert began with a suite from Rimsky-Korsakov's "Le Coq d'Or," which made one that the Chicago Civic Opera, once more possessed of a number of ballet, would produce this work, very agreeably remembered her those who saw the single performance of it given by the Metropolitan more than a decade ago. This and the "Scheherezade" suite are to prove the most enduring of Rimsky-Korsakov's many works. Mr. Burgin had the orchestra play with admirable deftness and clarity, especially in the march, which became turgid moments.

The symphony of the afternoon, Borodin's Second, is said to bear witness of Rimsky-Korsakov's talents at the work of his gifted but amateurish friends among the Russian nationalist composers. Some have in years condemned Rimsky's editing of Musorgsky's "Boris" as tasteless academic, yet, however superior original version, now published at last, may seem to the one long known in our opera houses; it is certainly to Rimsky's editing that "Boris" was the hearings that have given it worldwide fame.

Perhaps if Borodin had been able to speak for himself in the symphony heard yesterday, without the score passing as it did through the editorial hands of Rimsky and of Glazunov, his music might have had a harsher, more crabbed, more genuinely Slavic originality. As it stands, much of this symphony could easily be the work of Tchaikovsky, whom it was for a long time fashionable to run down as insufficiently Russian. Its qualities are his qualities, its defects, repetitiousness, failure to build up an imposing musical structure, and lapses into the commonplace, are his defects. The much talked of "Five" are less national than writers just before the War made them cut to be, and far less significant.

The real trouble with this Borodin symphony is that it no longer holds the listener's attention. Its theme, once piquant and exotic, is hardly startling to ears accustomed to Stravinsky and Prokofiev. Its musical ideas are not sufficiently pregnant and powerful to compel attention of themselves.

The program announced for next week includes Bach's Third "Brandenburg" Concerto; Blair Fairchild's "Chants Negres;" Ravel's much-discussed "Bolero," and Schumann's Second Symphony. Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct.

P. 7

Letters to the Editor

AS CURTAIN RAISERS

To the Editor of the Transcript:

I wonder if Dr. Koussevitzky would feel inclined to give us, now and then, a good old-fashioned overture as a curtain raiser instead of so many excerpts of ballet music? There are beautiful overtures which are rarely, almost never, heard. Take, for instance, Mendelssohn's "Fingel's Cave"; "The Midsummer Night's Dream"; Schumann's "Manfred," "Genoveva"; Weber's "Euryanthe"; "Der Freischütz"; "Oberon"; Mozart's "Figaro"; Beethoven's "Coriolan"—and in the more modern, Goldmark's "Sakuntala" and Smetana's "Bartered Bride," all beautiful, any of which would be a starter on any program. An overture is like a plate of soup, while ballet music is like a sweet which may be taken as dessert.

CLAYTON JOHNS

Boston, Dec. 2.

"Symphonic Dance," for example, Wetzler's opera, "The Basque," current show-piece in many concert halls. Dr. Muck's audience in Hamburg to cheer it. Mr. Toscanini's in New York to reverberant air. A show, however, requires showmanship who projects it—minor quality eminences as the German or the conductor, present and serviceable the less. It is altogether lacking in Burgin, intelligent, capable, symphonic conductor that he proved himself companionable with Saint-Saëns Thibaud.

In Basque dances, Wetzler for motives; and they are vivid, modernist energy, he whipped the rhythm to rhythm; diversified the measures to suggest the spell, fatal, irresistible, of Venus the Peacock. He dressed these motives, repeated, developed, in the multifarious of the modern orchestra. He polished that development in progressions, biting harmonies, discords, flicking timbres, nerve climaxes. The outcome is undoubted show-piece, but also current sense half the concert-halls of Europe America. We Bostonians deserved our excitement, but Mr. Burgin could to the dance no displayful, nervous, vivacious will. A laggard orchestra played unjustly to composer and to audience whole went for naught.

Like misfortune overtook the personal movement from the Suite of Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "The Cockerel." The composer flings rhythms; sets instrumental colors for the more incisiveness, glare and to the better. The showman's hand is essential and, for fault or merit, Mr. Burgin can not ply it. Therefore the leading March came tamely off, while the orchestra inertia sat plain. Near the music was the deputy conductor version of the drowsy scene in Dodon's courtyard, broken now and by distant sounds of war. Rimsky-Sakov was master, at will, of drum harmonies, lazy rhythms, somnolent bres. He could perfume measures the heavy scents, the thick senseness, the languorous dalliance of Orient. In such music he clothes the slumbrous noontide court, dresses the queen of Shemakha, and Mr. Burgin a viable notion of it.

Again with Borodin's Second Symphony much depends upon the conductor. Dr. Muck was no master of symphonic development. Visions of a primitive, feudal, oriental, Russia floated in his imagination, sounded in his ears, saw boyards in concourse and at heard the chants of minstrels above the throbbing guzzl. An opera, a ballet, even a symphonic suite, might contain and unfold this dreaming. Borodin preferred a symphony, repeating the chosen motives; making heavy-handed play with them; depending for a motion, body, surface, suggestion, upon emphatic rhythms, changing harmonies and timbres. By reiterated beat, by diversified color he would prevail. Now Borodin, with all his passionate conceiving, is no Rimsky and no Ravel at such imaginative, resourceful workmanship. He remains half-articulate and muscle-bound. The conductor must release the voice, set free the movement, disperse the monotonies. In their time Dr. Muck and Dr. Koussevitzky have done what man may with this Second Symphony of Borodin. Mr. Burgin, intelligent and able musician though he is, lacks the vitalizing force, the projecting imagination to impose such a laboring music upon orchestra and audience. His error throughout the afternoon—the Concerto only excepted—was to play conductors', not composers', music.

H. T. P.

BURGIN CONDUCTS SYMPHONY CONCERT

Thibaud Applauded in Saint-Saens Concerto

Globe — Nov. 30, 1929

Richard Burgin, concert master of the Boston Symphony, conducted yesterday's Symphony concert, making what has come to be his annual appearance in that capacity. In January, Eugene Goossens, and the Russian composer Glazunov will, it is reported, each conduct a pair of Symphony concerts as guest leaders. Dr. Koussevitzky's contract is reported to permit him to entrust not more than three of the 24 pairs of concerts to other leaders.

Yesterday the appearance as soloist of the distinguished French violinist, Jacques Thibaud, offered some compensation for the absence of Dr. Koussevitzky to those who think of concerts in terms of the notable personalities to be seen and heard. To those for whom the music is the chief thing at a concert, the admirable playing by the great orchestra under Mr. Burgin's unassuming yet thoroughly competent leadership of an interesting program was wholly satisfactory. One noted with interest, however, that a very large number of Friday subscribers had given their tickets to friends.

Mr. Thibaud's interpretation of Saint-Saens' B minor concerto was warmly applauded. The violinist played with the type of sentiment and the suavity of style this music, essentially a salon piece, demands. For its technical exactions he was, of course, more than adequate. But Mr. Thibaud's playing of Beethoven and Brahms on former occasions, has, however, roused more heartfelt admiration in the listener.

A suite of dances from Wetzler's opera "The Basque Venus" the novelty of the afternoon proved to be effective treatments of Spanish rhythms, scored for large modern orchestra, and given a highly spiced modern harmonic flavor. The composer, who was long a resident of New York, has not heretofore been represented on Boston Symphony programs.

The dances heard yesterday are drawn from an opera based on Merimee's story "The Venus of Ille." They may well take their place in the repertory with the many pseudo-Spanish works such as Rimsky-Korsakov's "Spanish Caprice," Chabrier's "España," and Bizet's "Carmen" whose vivid rhythms and coloristic orchestration so delight audiences. Genuine Spanish music, from Vittoria to de Falla, is curiously somber and serious in tone compared to the non-Spanish composer's notions of what Spain in music should be like.

Yesterday's concert began with a suite from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera "Le Coq d'Or," which made one wish that the Chicago Civic Opera, now once more possessed of a numerous ballet, would produce this work, still very agreeably remembered here by those who saw the single performance of it given by the Metropolitan Opera more than a decade ago. This opera and the "Scheherazade" suite are likely to prove the most enduring of Rimsky-Korsakov's many works. Mr. Burgin had the orchestra play with an admirable deftness and clarity, except in the march, which became turgid at moments.

The symphony of the afternoon, Borodin's Second, is said to bear marks of Rimsky-Korsakov's talents at editing the work of his gifted but amateurish friends among the Russian nationalist composers. Some have in recent years condemned Rimsky's editing of Musorgsky's "Boris" as tasteless and academic, yet, however superior the original version, now published at last, may seem to the one long known in our opera houses; it is certainly to Rimsky's editing that "Boris" was the hearings that have given it world-wide fame.

Perhaps if Borodin had been able to speak for himself in the symphony heard yesterday, without the score passing as it did through the editorial hands of Rimsky and of Glazunov, his music might have had a harsher, more crabbed, more genuinely Slavic originality. As it stands, much of this symphony could easily be the work of Tchaikovsky, whom it was for a long time fashionable to run down as insufficiently Russian. Its qualities are his qualities, its defects, repetitiousness, failure to build up an imposing musical structure, and lapses into the commonplace, are his defects. The much talked of "Five" are less national than writers just before the War made them cut to be, and far less significant.

The real trouble with this Borodin symphony is that it no longer holds the listener's attention. Its lion, once piquant and exotic, is hardly startling to ears accustomed to Stravinsky and Prokofieff. Its musical ideas are not sufficiently pregnant and powerful to compel attention of themselves.

The program announced for next week includes Bach's Third "Brandenburg" Concerto; Blair Fairchild's "Chants Negres;" Ravel's much-discussed "Bolero," and Schumann's Second Symphony. Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct.

P. 7.

To the Editor

STAIN RAISERS

of the Transcript:

Dr. Koussevitzky would give us, now and then, an overture as a curtain of so many excerpts of There are beautiful overtures rarely, almost never, for instance, Mendelssohn's "The Midsummer Night's Dream," "Manfred," "Genoa," "Euryanthe," "Der Freischütz"; Mozart's "Figaro"; "Don Giovanni"—and in the more mark's "Sakuntala" and "The Merry Widow," all beautiful which would be a starter on An overture is like a plate of ballet music is like a sweet taken as dessert.

CLAYTON JOHNS

2.

Jazz and the Symphony Orchestra

By ERWIN STEIN

Monitor, Nov. 30. Vienna
FEW institutions are as conservative as the Symphony Orchestra. For a century and more its composition has remained, generally speaking, unaltered. Of course the number of players has been increased, the technique of playing has in many cases improved. But on the other hand, the number of new instruments admitted has been very small indeed; and the new instruments are all similar to instruments which it included previously. Such is the case with the cor anglais, which is similar to the oboe, and with the bass clarinet.

The circumstances owing to which this conservative tendency came into being and endured are of various orders. To begin with, the orchestra, as it stood, corresponded with the ideals of composers in the matter of both quality and volume of tone. It commanded a wealth of colors, included instruments representing every region of pitch, every dynamic degree, every conceivable kind of musical character. It included mobile, nimble instruments and heavy instruments; instruments suited for melody and instruments suited to rhythmic pulsation; similar instruments and strongly contrasting instruments. In short, it seemed as though anything and everything could be expressed in the medium which it constituted.

Progress of Instrumentation

In proportion as styles changed from the time of Beethoven onward, the art of instrumentation progressed. The instruments which Mozart had used, re-arranged according to Wagner's conception of scoring, form the setting of the "Meistersinger." The jolly horn of "Till Eulenspiegel" sounds far different from the romantic horn in Weber's "Freischütz"; and again the impressionist horns in Debussy's music are quite another thing. Since instruments, taken singly, provide such a wide range of possibilities, it is natural that the possibilities of the orchestra as a whole should appear inexhaustible.

In spite of the great variations of style observable in the music of the past 150 years, there is one idiosyncrasy which must be acknowledged as common to all stages of evolution during that period: all the voices and timbres of the orchestra were conceived by composers as working in co-operation, and treated so as to merge, for the listeners' ear, into one "tone-compound." What listeners heard was, in the last resort, one melody with one background of chords or of harmonic accompanying patterns. Contrapuntal designs occurred as exceptions only. For the purposes of this harmonic music, the smooth balance of the traditional orchestra provided an altogether ideal medium. It not only held contrasts of tone within it, but the very way in which it was constituted made it possible to reduce all these contrasts to a unity of some kind.

A New Ideal

But nowadays it seems as though, gradually, a new ideal were asserting itself in the matter of tone-manipulation, and exercising a definite influence upon the hitherto conservative symphony orchestra. And in this respect, we must take into account the appearance on the one hand of the chamber orchestra, which tends to emphasize not harmonic tone, but melodic lines; and on the other hand of the jazz band, in which the fundamental is rhythm.

It is the same composer, Arnold Schönberg, who in the year 1900 in his "Gurrelieder" increased the old orchestra to the number of 140 players (including eight flutes and seven trombones) and who six years later instituted, in his "Chamber Symphony" for 15 solo instruments (10 wind and five blow instruments) the type of the modern chamber orchestra. But another 15 years were to elapse before this type came into favor.

The chamber orchestra is not endowed with as smooth a balance as the full orchestra. But it corresponds to a music in which all parts move far more independently than in the older type of setting, which was in the main purely homophonic. In the old orchestra, a good many of the instruments had nothing to play but accompaniment patterns: but in the chamber orchestra, every single instrument is, as a rule, intrusted with a melodic design. The music written for it is not conceived as a whole whose parts have to merge into a unity. Quite on the contrary, each part must stand out, distinguishable from every other part, so that the ear may perceive them simultaneously yet separately.

In order to achieve this end, it was necessary to decide upon this restriction of the number of instruments used—and, first and foremost, upon the number of the bow instruments: for if the setting comprises many of these, their tone will unavoidably tend to blend and to blur the tone of the wind instruments.

The Effect of Jazz

And there are other idiosyncrasies in the full orchestra which tend to produce similar results and for this reason must be done away with in the chamber orchestra. For instance, the use of several instruments of the same kind. It is indeed quite natural that one individual should stand out more clearly among other individuals than one pair stands out among other pairs. And in the chamber orchestra, sharpness of design is the first requirement.

But all this does not mean that there is a fear lest the chamber orchestra may do away with the full orchestra. All the possibilities of the small orchestra are included in the full orchestra; and at any time a composer, even within the bounds of one work, is free, according to his requirements, to detach from the main body a chamber orchestra of any dimension he pleases and to use this in contrast with the full orchestra—as, in fact, Alban Berg has done in his "Wozzek." Moreover, by resorting to the chamber orchestra, composers have mastered the fundamental idea which small settings embody, and have learned to impart independence to the individual parts of the full orchestra.

It is extremely probable that jazz and the technique of jazz will affect the constitution of the symphony orchestra more and more. It is impossible to deny that jazz draws upon many components which the evolution of European music does not tend to exclude. When Anton Webern heard a jazz band for the first time, he exclaimed: "Fine! very fine! But I started scoring in this very way 15 years ago." He was referring to the use of the muffled tone of the muted trumpet and trombone, and to the treatment of each part as an independent solo part.

The Saxophone

And even in Mahler's music all sorts of things that make us think of jazz are to be encountered: for instance the treatment of the percussion instruments. I am convinced that in many respects jazz music and jazz technique will lead to a lasting enrichment of the orchestra. It has turned the unwieldy brass instruments into instruments capable of agility and of giving out melodies, because it has led to their size being reduced. The ensuing disadvantage is that they no longer provide the volume of tone which the big brasses of Wagner's orchestra provided. But there is ample compensation in the fact that their general usefulness is greatly increased.

The saxophone is a most valuable acquisition for the orchestra, for it is beautiful in quality, easy to play, and extraordinarily useful. It appears in the setting of most of the operas and of any symphonic works written of late years; and recently Schönberg, Alban Berg and Franz Schreker have used it. It is likely that in a very few years it will have become part and parcel of the symphony orchestra.

In my opinion, another feature of jazz technique, the compulsory change from one instrument to another, is particularly important. If every player had to be capable of handling various instruments and of passing from the one to the other in the course of the performance of one piece, it stands to reason that composers would find the problem of laying out their scores far easier to solve.

There are, it is true, temporary difficulties in the way. The instrumentalists of our present symphony orchestras could hardly start learning the technique of instruments new to them. But in schools of music, the attempt could certainly be made to instruct pupils, from the outset, in the playing of several instruments.

Mr. JOSEPH JACQUES THIBAUD, violinist, was born at Bordeaux, France, on September 27, 1880. Until he was thirteen years old, he was taught by his father. Entering the Paris Conservatory he took lessons of Martin Marsick, and in 1896 was awarded a first prize. (First prizes were also awarded that year to Messrs. Sechiari and Monteux, pupils of Berthelier, and Soudant, pupil of Lefort.) Thibaud's brother, Joseph Charles, born at Bordeaux on February 25, 1875, took a first prize at the Paris Conservatory for piano-playing in 1892. Another brother, Henri Bernard, a violoncellist, and a student at the Paris Conservatory, was born at Bordeaux on July 8, 1877.

In his twelfth year, Mr. Thibaud had played in public at Angers. In Paris he had become known by his brilliant solos at the Café Rouge in the rue de Tournon, frequented by Conservatory pupils, who were in the habit of playing there in ensemble and as soloists. He joined Colonne's orchestra in 1897 and in 1898 became the solo violinist of that orchestra. In 1899-1900 he appeared as a virtuoso in towns of France, and at Brussels, Mannheim, and Geneva; in 1901 at Berlin, Amsterdam, Lisbon; in 1902-03 in Russia, the Scandinavian countries, Roumania, Italy, Spain.

His first appearance in Boston was on November 7, 1903, when he played César Franck's sonata with André Benôist, and pieces by Bach, Saint-Saëns, Vieuxtemps, Marsick, and Wieniawski. A second visit to this country was made in 1913-14 and on December 28, 1913, Mr. Thibaud gave a concert with Mr. Bauer in Symphony Hall. He gave a concert with Carlos Salzedo, harpist, in Jordan Hall, January 31, 1914.

When the war broke out, he went into active service. Late in 1916 he was given leave of absence from the French Army on account of injuries received while on duty in the trenches. He played in Boston with George Copeland in a concert at Symphony Hall, December 24, 1916. On April 2, 1917, he gave a concert with Mr. Bauer in Jordan Hall.

He gave other concerts later with Mme. Novaes, Mr. Bauer, Mr. Cortot. He has played at concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston:

- 1919. April 4, Saint-Saën's Concerto, B minor, No. 3.
- 1921. February 18, Mozart's Concerto, E-flat major.
- 1924. February 15, Lalo's Symphonie Espagnole.
- 1926. January 15, Brahms's violin concerto.

DEC 6, 1929 Tue
For Cantabrigians

LAST evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra again journeyed to Cambridge to give a concert in Sanders Theater at Harvard. Then and there it played two pieces from the orchestral repertory of the past two months, two pieces also which stand upon the Boston programs of today and tomorrow—Bach's "Brandenburg" concerto No. 3 for strings, Schumann's symphony in C major, Ravel's "Mother Goose" suite, Strauss's rondo, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

For beginning Dr. Koussevitzky grouped strings around him in a great half-circle for the playing of Bach's hearty concerto. Two movements there are, both in rapid tempi. The second proceeds at greater speed, more fleetly, than the first. To hear Bach thus employing strings is to marvel at the mountains of sonority which it is possible to draw from this single orchestral choir, at the kaleidoscopic variety of tonal quality which it yields. A limited palette, but what a multitude of glistening, sparkling tints! Again, to hear Bach with this concerto is not to witness a juggler playing with a bag of contrapuntal tricks, but to hear a master of an elaborate language speaking that language with ease, with fluency, with eloquent resourcefulness. Finally, to hear Dr. Koussevitzky and his men with this music is to experience again the joys of living as expressed by this master of a by-gone day.

Schumann's symphony in C major comes to the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as relative novelty. Not since the second year of Mr. Monteux's regime has it been heard. One singles out particularly vivacious scherzo, exceedingly characteristic of one aspect of Schumann's writing; an Adagio which in its expressive principal theme is epitome of Schumann the romanticist. Further it is hardly to the point to anticipate the performance and the review of the concerts of today and tomorrow.

As always, Ravel's suite of "My Mother the Goose," as the French will have it, gave pleasure. "Five Children's Pieces" is sub-title. Whether the children which Ravel has in mind are too sophisticated to be real children, as is sometimes said, is beside the point. Any child will enjoy the squeaking little voice of "Hop o' My Thumb," or the exotic jangle and the hearty tune of the Empress of the Pagodas, or the objectively pictured conversations of Beauty and the Beast, or the splendors of the Fairy Garden. But mostly, children are not called upon to hear these pieces. And for us adults they are unalloyed delight. At least as we hear them from the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Dr. Koussevitzky's version of "Till Eulenspiegel" is a masterpiece of interpretative characterization. Strauss's humors are many and various in this tone poem. Not one of them is clouded, not one of them vague or pointless as we hear them in this season of 1929-30. And the hearer who does not chuckle or at least feel inward amusement is dull or listless hearer indeed. The bright gleam on many a face in this Cantabrigian audience gave sufficient proof that such hearers are in the minority in the university city. A. H. M.

FORTY-NINTH SEASON, NINETEEN HUNDRED TWENTY-NINE AND THIRTY

Seventh Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, DECEMBER 6, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, DECEMBER 7, at 8.15 o'clock

J. S. Bach Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 in G major,
for String Orchestra

- I. Allegro moderato.
- II. Allegro.

Fairchild "Chants Nègres"
Vivo, ma non troppo—Molto Andante—Allegro—Teneroso—
Lento—Vivo, ma non troppo
(First performance)

Ravel "Bolero"
(First performance in Boston)

Schumann Symphony No. 2 in C major, Op. 61

- I. Sostenuto assai; Allegro ma non troppo.
- II. Scherzo; Allegro vivace: Trio (1), Trio (2).
- III. Adagio espressivo.
- IV. Allegro molto vivace.

STEINWAY PIANO USED

There will be an intermission before the symphony

The works to be played at these concerts may be seen in the Allen A. Brown Music Collection of the Boston Public Library one week before the concert

Dec 6, 1929
For Cantabrigians

LAST evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra again journeyed to Cambridge to give a concert in Sanders Theater at Harvard. Then and there it played two pieces from the orchestral repertory of the past two months, two pieces also which stand upon the Boston programs of today and tomorrow—Bach's "Brandenburg" concerto No. 3 for strings, Schumann's symphony in C major, Ravel's "Mother Goose" suite, Strauss's rondo, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

For beginning Dr. Koussevitzky grouped strings around him in a great half-circle for the playing of Bach's hearty concerto. Two movements there are, both in rapid tempi. The second proceeds at greater speed, more fleetly, than the first. To hear Bach thus employing strings is to marvel at the mountains of sonority which it is possible to draw from this single orchestral choir, at the kaleidoscopic variety of tonal quality which it yields. A limited palette, but what a multitude of glistening, sparkling tints! Again, to hear Bach with this concerto is not to witness a juggler playing with a bag of contrapuntal tricks, but to hear a master of an elaborate language speaking that language with ease, with fluency, with eloquent resourcefulness. Finally, to hear Dr. Koussevitzky and his men with this music is to experience again the joys of living as expressed by this master of a by-gone day.

Schumann's symphony in C major comes to the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as relative novelty. Not since the second year of Mr. Monteux's regime has it been heard. One singles out particularly vivacious scherzo, exceedingly characteristic of one aspect of Schumann's writing; an Adagio which in its expressive principal theme is epitome of Schumann the romanticist. Further it is hardly to the point to anticipate the performance and the review of the concerts of today and tomorrow.

As always, Ravel's suite of "My Mother the Goose," as the French will have it, gave pleasure. "Five Children's Pieces" is sub-title. Whether the children which Ravel has in mind are too sophisticated to be real children, as is sometimes said, is beside the point. Any child will enjoy the squeaking little voice of "Hop o' My Thumb," or the exotic jangle and the hearty tune of the Empress of the Pagodas, or the objectively pictured conversations of Beauty and the Beast, or the splendors of the Fairy Garden. But mostly, children are not called upon to hear these pieces. And for us adults they are unalloyed delight. At least as we hear them from the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Dr. Koussevitzky's version of "Till Eulenspiegel" is a masterpiece of interpretative characterization. Straussian humors are many and various in this tone poem. Not one of them is clouded, not one of them vague or pointless as we hear them in this season of 1929-30. And the hearer who does not chuckle or at least feel inward amusement is dull or listless hearer indeed. The bright gleam on many a face in this Cantabrigian audience gave sufficient proof that such hearers are in the minority in the university city.

A. H. M.

FORTY-NINTH SEASON, NINETEEN HUNDRED TWENTY-NINE AND THIRTY

Seventh Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, DECEMBER 6, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, DECEMBER 7, at 8.15 o'clock

J. S. Bach Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 in G major,
for String Orchestra

- I. Allegro moderato.
- II. Allegro.

Fairchild "Chants Nègres"
Vivo, ma non troppo—Molto Andante—Allegro—Teneroso—
Lento—Vivo, ma non troppo
(First performance)

Ravel "Bolero"
(First performance in Boston)

Schumann Symphony No. 2 in C major, Op. 61

- I. Sostenuto assai; Allegro ma non troppo.
- II. Scherzo; Allegro vivace: Trio (1), Trio (2).
- III. Adagio espressivo.
- IV. Allegro molto vivace.

STEINWAY PIANO USED

There will be an intermission before the symphony

The works to be played at these concerts may be seen in the Allen A. Brown Music Collection of the Boston Public Library one week before the concert

Maurice Ravel, dean of the moderns in French musical composition, busy in Chicago, where he arrived to conduct the Chicago Symphony Orchestra in a program of his orchestral compositions.

(Underwood & Underwood)

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, gave the seventh concert of the present season yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Bach, Brandenburg Concerto, No. 3, Fairchild, "Chants Negres" (first performance). Ravel, Bolero (first time in Boston). Schumann, Symphony, C major, No. 2. Mr. Theodorowicz was the concert master in Mr. Burgin's absence.

Mr. Fairchild's "Chants Negres" was originally a piano piece. Orchestrated, it is not a favorable example of a class of musical compositions thought by purists to be ignoble, or at least unworthy of a place on the program of a symphony concert. It all depends on whether these compositions are musically interesting even when they are rhythmically exciting. Mr. Fairchild took some old airs—he cannot remember the titles of the songs nor were they all familiar to the audience yesterday—took them, exposed them in a row and dressed them more or less fantastically but without conspicuous skill in harmonic or orchestral invention, though he once in a sentimental section obtained a pleasing effect by the use of the lower notes of flutes. The composer apparently wished to be aggressively modern. His work is episodic—perhaps he intended it to be. The songs might have been bound together by more interesting measures, and have had a more rhapsodic setting. The technical crudeness, the lack of coherency in the planning and the ineffectual straining after effect were all too evident. Yet Mr. Fairchild wrote a bravura cadenza for clarinet which gave Mr. Hamelin an opportunity to show his skill, and for that one was grateful.

Ravel's "Bolero" is an amazing tour de force with a stroke of genius, viz., the unexpected fortissimo modulation near the end. The side drum at the beginning gives the rhythm and maintains it through the long crescendo. Is the theme, repeated endlessly in the same key (until the modulation) Ravel's, or was he indebted to some Spanish or Biscayan tune? It is not one of special significance; it cannot be called strikingly piquant or sensuous at the first hearing; but after solo instruments follow the flute in playing it, after it is heard from groups of instruments and finally from the whole orchestra, one finds Ravel's use of it as extraordinarily effective as it is ingenious. Monotony when it serves a master is exciting. Even the endless repetition of a folk tune, especially an oriental one, or the constant rhythm given out by a percussion instrument, as drums in Africa which have so strongly affected travellers; or the steady beating of the drum in the trio of the "Pathetic" symphony's second movement, or dripping of water at regular intervals—all these play on the nerves and more or less excite. A long crescendo of music in one and the same key was employed by composers long before Ravel was born. Rossini, before him Jomelli (they say), knew the power of a long crescendo; Rossini used the same form of it indifferently for Don Basilio expatiating on the growth and spread of a slanderous report, and for the entrance of Othello bent on murdering the fair Desdemona. But no one has so cunningly directed the march of a crescendo, so varied and ornamented a simple figure as Ravel in this "Bolero." It would be idle to ask whether this dance has great musical value. It certainly excites and in a genuinely and uncommonly musical manner. This was proved yesterday when a roar of applause followed the final chord and was long continued; when the audience, not content with furious clapping of hands, stamped on the floor. One would not have been surprised to hear shrill whistling in approval or noisy squeals of joy from floor and balconies.

Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra thus triumphed gloriously in the production of the "Bolero." A loftier, a more purely musical triumph was the incomparable performance of Schumann's second symphony, which as often interpreted without poetic feeling and played perfunctorily in the past, seemed the least interesting, the least inspired of Schumann's four. Yesterday there was a revelation. The strings in years past would not have had the crispness, the clearness, the swiftness in expression that yesterday characterized the Scherzo, nor had the Adagio been sung with such tenderness, beauty, eloquence as it was under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction. And so there was fresh life and strength given to the other movements that are not to be ranked with those already mentioned. The familiar concerto of Bach was played with tonal sturdiness alternating with a sparkling lightness; played in a spirit of enthusiasm that still cared for clarity and contrast in details.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week will be as follows: Weber, Overture to "Euryanthe." Arnold Bax, Symphony No. 2 (first performance). Liszt, Piano concerto, No. 1 (Jose Iturbi, pianist). Respighi, "The Pines of Rome."

Maurice Ravel, dean of the moderns in French musical composition, busy in Chicago, where he arrived to conduct the Chicago Symphony Orchestra in a program of his orchestral compositions.

(Underwood & Underwood)

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, gave the seventh concert of the present season yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Bach, Brandenburg Concerto, No. 3, Fairchild, "Chants Negres" (first performance). Ravel, Bolero (first time in Boston). Schumann, Symphony, C major, No. 2. Mr. Theodorowicz was the concert master in Mr. Burgin's absence.

Mr. Fairchild's "Chants Negres" was originally a piano piece. Orchestrated, it is not a favorable example of a class of musical compositions thought by purists to be ignoble, or at least unworthy of a place on the program of a symphony concert. It all depends on whether these compositions are musically interesting even when they are rhythmically exciting. Mr. Fairchild took some old airs—he cannot remember the titles of the songs nor were they all familiar to the audience yesterday—took them, exposed them in a row and dressed them more or less fantastically but without conspicuous skill in harmonic or orchestral invention, though he once in a sentimental section obtained a pleasing effect by the use of the lower notes of flutes. The composer apparently wished to be aggressively modern. His work is episodic—perhaps he intended it to be. The songs might have been bound together by more interesting measures, and have had a more rhapsodic setting. The technical crudeness, the lack of coherency in the planning and the ineffectual straining after effect were all too evident. Yet Mr. Fairchild wrote a bravura cadenza for clarinet which gave Mr. Hamelin an opportunity to show his skill, and for that one was grateful.

Ravel's "Bolero" is an amazing tour de force with a stroke of genius, viz., the unexpected fortissimo modulation near the end. The side drum at the beginning gives the rhythm and maintains it through the long crescendo. Is the theme, repeated endlessly in the same key (until the modulation) Ravel's, or was he indebted to some Spanish or Biscayan tune? It is not one of special significance; it cannot be called strikingly piquant or sensuous at the first hearing; but after solo instruments follow the flute in playing it, after it is heard from groups of instruments and finally from the whole orchestra, one finds Ravel's use of it as extraordinarily effective as it is ingenious. Monotony when it serves a master is exciting. Even the endless repetition of a folk tune, especially an oriental one, or the constant rhythm given out by a percussion instrument, as drums in Africa which have so strongly affected travellers; or the steady beating of the drum in the trio of the "Pathetic" symphony's second movement, or dripping of water at regular intervals—all these play on the nerves and more or less excite. A long crescendo of music in one and the same key was employed by composers long before Ravel was born. Rossini, before him Jomelli (they say), knew the power of a long crescendo; Rossini used the same form of it indifferently for Don Basilio expatiating on the growth and spread of a slanderous report, and for the entrance of Othello bent on murdering the fair Desdemona. But no one has so cunningly directed the march of a crescendo, so varied and ornamented a simple figure as Ravel in this "Bolero." It would be idle to ask whether this dance has great musical value. It certainly excites and in a genuinely and uncommonly musical manner. This was proved yesterday when a roar of applause followed the final chord and was long continued; when the audience, not content with furious clapping of hands, stamped on the floor. One would not have been surprised to hear shrill whistling in approval or noisy squeals of joy from floor and balconies.

Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra thus triumphed gloriously in the production of the "Bolero." A loftier, a more purely musical triumph was the incomparable performance of Schumann's second symphony, which as often interpreted without poetic feeling and played perfunctorily in the past, seemed the least interesting, the least inspired of Schumann's four. Yesterday there was a revelation. The strings in years past would not have had the crispness, the clearness, the swiftness in expression that yesterday characterized the Scherzo, nor had the Adagio been sung with such tenderness, beauty, eloquence as it was under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction. And so there was fresh life and strength given to the other movements that are not to be ranked with those already mentioned. The familiar concerto of Bach was played with tonal sturdiness alternating with a sparkling lightness; played in a spirit of enthusiasm that still cared for clarity and contrast in details.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week will be as follows: Weber, Overture to "Euryanthe." Arnold Bax, Symphony No. 2 (first performance). Liszt, Piano concerto, No. 1 (Jose Iturbi, pianist). Respighi, "The Pines of Rome."

CHEERS HEARD AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Ravel's New Bolero Makes
a Sensation

Conservative Audience Stirred by
Modernist Piece of Music

Ravel's new Bolero, the latest work of the celebrated French modernist composer, played at yesterday's Symphony concert for the first time in Boston, caused a demonstration such as no piece of music, new or old, has hitherto elicited from the Friday subscribers. They clapped it loud and long. Many in the audience banged their seats up and down. There were even a few cheers. The only comparable incident in the past 20 years, and perhaps in the whole history of these concerts, now in their 49th season, was the great demonstration two years ago at the Boston debut of the pianist Horowitz.

Those familiar with the atmosphere at these Friday afternoon concerts, which are attended for the most part by socially prominent women, will realize how very extraordinary an event yesterday's demonstration was. An audience in which white-haired women are in a majority, where mild and decorous handclapping is the only usual method of showing enthusiasm, actually tried to behave like a football crowd, and over what?

Why, over one of those modernist pieces about which Dr. Koussevitzky and the management of the orchestra are said to receive hundreds of protests from outraged subscribers whenever the conductor puts one on a program. One turns for a parallel to memories of the amazing events of Nov. 11, 1918, when, for instance, a little group of these same women were observed marching up West st in Boston each beating lustily on a tin dishpan.

The piece that loosed this strange tumult of approval was written two years ago for the noted dancer, Ida Rubinstein, and enthusiastically received by her Parisian audiences. The concert version of it heard yesterday made a similar sensation in the audience the other day in New York, when Mr. Toscanini conducted it at a concert of the New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra.

A bolero is, of course, a Spanish dance, with a characteristic, strongly

marked simple rhythm. Ravel's bolero, according to an able technical analysis of the score made by A. H. Meyer, is built up of two musical sentences, each composed of an eight-measure phrase and a nine-measure phrase, with a single measure of interlude between the sentences. These sentences are built up into a musical paragraph containing 72 measures, which is repeated four times with increasingly intense and sonorous orchestration, leading up to a brief and brilliant closing climax. The construction and workmanship of this bolero are masterly. No more cleverly written piece of music exists.

The whole piece is one long crescendo. Its foundation is a constantly beating rhythm in the drums, which of itself would almost, as the drum in O'Neill's play, "The Emperor Jones," does, sustain the mood of suspense and nervous tension. Over this are heard monotonous snatches of melody from different instruments. At a first hearing one almost overlooks the contrasting themes revealed by study of the score, so overwhelming is the cumulative effect of the numerous repetitions.

The piece is an assault on the nervous system of the listener, subtle and brutal. It depends for its effect chiefly on the fact, a commonplace of musical psychology, that the ear is peculiarly sensitive to emphatic repetitions of strong, simply grouped stresses. The third movement of Tchaikowsky's "Pathetic Symphony" and the drum beat underlying the middle section of the second movement of that symphony are well-known musical examples of the same psychological phenomenon. But Ravel is a subtler musician than Tchaikowsky, and possessed of a more fastidious taste. He is also a better musical craftsman.

For an analogy to this piece let us turn to Poe's tales of horror, which still affect strongly even a reader familiar with Poe's cold-blooded explanation of just how he set about getting his effects. This sort of thing succeeds in being thrilling, but can hardly be deemed the highest form of art.

Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra made the most of the remarkable opportunity Ravel's musical tour de force afforded them.

The other novelty of the afternoon, Blair Fairchild's orchestral arrangement of his "Chants Negres," written for the piano, was eclipsed by the Ravel. It is, however, well written and interesting, if wholly artificial, music in the modern manner.

Bach's Third Brandenburg Concerto, which began the concert, has a vitality, a rhythmic urge, more profoundly and permanently moving than the cleverly calculated musical thriller of Ravel. Schumann's Second Symphony, the other number on the program, was given an eloquent if not always wholly accurate performance.

P. R.

Pleasures from The Symphonic Day and Scene

Return of Dr. Koussevitzky, Ravel's "Bolero" Stirs
Excitements

IN Carnegie Hall, when Mr. Toscanini and his orchestra played Ravel's "Bolero" for the first time in New York, some, excited beyond restraint, rose and shouted. In Symphony Hall, yesterday afternoon, when Dr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra played the piece for the first time in Boston, as many, similarly excited, sat and stamped. In New York, keen ears detected a few hisses interposed; in Boston, if there were any, none pierced the circumambient din. Since the Friday of Horowitz's debut as pianist, no such torrents of applause have swept over Symphony Hall, to toss up orchestra and conductor as on the crest of a wave. More interesting to watch and feel was the mounting tension through the audience, as Ravel reiterated his Bolero-rhythm above a changeless chord; repeated his twofold dance-melody unvaried in intervals, key and pitch; dressed it in vividder and vividder instrumental colors, ever ampler or more diverse; drove and measured it up an unbroken crescendo twenty minutes long, until the concert-hall throbbed with that Spanish tune and with it all the air was pungent. A glance—and some were sitting with rigid bodies. Another glance—and some were clenching hands as though the sounds irresistibly tautened them. A third—and a few seemed nervously trying to break through a spell no longer to be endured. Then—is it eleven measures from the end?—the snapping of the tension by a stroke of imagination that also may be stroke of genius—a modulation into the flaming key of E major; a final blazing tumult; the instant's pause before the floodgate of release is opened. For once, in Symphony Hall on a Friday, a scene for description.

By this time, everyone who keeps pace with the world knows the story of "Bolero," how Ida Rubinstein, the Parisian mime and dancer, commissioned pieces for an impending tour from Parisian composers, Ravel in; how he wrote his dance and held his tongue, as did hers in preparation and rehearsal; how on an evening vember of last year at the Opéra slipped to silence and then to an audience all unaware; how rang with that experience, and after European city after European now New York took up the running now Boston joins the hue and cry. It better or worse brought to voice mphony Hall than in other celebrated concert-rooms? If worse, then illous must have been performed elsewhere.

a detail escaped Dr. Koussevitzky ears as chose to hear. He beat rhythm hard, bright, tense, unmitigated. He flung the sinuous dance-melody with high relief, yet without variation or w of turning. On the instant he a new timbre flash; a new group the unescapable tune. Ravel's bass-Dr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra Ravel's insidious clarinet, Ravel's played the piece for the first time in nt saxophones, darted at the ear. Boston, as many, similarly excited, power to power; the crescendo asat and stamped. In New York, d unrelaxed, suspensive, clamant. keen ears detected a few hisses intere modulation, with a great sweep posed; in Boston, if there were any, none arms, like a magician smashing his pierced the circumambient din. Since crystal into a hundred glittering the Friday of Horowitz's debut as pianist, ents, the conductor released the no such torrents of applause have swept whirl. . . . The smoky room was over Symphony Hall, to toss up orchesd; the woman no longer danced tra and conductor as on the crest of a the table; from hands to hands the wave. More interesting to watch and had ceased to toss her. They had feel was the mounting tension through sheathed their knives.

ple—from composer, conductor, stra—proceeded this magical tour orce. For no other phrase so y fits it. Spell-like it plays upon rs; holds them under a magic of changeful and the changeless; in animous frenzy cuts them free. It s upon the aural nerves; produces cal as well as mental sensation. the spell, if one likes, of a mechanage. But is a composer to be rehed because he is of his own time an ply his particular magic? Conalso the magician's skill, to stabilize melody—shape, substance, course; btillize a seeming rhythmic directto choose, place and adjust the hanging instrumental vesture upon crescendo in ceaseless motion; to and set alight the breaking point. skill merely, or only resource; but nation edging close to genius, dry, narrow, again if one likes, all wit all style, but genius none the less. age in a Spanish dance-tune and a le of craft, with Ravel at five-andto put it there. Merlin is precedent dlerly necromancers.

CHEERS HEARD AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Ravel's New Bolero Makes
a Sensation

Conservative Audience Stirred by
Modernist Piece of Music

Ravel's new Bolero, the latest work of the celebrated French modernist composer, played at yesterday's Symphony concert for the first time in Boston, caused a demonstration such as no piece of music, new or old, has hitherto elicited from the Friday subscribers. They clapped it loud and long. Many in the audience banged their seats up and down. There were even a few cheers. The only comparable incident in the past 20 years, and perhaps in the whole history of these concerts, now in their 49th season, was the great demonstration two years ago at the Boston debut of the pianist Horowitz.

Those familiar with the atmosphere at these Friday afternoon concerts, which are attended for the most part by socially prominent women, will realize how very extraordinary an event yesterday's demonstration was. An audience in which white-haired women are in a majority, where mild and decorous handclapping is the only usual method of showing enthusiasm, actually tried to behave like a football crowd, and over what?

Why, over one of those modernist pieces about which Dr. Koussevitzky and the management of the orchestra are said to receive hundreds of protests from outraged subscribers whenever the conductor puts one on a program. One turns for a parallel to memories of the amazing events of Nov 11, 1918, when, for instance, a little group of these same women were observed marching up West st in Boston each beating lustily on a tin dishpan.

The piece that loosed this strange tumult of approval was written two years ago for the noted dancer, Ida Rubinstein, and enthusiastically received by her Parisian audiences. The concert version of it heard yesterday made a similar sensation in the audience the other day in New York, when Mr. Toscanini conducted it at a concert of the New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra.

A bolero is, of course, a Spanish dance, with a characteristic, strongly

marked simple rhythm. Ravel's bolero, according to an able technical analysis of the score made by A. H. Meyer, is built up of two musical sentences, each composed of an eight-measure phrase and a nine-measure phrase, with a single measure of interlude between the sentences. These sentences are built up into a musical paragraph containing 72 measures, which is repeated four times with increasingly intense and sonorous orchestration, leading up to a brief and brilliant closing climax. The construction and workmanship of this bolero are masterly. No more cleverly written piece of music exists.

The whole piece is one long crescendo. Its foundation is a constantly beating rhythm in the drums, which of itself would almost, as the drum in O'Neill's play, "The Emperor Jones," does, sustain the mood of suspense and nervous tension. Over this are heard monotonous snatches of melody from different instruments. At a first hearing one almost overlooks the contrasting themes revealed by study of the score, so overwhelming is the cumulative effect of the numerous repetitions.

The piece is an assault on the nervous system of the listener, subtle and brutal. It depends for its effect chiefly on the fact, a commonplace of musical psychology, that the ear is peculiarly sensitive to emphatic repetitions of strong, simply grouped stresses. The third movement of Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic Symphony" and the drum beat underlying the middle section of the second movement of that symphony are well-known musical examples of the same psychological phenomenon. But Ravel is a subtler musician than Tschaikowsky, and possessed of a more fastidious taste. He is also a better musical craftsman.

For an analogy to this piece let us turn to Poe's tales of horror, which still affect strongly even a reader familiar with Poe's cold-blooded explanation of just how he set about getting his effects. This sort of thing succeeds in being thrilling, but can hardly be deemed the highest form of art.

Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra made the most of the remarkable opportunity Ravel's musical tour de force afforded them.

The other novelty of the afternoon, Blair Fairchild's orchestral arrangement of his "Chants Negres," written for the piano, was eclipsed by the Ravel. It is, however, well written and interesting, if wholly artificial, music in the modern manner.

Bach's Third Brandenburg Concerto, which began the concert, has a vitality, a rhythmic urge, more profoundly and permanently moving than the cleverly calculated musical thriller of Ravel. Schumann's Second Symphony, the other number on the program, was given an eloquent if not always wholly accurate performance.

P. R.

Pleasures Ira The Sym Day an

Return of Dr.
Ravel's "Bolero" Excitem

IN Carnegie Hall, canini and his Ravel's "Bolero" in New York, son restraint, rose and phony Hall, yesterday Dr. Koussevitzky an played the piece for Boston, as many, sat and stamped. keen ears detected a posed; in Boston, if the pierced the circuman the Friday of Horowitz no such torrents of ap over Symphony Hall, tra and conductor as wave. More interesti feel was the mountin the audience, as Ra Bolero-rhythm above chord; repeated his twed unvaried in intervals dressed it in vivider mental colors, ever a verse; drove and mea broken crescendo tw until the concert-ha that Spanish tune a air was pungent. A were sitting with rig glance—and some we as though the sounds them. A third—and a ously trying to break longer to be endured measures from the en the tension by a str that also may be modulation into the major; a final blaz stant's pause before lease is opened. For Hall on a Friday, a new pieces for an impending tour from various Parisian composers, Ravel included; how he wrote his dance-scene and held his tongue, as did all others in preparation and rehearsals concerned; how on an evening in November of last year at the Opéra it whipped to silence and then to outcry an audience all unaware; how Paris rang with that experience, and thereafter European city after European city; how New York took up the running—and now Boston joins the hue and cry. Was it better or worse brought to voice in Symphony Hall than in other celebrated concert-rooms? If worse, then marvellous must have been performances elsewhere.

By this time, every with the world "Bolero," how Ida sian mime and

Not a detail escaped Dr. Koussevitzky or such ears as chose to hear. He beat the rhythm hard, bright, tense, unmitigated. He flung the sinuous dance-melody into high relief, yet without variation or shadow of turning. On the instant he made a new timbre flash; a new group flesh the unescapable tune. Ravel's bassoon, Ravel's insidious clarinet, Ravel's insolent saxophones, darted at the ear. From power to power, the crescendo ascended unrelaxed, suspensive, clamant. At the modulation, with a great sweep of his arms, like a magician smashing his potent crystal into a hundred glittering fragments, the conductor released the final whirl. . . . The smoky room was cleared; the woman no longer danced upon the table; from hands to hands the men had ceased to toss her. They had even sheathed their knives.

Triple—from composer, conductor, orchestra—proceeded this magical tour de force. For no other phrase so nearly fits it. Spell-like it plays upon hearers; holds them under a magic of the changeful and the changeless; in magnanimous frenzy cuts them free. It tingles upon the aural nerves; produces physical as well as mental sensation. It is the spell, if one likes, of a mechanized age. But is a composer to be reproached because he is of his own time and can ply his particular magic? Consider also the magician's skill, to stabilize the melody—shape, substance, course; to subtilize a seeming rhythmic directness; to choose, place and adjust the ever-changing instrumental vesture upon that crescendo in ceaseless motion; to find and set alight the breaking point. Not skill merely, or only resource; but imagination edging close to genius, dry, and narrow, again if one likes, all wit and all style, but genius none the less. This age in a Spanish dance-tune and a miracle of craft, with Ravel at five-and-fifty to put it there. Merlin is precedent for elderly necromancers.

Since the opening concerts of the season, with Pick-Mangliagalli's Fugue, Dr. Koussevitzky has not had so fortunate a day with novel pieces. One, possibly, two, to each pair of concerts and with reason. Shall we not hear the music of our own time, as we read its books, look upon its pictures, seek out its plays? The concert-hall is no moated grange of masterpieces. The new matter, the new methods and manners, have come to stay the while, however restlessly and barrenly we now use them. And Mr. Blair Fairchild's "Negro Songs" were neither savorless nor sterile. No dilettante, which is the customary reproach to his music, wrote them—possibly because he remembered, rather than tried to invent, his musical matter. Scraps of negro songs, the titles even long forgotten, floated and fused across his mind—five in sum, one syncopated and shrill; another jazzily irregular; a third with a clarinet hollow-voiced through a "blues"; this plaintive; that simpler and flowing. And all restated tersely; some sharp-voiced, some gentle; both with the rhythms, harmonies, timbres of these days of dissonance. By this time even a matinee audience at Symphony Hall agrees to them, applauding Mr. Fairchild's orchestral songs because in them ran interest and pleasure. Call them, not modernistic subtleties, but modernistic incisiveness, to homely flavor adapted.

An old master began, a romantic master ended, the afternoon. So scant is the symphonic baggage of Bach, who hardly foresaw the twentieth-century concert-hall from the salons of Cöthen or the organ-loft of St. Thomas's, that the conductor must return again and again to the Brandenburg pieces. Yesterday it was the Third Concerto, in G major, for strings only; in two divisions with no slow song, outside two middle measures, to part them. A high-spirited and a quick-fingered Bach wrote this music, dividing and sub-dividing his groups—the trick is by no means a modern one; giving them subjects to play with and figures to toss about; pulling them up with chords and unisons and tuttis; sending them racing off again. The juggling game of counterpoint played to the hilt by a Bach who, for once, is more of his time than of the ages, whom nobody could possibly "revere" as he takes his tonal pastime. The zest of living ran in him as he wrote this Concerto in a whirl of subjects, figures, accents. And now the manifold volume and color that a conductor, like Dr. Koussevitzky, draws from his string choir enhances and diversifies him. It is doubtful whether the "private band" of his royal highness, the Margrave of Brandenburg, could match them. Hitherto the conductor has been for-Willsch's choosings from Schumann. Willacy the pieces faded and time and change, like to "Manfred" or "Geno- the vernal warmth, ex- sing, of the Symphony in d the lyric, dreamful, The Rhenish" moments of The singing, sentimental. quality in Schumann sets aglow. These sym- felt orchestral thickness, instrumental clumsiness. yesterday, the slow and ep-felt, of the Symphony lustrous, upspringing, for- Finale. Even Dr. Kous- rirng himself, might not first two movements. y Schumann at Dresden of Mendelssohn shining is song, was fain to write To it time has not been Dr. Koussevitzky returned ymphony Concerts alive H. T. P.

How Iturbi to Honor to Spain

Hearing the Pianist re and Gleaming omplishments

DAY afternoon at the Statler Boston heard for the first at new star in the firm- ists, Jose Iturbi. Out of the comes, a Spain which now rs has been contributing its the life of the musical world. rs have achieved a vogue, more, considerable genuine since the days of Albeniz. rs and artists include the Casals and Arbos, the recent egovia and the Agullars, and For Jose Iturbi is beyond musician of the very first in technical equipment and iting musicianship. benefit of the Denison House cital given. The audience luded many of the socially should not have been one even in the face of the driv- ayhouse which made the coming Miss sore than uncomfortable. But Miss was large enough so that e and the heartiness of the ort Co share of those who would iss Cla ed the empty chairs was d.

Iturbi's program ranged widely among composers; as a sign of the times, some would say, Beethoven was absent but Mozart, with the delicate and graceful Sonata in A major was present. The Romanticists were heard variously—Schumann, Chopin, Brahms. The first with the gossamer Arabesque; the second with a waltz (G-flat), and a polonaise (A-flat); the last with the pianist's own shortened version of the "Variations on a Theme by Paganini." By a single item

French music was represented, Ravel's grave "Pavane for a Dead Child." Then the pianist turned to that music which his hearers were probably waiting to hear above all else. The music of Spain. Of this Mr. Iturbi chose "The Dance of Terror" from de Falla's ballet, "Love the Sycamore of a Brahms had been called in. Sorcerer"; Albeniz's "Corpus-Christi at Seville," at once stately and brilliant; finally Granados's scintillating musical version of the Basque game "Pelele."

It borders on presumption to write of the technic of such an artist as Iturbi. A sentence or two tells the story. What- ever is necessary technically he has in his possession, and that abundantly, be it passage work, staccati, chords or any of the various forms of "bravura." And the best. The full flat tone of an older generation one seldom meets in Iturbi. Neither does one hear the hard, knock- ing tone which passes here and there as an example of "modern" piano playing. Rather is his tone a thing of aristocratic beauty, slender in its proportions, elegant in its shadings, a tone which always strikes the ear pleasantly. His tone alone would make him an ideal Mozart player. Add to it the fineness of nuance, the distinctiveness of his phrasing, the innate grace and abounding charm of his every inflection and one begins to see the picture of the Mozart of yesterday afternoon. Continue to think of Mozart the polished courtier; Mozart the melodist who dips deep into the sunny contours of Italian song; Mozart who is master translator in tone of the rich ornamentation of Viennese life near the passing of the eighteenth century, and one has the feeling of Iturbi's Mozart. Not a fortissimo stepped out of this frame. Not a turn of brilliance was allowed to be too hard for it. For once from a pianist ideal Mozart.

And thanks to Mr. Iturbi for the Arabesque of Schumann. In the modern vein he held it. Its thrice-repeated main portion might have been a fluid "impressionism"; its more melodic contrasting themes were not given over to late-nineteenth century sentimentality. Schumann, if he is not the Schumann of two or three thread-bare war-horses, fits well into such scheme. At least he gave not a little pleasure yesterday afternoon.

if one had thought oneself in the be of technical feats before the ni-Brahms variations one heard in em all previous abilities eclipsed. again, this technique was neither nor dry brilliance, every note of it, passage, every difficulty had a al reason for being. Thanks to Mr. for display, mere shallow virtuoso- had not been chosen. The higher at s to Iturbi's Brahms; this technical ly relieved that composer once the charge of dry-as-dust acade- Virtuosity and musicianship, dis- a warmth that touched the at last the much awaited Spanish rs from this authoritative Span- Wisely Mr. Iturbi chose not the sly rhythmed, tambourine jangling, cornered dances, which after all ly represent nothing more signifi- Spanish culture than do foxtrots own. Instead came the stark, ating measures of de Falla's of Terror"; the ascending cli- and the bursts of majestic song the advancing procession of the Feast pus Christi, pictured by Albéniz; shing and sparkling play of games ing to Granados. With great con- Mr. Iturbi played his music. And lience felt itself drawn nearer to a obvious Spain than is often the case. means let us hear more Spanish from José Iturbi. A. H. M.

Since the opening concerts of the season, with Pick-Mangialani's Fugue, Koussevitzky has not had so fort a day with novel pieces. One, possibly, to each pair of concerts and reason. Shall we not hear the music of our own time, as we read its books upon its pictures, seek out its masterpieces. The new matter, the methods and manners, have come to the while, however restlessly and rarely we now use them. And Mr. Fairchild's "Negro Songs" were no savorless nor sterile. No dilettante which is the customary reproach to music, wrote them—possibly because remembered, rather than tried to in his musical matter. Scraps of negro songs the titles even long forgotten, floated fused across his mind—five in sum, syncopated and shrill; another jazz regular; a third with a clarinet howled through a "blues"; this plain that simpler and flowing. And all stated tersely; some sharp-voiced, gentle; both with the rhythms, harmonies, timbres of these days of dissonance. By this time even a matinee audience at the Symphony Hall agrees to them, applauding Mr. Fairchild's orchestral songs, cause in them ran interest and pleasure. Call them, not modernistic subtleties, modernistic incisiveness, to homely vor adapted.

An old master began, a romantic ter ended, the afternoon. So scarce the symphonic baggage of Bach, hardly foresaw the twentieth-century cert-hall from the salons of Cöthe the organ-loft of St. Thomas's, that conductor must return again and a to the Brandenburg pieces. Yesterday was the Third Concerto, in G major strings only; in two divisions with slow song, outside two middle measures to part them. A high-spirited and quick-fingered Bach wrote this in dividing and sub-dividing his groups—trick is by no means a modern one; ing them subjects to play with and ures to toss about; pulling them up chords and unisons and tuttis; sent them racing off again. The juggling of counterpoint played to the hilt Bach who, for once, is more of his than of the ages, whom nobody could sibly "revere" as he takes his tonal time. The zest of living ran in him he wrote this Concerto in a whirl of jets, figures, accents. And now manifold volume and color that a ductor, like Dr. Koussevitzky, draws his string choir enhances and divers him. It is doubtful whether the "pr band" of his royal highness, the grave of Brandenburg, could match it. Hitherto the conductor has been tunate in his choosings from Schumann. He has put by the pieces faded and thinned under time and change, like the overtures to "Manfred" or "Genève"; revived the vernal warmth, exuberant or musing, of the Symphony in B-flat; released the lyric, dreamful, cherishing voice of the connubial phony; given "The Rhenish" moments of sonorous state. The singing, sentimental, rhapsodizing quality in Schumann sets Dr. Koussevitzky aglow. These sympathetic heats melt orchestral thickness, smooth away instrumental clumsiness. So sounded, yesterday, the slow and ardent song, deep-felt, of the Symphony in C major; the lusty, upspringing, forward-thrusting Finale. Even Dr. Koussevitzky, outpouring himself, might not resuscitate the first two movements. The melancholy Schumann at Dresden took thought of Mendelssohn shining afar; forgot his song, was fain to write counterpoint. To it time has not been kind. . . . Dr. Koussevitzky returned and the Symphony Concerts alive again.

H. T. P.

And Now Iturbi to Do Honor to Spain For First Hearing the Pianist Of Rare and Gleaming Accomplishments

YESTERDAY afternoon at the Statler Hotel Boston heard for the first time that new star in the firmament of pianists, Jose Iturbi. Out of the new Spain he comes, a Spain which now for some years has been contributing its full share to the life of the musical world. Its composers have achieved a vogue, and what is more, considerable genuine distinction, since the days of Albéniz. Its conductors and artists include the well-known Casals and Arbos, the recent sensations, Segovia and the Aguilars, and now Iturbi. For Jose Iturbi is beyond any doubt a musician of the very first rank, both in technical equipment and in discriminating musicianship.

For the benefit of the Denison House was this recital given. The audience therefore included many of the socially elect. There should not have been one empty seat, even in the face of the driving snowstorm which made the coming and going more than uncomfortable. But the audience was large enough so that in the volume and the heartiness of the applause the share of those who would have occupied the empty chairs was hardly missed.

Iturbi's program ranged widely among composers; as a sign of the times, some would say. Beethoven was absent but Mozart, with the delicate and graceful Sonata in A major was present. The Romanticists were heard variously—Schumann, Chopin, Brahms. The first with the gossamer Arabesque; the second with a waltz (G-flat), and a polonaise (A-flat); the last with the pianist's own shortened version of the "Variations on a Theme by Paganini." By a single item

if one had thought oneself in the presence of technical feats before the pianist turned to that music which shortened version of the "Variations on a Theme by Paganini." By a single item French music was represented, Ravel's grave "Pavane for a Dead Child." Then the pianist turned to that music which his hearers were probably waiting to hear above all else. The music of Spain. Out of this Mr. Iturbi chose "The Dance of Terror" from de Falla's ballet, "Love the city of a Brahms had been called in. Sorcerer"; Albéniz's "Corpus-Christi at Seville," at once stately and brilliant; finally Granados's scintillating musical version of the Basque game "Peleele."

It borders on presumption to write of the technic of such an artist as Iturbi. A sentence or two tells the story. What ever is necessary technically he has in his possession, and that abundantly, his passage work, staccati, chords or any of the various forms of "bravura." And best. The full flat tone of an older generation one seldom meets in Iturbi. Neither does one hear the hard, knocking tone which passes here and there as an example of "modern" piano playing. Rather is his tone a thing of aristocratic beauty, slender in its proportions, elegant in its shadings, a tone which always strikes the ear pleasantly. His tone alone would make him an ideal Mozart player. Add to it the fineness of nuance, the distinctiveness of his phrasing, the innate grace and abounding charm of his every inflection and one begins to see the picture of the Mozart of yesterday afternoon. Continue to think of Mozart the polished courtier; Mozart a melodist who dips deep into the sunny contours of Italian song; Mozart who is master translator in tone of the rich ornamentation of Viennese life near the passing of the eighteenth century, and one has the feeling of Iturbi's Mozart. Not a fortissimo stepped out of this frame. Not a turn of brilliance was allowed to be too hard for it. For once from a pianist ideal Mozart.

And thanks to Mr. Iturbi for the Arabesque of Schumann. In the modern vein he held it. Its thrice-repeated main portion might have been a fluid "impressionism"; its more melodic contrasting themes were not given over to late-nineteenth century sentimentality. Schumann, if he is not the Schumann of two or three thread-bare war-horses, fits well into such a scheme. At least he gave not a little pleasure yesterday afternoon.

rising it was then, to hear Chopin's use as a magnificent tonal panorama rather than as a firmly rhythmed lance. It summoned technical feats were astounding. It indulged in painting which one would travel equal. Romantic through modern it was. Court processional it was. . . . if one had thought oneself in the presence of technical feats before the pianist turned to that music which his hearers were probably waiting to hear above all else. The music of Spain. Out of this Mr. Iturbi chose "The Dance of Terror" from de Falla's ballet, "Love the city of a Brahms had been called in. Sorcerer"; Albéniz's "Corpus-Christi at Seville," at once stately and brilliant; finally Granados's scintillating musical version of the Basque game "Peleele." . . . Virtuosity and musicianship, displayed in a warmth that touched the the technic of such an artist as Iturbi. for once went hand in hand. . . . Ravel's Pavane Mr. Iturbi found ever is necessary technically he has in the right note. The somber melody his possession, and that abundantly, be occasional rich harmonies, the re- it passage work, staccati, chords or any ts struck a mood which one seldom of the various forms of "bravura." And outside of Ravel and which the play- tone is of the modern variety—at its Ravel none too often fathom. . . . at last the much awaited Spanish eration one seldom meets in Iturbi. rs from this authoritative Span- Neither does one hear the hard, knock- Wisely Mr. Iturbi chose not the ing tone which passes here and there as sly rhythmed, tambourine jangling, an example of "modern" piano playing. cornered dances, which after all Rather is his tone a thing of aristocratic ly represent nothing more signifi- beauty, slender in its proportions, ele- Spanish culture than do foxtrots gant in its shadings, a tone which al- own. Instead came the stark, ways strikes the ear pleasantly. His tone ating measures of de Falla's alone would make him an ideal Mozart e of Terror"; the ascending cli- player. Add to it the fineness of nuance, and the bursts of majestic song the distinctiveness of his phrasing, the advancing procession of the Feast innate grace and abounding charm of pus Christi, pictured by Albéniz; his every inflection and one begins to shing and sparkling play of games see the picture of the Mozart of yester- ing to Granados. With great con- day afternoon. Continue to think of Mo- Mr. Iturbi played his music. And zart the polished courtier; Mozart the lence felt itself drawn nearer to a obvious Spain than is often the case. means let us hear more Spanish from José Iturbi. A. H. M.

Since the opening concerts of the season, with Pick-Mangiagalli's Fugue, Koussevitzky has not had so fort a day with novel pieces. One, pos two, to each pair of concerts and reason. Shall we not hear the mu our own time, as we read its books upon its pictures, seek out its masterpieces. The new matter, the methods and manners, have come to the while, however restlessly and renly we now use them. And Mr. Fairchild's "Negro Songs" were n savorless nor sterile. No dilett which is the customary reproach t music, wrote them—possibly becau remembered, rather than tried to in his musical matter. Scraps of negro s the titles even long forgotten, floated fused across his mind—five in sum, syncopated and shrill; another jazz regular; a third with a clarinet ho voiced through a "blues"; this plain that simpler and flowing. And al stated tersely; some sharp-voiced, gentle; both with the rhythms, ha nles, timbres of these days of disson. By this time even a matinée audien Symphony Hall agrees to them, app ing Mr. Fairchild's orchestral song cause in them ran interest and plea Call them, not modernistic subtleties modernistic incisiveness, to homely vor adapted.

An old master began, a romantic ter ended, the afternoon. So sca the symphonic baggage of Bach, hardly foresaw the twentieth-century cert-hall from the salons of Cöthe the organ-loft of St. Thomas's, that conductor must return again and a to the Brandenburg pieces. Yesterd was the Third Concerto, in G major strings only; in two divisions wtl slow song, outside two middle meas to part them. A high-spirited an quick-fingered Bach wrote this m dividing and sub-dividing his groups trick is by no means a modern one; ing them subjects to play with and ures to toss about; pulling them up chords and unisons and tuttis; sen them racing off again. The juggling of counterpoint played to the hilt Bach who, for once, is more of his than of the ages, whom nobody could sibly "revere" as he takes his tonal time. The zest of living ran in hi he wrote this Concerto in a whirl of jets, figures, accents. And now manifold volume and color that a ductor, like Dr. Koussevitzky, draws his string choir enhances and divers him. It is doubtful whether the "pri band" of his royal highness, the grave of Brandenburg, could match t Hitherto the conductor has been fortunate in his choosings from Schumann. He has put by the pieces faded and thinned under time and change, like the overtures to "Manfred" or "Genoveva"; revived the vernal warmth, exuberant or musing, of the Symphony in B-flat; released the lyric, dreamful, cherishing voice of the connubial Symphony; given "The Rhenish" moments of sonorous state. The singing, sentimental, rhapsodizing quality in Schumann sets Dr. Koussevitzky aglow. These sympathetic heats melt orchestral thickness, smooth away instrumental clumsiness. So sounded, yesterday, the slow and ardent song, deep-felt, of the Symphony in C major; the lusty, upspringing, forward-thrusting Finale. Even Dr. Koussevitzky, outpouring himself, might not resuscitate the first two movements. The melancholy Schumann at Dresden took thought of Mendelssohn shining afar; forgot his song, was fain to write counterpoint. To it time has not been kind. . . . Dr. Koussevitzky returned and the Symphony Concerts alive again. H. T. P.

And Now Iturbi to Do Honor to Spain For First Hearing the Pianist Of Rare and Gleaming Accomplishments

YESTERDAY afternoon at the Statler Hotel Boston heard for the first time that new star in the firmament of pianists, Jose Iturbi. Out of the new Spain he comes, a Spain which now for some years has been contributing its full share to the life of the musical world. Its composers have achieved a vogue, and what is more, considerable genuine distinction, since the days of Albéniz. Its conductors and artists include the well-known Casals and Arbos, the recent sensations, Segovia and the Aguilars, and now Iturbi. For Jose Iturbi is beyond any doubt a musician of the very first rank, both in technical equipment and in discriminating musicianship. For the benefit of the Denison House was this recital given. The audience therefore included many of the socially elect. There should not have been one empty seat, even in the face of the driving snowstorm which made the coming and going more than uncomfortable. But the audience was large enough so that in the volume and the heartiness of the applause the share of those who would have occupied the empty chairs was hardly missed.

Iturbi's program composers; as a si would say, Beeth Mozart, with the Sonata in A maj Romanticists we Schumann, Chopi with the gossamer with a waltz (G (A-flat); the last v shortened version a Theme by Pagan

French music was r grave "Pavane for the pianist turned to his hearers were prob above all else. The n of this Mr. Iturbi ch Terror" from de Falla Sorcerer"; Albéniz's Seville," at once sta finally Granados's s version of the Basque

It borders on presu the technic of such a A sentence or two tells ever is necessary tel his possession, and th it passage work, stacc of the various forms o tone is of the mode best. The full flat tor eration one seldom Neither does one hear ing tone which passes an example of "moder Rather is his tone a th beauty, slender in its gant in its shadings, ways strikes the ear pl alone would make him player. Add to it the f the distinctiveness of innate grace and abo his every inflection a see the picture of the day afternoon. Continu zart the polished cou melodist who dips dee contours of Italian son master translator in ornamentation of Vienn passing of the eightee one has the feeling o Not a fortissimo stepped Not a turn of brilliance too hard for it. For or ideal Mozart.

And thanks to Mr. It esque of Schumann. In he held it. Its thrice-re tion might have been a lism"; its more melodic were not given over t century sentimentality. is not the Schumann thread-bare war-horses, a scheme. At least he pleasure yesterday aft the Brearle lege. Mr. the Middle Harvard L Law School as a secon clubs inclu Tennis of Club of Ha law firm o fellow.

Surprising it was then, to hear Chopin's polonaise as a magnificent tonal panorama rather than as a firmly rhythmed court dance. It summoned technical feats that were astounding. It indulged in tonal painting which one would travel far to equal. Romantic through modern eyes, it was. Court processional it was not.

And if one had thought oneself in the presence of technical feats before the Paganini-Brahms variations one heard in this item all previous abilities eclipsed. And again, this technique was neither hard nor dry brilliance, every note of it, every passage, every difficulty had a musical reason for being. Thanks to Mr. Iturbi, for display, mere shallow virtuoso-music had not been chosen. The higher virtuosity of a Brahms had been called in. Thanks to Iturbi's Brahms, this technical wizardry relieved that composer once again of the charge of dry-as-dust academicism. Virtuosity and musicianship, display and a warmth that touched the heart, for once went hand in hand.

So for Ravel's Pavane Mr. Iturbi found exactly the right note. The somber melody, the occasional rich harmonies, the restraints struck a mood which one seldom finds outside of Ravel and which the players of Ravel none too often fathom.

And at last the much awaited Spanish numbers from this authoritative Spaniard. Wisely Mr. Iturbi chose not the obviously rhythmed, tambourine jangling, square cornered dances, which after all probably represent nothing more significant in Spanish culture than do foxtrots in our own. Instead came the stark, stimulating measures of de Falla's "Dance of Terror"; the ascending climaxes and the bursts of majestic song of the advancing procession of the Feast of Corpus Christi, pictured by Albéniz; the flashing and sparkling play of games according to Granados. With great conviction Mr. Iturbi played his music. And an audience felt itself drawn nearer to a less obvious Spain than is often the case. By all means let us hear more Spanish music from José Iturbi. A. H. M.

Bach and "Bolero"

Reflections for The Hour On Sensation Versus Permanence

PERHAPS nothing is more significant of the times than that the novelty which created the liveliest stir of any new symphonic work since "Le Sacre du Printemps" was first heard in New York—Ravel's bitingly sardonic "Bolero"—is a tour de force that can boast of only the scantiest material, and this theme in itself utterly commonplace and banal.

Time was when the basic thematic ideas of any work were quite as important as the manner in which they were presented. All that is most remarkable about this astonishing "Bolero" has to do with making bricks with a very minimum of straw.

An almost maddening reiteration of a single idea over a period of about twenty minutes achieves its exciting effect by reason of the legerdemain with which this theme is intensified as it is bandied from instrument to instrument, the while a crescendo is built under it by augmentation of the instruments supplying a pulsatile and pizzicato background. Virtuoso technique is here exalted to its highest power. It transcends the ordinary showmanship of the Strauss epigone because this technical wizardry is not used for its own glorification but to produce an end that is not of itself a matter of technical display.

Ravel does not swing a sledge as Stravinsky does in parts of the "Sacre." But he has transcended himself in the stark vigor of this work, which is a long way removed from the ironic precosities of, let us say, the pseudo-Spanish music of "L'Heure Espagnole." There are those who will continue to regard "Daphnis and Chloe," with its irisated scoring and its altogether Ravelesque thematic material, as his most notable score. It has beauty where the "Bolero" has impudence; its appeal is to the finer sensibilities, whereas the new work goes unashamedly about its business of creating a sensation. That the "Bolero" does this with so little except a dazzling mastery of effect on which to build is to the ever-lasting credit of Ravel's art; but the very thing which is most remarkable in the achievement—the absence of any musical idea the world would have been one whit the poorer without—is the weakness that seems to predict speedy oblivion for this work.

de force is as old as the successive generation. The virtuosity here material in itself has been united with the pristine technique has the pristine survived after other and new ways of creating t chorus of Bach's "Ein unser Gott," the cantata friends of Music recently, may have recognized in h has here written what son to pronounce a tour at the noble old Refor- provides a basis so solid est purport as to make unnecessarily belittling. "Bolero" is to court aban- of the utterly antithetical ses of the works as well ferent mediums and num- tations separating one pe- from another.

isic persists for the rea- is least likely to per- ed his mature mastery at would withstand the is not necessary to see actual assault and de- press that Charles San- dly pictures in the high- s printed in the Friends a book. Bach can get well without any such panoramas as Huneker ttle in Strauss's "Held- the purely musical side contemporaneous tech- ntly worth pausing to this chorus which Mr. lucting in Mecca Tem- ame moment Mr. Tos- g the Ravel "Bolero."

ickets season: fifth the Chorale prelude tpt. Boston, to its highest vocal Theatre e colossal resources Dec. 10, 24, en a lifetime in ac- on to give an over- idge. the fugal entrance of ncerts, first tory to the stirring ouble F for by the instruments; N. H., or and oboes, then the ne by line, by the te end of the scale. on this program, as pointed out, Bach ave found that al- raises permitted of e latter part of the ie mysteryut Bach. Parry ob- rite in the apparently impos- into a talk-he smallest trouble eal - Leilase of the chorale enunciated by the high and piercing instruments is answered immediately by the basses in the next bar, while all the voices go on vivaciously discoursing in elaborate polyphony; and not only so, but the very device is made to minister to the intrinsic expression of the music itself."

Much as there is present reason to admire the Ravel "Bolero" we would not care to hear it played just passably well after the stunning performance given it at its first American performance by Toscanini. That, after all, may be a very just test of its intrinsic merit and of its enduring qualities. The Ravel work is too distinguished in its workmanship to be dismissed with various other showpieces of recent years, including the highly energized and considerably inflated Wetzler work which created more than a ripple of its own on this same Toscanini program, but its first triumph is likely to remain its greatest, with a steady diminuendo hereafter.

OSCAR THOMPSON

[Reprinted from the New York Evening Post]

SYMPHONY AUDIENCE GOES WILD

Cheers and Stamps at End of Ravel's "Bolero"

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Excitement reigned at the Symphony concert of yesterday afternoon. Staid dowagers stamped their feet and cheered, behaved as people generally behave only at athletic contests and political rallies. And all for a piece of music, a piece of slender content and obvious design but contrived with an almost devilish ingenuity: the new "Bolero" of Maurice Ravel.

SIXTEEN REPETITIONS

Written for Ida Rubinstein and first danced by her in Paris in November, 1928, this "Bolero" had its American premiere as concert-piece in New York last month at the hands of M. Toscanini and the Philharmonic-Symphony, and a scene similar to that described above was then enacted in Carnegie Hall.

So much for the effect of "Bolero," as Ravel simply names it. And the piece itself? That story is soon told. From the snare drum is heard the bolero rhythm that, once begun, is never dropped: dum - diddilly-dum-dum-dum-dum, dum - diddilly-iddilly-iddilly-dum-dum. A flute begins the tune, commonplace enough of itself. Repetitions follow, 16 in all, with fuller and fuller instrumentations, until the full force of the orchestra is attained. Save for a brief and startling lapse into E-major near the close the piece runs all in the key of C. Essentially the music does not change, it merely swells and expands, but by the time it is done the reiterated rhythm and the subtly planned crescendo has aroused the listeners, or at least the more impressionable among them, to such a pitch that, once the goading, maddening sound has ceased, they must shout their release. No more than a musical showman's trick, perhaps, but what other composer living or dead could have turned it so well?

There was another new piece yesterday, and in its first performance anywhere: "Chants Negres," by Blair Fairchild, formerly of Boston, now of Paris and New York. In the excitement over Ravel, Mr. Fairchild was forgotten—but he would have been forgotten almost as speedily under any circumstances, for his composition is of negligible interest and value. A few "popular" melodies of Negroid type are strung together without development, harmonized and orchestrated in accordance with contemporary formulae but with scant distinction.

There were classics, too: Bach's Third Brandenburg Concerto for the beginning and Schumann's Second Symphony for the close. Not before had Mr. Koussevitzky conducted here this most substantial if not most rewarding of the Schumann four. A piece of moments in this C major Symphony, with dull stretches between, though of these moments—the glib play of the Scherzo, the soaring violins of the Adagio and the lusty energies of the Finale oddly forecasting Brahms—Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra made the most.

Bach and "Bolero"

Reflections for The On Sensation Versus Permanence

PERHAPS nothing is more significant of the times than that the which created the liveliest any new symphonic work since "du Printemps" was first heard in New York—Ravel's biting sardonic—is a tour de force that can only the scantiest material, and theme in itself utterly common and banal.

Time was when the basic ideas of any work were quite as important as the manner in which they were presented. All that is most remarkable about this astonishing "Bolero" is that it is made with making bricks with a very little straw.

An almost maddening reiteration of a single idea over a period of about ten minutes achieves its exciting effect on something that would withstand the wear and tear of time. It is not necessary to see the theme as intensified as it is in this music; the actual assault and defense of the fortress that Charles Sanford Terry so vividly pictures in the high-ly literary analysis printed in the Friends of Music program book. Bach can get along quite as well without any such imaginative word panoramas as Huneker devised for the battle in Strauss's "Heldenleben." But on the purely musical side there is nothing in contemporaneous technique more eminently worth pausing to marvel over than this chorus which Mr. Bodanzky was conducting in Mecca Temple at almost the same moment Mr. Toscanini was repeating the Ravel "Bolero."

Here the form of the Chorale prelude has been carried to its highest vocal manifestation. The colossal resources which Bach had been a lifetime in acquiring are drawn on to give an overwhelming vitality to the fugal entrance of the voices, anticipatory to the stirring intoning of the hymn by the instruments; first by the trumpets and oboes, then the answer in canon, line by line, by the basses at the opposite end of the scale. Once launched upon this program, as Hubert Parry has pointed out, Bach might conceivably have found that although the first phrases permitted of a canonic treatment, the latter part of the chorale would not. But Bach, Parry observes, "achieves the apparently impossible without taking the smallest trouble about it. Every phrase of the chorale predict speedy oblivion for this work.

The tour de force is as old as the musical art. Each successive generation of composers beggars the virtuosity of the last. Only where material in itself worth the potter has been united with astounding technique has the pristine force of the latter survived after other masters have found new ways of creating amazement.

Today the first chorus of Bach's "Ein feste Burg ist unser Gott," the cantata sung by the Friends of Music recently, is a more amazing technical achievement in that any one may have recognized in Bach's time. Bach has here written what there is every reason to pronounce a tour de force, save that the noble old Reformation hymn provides a basis so solid and of such earnest purport as to make the term seem unnecessarily belittling. To compare such an achievement with Ravel's in the "Bolero" is to court absurdity because of the utterly antithetical aims and purposes of the works as well as their very different mediums and numberless considerations separating one period and one public from another.

But Bach's music persists for the reason that Ravel's is least likely to persist. He expended his mature mastery on something that would withstand the wear and tear of time. It is not necessary to see the theme as intensified as it is in this music; the actual assault and defense of the fortress that Charles Sanford Terry so vividly pictures in the high-ly literary analysis printed in the Friends of Music program book. Bach can get along quite as well without any such imaginative word panoramas as Huneker devised for the battle in Strauss's "Heldenleben." But on the purely musical side there is nothing in contemporaneous technique more eminently worth pausing to marvel over than this chorus which Mr. Bodanzky was conducting in Mecca Temple at almost the same moment Mr. Toscanini was repeating the Ravel "Bolero."

Here the form of the Chorale prelude has been carried to its highest vocal manifestation. The colossal resources which Bach had been a lifetime in acquiring are drawn on to give an overwhelming vitality to the fugal entrance of the voices, anticipatory to the stirring intoning of the hymn by the instruments; first by the trumpets and oboes, then the answer in canon, line by line, by the basses at the opposite end of the scale. Once launched upon this program, as Hubert Parry has pointed out, Bach might conceivably have found that although the first phrases permitted of a canonic treatment, the latter part of the chorale would not. But Bach, Parry observes, "achieves the apparently impossible without taking the smallest trouble about it. Every phrase of the chorale enunciated by the high and piercing instruments is answered immediately by the basses in the next bar, while all the voices go on vivaciously discoursing in elaborate polyphony; and not only so, but the very device is made to minister to the intrinsic expression of the music itself."

Much as there is present reason to admire the Ravel "Bolero" we would not care to hear it played just passably well after the stunning performance given it at its first American performance by Toscanini. That, after all, may be a very just test of its intrinsic merit and of its enduring qualities. The Ravel work is too distinguished in its workmanship to be dismissed with various other showpieces of recent years, including the highly energized and considerably inflated Wetzlar work which created more than a ripple of its own on this same Toscanini program, but its first triumph is likely to remain its greatest, with a steady diminuendo hereafter.

OSCAR THOMPSON

[Reprinted from the New York Evening Post]

SYMPHONY AUDIENCE GOES WILD

Cheers and Stamps at End of Ravel's "Bolero"

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Excitement reigned at the Symphony concert of yesterday afternoon. Staid dowagers stamped their feet and cheered, behaved as people generally behave only at athletic contests and political rallies. And all for a piece of music, a piece of slender content and obvious design but contrived with an almost devilish ingenuity: the new "Bolero" of Maurice Ravel.

SIXTEEN REPETITIONS

Written for Ida Rubinstein and first danced by her in Paris in November, 1928, this "Bolero" had its American premiere as concert-piece in New York last month at the hands of M. Toscanini and the Philharmonic-Symphony, and a scene similar to that described above was then enacted in Carnegie Hall.

So much for the effect of "Bolero," as Ravel simply names it. And the piece itself? That story is soon told. From the snare drum is heard the bolero rhythm that, once begun, is never dropped: dum-diddilly-dum-dum-dum-dum, dum-diddilly-diddilly-diddilly-dum-dum. A flute begins the tune, commonplace enough of itself. Repetitions follow, 16 in all, with fuller and fuller instrumentation, until the full force of the orchestra is attained. Save for a brief and startling lapse into E-major near the close the piece runs all in the key of C. Essentially the music does not change, it merely swells and expands, but by the time it is done the reiterated rhythm and the subtly planned crescendo has aroused the listeners, or at least the more impressionable among them, to such a pitch that, once the goading, maddening sound has ceased, they must shout their release. No more than a musical showman's trick, perhaps, but what other composer living or dead could have turned it so well?

There was another new piece yesterday, and in its first performance anywhere: "Chants Negres," by Blair Fairchild, formerly of Boston, now of Paris and New York. In the excitement over Ravel, Mr. Fairchild was forgotten—but he would have been forgotten almost as speedily under any circumstances, for his composition is of negligible interest and value. A few "popular" melodies of Negroid type are strung together without development, harmonized and orchestrated in accordance with contemporary formulae but with scant distinction.

There were classics, too: Bach's Third Brandenburg Concerto for the beginning and Schumann's Second Symphony for the close. Not before had Mr. Koussevitzky conducted here this most substantial if not most rewarding of the Schumann four. A piece of moments in this C major Symphony, with dull stretches between, though of these moments—the glib play of the Scherzo, the soaring violins of the Adagio and the lusty energies of the Finale oddly forecasting Brahms—Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra made the most.

Modernist Boston Classic New York

Koussevitzky's Programs and Toscanini's Ingeniously Compared

WHILE the Philharmonic Society is pursuing its highly successful career abroad [writes Francis D. Perkins, the insatiable statistician of music], the Boston Symphony Orchestra completed its season (which ran into the first week of May), and dispatched us the last of the brown-covered pamphlets containing the program-notes and the customary summary of the orchestra's activities. In this connection it may be interesting to compare the musical fare offered by the two orchestras in their principal series—the Philharmonic's Thursday evening series in Carnegie Hall and the Bostonian's Friday-Saturday series in Symphony Hall. The Philharmonic gave twenty-six Thursday-evening concerts; fifteen under Toscanini, seven under Mengelberg and four under Molinari. The Boston Symphony had twenty-four Friday-afternoon concerts, repeated on Saturday evening: twenty-one under Dr. Koussevitzky and one each under Richard Burgin, Glazunov and Goossens. The composers, Henry Eichheim, Samuel Gardner and Walter Piston conducted their own works in three programs otherwise under Dr. Koussevitzky. Forty-seven composers were represented in each series under discussion. The Philharmonic played 103 works in this particular series; the Bostonians, in the corresponding series, eighty-eight works. Of the 176 on both lists only fifteen were common to both series; of the sixty-nine composers twenty-five. Whereby it can be deduced that the conductors followed different lines in the program-making. Of the composers represented in the Philharmonic's Thursday evenings, Wagner leads the list with eleven works or excerpts. Beethoven follows with ten; Brahms with seven; Mozart and Strauss with six each; Bach, Debussy, Handel, Mendelssohn, Respighi with three each; Haydn, Honegger, Ravel, Rossini, Schumann, Stravinsky and Chaikovsky with two each. Of the composers represented in the Boston Symphony's Friday afternoon series Beethoven leads with six works, followed by Strauss with five; Brahms, Ravel, and Sibelius with four; Debussy, Glazunov with three; de Falla, Eichheim, Gruenberg, Prokofiev, Respighi, Rimsky-Korsakov, Saint-Saëns, Schumann, Stravinsky, Chaikovsky, Wagner and Weber with two each.

The Philharmonic, offering fourteen works than the Boston Symphony series including two more concerts, much more attention to Wagner considerably more to Beethoven. The Bostonians waxed more modern, playing five works by twenty-seven living composers, as compared with the thirty-two works by twenty-two living composers given by the Philharmonic. A large difference appears in the matter of novelties offered in the two series, ten new to New York and twenty-five to Boston.

American composers, as has been repeated before, found little favor with the Philharmonic this last season—two, Koussevitzky and Wagenaar, achieving reputation with one work each. But Dr. Koussevitzky and his colleagues played ten works by eleven American composers. In the case of Italian composers the two series, the case is nearly an exact reverse; Philharmonic, twelve composers, fifteen works; Boston Symphony, three composers, four works. In general, we can consider excellent chances of classic and romantic music as the feature of the Philharmonic, especially of that part of it under Toscanini's direction, but must look to the Boston Symphony's visit for the interesting novelties.

A reason why American composers are better with the Boston Symphony than with our Philharmonic may well be that Dr. Koussevitzky devotes all his time to the Boston Orchestra, abandoning last year even the spring concerts he hitherto conducted in Paris. Presumably he has more time to examine grown scores. Mr. Mengelberg, who has given us American works every season, although not often, divided his time between the Philharmonic and the Amsterdam Concertgebouw; Molinari's season is shared by several. Mr. Toscanini is concentrating his activities on the Philharmonic, but his season was only the first not shared with La Scala. It is reported that American scores will be among the works he considers for 1930-'31. [New York Tribune]

Modernist B

Classi

Koussevitzky's Toscanini's Comp

WHILE the Philharmonic is pursuing its home reer abroad [edge of ac music], the Boston S completed its season the first week of May) the last of the brown containing the progr customary summary activities. In this col interesting to compar offered by the tw their principal series— Thursday evening seri and the Bostonian's series in Symphony I monic gave twenty-six concerts; fifteen under Mengelberg and nari. The Boston Sy ty-four Friday-afterno ed on Saturday ev under Dr. Koussevitz under Richard Burg Goossens. The comp helm, Samuel Gardner conducted their own v grams otherwise unde Forty-seven compos ed in each series und Philharmonic played particular series; the corresponding series. Of the 176 on both lis common to both serie composers twenty-five be deduced that the different lines in th Of the composers rep harmonic's Thursday leads the list with e cerpts. Beethoven Brahms with seven; with six each; Bach Mendelssohn, Respig Haydn, Honegger, F mann, Stravinsky a two each. Of the co in the Boston Symp

Beethoven leads with six works, wed by Strauss with five; Brahms, art, Ravel and Sibelius with four; Ea. i., Debussy, Glazunov with three; Bax, de Falla, Eichheim, Gruenberg, Haydn, Prokofiev, Respighi, Rimsky-Korsakov, Saint-Saëns, Schumann, Stravinsky, Chaikovsky, Wagner and Weber with two each.

The Philharmonic, offering fourteen more works than the Boston Symphony in a series including two more concerts, gave much more attention to Wagner and considerably more to Beethoven. The Bostonians waxed more modern, playing forty-five works by twenty-seven living composers, as compared with the thirty-three works by twenty-two living composers given by the Philharmonic. A similar difference appears in the matter of novelties offered in the two series, ten works new to New York and twenty-five new to Boston.

American composers, as has been remarked before, found little favor with the Philharmonic this last season—two, Loeffler and Wagenaar, achieving representation with one work each. But Dr. Koussevitzky and his colleagues played thirteen works by eleven American composers. In the case of Italian composers in the two series, the case is nearly an exact reverse; Philharmonic, twelve composers, fifteen works; Boston Symphony, three composers, four works. In general, we can consider excellent performances of classic and romantic works as the feature of the Philharmonic season, especially of that part of it under Mr. Toscanini's direction, but must look to the Boston Symphony's visit for the most interesting novelties.

One reason why American composers fare better with the Boston Symphony than with our Philharmonic may well be that Dr. Koussevitzky devotes all his activities to the Boston Orchestra, abandoning last year even the spring concerts he had hitherto conducted in Paris. Presumably he has more time to examine home-grown scores. Mr. Mengelberg, who has given us American works every now and then, although not often, divided his active season between the Philharmonic and the Amsterdam Concertgebouw; Mr. Molinari's season is shared by several cities. Mr. Toscanini is concentrating his activities on the Philharmonic, but last season was only the first not shared with La Scala. It is reported that American scores will be among the works he will consider for 1930-'31. [New York Herald Tribune

FORTY-NINTH SEASON, NINETEEN HUNDRED TWENTY-NINE AND THIRTY

Eighth Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, DECEMBER 13, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, DECEMBER 14, at 8.15 o'clock

Weber Overture to "Euryanthe"

Bax Symphony No. 2 in E minor and C
 I. Allegro moderato.
 II. Andante.
 III. Allegro feroce.
 (First performance)

Liszt Concerto for Pianoforte in E-flat, No. 1

Respighi Symphonic Poem, "The Pines of Rome"
 I. The Pines of the Villa Borghese.
 II. The Pines near a Catacomb.
 III. The Pines of the Janiculum.
 IV. The Pines of the Appian Way.

SOLOIST
 JOSÉ ITURBI

BALDWIN PIANO USED
 Orthophonic Victrola furnished by M. Steinert & Sons

There will be an intermission after the symphony

The works to be played at these concerts may be seen in the Allen A. Brown Music Collection of the Boston Public Library one week before the concert

JOSE ITURBI

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The eighth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was conducted by Dr. Koussevitzky. Jose Iturbi, pianist, played for the first time at these concerts. The program was as follows: Weber, Overture to "Euryanthe." Bax, symphony No. 2 in E minor and C. Liszt, piano concerto, No. 1. Respighi, "The Pines of Rome." The new symphony by Arnold Bax was performed for the first time anywhere. Although it was written in 1924-1925, he reserved the production for Dr. Koussevitzky, to whom the score is dedicated, feeling confident, as he said in a letter, that conducted by him and played by this orchestra the symphony "will receive a finer first performance than any previous work of mine." His confidence was not misplaced. He honored conductor and players by it; the superb performance justified it. In another letter, dated London, Dec. 3, Mr. Bax says: "There is absolutely no communicable 'program' associated with the music which is entirely, severely 'absolute' as a classical work." He calls attention to the cyclic character of the form and to the persistence in all the three movements of a three-note figure.

"Severely", "absolute" music — but the symphony is charged with emotion and with contending emotions. By reason of contents, its musical ideas, its treatment of them, the technical workmanship, the strain of mysticism alternating with human warmth, the melodic beauty. The boldness, never experimental, of the harmonic schemes, the ingenuity and the taste displayed in the orchestral dress, this symphony is by far the most important work that has come from England for many years; one of the most important that has come from Europe.

When the symphonic poems by Bax were played by this orchestra the charge of occasional diffuseness, if not vagueness, was urged against him, while full justice was done to the fine, poetic qualities. It might have been said that he was then lulled at too great length by the enchanting airs he heard in the Faery Hills and in the Garden of Fand. In this symphony even more than in his first symphony played two years ago, there is still, especially in the second movement, the Celtic feeling that is characteristic of many of his works; there are themes, there are harmonies of tender, wistful beauty, not free from a pleasing melancholy, but these pages only relieve and enhance the heroic character of the work as a whole, the defiant pages or those of doubt and questioning until there is at the end submission to the inevitable, if not a lasting peace. These final pages, artfully simple, leading to silence, are among the most eloquent and impressive in the symphony.

That the audience realizes the strength and the beauty, the originality of invention and expression was shown by the manner in which the symphony was received. Seldom, if ever, has the first performance of a new symphony been so heartily and honestly applauded.

Mr. Iturbi, whose playing of concertos by the Mozart and Beethoven aroused enthusiasm in Philadelphia and New York, chose for Boston the "Triangle" concerto by Liszt that had not been placed on a program of these concerts since 1913. His performance was one of dazzling brilliance; nor is this all that is to be said. The concerto itself is much more than a parade piece; it is shrewdly, musically planned, and not only for the glory of a virtuoso; there are pages of genuine and haunting charm that test the soul as well as the fingers of a pianist. The delicacy and poetry of Mr. Iturbi's interpretation of these passages were as conspicuous as his triumphant bravura. Yes, when played as Mr. Iturbi played it, this concerto is exciting; but it is more than an appeal to the nerves. It was a pleasure to find that Mr. Iturbi is not a "specialist," for a specialist in music is a fearsome wild fowl. To excel in the playing of Mozart's music stamps one as a thorough musician of knowledge, taste and charm. This one is indeed, an artist. To excel also in this music of Liszt's awakens further admiration and respect. As remarkable as the piano playing was the orchestral accompaniment. Mr. Iturbi was recalled many times; Dr. Koussevitzky was greeted most warmly when he came on the platform to conduct "The Pines of Rome." Of Respighi's four movements, the second, "The Pines Near a Catacomb," has the most enduring musical and emotional value. The first movement is conspicuous for its orchestration; the third movement does not gain by the introduction of a gramophone-nightingale; the march of victorious Romans in the Appian way owes its effect only to steadily increasing dynamic force and the anticipation of a thundering climax.

As an introduction to one of the most interesting concerts of several seasons, Weber's overture was performed in an appropriately dramatic manner with due regard to the singing of the suave second theme and the unearthliness of the mysterious episode for strings.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week's program will comprise Roussel's "Petite Suite." Tournier's "Feerie" prelude and dance for harp (Mr. Zighera) and orchestra; the second suite from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe," and Dvorak's "From the New World" symphony.

Music in Boston

Koussevitzky Offers New Symphony by Bax

Arnold Bax's Symphony No. 2, dedicated to Serge Koussevitzky, had its first performance in Symphony Hall, Boston, on the afternoon of Dec. 13, as the principal item in the eighth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

For some reason, possibly to make it harder, Bax describes this symphony as written "in E minor and C major"; a novel designation which has served to rouse a deal of discussion already. The fact seems to be that the composer has hesitated between the two keys. E minor has rather the edge in the first movement, but C major wins out in the end.

The symphony, for full orchestra, is in three movements, an Allegro Moderato, an Andante and an Allegro Feroce. The first movement is the most impressive. It abounds in thematic material and is marked by the atmospheric quality that inheres in all Bax's music. The form is roughly regular, with diversions ad lib which nevertheless are fused into unity. There are of course evidences of the influence of Rimsky, Debussy, Wagner, Strauss; but there is nothing that could be called imitative. This music is characteristic. Faërie rules, but this imaginative world nevertheless is substantial. If you tried to demolish it, you would find it necessary to use mechanical drills, as they do in taking apart the old Federal Building in Boston.

The Andante falls off in invention and in treatment, though no doubt it heard without the preceding movement it would strike us as charming. The Finale starts off ferociously enough, to conclude with a pianissimo. Shall Bax be accused of writing an English "Pathetic"? He himself has said that the end "should be very broad indeed, with a kind of oppressive catastrophic mood." That "oppressive" sense, a sense of struggle, pervades in fact the whole work. But we are glad the composer has not provided us with an elaborate program. His music is interesting and impressive as music.

The composer also had expressed confidence that this work would receive "a finer first performance than any previous work of mine." Without making comparisons, it may be said that one cannot imagine a finer performance than it received. The orchestra played brilliantly in this, as it had played in Weber's "Euryanthe" Overture, which opened the concert—a highly dramatized reading of a highly dramatic piece of music.

When Arturo Toscanini led his orchestra from La Scala in a triumphal tour of the United States, in the season of 1920-21, the visitors felt, according to the Italian conductor's biographer, Tobia Nicotra, that with all their successes elsewhere, they had not won the accolade until the approval of the Boston public had been bestowed upon them. This flattering opinion evidently is not shared by José Iturbi and Dr. Koussevitzky. For this Spanish pianist, acclaimed a master-interpreter of Mozart, was presented to the Boston Symphony audience in the Liszt E-flat Concerto.

He had an ovation, it is true, with handclapping starting before the final notes and with "Bravos" resounding; but what conservatory graduate cannot win an ovation with this sort of music? It is true that he displayed a wondrous technique; but wondrous technique runs in the streets. It is true that he employed an unexpected delicacy of touch and purity of phrasing, as they say Joseffy used to do; but it is also true that he used an exaggerated rubato.

A pity, that a great orchestra and a (by report) great pianist should be thus thrown away.

The final item listed on the program was Respighi's "Pines of Rome," but whether the nightingale was in good voice you will never learn from this reporter. L. A. S.

Full Afternoon, New Symphony, New Virtuoso

Bax Running High and Rich, Iturbi for Fineness, Romantic Moods

A WEEK ago Ravel's devil's dance taught the matinee audience at Symphony Hall to stamp out its pleasure—with feet, upon the floor. Such response may have suited "Bolero"; but the assembled matrons and juniors (as the advertisements have it) learned their lesson too well. Mr. Iturbi, playing Liszt's Concerto in E-flat (1855) with the Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon was as far as might be from that orchestra whipping out Ravel's tour de force (1928). A bolero happens to be Spanish dance; Mr. Iturbi happens to be Spanish pianist. Therewith ends any conceivable bond between the two. The matinee audience, taking pleasure in the newcomer, stamped out two recalls for him after as many more bestowed by hands. Every mother of a family knows her reactions when the baby does a "cute" thing for the first time, when subsequently it has become a habit. It is needless to press that analogy.

Speculative bystanders, having little to occupy their minds while the succeeding "Pines of Rome" belabored their ears, fell to wondering how much of the applause wreathed around Mr. Iturbi belonged also to Liszt's once hackneyed, now neglected, Concerto. A fat paragraph of pianists played it at the Symphony Concerts between 1885 and 1913. Since that time, the venerable "program-ist" waited nearly seventeen years before he could reprint favorite pages about "the concerto with a triangle" and to the greater glory of its tinkle. Nobody nowadays excites himself about that instrument. Indeed it is rather hard to descry or to hear when a modernist brings up, like a general of artillery, whole batteries of percussion. Much more in the Concerto precludes any excitement over it in December, 1929. Elderly men like to tell how "the great genera-of romantic pianists ended it in a h of dazzling bravura but in lordly of tone and motion, slowly expanding. Once upon a time it was accounted marvel of difficult exaction, whereat Toch, handing his newest Concerto to Sanromá, would probably smile his shoulder. The books tell with stately breadth the opening measured to unfold upon sympathetic how the Scherzo struck sparks, not from the triangle; how the whole passed for a tour de force of power brilliance, a romantic fantasia in to-disguise.

ody, unless, possibly, Mr. Horowitz now play "Liszt in E-flat" (as they to call it) in that voice and style not sound shamming and hollow. Musical times change; we mortals them; for the while they are not to the mid-nineteenth-century rocks. Mr. Iturbi, who has a mind and it, made no attempt to recall that n age, as if it were really golden. Koussevitzky, who in spite of his rnism, shelters a romantic impulse, id to the temptation only at the out- f the Concerto, quickly put it by; eforth agreed with the pianist. For turbi's notion and accomplishment Liszt in E-flat" is of a brilliantly led music, to be played precisely droltly, with incessant glint of tone, ation of rhythm, sparkle of bravura. piano, like that of most in the new ation, is an instrument of percus- not of simulated song. Nothing in Concerto tempts him to sentiment. ives it no airs, preferring to find in ces.

e outcome was a performance re- able for clarity of outline, vivacity ce and rhythm, charm of tone, melt- euphonies with the orchestral part, ring ornament, light and poised ry. It was as though Mr. Iturbi the faded Concerto in his hand; ed it this way and that until every had caught the light; while Dr. sevitzky raised or lowered the cur- of the accompaniment to brighten mper the shimmer. You never can when a pianist as technically adroit as musically sensitive as Mr. Iturbi s down a museum-piece. His new with Liszt seemed much more de- le than the stalking ghost—all that ne can now summon—of the old. To n was at least to find a new sensation to experience a pleasing thrill. Yet le lobby-talk as the audience dispersed, and another said that as long ago as ighties Joseffy took the selfsame way "Liszt in E-flat" and also in A.

roughout, indeed, the concert was er a romantics' afternoon. It began a music in which they are still alive

Music in Boston

Koussevitzky Offers

New Symphony by Bax

Arnold Bax's Symphony No. 2, dedicated to Serge Koussevitzky, had its first performance in Symphony Hall, Boston, on the afternoon of Dec. 13, as the principal item in the eighth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

For some reason, possibly to make it harder, Bax describes this symphony as written "in E minor and C major"; a novel designation which has served to rouse a deal of discussion already. The fact seems to be that the composer has hesitated between the two keys. E minor has rather the edge in the first movement, but C major wins out in the end.

The symphony, for full orchestra, is in three movements, an Allegro Moderato, an Andante and an Allegro Feroce. The first movement is the most impressive. It abounds in thematic material and is marked by the atmospheric quality that inheres in all Bax's music. The form is roughly regular, with diversions ad lib which nevertheless are fused into unity. There are of course evidences of the influence of Rimsky, Debussy, Wagner, Strauss; but there is nothing that could be called imitative. This music is characteristic. Faërie rules, but this imaginative world nevertheless is substantial. If you tried to demolish it, you would find it necessary to use mechanical drills, as they do in taking apart the old Federal Building in Boston.

The Andante falls off in invention and in treatment, though no doubt if heard without the preceding movement it would strike us as charming. The Finale starts off ferociously enough, to conclude with a pianissimo. Shall Bax be accused of writing an English "Pathetic"? He himself has said that the end "should be very broad indeed, with a kind of oppressive catastrophic mood." That "oppressive" sense, a sense of struggle, pervades in fact the whole work. But we are glad the composer has not provided us with an elaborate program. His music is interesting and impressive as music.

The composer also had expressed confidence that this work would receive "a finer first performance than any previous work of mine." Without making comparisons, it may be said that one cannot imagine a finer performance than it received. The orchestra played brilliantly in this, as it had played in Weber's "Euryanthe" Overture, which opened the concert—a highly dramatized reading of a highly dramatic piece of music.

When Arturo Toscanini led his orchestra from La Scala in a triumphal tour of the United States, in the season of 1920-21, the visitors felt, according to the Italian conductor's biographer, Tobia Nicotra, that with all their successes elsewhere, they had not won the accolade until the approval of the Boston public had been bestowed upon them. This flattering opinion evidently is not shared by José Iturbi and Dr. Koussevitzky. For this Spanish pianist, acclaimed a master-interpreter of Mozart, was presented to the Boston Symphony audience in the Liszt E-flat Concerto.

He had an ovation, it is true, with handclapping starting before the final notes and with "Bravos" resounding; but what conservatory graduate cannot win an ovation with this sort of music? It is true that he displayed a wondrous technique; but wondrous technique runs in the streets. It is true that he employed an unexpected delicacy of touch and purity of phrasing, as they say Joseffy used to do; but it is also true that he used an exaggerated rubato.

A pity, that a great orchestra and a (by report) great pianist should be thus thrown away.

The final item listed on the program was Respighi's "Pines of Rome," but whether the nightingale was in good voice you will never learn from this reporter. L. A. S.

Full After Stock New Sym New V

Bax Running Hig Iturbi for Romantic M

A WEEK ago Ravel taught the mat Symphony Hall pleasure—with floor. Such response ed "Bolero"; but the trons and juniors (as ments have it) learned well. Mr. Iturbi, playl certo in E-flat (1855) wit Orchestra yesterday af far as might be from whipping out Ravel's to A bolero happens to be Mr. Iturbi happens to be Therewith ends any c between the two. The n taking pleasure in the ne out two recalls for him more bestowed by hands of a family knows her the baby does a "cute first time, when subseq come a habit. It is that analogy. Speculative bystander occupy their minds whi "Pines of Rome" bela fell to wondering how plause wreathed aroun longed also to Liszt's now neglected, Concer graph of pianists play phony Concerts betwe Since that time, the ve ist" waited nearly before he could repri about "the concerto wi to the greater glory body nowadays excites instrument. Indeed to descry or to hear brings up, like a ge whole batteries of perc in the Concerto precl ment over it in Decem men like to tell how

High	Low
56 5/8	54
50 1/2	58
10 3/4	8
60	58
60 1/2	56
11	4
33	34
43 3/4	4
107 1/2	104
85	77
144 7/8	144
120	114
107 1/4	104
88 1/8	80
85 1/2	8
24 3/4	21
114	110
86 3/8	79
49 1/8	38
54	54
72	71
22 1/4	18
39 3/8	33
70	70
36 1/2	33
31	12
46 3/4	40
48	47
53	47
95	90
5 1/2	8
32	28
93	91
125 1/8	11
87	76
107	106
31 1/2	29
76 1/2	76
105 1/2	105
5	4
3/8
78	75
52 3/4	48
45 1/2	44
29 3/4	28
22 1/2	19
49 1/4	46
43 3/4	36
54 1/4	51
131	116
109 1/2	107
97 1/2	96
58 3/8	51
113	110
92 3/4	92
69 1/2	61
86	86
29	25
7	5
64	44

tion" of romantic pianists ended it in no rush of dazzling bravura but in lordly pomp of tone and motion, slowly expanding. Once upon a time it was accounted a marvel of difficult exaction, whereat Herr Toch, handing his newest Concerto to Mr. Sanromá, would probably smile over his shoulder. The books tell with what stately breadth the opening measures used to unfold upon sympathetic ears; how the Scherzo struck sparks, not merely from the triangle; how the whole piece passed for a tour de force of power and brilliance, a romantic fantasia in concerto-disguise.

Nobody, unless, possibly, Mr. Horowitz could now play "Liszt in E-flat" (as they used to call it) in that voice and style and not sound shamming and hollow. The musical times change; we mortals with them; for the while they are not kind to the mid-nineteenth-century romantics. Mr. Iturbi, who has a mind and uses it, made no attempt to recall that golden age, as if it were really golden. Dr. Koussevitzky, who in spite of his modernism, shelters a romantic impulse, yielded to the temptation only at the outset of the Concerto, quickly put it by; thenceforth agreed with the pianist. For Mr. Iturbi's notion and accomplishment of "Liszt in E-flat" is of a brilliantly jewelled music, to be played precisely and adroitly, with incessant glint of tone, animation of rhythm, sparkle of bravura. His piano, like that of most in the new generation, is an instrument of percussion, not of simulated song. Nothing in the Concerto tempts him to sentiment. He gives it no airs, preferring to find in it graces.

The outcome was a performance remarkable for clarity of outline, vivacity of pace and rhythm, charm of tone, melting euphonies with the orchestral part, glittering ornament, light and poised energy. It was as though Mr. Iturbi held the faded Concerto in his hand; turned it this way and that until every facet had caught the light; while Dr. Koussevitzky raised or lowered the curtain of the accompaniment to brighten or temper the shimmer. You never can tell when a pianist as technically adroit and as musically sensitive as Mr. Iturbi takes down a museum-piece. His new way with Liszt seemed much more desirable than the stalking ghost—all that anyone can now summon—of the old. To listen was at least to find a new sensation and to experience a pleasing thrill. Yet in the lobby-talk as the audience dispersed, one and another said that as long ago as the eighties Joseffy took the selfsame way with "Liszt in E-flat" and also in A.

Throughout, indeed, the concert was rather a romantics' afternoon. It began with a music in which they are still alive and speaking—Weber's Overture to his opera "Euryanthe." It is a good old piece, a stock-piece as the orchestra evidently believed when it scrabbled audibly through the first dozen pages before the conductor reined it into stride. Schumann sits, dreams and makes romantic music. Liszt writes it as though it were "theater" and he no inconsiderable actor. Berlioz strips it to a quivering nerve as in his melodies; or fleshes it with something nowadays very like bombast. Out of Weber it foams impetuously—say at the beginning of this Overture to "Euryanthe." To this day there is no resisting such an ardent torrent. He stays it for the muted, mysterious Largo as one who would concentrate and breathe soft his intensities; but not for long. He whips up a fugato until it sounds operatic; ends with a jubilant and triumphant flourish. He flings out the overture as though he were brimming with a dozen others; it is full of hot blood and gusto. Willy-nilly, the listener hears and believes. It is the compulsion of the romantics, in most others now withered. And for Weber the orchestra was vivid as a sunset, alive as a wind.

Count Respighi, who ended the concert with "Pines of Rome," among the twentieth-century romantics. He sees children at play under the trees of the Villa Borghese and magnifies them into the little darting monsters of the shifting temple, broken rhythms, abrupt phrases of his first division—the modern way with a romantic impression. He wanders near catacombs and hears a mysterious hymn echoing from them. Berlioz or Liszt might have done as much and confided it to nearly the same instruments. He hears the nightingale singing from the pines of the Janiculum—notorious romantic pastime after dark. Berlioz's Harold, Liszt's Tasso, might have kept him company. They, however, would have relied upon the wind choir for the bird-voice, as at first Respighi makes shift to do. Then he glances up at the calendar on the wall of his work-room. "Dio mio! it is 1924," and forthwith shuts it up in a gramophone-record. From which—to tell the truth—it sounded yesterday rather throaty. To end, the legionaries pounding up the Apian Way. By this time we have learned a trick or two about high-rhythmed tonal masses in crescendo; while Respighi, as everyone knows, is as absorbent as a sponge. . . . It is not necessary, though possibly easy, to agree with the listener who trusted that as soon as the legion had got its breath, a centurion would be dispatched to wring the neck of the gramophoned nightingale. If not, what is Caesar Augustus—or il Signore Mussolini—for?

her romanticism, how-cending Respighi's so-alive to this day, ever-long as the sons of men passionately: would also passion. It fills Bax's ny, played for the first after strenuous rehearsal and truth and life by Dr. and the orchestra. (The evidence was the strag- of the Overture to Of the two keys with xceptionally labelled the earned and acute colleague scoured in these columns. and the fertility of the the, the manipulative readi- and imagination—for it is that further distinguish phony. For the moment r salient matters. many say, this is the day things. Composers choose ns; busy themselves with ; expand them prudently; conomically. Bax, to the etches spacious canvas writes full and ardent. his Symphony nobly: ily; achieved it in un- ion of mind and heart and ntention, the tumult, the ght, the descents of tonal burthened restlessness, nly to thrust forth—all he long first movement are ase of deep and welling it, if the hearer likes, the souls for their own ex- tlement enemies and fates. was pro-vement, lyrical, insistent, ers out-d calm. Yet this measure require- is bitter-edged, repining. These final division begins in a t stocks, for the conflict; presses it antici-ung theme; wages it it here and there as if in ends less exhausted than nless the burden that may not be of Eng- that will not change. A e up to ic, if the hearer likes— ear, giv-'s bitter, angry First ey condi-ence and deepening, less adverse mystical comfort. Yet ng Hatr-usic of passion and ex- during with a sardonic time, eld of conflict to the or better, unashamed to speak increased, he soul. new year nphony of uncommon doubt, op-y of straitened music. are de- bear forty minutes of arer coal- ease on the part of a individual object that Bax over- however, id. Possibly there are ally cheap second movement that urd than deepen insistence. On the other hand, recall those abounding and usually significant themes, diverse in profile, diverse in substance and implication. Consider again a musical development and emotional progress both seldom flagging. Note no less the multifarious texture, the intensified harmonic and instrumental color, the rhythmic energy of all these pages.

Observe again not only the ingenuity but the imagination with which a score of devices, intrinsically modernistic and of a prosaic music of dissonance, are wrought into a music essentially romantic, underlyingly songful; are not only transfused but vitalized to new purpose. Here indeed in first fruition is the issue out of present tonal incoherence which many have visioned—the incorporation of the new means into the old substance, there to generate a more plangent speech of music, a more piercing speech of emotion. . . . A Symphony nobly conceived, loftily planned; passionately released, sustained at intensity and exaltation; full-freighted, deep-fleshed. Rarely are they written in this day and year. Rarely do they conquer us who live within it. An exception, as it seemed yesterday, might be Arnold Bax—in two keys. Maybe, the creatrix of "The Constant Nymph," with her triumphant Symphony—likewise in two keys—was his sub-conscious prophet.

H. T. P.

ITURBI SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Spanish Pianist Is Given an Ovation

Arnold Bax' Second Symphony Played for First Time

Jose Iturbi, the noted Spanish pianist, now making his first American tour, was given an ovation at yesterday's Symphony concert for his remarkably brilliant playing of Liszt's Concerto in E flat. Applause was loud and long, many stamped their feet as well as clapped their hands, recalls were numerous.

Iturbi, who impressed those who heard his Boston debut the other day

at a charity concert as an artist of the first rank, is now well on the way to wide and lasting popularity in Boston.

A second recital by him, to be held preferably at Symphony Hall, would, if now arranged for, undoubtedly draw a large audience. No new solo performer since Horowitz has been so cordially, so demonstratively received by a Boston audience as Iturbi was yesterday. The chief item on Dr Koussevitzky's program was a new symphony by Arnold Bax, favorably received by the audience.

Mr Iturbi was born at Valencia, Spain, in 1895, and received in 1913 a first prize for pianoforte playing from the Paris Conservatoire. From 1919 to 1923 he was head of the piano department of the Geneva Conservatoire, a position he held until 1923. He has in recent years toured Europe and South America with marked success as a concert pianist. He made his American debut Oct 11, 1929, as soloist with the Philadelphia Orchestra in Philadelphia.

He has neither the long hair nor the affected mannerisms the 19th century expected of celebrated pianists. Yesterday's audience saw a quiet and business-like young man, serious and intent on his task, yet obviously certain of his ability to carry it through. The one trait betokening what press agents describe as "personality" was a remarkably ingratiating smile, which, however, appeared only when the concerto was over and the remarkable, almost unprecedented, demonstration from the audience well under way.

Sureness of Taste

Iturbi began his first Boston recital Dec 2 with Mozart's A-major sonata, and for his New York debut Dec 7 with the Philharmonic Orchestra chose a Mozart concerto. In Philadelphia, for his American debut, he played Beethoven's Fourth Concerto. These pieces, of course, demanded of him a fineness of musicianship and a sureness of taste which yesterday's show piece by Liszt gave him small opportunity to reveal.

Liszt's concerto demands, if it is to make its effect, a technique and a showmanship almost, though not quite, as rare as the musicianship the classics exact of a first-rate performer. Iturbi left no doubt in yesterday's audience of his prowess as a virtuoso, and anyone paying close attention could see from the subtlety and elegance of his phrasing and dynamics that there was no mere virtuoso, no superlative pianopounder, but a true artist. One cannot, however, help being sorry he did not play us Mozart or Beethoven.

and speaking—Weber's Overture opera "Euryanthe." It is a good old stock-piece as the orchestra evidently believed when it scabbled a through the first dozen pages before conductor reined it into stride. Mann sits, dreams and makes romantic music. Liszt writes it as though it "theater" and he no inconsiderable Berlioz strips it to a quivering nerve in his melodies; or fleshes it with thing nowadays very like bombast of Weber it foams impetuously—the beginning of this Overture to ryanthe." To this day there is no ing such an ardent torrent. He stands for the muted, mysterious Largo a who would concentrate and breathe his intensities; but not for long. He up a fugato until it sounds operatic with a jubilant and triumphant flourish. He flings out the overture as though were brimming with a dozen others; full of hot blood and gusto. Willy—the listener hears and believes. It is compulsion of the romantics, in mosters now withered. And for Weber orchestra was vivid as a sunset, alive wind.

Count Respighi, who ended the century with "Pines of Rome," among the twentieth-century romantics. He sees child at play under the trees of the Villa ghesse and magnifies them into the darting monsters of the shifting broken rhythms, abrupt phrases of first division—the modern way with mantic impression. He wanders near combs and hears a mysterious echoing from them. Berlioz or might have done as much and come it to nearly the same instruments; hears the nightingale singing from pines of the Janiculum—notorious romantic pastime after dark. Berlioz's Liszt's Tasso, might have kept him pany. They, however, would have lled upon the wind choir for the voice, as at first Respighi makes sh do. Then he glances up at the calendar on the wall of his work-room. "Did it is 1924," and forthwith shuts it up gramophone-record. From which—the truth—it sounded yesterday throaty. To end, the legionaries p ing up the Appian Way. By this we have learned a trick or two high-rhythmed tonal masses in crescendo while Respighi, as everyone knows as absorbent as a sponge. . . . It is necessary, though possibly easy, to with the listener who trusted that soon as the legion had got its breac centurion would be dispatched to the neck of the gramophone night If not, what is Caesar Augustus—or more Mussolini—for?

There is another romanticism, however, far transcending Respighi's sonorous surfaces, alive to this day, everlastingly alive so long as the sons of men think and feel passionately: would also release their passion. It fills Bax's Second Symphony, played for the first time anywhere, after strenuous rehearsal and in manifold truth and life by Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra. (The circumstantial evidence was the straggling beginning of the Overture to "Euryanthe.") Of the two keys with which Bax exceptionally labelled the Symphony a learned and acute colleague has already discoursed in these columns. He also exposed the fertility of the thematic invention, the manipulative readiness, resource and imagination—for it is nothing less—that further distinguish this new Symphony. For the moment there are other salient matters.

Musically, as many say, this is the day of small, lean things. Composers choose the lesser forms; busy themselves with minute motifs; expand them prudently; clothe them economically. Bax, to the contrary, stretches spacious canvas; fills it richly writes his Symphony nobly: He conceived his Symphony nobly: planned it loftily; achieved it in unfeigned exaltation of mind and heart and hand. The contention, the tumult, the rifts of tonal light, the descents of tonal shadow, the burthened restlessness, thrust back only to thrust forth—all these through the long first movement are passionate release of deep and welling emotion. Call it, if the hearer likes, the battle of men's souls for their own existence against enemies and fates.

The second movement, lyrical, insistent, would soothe and calm. Yet this measure and that period, is bitter-edged, repining. The third and final division begins in a new marshalling for the conflict; presses it again in a far-flung theme; wages it fiercely; lightens it here and there as if in brave defiance; ends less exhausted than oppressed—the burden that may not be lifted, the omens that will not change. A pessimistic music, if the hearer likes—sequence to Bax's bitter, angry First Symphony, sequence and deepening, less touched with mystical comfort. Yet throughout a music of passion and exaltation, at odds with a sardonic time, preferring the field of conflict to the seat of mockery, unashamed to speak nobly of and to the soul.

Second, a Symphony of uncommon richness in a day of straitened music. Those who cannot bear forty minutes of a passionate self-release on the part of a composer, will object that Bax overwrites and is turgid. Possibly there are measures in the second movement that less move forward than deepen insistence. On the other hand, recall those abounding and usually significant themes, diverse in profile, diverse in substance and implication. Consider again a musical development and emotional progress both seldom flagging. Note no less the multifarious texture, the intensified harmonic and instrumental color, the rhythmic energy of all these pages.

Observe again not only the ingenuity but the imagination with which a score of devices, intrinsically modernistic and of a prosaic music of dissonance, are wrought into a music essentially romantic, underlyingly songful; are not only transfused but vitalized to new purpose. Here indeed in first fruition is the issue out of present tonal incoherence which many have visioned—the incorporation of the new means into the old substance, there to generate a more plangent speech of music, a more piercing speech of emotion. . . . A Symphony nobly conceived, loftily planned; passionately released, sustained at intensity and exaltation; full-fledged, deep-fleshed. Rarely are they written in this day and year. Rarely do they conquer us who live within it. An exception, as it seemed yesterday, might be Arnold Bax—in two keys. Maybe, the creatrix of "The Constant Nymph," with her triumphant Symphony—likewise in two keys—was his sub-conscious prophet.

H. T. P.

ITURBI SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Spanish Pianist Is Given an Ovation

Arnold Bax' Second Symphony Played for First Time

Jose Iturbi, the noted Spanish pianist, now making his first American tour, was given an ovation at yesterday's Symphony concert for his remarkably brilliant playing of Liszt's Concerto in E flat. Applause was loud and long, many stamped their feet as well as clapped their hands, recalls were numerous.

Iturbi, who impressed those who heard his Boston debut the other day

at a charity concert as an artist of the first rank, is now well on the way to wide and lasting popularity in Boston.

A second recital by him, to be held preferably at Symphony Hall, would, if now arranged for, undoubtedly draw a large audience. No new solo performer since Horowitz has been so cordially, so demonstratively received by a Boston audience as Iturbi was yesterday. The chief item on Dr. Koussevitzky's program was a new symphony by Arnold Bax, favorably received by the audience.

Mr Iturbi was born at Valencia, Spain, in 1895, and received in 1913 a first prize for pianoforte playing from the Paris Conservatoire. From 1919 to 1923 he was head of the piano department of the Geneva Conservatoire, a position he held until 1923. He has in recent years toured Europe and South America with marked success as a concert pianist. He made his American debut Oct 11, 1929, as soloist with the Philadelphia Orchestra in Philadelphia.

He has neither the long hair nor the affected mannerisms the 19th century expected of celebrated pianists. Yesterday's audience saw a quiet and business-like young man, serious and intent on his task, yet obviously certain of his ability to carry it through. The one trait betokening what press agents describe as "personality" was a remarkably ingratiating smile, which, however, appeared only when the concerto was over and the remarkable, almost unprecedented, demonstration from the audience well under way.

Sureness of Taste

Iturbi began his first Boston recital Dec 2 with Mozart's A-major sonata, and for his New York debut Dec 7 with the Philharmonic Orchestra chose a Mozart concerto. In Philadelphia, for his American debut, he played Beethoven's Fourth Concerto. These pieces, of course, demanded of him a fineness of musicianship and a sureness of taste which yesterday's show piece by Liszt gave him small opportunity to reveal.

Liszt's concerto demands, if it is to make its effect, a technique and a showmanship almost, though not quite, as rare as the musicianship the classics exact of a first-rate performer. Iturbi left no doubt in yesterday's audience of his prowess as a virtuoso, and anyone paying close attention could see from the subtlety and elegance of his phrasing and dynamics that there was no mere virtuoso, no superlative pianopounder, but a true artist. One cannot, however, help being sorry he did not play us Mozart or Beethoven.

Bax's Second Symphony, dedicated to Serge Koussevitzky and published in 1929, was yesterday played for the first time in public. Its composer, a Londoner by birth and residence, is known here for a number of impressionistic pieces for orchestra and for pianoforte, associated with Irish, or as he would doubtless prefer to say, with "Keltic" subjects. His first symphony was played at these concerts Dec 16, 1927, but the present writer did not hear it.

The symphony heard yesterday is interesting chiefly for several of its episodic passages. It contains some salient musical ideas, none of which are developed. The piece is overlong, and far too rhapsodic to deserve its title. Bax could have made better use of these ideas in short impressionistic tone poems. His style is incurably diffuse, with no trace of either desire or ability to create musical structures on a large scale. The numerous climaxes the work contains, some of which employ the full power of orchestra and organ, grow wearisome because they are not prepared far in advance, or fitted into a carefully-planned musical scheme. There are also numerous reminiscences of the work of other and greater composers. The performance was painstakingly eloquent, and the work was more cordially received than is that of most living writers represented on Boston Symphony programs.

Romantic Music

The other members were Weber's "Euryanthe" overture and Respighi's "Pines of Rome," so that the program as a whole had an admirable artistic unity. Dr Koussevitzky conducted with his characteristic dramatic fervor, oversteering most of the points he wished to make, but certainly driving them home to the average listener. Restraint, poise, balance are qualities less obviously but none the less certainly demanded of an interpreter of romantic music than they are of a performer of the classics.

The program announced for next week includes a new suite by Roussel, a piece for harp by Tournier, with Mr Zighera, first harpist of the orchestra, as soloist; the second suite from Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe," and Dvorak's "New World" Symphony.

P. R.

THEODOR SEYDEL MUSICIAN, DIES

Was Member of Symphony Orchestra for 33 Years

Theodor Seydel, a member of the Boston Symphony orchestra for 33 years and distinguished master of the double bass, died yesterday morning at Forest Hills Hospital from the results of a shock which he suffered last May.

Mr. Seydel made his home at 15 Warwick road, Brookline, where his widow, Mrs. Emetie Buettel Seydel, now lives. He is also survived by two daughters, Irma and Olga.

Mme. Irma Seydel, taught for many years by her own father, is now known internationally as a violinist of genius. She is at present on tour as concertmaster of Miss Ethel Leginska's Women's Symphony. Mrs. Olga Seydel Stiles is society editor of The Boston Herald.

Born in 1867 in Saxony, Germany, Mr. Seydel journeyed to this country after completing his musical studies at the Leipzig Royal Conservatory of Music. For one year, he played with the Chicago Symphony orchestra, and then, for 33 years, filled an important post in the symphony orchestra here until last year, when he joined the ranks of the St. Louis Symphony orchestra.

Beside his orchestral work, Mr. Seydel was also widely known as a teacher of both double bass and violin, and as a conductor. He was a member of the Euclid lodge, A. F. and A. M., and the Steuben Society.

Funeral services will be held on Monday afternoon at Forest Hills chapel.

Funeral of Symphony Player Is Held at Forest Hills

Trans. Dec. 16, 1929
With music by a quartet from the Musicians' Protective Association and by Francis W. Snow, organist of Trinity Church, the funeral of Theodor Seydel of 15 Warwick road, Brookline, a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for thirty-three years, was held at the Forest Hills Crematory Chapel this afternoon.

Rev. George A. Mark, pastor of the First Church in Somerville (Unitarian), officiated. Mr. Snow played a choral prelude of Karg-Elert and another of Bach, and Karg-Elert's "O, Thou That Breakest Bands." The place of burial has not been determined.

SYMPHONY AUDIENCE RESPONDS

Iturbi, Pianist, Makes Sensation in Liszt's 1st Concerto

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The Friday afternoon Symphony Concerts are losing their traditional air of sobriety. Last week it was Ravel's "Bolero" of the protracted crescendo that launched a furore of excitement. Yesterday it was the newly arrived Spanish pianist, Jose Iturbi, bringing to electrifying performance that much-ridden war-horse, Liszt's Concerto in E-flat.

A MASTER OF ELEGANCE

The present musical years, so lean in some respects, are happily not falling behind their predecessors in the production of remarkable pianists. Two seasons ago it was the tornadic Horowitz that inflamed a pair of Symphony audiences; now comes Mr. Iturbi to create yet another sensation.

That the Russian and the Spaniard should be so alike in their power to arouse their listeners and so unlike their methods of doing it is renewed proof of the range and scope of musical performance. The one is dynamic, a super-technician inclined, as his latest Symphony Hall recital suggested, to let his volcanic energies lead him into inartistic excesses. The other, singularly poised and self-controlled, is a supreme master of musical elegance, of rhythmic verve, of clear-cut, crystalline tone.

In Temper of the Day

There is in his playing rare fineness and precision that yet escapes any hint of aridity. Other performances of Liszt's Concerto in Symphony Hall, for example that of Mr. Rosenthal several seasons ago, have had a breadth, a sweep, an overpowering force that was not in Mr. Iturbi's highly polished and sensitive version of yesterday. But the Spaniard's way with the music is more in accord with the temper of our own day, and one more likely to freshen and reanimate a romantic and rhetorical music. Mr. Iturbi, who played a short time ago at the Hotel Statler, is certain sooner or later to give a recital in Symphony Hall, and when he does he should pack that auditorium to the doors.

Besides the stimulating Iturbi, yesterday's concert offered the first performance anywhere of the Second Symphony of Arnold Bax, dedicated to Dr. Koussevitzky, together with Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe," in a performance so inflated, exaggerated and over-contrived that, as may sometimes happen, it fell in consequence quite flat, and finally, in a most eloquent performance, Respighi's now popular "Pines of Rome" of the shrilling children, the gloomy catacombs, the phonograph nightingale and the cataclysmic march of Caesar's legions.

In Uncongenial Field

Though his Symphony proved a work of uneven interest and unequal value, Bax is not a composer to be lightly dismissed. Yet it is possible to feel that in his two symphonies, of which the first is the more significant, he is laboring in an uncongenial field.

A moody, poetic, essentially subjective composer, this Celt seems more at home in the symphonic poem than in the symphony, where logic of design the severer, more abstract domain of design and continuity of thought are prime essentials.

Mr. Iturbi for New Pianist,
New Symphony by Bax
In Two Keys

is very much on the musical map these days, and it has not, happily, been backward in sending us proof of the fact. We have lately welcomed its necromantic guitarist, Segovia; its admirable conductor, Fernandez Arbos, and its remarkable quartet of lutenists, the Aguillars. As for the incomparable Casals, he is, of course, an old friend of music-loving Americans. Now we have the pleasure of greeting the newest of Spain's musical exports, to this market, the eminent pianist, Jose Iturbi, a native of Valencia who, in the course of his thirty-four years, has made himself one of the most distinguished of European virtuosos. He has already been heard in Philadelphia and [at recital] in Boston.

New: From Bax

symphony as being the title-page, dedary) first, stand these Koussevitzky, Second nor and C, for orches-
th. Literary men have the idea of a sym-Composers, notably ticed systematic poly-given (so far as mem-records serve) a double a piece of music. For t said that the sym-means in two keys will not be treated to ytonality, nor even to mount of polytonality.
er.

in invention. "When new theme," seems to be one of his larger scores. The theme is always at the list of the themes of symphonies looks like a German busy with a Strauss. The size of his works is not counted four hundred measures in the first Second Symphony; two in the second; two in the third. Consistent last movement is in the second, he is thus increasing conciseness. In E minor and C is modern orchestra; three and English horn, three clarinet, two bassoons; four horns, three trombones and one tenor tuba and a bass drum, side-

In Two Keys

The last movement, before the final recapitulation, contains the same passage, literally, note for note. This time, however, one emerges in C major, the key of the finale. Bax thus seems to have in mind a common source from which the two keys proceed. Further, at the very end, while strings grow quieter and quieter upon a sub-dominant "six-four" in C major, bassoons gently hint at both keys, by following the dominant E with the tonic of C. Still further: at least one theme (or rather the second half of the main theme of the first movement) without indulging in the usual crude superposition of two keys so often practised by polytonalists, is built of progressions subtly suggesting both C major and E minor. . . . Of which technical matters let the general reader be wearied no further. It is the musician's only answer to a highly technical question.

The Wealth of It

the movement; the conventional label "Angels in their own right," which is too ferocious."

y and ingeniously. The first section is a second movement, melodic, lyrical and 'cello solo, is stated and developed. The introduction of a new theme says that it is not so affording relief, but with the already heard. The last section, "if you will, exposition," but in reference to the introduction, the movement, to the fanfare of a new development. Finally, it states the main theme with its ir simpler. After g with slightly Des and 'cellos, frey horns, develop a zicato motto of the

there is a "canta-
ne, simple, lyrical, the violas with an
the chief contrast-
al, but more rhyth-
the first. There is more of the frag-
themes, and briefer
development of the
with some appear-
for coda.

is dominated by a single theme. The ten introduction occupy with the motto. Then the most important generated. The eight are somewhat of the Strauss. Not only in abundance. The new is pregnant with development as written it. These and energetically de- brass and wood- subsidiary theme large sweep and development of main theme. After are many repeated varied rhythms, as accompaniment "e." There is still of the main the ambiguous introduction to the already described. ment of the initial and a final plucking to the mysterious ing the two keys of A. H. M

Symphony Concert Fully Furnished

Mr. Iturbi for New Piano New Symphony by Bax In Two Keys

HUMAN nature in the concert is changeless. Therefore to meet the event at the Symphony Concert tomorrow and Saturday is the first advance, in Boston and with orchestra Jose Iturbi. Seemingly, he is the distinguished pianist to descend these shores this season. Mr. G. writing in The Herald Tribune début in New York last week, did to his Spanish origins and international reputation. "Spain, he wrote, is very much on the musical scene these days, and it has not, happily, been backward in sending us proof of the fact. We have lately come to its necromantic guitar, Segovia; its admirable conductor, Fernandez Arbos, and its remarkable quartet of lutenists, the Aguirres. As for the incomparable Casals, he is, of course, an old friend and music-loving American. Now we have the pleasure of greeting the newest of Spain's musical exports to this market, the eminent pianist Jose Iturbi, a native of Valencia, who, in the course of his thirty-four years, has made himself one of the most distinguished of European musicians. He has already been heard in Philadelphia and [at recital] in London.

At Symphony Hall, Mr. Iturbi will give Liszt's Concerto in E-flat, so unknown to "these concerts" that it is the word in place. He played the piece in New York last Sunday with the Harmonic Society, and the review dwelt upon his technical skill, precision and polish; his justice to the measures, his virtuosity in ornamentation. They missed, however, "the sweep and swank" which they counted appropriate to the Concerto. The inference is that Mr. Iturbi plays the piece as Josef Hofmann years ago and exceptionally, played aristocratically, as a music of few brilliant. The more interesting, should be his version.

New: From Bax

To the pianist now add a composer. For, in the strict musical sense, the event of the concert is the production of a new Symphony by the Englishman, Arnold Bax. He has ventured—writes A. H. M.—upon what none before him has dared.

He has named the symphony as being in two keys. Upon the title-page, dedication (as is customary) first, stand these words: "To Serge Koussevitzky, Second Symphony, in E minor and C, for orchestra, by Arnold Bax." Literary men have sometimes toyed with the idea of a symphony in two keys. Composers, notably Milhaud, have practiced systematic polytonality. None has given (so far as memory and available records serve) a double key-designation to a piece of music. For the fearsome, be it said that the symphony is not by any means in two keys throughout. They will not be treated to an overdose of polytonality, nor even to any considerable amount of polytonality. Of which more later.

Arnold Bax has been represented at the Symphony Concerts by his first Symphony, heard originally on a visit of the Cleveland Orchestra; by the tone-poems, "In Fairy Hills," "November Woods," "The Garden of Fand." He will be remembered as a composer of strongly Celtic leanings, with a sense of beauty at once developed and refined, a composer withal expansive and fertile. If one must classify him one would probably call him a modern romantic. He shuns neither the evanescent shimmerings of Debussy nor the far-flung melodies of Strauss nor the atonal wanderings of Schönberg. Yet it would be mistaken to call him either Debussyan, Straussian or Schönbergian. He is ardent and pregnant melodist, resourceful harmonic colorist with an eye and ear for beauty, a skillful orchestrator. Modern aesthetic theorizings do not seem to lure him, unless from them he can extract something that will serve his ideal. And that ideal is the romantic ideal of tonal splendor in melodies, harmonies, orchestra. In short, he is Arnold Bax, and no other—Englishman, Celt.

Bax is prolific in invention. "When in doubt, write a new theme," seems to cry to you from one of his larger scores. And for him the theme is always at hand. A complete list of the themes of one of his symphonies looks like a German commentator busy with a Strauss tone-poem. The size of his works is proportionate. One counts four hundred and twenty-eight measures in the first movement of this Second Symphony; two hundred and seven in the second; two hundred and twenty in the third. Considering that this last movement is in faster tempo than the second, he is thus moving toward increasing conciseness.

The Symphony in E minor and C is scored for large modern orchestra; three flutes, two oboes and English horn, three clarinets and bass clarinet, two bassoons and double bassoon; four horns, three trumpets, two tenor trombones and one bass trombone, a tenor tuba and a bass tuba; kettledrums, bass drum, side-drum, tambourine, cymbals, glockenspiel, xylophone, tam-tam, gong; celesta, piano, two harps, organ; and the usual strings. It was published in the summer of the present year.

In Two Keys

The first thing that is certain to occupy even a casual analyst is the unusual key-designation. A first glance reveals nothing beyond the fact that the first movement is predominantly in E minor, the second in B major, the third in C major. He might thus ask, not without show of reason, "Well, why not call it in E minor, B, and C?" The introduction begins on the open fifth G-D, suggesting the key of C major. Very shortly, however, there are discordant chords in trombones and bassoons, gloomy but of a grave richness, which for the moment destroy all sense of key. There are vague suggestions of C major, hints of the key of A-flat, which stands mid-way between E and C, chords common to both keys, but as yet no commitment. Near the middle of the introduction one comes to a passage upon an atonal chord with a shifting chromatic bass. From it one emerges eventually in the key of E minor, the key of the first movement.

The last movement, before the final recapitulation, contains the same passage, literally, note for note. This time, however, one emerges in C major, the key of the finale. Bax thus seems to have in mind a common source from which the two keys proceed. Further, at the very end, while strings grow quieter and quieter upon a sub-dominant "six-four" in C major, bassoons gently hint at both keys, by following the dominant E with the tonic of C. Still further: at least one theme (or rather the second half of the main theme of the first movement) without indulging in the usual crude superposition of two keys so often practiced by polytonalists, is built of progressions subtly suggesting both C major and E minor. . . . Of which technical matters let the general reader be wearied no further. It is the musician's only answer to a highly technical question.

The Wealth of It

Can that implied promise to the general reader be kept? To describe the course of this complex symphony in words without musical illustrations, whether those words be technical or non-technical, will in the very nature of the case tax the resources of language. There are three movements. The first proceeds through an introduction "Molto moderato" to an "Allegro moderato" main theme with its original second part the movement; the conventional label "Allegro moderato," which is its own brief ingamante," which is pro feroce."

cludes (1) the dark, mies already mentioned theme "declamato" clarinet, much used in the last movements.

this theme, a heavy rush of notes in the basses and cellos yields two motifs throughout the piece notes pizzicato, B-flat, form a material for all the first. There is more of the frag-

(4) Close upon comes a theme in which is again useful work. This exposition, there follows a passage discussed in the introduction. A fanfare of ridge which eventually "Allegro moderato." This "Allegro moderato" is hmed with incisive rds. As these sub-the main theme is also charmingly tely the complement of the second half of it? is pregnant with monic theme previously development as ived from the flute. of the introduction, is repeated. Then, a subsidiary theme, introduced by violas, itself an large sweep and violins, horns and is heard variously, are many repeated d chords of the be- n varied rhythms. it earlier composers as accompaniment development. le." There is still of the main section is a second n the ambiguous introduction to the already described. ment of the initial and a final plucking s to the mysterious being the two keys of first. Then for of the introduction me, the three-note conclusion. All of skeleton outline of and twenty-eight other "themelets" ated.

ar simpler. After with slightly De- es and cellos, fre- y horns, develop a zicato motto of the there is a "canta- ns, simple, lyrical, e violas with an the chief contrast- al, but more rhyth- the first. There is more of the frag- themes, and briefer development of the with some appear- for coda.

is dominated by a g theme. The ten introduction occupy th the motto. Then he most important nerated. The eight e somewhat of the trauss. Not only in mbance. The new is pregnant with or development as written it. These nd energetically de- s, brass and wood- a subsidiary theme a large sweep and ore development of main theme. After are many repeated d chords of the be- n varied rhythms. it earlier composers as accompaniment development. le." There is still of the main the ambiguous introduction to the already described. ment of the initial and a final plucking s to the mysterious being the two keys of

A. H. M.

Symphony Concert Fully Furnished

Mr. Iturbi for New Pia
New Symphony by B.
In Two Keys

HUMAN nature in the concert-changeless. Therefore to me event at the Symphony Concer-morrow and Saturday is the first a-ance, in Boston and with orchest-Jose Iturbi. Seemingly, he is the distinguished pianist to descend these shores this season. Mr. G.
writing in The Herald Tribune début in New York last week, did to his Spanish origins and interna-reputation. "Spain, he wrote, is very much on the musical these days, and it has not, hapbeen backward in sending us p-of the fact. We have lately comed its necromantic guitar
Segovia; its admirable conduc-Fernandez Arbos, and its rema-able quartet of lutenists, the Agars. As for the incomparable Cas-he is, of course, an old friend music-loving Americans. Now have the pleasure of greeting newest of Spain's musical expo-to this market, the eminent pian-Jose Iturbi, a native of Valen-who, in the course of his thirty-years, has made himself one of most distinguished of European tuosi. He has already been heard Philadelphia and [at recital] in Iton.

At Symphony Hall, Mr. Iturbi w vive Liszt's Concerto in E-flat, so unknown to "these concerts" that re is the word in place. He played the in New York last Sunday with the harmonic Society, and the revie dwelt upon his technical skill, p tion and polish; his justice to the s measures, his virtuosity in orna
They missed, however, "the sweep swank" which they counted approp to the Concerto. The inference is Mr. Iturbi plays the piece as Jo years ago and exceptionally, played aristocratically, as a music of jew brilliance. The more interesting, should be his version.

New: From Bax

To the pianist now add a composer. For, in the strict musical sense, the chief feature of the concerts is the production of a Symphony by the Englishman, Arthur Bax. He has ventured—writes A. H. Noyes—upon what none before him has da

He has named the symphony as to be in two keys. Upon the title-page of the edition (as is customary) first, stand the words: "To Serge Koussevitzky, Symphony, in E minor and C, for orchestra, by Arnold Bax." Literary men sometimes toyed with the idea of a symphony in two keys. Composers, like Milhaud, have practiced systematic polytonality. None has given (so far as any and available records serve) a key-designation to a piece of music the fearsome, be it said that polytonality is not by any means in vogue throughout. They will not be troubled by an overdose of polytonality, nor by any considerable amount of polytonality. Of which more later.

Arnold Bax has been represented by the Symphony Concerts by the Symphony, heard originally on the Cleveland Orchestra; by poems, "In Fairy Hills," "Woods," "The Garden of Fa," will be remembered as a cor, strongly Celtic leanings, with beauty at once developed and composer withal expansive. If one must classify him, probably call him a modern. He shuns neither the evanescent merings of Debussy nor the melodies of Strauss nor the at derings of Schönberg. Yet it mistaken to call him either Straussian or Schönbergian. He is a poet, a melodist, a harmonic colorist with an ear for beauty, a skillful orchestrator, a modern æsthetic theorizings do lure him, unless from them extract something that will sell. And that ideal is the romantic splendor in melodies, orchestra. In short, he is and no other—Englishman, Englishman.

Bax is prolific in invention, in doubt, write a new theme to you from one of his hands. And for him the theme is a complete list of one of his symphonies looks like a man commentator busy with a symphonic poem. The size is proportionate. One counts and twenty-eight measures movement of this Second hundred and seven in the hundred and twenty in the considering that this last is faster tempo than the second moving toward increasing

The Symphony in E scored for large modern flutes, two oboes and English clarinets and bass clarinets and double bassoon; four trumpets, two tenor trombones and one bass trombone, a tenor tuba and a bass tuba; kettledrums, bass drum, side-

J. Walter Lambert, chaplain

Christmas Frolic on Boston Tea

The annual Christmas Boston Teachers' Club was Twentieth Century Club, gram was put on, during w of more than one hundred Christmas carols. Miss Miss Catherine Coveney, M mins and Miss Julia E. St the committee.

Guests' Days to Be at Er

The English Club of School has two more guest fall program. The first tomorrow afternoon when the nation, "Casey's Comeback," directed by Frederick B. Halling Friday, Dec. 20, at the club and the Junior English present Dickens's "Christmas

Tufts Phi Lambda
Kappa to H

Phi Lambda Kappa Me at Tufts will hold its annu tomorrow evening to welc bers at its chapter hou street, Brookline. The Dr. Hyman Morrison, Pro cine at the school.

lullaby will be sung by C. J. [unclear] accompanied by the Glee Club.
Clare Hightower, violin, and Dick, harp.

Woodland Park School Christmas musical and pageant evening. "The Dream Doll" by members of grades seven and eight. The Woodland Park Chorus sang Christmas carols. "Why the Christmas Carol" will be presented on next Thursday at the Lasell Dramatic Club.

Form Round-Table

which is the body of the movement; the second bears the conventional label "Andante"; the third has its own brief introduction, "Poco largamente," which is followed by an "Allegro feroce."

The introduction includes (1) the dark, rich, gloomy harmonies already mentioned. (2) Soon a theme "declamato" by English horn and clarinet, much used in the first and also the last movements. (3) Immediately after this theme, a heavily accented, upward rush of notes in violas, 'cellos, bassoons and other low wood-winds, 'cellos, asoons and other low notes "pizzicato" in basses and 'cellos doubled by tubas, yields two motifs which are of importance throughout the symphony. The three notes pizzicato, an ascending A, E-flat, B-flat, form a motif which furnishes material for all three of the movements. (4) Close upon the heels of this motif comes a theme in flutes and trumpets which is again useful throughout the entire work. This exposition of material concluded, there follows the vague dual passage discussed in the previous paragraph. A fanfare of trumpets form the bridge which eventually leads into the "Allegro moderato".

The beginning of this "Allegro moderato" is sharply rhythmized with incisive accompanimental chords. As these subside, two clarinets sing the main theme of the movement, also charmingly rhythmical. Immediately the complement to this theme (or the second half of it?) is heard—the duo-harmonic theme previously referred to, derived from the flute-and-trumpet theme of the introduction. This double theme is repeated. Then comes the first subsidiary theme, introduced by recitativ-like violas, itself an energetic theme for violins, horns and English horn. It also is heard variously, with some reversion to the main theme. The sharply rhythmized chords of the beginning usher in what earlier composers would have made the development.

Bax develops fully and ingeniously. Near the end of this section is a second subsidiary theme, simple, melodic, lyrical. It enters for flute and 'cello solo, is in itself much repeated and developed. Unorthodox is the introduction of a new theme here. Who can say that it is not a stroke of genius, affording relief, before proceeding again with the already much-worked material? The last section, call it "recapitulation" if you will, follows largely the "exposition," but in reverse order. After reference to the opening harmonies of the introduction, to the main theme of the movement, to the "declamatory theme," to the fanfare of the introduction, and a new development of the second subsidiary, it states the two portions of the main theme with its first. Then for of the introduction me, the three-note conclusion. All of eleton outline of and twenty-eight other "themelets" ated.

ir simpler. After
g with slightly Dey and 'cellos, frey horns, develop a zicato motto of the
there is a "canta-
ins, simple, lyrical, e violas with an
the chief contrast-
al, but more rhyth-
the first. There is more of the frag-
themes, and briefer
development of the
with some appear-
for coda.

is dominated by a single theme. The ten introduction occupy the motto. Then the most important generated. The eight somewhat of the Strauss. Not only in balance. The new is pregnant with development as written it. These and energetically de- brass and wood- subsidiary theme large sweep and development of main theme. After are many repeated varied rhythms. as accompaniment e." There is still of the main the ambiguous introduction to the already described. ment of the initial and a final plucking to the mysterious the two keys of A. H. M.

A. H. M

Symphony Concert Fully Furnished

Mr. Iturbi for New Piano
New Symphony by Bax
In Two Keys

HUMAN nature in the concert is changeless. Therefore to meet the event at the Symphony Concert tomorrow and Saturday is the first advance, in Boston and with orchestra, in Jose Iturbi. Seemingly, he is the distinguished pianist to descend these shores this season. Mr. G. writing in The Herald Tribune debut in New York last week, did to his Spanish origins and international reputation. "Spain, he wrote, is very much on the musical air these days, and it has not, happily, been backward in sending us proof of the fact. We have lately come its necromantic guitar Segovia; its admirable conductor Fernandez Arbos, and its remarkable quartet of lutenists, the Agars. As for the incomparable Cashe is, of course, an old friend music-loving Americans. Now have the pleasure of greeting the newest of Spain's musical exports to this market, the eminent pianist Jose Iturbi, a native of Valencia who, in the course of his thirty-four years, has made himself one of the most distinguished of European virtuosos. He has already been heard in Philadelphia and [at recital] in London.

At Symphony Hall, Mr. Iturbi will give Liszt's Concerto in E-flat, so unknown to "these concerts" that it is the word in place. He played the in New York last Sunday with the harmonic Society, and the review dwelt upon his technical skill, precision and polish; his justice to the treasures, his virtuosity in ornamentation. They missed, however, "the sweep and swank" which they counted appropriate to the Concerto. The inference is Mr. Iturbi plays the piece as Jose years ago and exceptionally, played aristocratically, as a music of jewel brilliance. The more interesting, should be his version.

New: From Bax

To the pianist now add a composer. For, in the strict musical sense, the event of the concert is the production of a Symphony by the Englishman, Arnold Bax. He has ventured—writes A. H. M.—upon what none before him has dared.

He has named the symphony as "In Two Keys." Upon the title-page is the customary first, standard words: "To Serge Koussevitzky, Symphony, in E minor and C, for orchestra, by Arnold Bax." Literary men sometimes toyed with the idea of a symphony in two keys. Composers, Milhaud, have practiced systematic tonality. None has given (so far as I know) and available records serve) a key-designation to a piece of music, the fearsome, be it said that the symphony is not by any means in two keys throughout. They will not be the an overdose of polytonality, nor an any considerable amount of polytonality. Of which more later.

Arnold Bax has been represented by the Symphony Concerts by the Cleveland Orchestra; by the poems, "In Fairy Hills," "The Woods," "The Garden of Fountains," will be remembered as a composer with strong Celtic leanings, with beauty at once developed and expansive. If one must classify him, probably call him a modernist. He shuns neither the evanescent innerings of Debussy nor the melodies of Strauss nor the derivings of Schönberg. Yet mistaken to call him either Straussian or Schönbergian. A distinct and pregnant melodist, harmonic colorist with an ear for beauty, a skillful orchestrator, aesthetic theorizings do lure him, unless from them he extract something that will sell. And that ideal is the romantic splendor in melodies of the orchestra. In short, he is and no other—Englishman.

Bax is prolific in invention. In doubt, write a new theme cry to you from one of his hands. And for him the theme hand. A complete list of one of his symphonies for man commentator busy is proportionate. One count, and twenty-eight measures, movement of this Second, hundred and seven in hundred and twenty in considering that this last faster tempo than the moving toward increase.

The Symphony in scored for large modern instruments, two oboes and E clarinets and bass clarinet and double bassoon; four trumpets, two tenor trombones and a bass trombone, a tenor tuba and a tuba; kettledrums, bass drum, side-

Christmas Frolic of Boston Teachers'

The annual Christmas Boston Teachers' Club was Twentieth Century Club. A program was put on, during which of more than one hundred Christmas carols. Miss Catherine Coveney, Miss Julia E. Smith, and the committee.

Guests' Days to Be at Emerson

The English Club of School has two more guests for fall program. The first will be tomorrow afternoon when the "Casey's Comeback," ordered by Frederick B. Halling Friday, Dec. 20, at the club and the Junior English present Dickens's "Christmas

Tufts Phi Lambda Kappa to Phi Lambda Kappa Meeting at Tufts will hold its annual tomorrow evening to welcome members at its chapter house, street, Brookline. The Dr. Hyman Morrison, President at the school.

Summary will be sung by the accompanied by the Glee Club, Clare Hightower, violin, and dick, harp.

Woodland Park School Christmas musical and play evening. "The Dream Doll" by members of grades seven and eight. Woodland Park Chorus will sing carols. "Why the Christmas be presented on next Thursday the Lasell Dramatic Club.

Form Round-Table Group

Frances M. Heath, president of the Social Table Discussion, is responsible for the Table Discussion, which is a mere skeleton outline of Bax's four hundred and twenty-eight measures. There are other "themelets" besides the ones indicated.

To Conclude
The Andante is far simpler. After some delicious playing with slightly Debussian chords, basses and cellos, frequently reinforced by horns, develop a theme out of the pizzicato motto of the introduction. Then there is a "cantabile" theme for violins, simple, lyrical, direct. After a time violas with an octave-leap introduce the chief contrast—on the list. The theme, also lyrical, but more rhythmically active than the first. There is some development, more of the fragmentary contrasting themes, and briefer statement and redevelopment of the two lyrical themes with some appearances of the "motto" for coda.

President L Harvard

The quietness of the introduction occupies itself chiefly with the motto. Then that motto yields the most important theme it has yet generated. The eight measures remind one somewhat of the extended flights of Strauss. Not only in range is there resemblance. The new eight-measure theme is pregnant with many motifs for development as though Strauss had written it. These are in turn freely and energetically developed, until strings, brass and woodwinds all join in a subsidiary theme, "molto feroce" of large sweep and breadth. There is more development of motives from the main theme. After week-ends of his subsides there are many repeated Preparations in strings, in varied rhythms, which soon serve as accompaniment for a "cello cantabile." There is still College Hall. Further development of the main theme, after which the ambiguous passage from the introduction to the first movement, as already described. Which, after restatement of the initial "declamato" theme, and a final plucking of the "motto," leads to the mysterious close faintly suggesting the two keys of the symphony.

A. H. M.

ard '30

OTTORINO RESPIGHI

CONDUCTOR — COMPOSER — PIANIST

FORTY-NINTH SEASON, NINETEEN HUNDRED TWENTY-NINE AND THIRTY

Ninth Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, DECEMBER 20, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, DECEMBER 21, at 8.15 o'clock

Moussorgsky Prelude to the Opera, "Khovánstchina"

Rimsky-Korsakov "Sadko," a Musical Picture, Op. 5

Tournier "Féerie," Prelude and Dance,
for Harp with Orchestra
(First performance with Orchestra)

Ravel Orchestral Excerpts from "Daphnis et Chloé,"
Ballet (Second Suite)

Lever du Jour — Pantomime — Danse Générale

Dvořák Symphony No. 5 in E minor,
"From the New World," Op. 95

- I. Adagio; Allegro molto.
- II. Largo.
- III. Scherzo.
- IV. Allegro con fuoco.

SOLOIST

BERNARD ZIGHERA

There will be an intermission before the symphony

The works to be played at these concerts may be seen in the Allen A. Brown Music Collection of the Boston Public Library one week before the concert

OTTORINO RESPIGHI

CONDUCTOR — COMPOSER — PIANIST

FORTY-NINTH SEASON, NINETEEN HUNDRED TWENTY-NINE AND THIRTY

Ninth Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, DECEMBER 20, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, DECEMBER 21, at 8.15 o'clock

Moussorgsky Prelude to the Opera, "Khovánstchina"

Rimsky-Korsakov "Sadko," a Musical Picture, Op. 5

Tournier "Féerie," Prelude and Dance,
for Harp with Orchestra
(First performance with Orchestra)

Ravel Orchestral Excerpts from "Daphnis et Chloé,"
Ballet (Second Suite)

Lever du Jour — Pantomime — Danse Générale

Dvořák Symphony No. 5 in E minor,
"From the New World," Op. 95

- I. Adagio; Allegro molto.
- II. Largo.
- III. Scherzo.
- IV. Allegro con fuoco.

SOLOIST

BERNARD ZIGHERA

There will be an intermission before the symphony

The works to be played at these concerts may be seen in the Allen A. Brown Music Collection of the Boston Public Library one week before the concert

Rimsky-Korsakov

Dvořák

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Herald By PHILIP HALE, Dec. 21, 1920

The program of the ninth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, which took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall, was as follows: Moussorgsky, prelude to the opera, "Khovanstchina," Rimsky-Korsakov, "Sadko" Tournier, "Ferie"—prelude and dance for harp and orchestra (first performance with orchestra). Ravel, second suite from "Daphnis and Chloe." Dvorak, symphony No. 5, "From the New World."

Without doubt Rimsky-Korsakov, editing Moussorgsky's score left unfinished at his death, rewriting, adding, cutting, turned this prelude into a thing of beauty chiefly by the charm of his instrumentation. It would be interesting to see Moussorgsky's sketch for this Prelude as it would be to hear Rimsky-Korsakov's original version of "Sadko"—which was composed as early as 1867. The revision was in 1891 and the reviser had learned much in the years between. Yesterday the Prelude stirred the imagination of the hearer and not only because it is associated with a scene in the Kremlin's Red Square. One not knowing the opera might be curious concerning the significance of solemn strains that stand out from a purely pictorial background. Kremlin or no Kremlin, the music was a pleasure to ear and mind, and Philistines would not be alone in saying: "That's what music is for." Down went Sadko like McGinty to the bottom of the sea. He played for the dancers there. The music is picturesque, though it does not show Rimsky at his best.

Ravel's Suite is if it had been planned with the express purpose of displaying the euphony, sonority, brilliance and elasticity of the remarkable orchestra conducted by Dr. Koussevitzky. One can easily think that led by a respectable but prosaic man of routine experience the music itself might occasionally seem purposeless, if not trite, especially as it does not in the concert hall accompany action in an appropriate stage setting. As played under the conditions stated—a virtuoso orchestra with an understanding, poetic, magnetic conductor in full sympathy with the composer—the music has kaleidoscopic beauty, the performance is incomparable. One might ask whether in this instance a conductor and his men do not with the material produce such glowing effects that Ravel, if he were listening, might say to himself: "Did I really write this music? Did I expect it to be so beautiful in the actual performance?"

David played the harp until Saul threw a javelin at him, but David probably improvised. Some of us remember the dreary compositions that skilled harpists were obliged to play, for composers of high standing wrote little for them, and the harpists themselves when they were forced to compose thought first of their own technical ability and shaped their music accordingly. The instrument was favored in drawing rooms at a time when a woman with sculptural arms, a neck of dazzling whiteness—blonde harpists were preferred—strummed the wires and sang, not always tunefully, "Love not, ye hapless sons of clay"—and attentive swains would in sugared compliments beg another song—"Touch the harp gently, my pretty Louise." But composers today take the harp seriously and write seriously for it, especially as an orchestral instrument. A harpist is now expected to be a musician as well as a master of his instrument. Tournier's "Ferie" is written by a musician, who is also a harpist and a teacher of the harp. He may well be proud of his pupil, Mr. Zighera, whose musical proficiency and technical skill were warmly and justly applauded yesterday.

Dvorak's symphony, which once excited controversy, had not been played here by the Symphony Orchestra since March, 1920. Today there is little or no talk about its origin, which at the time the symphony was first performed was misunderstood especially by those who shouted its praise, screaming: "It's 100 per cent. American." The symphony is popular. The tunes are obvious. Some of them can be hummed and whistled as one is leaving the hall. There are otherwise interesting pages in the work. But when Dvorak was on his native soil, he rose to a greater height as a composer, than when he composed an oratorio for England and a symphony for the United States. The performance yesterday was all that could be asked, and the audience was greatly pleased.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is thus announced: Mozart, overture to "The Magic Flute"; Beethoven, symphony No. 4, B flat major; Bloch, "Schelomo" (Solomon) Hebrew rhapsody for violoncello (Felix Salmond), and orchestra; Gliere, "The Saporotchky Cossacks"; symphonic tone picture-ballet (first time here).

A Matinee Of Bon-Bons and Sweet Sounds

Dr. Koussevitzky with Mr.
Zighera and His Harp
To Assist

WHAT an afternoon of bon-bons. . . It was a stray remark from the corridors after yesterday's concert at Symphony Hall. Which corridors are to the observant a treasure house of reactions, a mine of points of view. And if one of the observant perchance has the pleasant duty of making "copy" of programs and performances, companies of hearers and responses from those hearers, those same corridors may become for him a veritable Bible of texts. And thus for the day a "text" has been chosen.

Bon-bons—confections; let us see. In the course of the afternoon twice the rising dawn was evoked; once the surface of a gentle sea yielded its picture; lovers made sport to the tones of a liquid flute; while other beings, product of romantic imaginings, held court at the bottom of the sea; a shining harp was brought to stand beside the conductor for all to see and hear; and lately, a string of "tunes" was made by clever hands into a symphony. Or, for the prosaic record—the rising dawn once was prelude to Musorgsky's opera, "Khovantschina"; again it was first of the excerpts from Ravel's ballet, "Daphnis and Chloe," which also yielded the silver flute and the pastoral dancers; the sea and the goings-on beneath the sea were Rimsky-Korsakov's "musical picture," "Sadko"; upon the golden harp Mr. Zighera ably played Monsieur Tournier's "Féerie"; and the symphony which was also "tunes," was Dr. Antonin Dvorak's symphony, No. 5 in E minor, better known as the "New World Symphony."

Thus ran a pleasant afternoon, with not a thing to disturb the most timid. Yes, there were climaxes; no music can proceed without its periodic ebb and flow, its heights and depths. But these heights were not the towering Rockies with bold crags and gouged canyons; these were the peaks eroded and the wash from the to change violently to homely simile, caused a tempest rather the natural nometer on a calm y—brought indoors pause a bit. Why year of 1929 thus itself of its smug le or two, a mere wo, have wrought nt back only two decade and Boston Daphnis and Chloe," ing on needles and straightening their for in 1918 it was of the "advanced"; decade farther and ght dissension be- oducer, Ravel and deed! Or go back years, within the who sit before the less who sit there ther of these "bon- tion. The pro- was full of reflec- against pen. The discover whether ak had used negro of an "Ameri- ng in the back- tant question of . in the very na- "American" mu- Negroid melodies Which dissen- d to rest in peace. within the easy this symphony is more an issue latest problem- a Honegger or a one have to go eties for such will roar to be from the ranks thus delivered the last meas- The end comes ear-devastating of lost souls." Symphony hall vitzky, in the a was but ex- y in program- vn during his may be exer- e component rious. While another is painfully lacerated; while one smilingly remembers the good old days, another is lulled to sleep. Both may be satisfied by placing numbers of both kinds on a single program. Or, some programs may be for the one group while others are for the other. The present generation places possibly undue emphasis upon suspense and excitement; it has often had its day in Symphony Hall. An older generation prefers wistfulness, and memories, and pleasant sounds; it had its day yesterday. Certainly one in ten years (it was last played in 1920) the "New World Symphony" deserves hearing. And how best frame it than with music of not too great disparity with it? That the afternoon was enjoyed was evident from the hand-clapping at the end. For while suburbanites and modernists (what a combination!) were rushing to the doors a large company ardently recalled conductor time after time until he bade the orchestra rise to its feet. In a well appointed day (or year) there is a place for "bon-bons."

Dr. Koussevitzky's way with Mussorgsky, Rimsky-Korsakov or Ravel is well known. Be they writing of the shining sea or the rising dawn, he polishes and makes bright and effulgent their tonal surfaces. Light is reflected from them. They shine. Is the dawn rising, they grow in splendor, as with the clear-skied Musorgsky; or, they radiate more and more warmth (not heat, be it remembered) as in the unfolding measures of Ravel. Is there sudden change of scene, as in "Sadko," a drum-beat quickly whisks one from undulating surfaces into realms of magic. And the new mood is as suddenly upon one as if by a stroke of legerdemain. Is there dancing, as of nymphs and shepherds and bacchantes, Dr. Koussevitzky, even as Ravel, furnishes stimulus, rises with the dancers to the tumult of joy.

Marcel Tournier is, of course, virtuoso composer, very much virtuoso-composer. He knows his harp and, disdaining the vaudeville tricks with which others seem to find it necessary to deck it out, writes pleasingly and effectively for it. His piece fits into the afternoon's program. And Mr. Zighera, who for some years has labored in semi-obscurity behind violas and near bass drums is for once heard as able virtuoso on his own account. By no means small was his portion of the applause.

What would Dr. Koussevitzky do with Dr. Dvorak's symphony, it was asked. First of all, he gave it performance remarkable for its clarity, for excellent proportioning of parts to each other, to the whole. Straightforward, virile, was theme of ascending and descending. The succeeding one, in G, might as well have been Oriental. Or do our ears still hear as anything of a certain type of exotic, regardless of its origin? A "go" which has become the stock-in-trade of all sorts and conditions of musical and near-musicians (perhaps a little opposite, far-musicians, would be a truthful word), came with exquisite taste. The English horn of Mr. Zighera, gently guided by the hand of the conductor, avoided both pitfalls; it was over-sentimentalized by too slow, nor lost one whit of its melancholy. And with succeeding themes Dr. Koussevitzky was equally apt, even though the incongruous ballet-like airs which serve to introduce a new piece to the main theme of the symphony, and through it to the English solo.

the scherzo proved, of all the movements most akin to our own age. The living in a scherzo-day. Probably the day of Dvorak, not the day and day of any of his most ardent admirers (and he was a great lion himself, the time) could summon so well herzo-mood as did Dr. Koussevitzky to the modernists in the audience it have been like a breath of fresh air did the perfumes emanating from—the "bon-bons." And in the last movement, almost Chaikovskian, resounding proclamation which is its chief Less slender than the other movements, it gave Dr. Koussevitzky opportunity for real climax with this symphony.

While the youngsters who at Dvorak's "old hat," but who are young to have heard him in the absence of these ten years, must have surprised eyes and ears at the return of earlier themes in the later movements, and perhaps at the simultaneous appearance of two themes, recall of the once new clash of harmonies which the professor found "devastating."

A. H. M.

's Day

PARING a light program for the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday, Dr. Koussevitzky began it with "Little Suite" by Roussel. Hearing it, he found it unsuited to his purpose and deferred it to a later pair of days. For it he substitutes two familiar Russian numbers—the Prelude to Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "Khovantschina," and Rimsky-Korsakov's tone-poem, "Sadko." In the first piece there remains only Tournier's "Féerie," with subtitle, "Prelude for Harp." It will be played—by the orchestra assisting—by Mr. Zighera, familiar figure "at these concerts" with either harp or piano.

A Matinee Of Bon-Bons and Sweet Soups

Dr. Koussevitzky with Zighera and His Harp
To Assist

WHAT an afternoon of bon-bons. It was a remark from the conductor after yesterday's concert in Symphony Hall. Which corridors the observant a treasure house of actions, a mine of points of view if one of the observant perch at the pleasant duty of making "concert programs and performances, cor- of hearers and responses from hearers, those same corridors may for him a veritable Bible of text: thus for the day a "text" has been Bon-bons—confections; let us s the course of the afternoon twice ing dawn was evoked; once the of a gentle sea yielded its picture made sport to the tones of a liquid while other beings, product of re- imaginings, held court at the bot- the sea; a shining harp was bro- stand beside the conductor for all and hear; and lately, a string of was made by clever hands into phony. Or, for the prosaic record- ing dawn once was prelude to Mus- opera, "Khovantschina"; again first of the excerpts from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe," which also the silver flute and the pastoral da- the sea and the goings-on benea- sea were Rimsky-Korsakov's "n picture," "Sadko"; upon the golden Mr. Zighera ably played Monsieur nier's "Féerie"; and the symphony was also "tunes," was Dr. A Dvorak's symphony, No. 5 in E better known as the "New World phony."

Thus ran a pleasant afternoon not a thing to disturb the most. Yes, there were climaxes; no mus- proceed without its periodic ebb and its heights and depths. But these were not the towering Rockies with crags and gouged canyons; these were older Alleghenies, with peaks eroded and valleys filled in with the wash from the mountain-tops. Or, to change violently the figure and resort to homely simile, these climaxes scarce caused a tempest in a teapot, they were rather the natural rise and fall of a thermometer on a calm fleckless summer's day—brought indoors in mid-December.

And yet—one should pause a bit. Why should this little old year of 1929 thus complacently deliver itself of its smug assurances? A decade or two, a mere score of years or two, have wrought mighty change. Count back only two years more than a decade and Boston was first hearing its "Daphnis and Chloe," and oldsters were sitting on needles and youngsters were straightening their spines at its audacities, for in 1918 it was in the very vanguard of the "advanced"; and count back a half-decade farther and this same ballet brought dissension between composer and producer, Ravel and Diaghilev. Bon-bon indeed! Or go back less than two score of years, within the easy memory of many who sit before the orchestra on Fridays (less who sit there on Saturdays), and another of these "bon-bons" is a bone of contention. The program-book yesterday was full of reflections of the battle of pen against pen. The learned were trying to discover whether the Bohemian Dr. Dvorak had used negro tunes for the making of an "American" symphony; leaving in the background the more important question of whether a Bohemian can, in the very nature of the case, write "American" music, and to what extent Negro melodies are indeed "American." Which dissensions may well be allowed to rest in peace. The point being that within the easy span of a single lifetime this symphony was as much and perhaps more an issue than is at present the latest problem-work of a Stravinsky or a Honegger or a Schoenberg. Nor does one have to go back to the eighteen-nineties for such opinion. Our young lions will roar to be reminded that not later than 1918 one of the best of commentators from the ranks of the teaching fraternity thus delivered himself on the subject of the last measures of this symphony: "The end comes with the savagest, most ear-devastating harmonies, like the cries of lost souls." And now the corridors of Symphony Hall call it a "bon-bon."

Truth to tell, Dr. Koussevitzky, in the assembling of this program was but exercising the same catholicity in program-making which he has shown during his entire stay in Boston. It may be exercised in many ways. The component parts of an audience are various. While one is agreeably stimulated, another is painfully lacerated; while one smilingly remembers the good old days, another is lulled to sleep. Both may be satisfied by placing numbers of both kinds on a single program. Or, some programs may be for the one group while others are for the other. The present generation places possibly undue emphasis upon suspense and excitement; it has often had its day in Symphony Hall. An older generation prefers wistfulness, and memories, and pleasant sounds; it had its day yesterday. Certainly one in ten years (it was last played in 1920) the "New World Symphony" deserves hearing. And how best frame it than with music of not too great disparity with it? That the afternoon was enjoyed was evident from the hand-clapping at the end. For while suburbanites and modernists (what a combination!) were rushing to the doors a large company ardently recalled conductor time after time until he bade the orchestra rise to its feet. In a well appointed day (or year) there is a place for "bon-bons."

Dr. Koussevitzky's way with Mussorgsky, Rimsky-Korsakov or Ravel is well known. Be they writing of the shining sea or the rising dawn, he polishes and makes bright and effulgent their tonal surfaces. Light is reflected from them. They shine. Is the dawn rising, they grow in splendor, as with the clear-skied Musorgsky; or, they radiate more and more warmth (not heat, be it remembered) as in the unfolding measures of Ravel. Is there sudden change of scene, as in "Sadko," a drum-beat quickly whisks one from undulating surfaces into realms of magic. And the new mood is as suddenly upon one as if by a stroke of legerdemain. Is there dancing, as of nymphs and shepherds and bacchantes, Dr. Koussevitzky, even as Ravel, furnishes stimulus, rises with the dancers to the tumult of joy.

Marcel Tournier is, of course, virtuoso composer, very much virtuoso-composer. He knows his harp and, disdaining the vaudeville tricks with which others seem to find it necessary to deck it out, writes pleasingly and effectively for it. His piece fits into the afternoon's program. And Mr. Zighera, who for some years has labored in semi-obscurity behind violas and near bass drums is for once heard as able virtuoso on his own account. By no means small was his portion of the applause.

What would Dr. Koussevitzky do with Dr. Dvorak's symphony, it was asked. First of all, he gave it performance remarkable for its clarity, for excellent proportioning of parts to each other, to the whole. Straightforward, virile, was

theme of ascending and descending. The succeeding one, in G major, might as well have been Oriental. Or do our ears still hear as "exotic," regardless of its origin? A "bon-bon" which has become the stock-in-trade of all sorts and conditions of musical and near-musicians (perhaps a far opposite, far-musicians, would be a truthful word), came with exquisite taste. The English horn of Mr. Zighera, gently guided by the hand of the conductor, avoided both pitfalls; it was not over-sentimentalized by too slow nor lost one whit of its melan- And with succeeding themes Koussevitzky was equally apt, even though the incongruous ballet-like airs which serve to introduce a new piece to the main theme of the symphony, and through it to the English horn solo.

The scherzo proved, of all the movements most akin to our own age. We are living in a scherzo-day. Probably the day of Dvorak, not the day and day of any of his most ardent admirers (and he was a great lion himself, in his time) could summon so well the scherzo-mood as did Dr. Koussevitzky. To the modernists in the audience it have been like a breath of fresh air, did the perfumes emanating from—the "bon-bons." And in the last movement, almost Chaikovskian, resounding proclamation which is its chief theme, it gave Dr. Koussevitzky opportunity for real climax with this symphony.

While the youngsters who at Dvorak's "old hat," but who are young to have heard him in the ab- of these ten years, must have surprised eyes and ears at the evolution of earlier themes in the later movements, and perhaps at the simultaneous appearance of two themes, recall of the once new clash of harmonies which the professor found "devastating."

A. H. M.

It's Day

PARING a light program for the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday, Dr. Koussevitzky began it with "Little Suite" by Roussel. Hearing it, he found it unsuited to his purpose and deferred it to a later pair of programs. For it he substitutes two familiar Russian numbers—the Prelude to Rimsky's opera, "Khovantschina," and Rimsky-Korsakov's tone-poem, "Sadko." In place of these remains only Tournier's "Féerie," with subtitle, "Prelude for Harp." It will be played—by the orchestra assisting—by Dr. Zighera, familiar figure "at these concerts" with either harp or piano.

A Matinee Of Bon-Bons and Sweet Soups

Dr. Koussevitzky with Zighera and His Harp
To Assist

WHAT an afternoon of bon-bons. It was a remark from the conductor after yesterday's concert at the Symphony Hall. Which corridors the observant a treasure house of actions, a mine of points of view if one of the observant perch at the pleasant duty of making "corrections" and responses from the hearers, those same corridors may for him a veritable Bible of texts; thus for the day a "text" has been Bon-bons—confections; let us see the course of the afternoon twice the dawn was evoked; once the of a gentle sea yielded its picture made sport to the tones of a liquid while other beings, product of imagination, held court at the bottom of the sea; a shining harp was brot stand beside the conductor for all and hear; and lately, a string of was made by clever hands into phony. Or, for the prosaic record—ing dawn once was prelude to Muso opera, "Khovantschina"; again first of the excerpts from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe," which also the silver flute and the pastoral d the sea and the goings-on beneath sea were Rimsky-Korsakov's "n picture," "Sadko"; upon the golden Mr. Zighera ably played Monsieur nier's "Féerie"; and the symphony was also "tunes," was Dr. A Dvorak's symphony, No. 5 in E better known as the "New World phony."

Thus ran a pleasant afternoon not a thing to disturb the most Yes, there were climaxes; no mus proceed without its periodic ebb and its heights and depths. But these h were not the towering Rockies with crags and gouged canyons; these we older Alleghenies, with peaks eroded and valleys filled in with the wash from the mountain-tops. Or, to change violently the figure and resort to homely simile, these climaxes scarce caused a tempest in a teapot, they were rather the natural rise and fall of a thermometer on a calm fleckless summer's day—brought indoors in mid-December.

And yet—one should pause a bit. Why should this little old year of 1929 thus complacently deliver itself of its smug assurances? A decade or two, a mere score of years or two, have wrought mighty change. Count back only two years more than a decade and Boston was first hearing its "Daphnis and Chloe," and oldsters were sitting on needles and youngsters were straightening their spines at its audacities, for in 1918 it was in the very vanguard of the "advanced"; and count back a half-decade farther and this same ballet brought dissension between composer and producer, Ravel and Diaghilev. Bon-bon indeed! Or go back less than two score of years, within the easy memory of many who sit before the orchestra on Fridays (less who sit there on Saturdays), and another of these "bon-bons" is a bone of contention. The program-book yesterday was full of reflections of the battle of pen against pen. The learned were trying to discover whether the Bohemian Dr. Dvorak had used negro tunes for the making of an "American" symphony; leaving in the background the more important question of whether a Bohemian can, in the very nature of the case, write "American" music, and to what extent Negro melodies are indeed "American." Which dissensions may well be allowed to rest in peace. The point being that within the easy span of a single lifetime this symphony was as much and perhaps more an issue than is at present the latest problem-work of a Stravinsky or a Honegger or a Schoenberg. Nor does one have to go back to the eighteen-nineties for such opinion. Our young lions will roar to be reminded that not later than 1918 one of the best of commentators from the ranks of the teaching fraternity thus delivered himself on the subject of the last measures of this symphony: "The end comes with the savagest, most ear-devastating harmonies, like the cries of lost souls." And now the corridors of Symphony hall call it a "bon-bon."

Truth to tell, Dr. Koussevitzky, in the assembling of this program was but exercising the same catholicity in program-making which he has shown during his entire stay in Boston. It may be exercised in many ways. The component parts of an audience are various. While one is agreeably stimulated, another is painfully lacerated. . . . remembers the go . . . is lulled to sleep. . . . by placing number . . . & Towne . . . single program. . . . Orw Tr & Coach . . . be for the one . . . grogs Sp & Wire . . . for the other. . . . Thgs S&T . . . places possibly ur . . . suspense and excit . . . had its day in Sym . . . generation prefers . . . yable in st . . . ories, and pleasant . . . Stock div . . . yesterday. Certain . . . it was last played . . . World Symphony" . . . how best frame it . . . not too great disp . . . the afternoon was . . . from the hand-clap . . . while suburbanites . . . a combination! were . . . a large company a . . . ductor time after ti . . . orchestra rise to it . . . pointed day (or ye . . . for "bon-bons."

Dr. Koussevitzky, sky, Rimsky-Korsak known. Be they w sea or the rising d makes bright and surfaces. Light is They shine. Is the grow in splendor, a Musorgsky; or, the more warmth (not bered) as in the u Ravel. Is there suc as in "Sadko," a whisks one from into realms of m mood is as sudden stroke of legerdema as of nymphs bacchantes, Dr. K Ravel, furnishes st dancers to the tum Marcel Tournier composer, very mu He knows his har vaudeville tricks w to find it necess writes pleasingly His piece fits into gram. And Mr. 2 years has labored hind violas and n once heard as own account. By his portion of the What would Dr Dr. Dvorak's syn First of all, he g markable for its proportioning of n the whole. Strab eleven h try's best to be a Arm La

La Ju westward sped into bringing continental with the Dec. 28.

As the of 140 c steep m little hop time cau and frigh Inabilit
Ks., whe scheduled an emer
Ks. A calisthen the high Time Cadets i come fr Lazar, b hind bec had been was leav teammate

Alexander
American Cessna Air
Central Air
Curtiss-Rob
Curtiss-Rob
Fokker Air
Lockhead A
Maddox Air
New Stand
So Air Tra Swallow Air

the theme of ascending and descending arpeggii. The succeeding one, in G minor, might as well have been Oriental as Negroid. Or do our ears still hear as "Oriental" anything of a certain type of the exotic, regardless of its origin? A "Largo" which has become the stock-in-trade of all sorts and conditions of musicians and near-musicians (perhaps a coined opposite, far-musicians, would be more truthful word), came with exquisite taste. The English horn of Mr. Speyer, gently guided by the hand of the conductor, avoided both pitfalls; it neither over-sentimentalized by too slow tempo, nor lost one whit of its melancholy. And with succeeding themes Dr. Koussevitzky was equally apt, even through the incongruous ballet-like measures which serve to introduce a reference to the main theme of the symphony, and through it to the English horn solo.

But the scherzo proved, of all the movements most akin to our own age. We are living in a scherzo-day. Probably not the day of Dvorak, not the day and the way of any of his most ardent admirers (and he was a great lion himself, at one time) could summon so well the scherzo-mood as did Dr. Koussevitzky. To the modernists in the audience it must have been like a breath of fresh air amid the perfumes emanating from—the "bon-bons." And in the last movement, almost Chaikovskian, resounded the proclamation which is its chief theme. Less slender than the other movements, it gave Dr. Koussevitzky opportunity for real climax with this symphony. While the youngsters who thought Dvorak's "old hat," but who are too young to have heard him in the absence of these ten years, must have opened surprised eyes and ears at the quotation of earlier themes in the later movements, and perhaps at the simultaneous appearance of two themes, regardless of the once new clash of harmonies, which the professor found "devastating."

A. H. M.

Harpist's Day

PREPARING a light program for the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday, Dr. Koussevitzky began it with a "Little Suite" by Roussel. Hearing the piece, he found it unsuited to his purpose and deferred it to a later pair of concerts. For it he substitutes two familiar Russian numbers—the Prelude to Musorgsky's opera, "Khovantschina," Rimsky-Korsakov's tone-poem, "Sadko." For new piece there remains only Tournier's "Faerie," with subtitle, "Prelude and Dance for Harp." It will be played—the strings of the orchestra assisting—by Bernard Zighera, familiar figure "at these concerts" with either harp or piano.

About "Faerie," A. H. M. sends his customary note: Marcel Tournier, one of whose chamber-pieces was played last month in Boston at a Flute-Players' concert, is professor of the harp in the Conservatory at Paris. He was born in 1879; received a "first prize" at the Conservatory in 1899; won the "Prix de Rome" in 1909, and succeeded Hasselmans as professor in 1912. He writes extensively and pleasingly for his chosen instrument. . . . The chief interest of "Faerie" lies in the solo-part. The orchestral score is slight. The harmonies, to the present-day ear, are only mildly dissonant, as becomes a piece written well before the late war. After introductory measures a very simple melody forms the basis of many harp figurations, arpeggios, broken chords, devices which sound well and are the natural language of the instrument. One becomes aware that "harp-style," as it is called, has much in common with "prelude-style" as laid down by many a master since the days of Sebastian Bach. The Prelude runs through a "Très modéré," the dance begins with an "Allegretto scherzando." There are measures of obvious dance-accompaniment, and a sprightly dance-figure emerges, the chief theme of the dance. Several times the music broadens to lyric utterance. Each time the dance-theme returns. Once, such broadening, rising to greater heights than before, carries the significant direction "Chaleureux." At the close there are again the characteristic harp arpeggios, a moment of pianissimo, and then a steady crescendo to climax and end.

MUSIC

Monitor — Dec. 21, 1929
Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, submitted the ninth program of the Friday afternoon series of concerts at Symphony Hall, Boston, on the afternoon of Dec. 20. Two Russian pieces inaugurated the afternoon. The Prelude to Moussorgsky's "Khovantchina" and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Sadko." Then came two samples of French writing. Tournier's "Féerie," Prelude and Dance for Harp with Orchestra, given its first performance with orchestra yesterday (Bernard Zighera, member of the orchestra, was the soloist) and the Second Suite from Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloé." For larger work, the audience heard Dvorak's Symphony in E minor, "From the New World."

ky's program, as he yesterday, was not the combination of "Sadko" had been. The music from for all its barbaric deep, gaunt effectiveness unfamiliar fare. or not, these Russians to listen to. How revels in the grand magnificence of the how he sweeps his the swiftly changing "Sadko"! The instrument rumbling, charging music with sureness and here is something of the ancient folk tale, rful elaborations of

"Féerie" one found a Russian music, a cadence and grace and less. If there was no indication of originality or indication of the stat- this piece, it did nev- est the charm and gra- ce finished technician. is professor of the Conservatory in Paris acher of Mr. Zighera, ist. His music is char- onceived for the solo the instrumentation. A pleasant and dex- hout any pretensions it held a creditable program.

zky brings to Ravel's th and a brilliance listeners is his most ner. He finds all the ns and sets them and sharply. He con- thms one against an- the intricate lines exposition. He ac- killfully. And never to sentimental ruts. usic simply refuses tereto. Perhaps the the combined with the 3,690,000s of the composer op Dec tsky's best spur. At iters route him to was 12- ess. n of the 84.4 per kian music, the an- pass. For here were gain was, the melancholic on of the sweetness, which so of a non-ior. Here he drove his players into ardors which doubtless lend this music its most popular appeal, but which some few find a little tiresome. Yet there is no gainsaying the appeal of this music to many, especially when players of such skill and a conductor of such finesse traverse its measures. Yesterday's program book pointed out that the old controversies which waged about this symphony have fortunately subsided, and that now the work may be regarded simply as music, and not as a work with or without spirituals or plantation songs, or, for that matter, songs of Brittany. As music, per se, it does not own the acidity of challenge.

C. S. B.

HARP SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Bernard Zighera Plays
Tournier's "Feerie"

Dr Koussevitzky Interprets Dvorak's
"New World" Symphony

Ylobe — Dec. 21, 1929
Bernard Zighera, first harpist of the Boston Symphony, appeared as soloist at yesterday's Symphony concert, playing a composition by his teacher, Marcel Tournier, professor in the Paris Conservatoire, entitled "Feerie." The program, altered from that announced in advance, began with the overture to Musorgsky's opera "Khovantchina" and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Sadko." It concluded with Dvorak's "New World" Symphony, which Dr Koussevitzky had not previously conducted in Boston.

Mr Zighera, as those who have listened to his playing in the orchestra will not need be told, is a fine harpist. Tournier in the little prelude and dance entitled "Feerie" has written music agreeable enough to listen to if lacking in musical distinction. It goes without saying that the performer is given ample opportunity to display his virtuosity. There were many recalls from a pleased and demonstrative audience.

The general public is unquestionably delighted at the chance to listen to an occasional harp solo. Yet one cannot but feel the harp to be a monotonous instrument when brought into prominence throughout a piece, effective as it is in its usual subordinate place in the orchestra. One had as lief hear a solo on the contrabassoon as a harp solo.

The prelude to "Khovantchina," which depicts dawn in the Kremlin at Moscow, is music which gives Dr Koussevitzky full scope for his remarkable gift of dramatic and pictorial interpretation. The listener, however skeptical he may be about the possibility of tone painting, cannot but be impressed by a reading as eloquent as yesterday's. That Dr Koussevitzky fully believes in the possibility of evoking pictures and stories in the minds of listeners to music seems certain. Such pieces as this prelude almost invariably show him at his best.

Yesterday's program was, as more than one of Dr Koussevitzky's programs this season have been, apparently chosen with a view to artistic unity. This way of planning a concert with a view to its total effect on the listener, instead of grouping pieces on a program haphazard, is commendable. Slavic composers of the last quarter of the 19th century occupied the whole concert, save for the brief and musically not highly significant harp solo.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Sadko," an attempt to make music tell an elaborate Russian legend about a shipwrecked mariner, sounded yesterday curiously old fashioned. Not all Dr Koussevitzky's eloquence and fervor could make one think of the legend that suggested the piece and ignore its defects as music, its meaningless repetition of themes which lack the intrinsic interest of those in "Scheherazade," its relatively colorless orchestration.

Dvorak's "New World" Symphony, about which commentators discoursed so learnedly and so lengthily when it was an epoch-making novelty, back in the 1890s, also sounded very old-fashioned yesterday. Its composer, a Czech peasant, had an apparent inexhaustible, but wholly naive and uncritical musical gift. For this symphony he used themes which, though wholly his own inventions, suggest at times the American Negro tunes he heard during his sojourn in the United States. Many of them are sufficiently ingratiating to have won for this symphony wide popularity. Its slow movement has become what some publishers would call "a popular classic." The orchestration, though simple, is also highly effective. But again the tendency to meaningless repetition, and the lack of elaborate musical

About "Faerie," A. H. M. sends customary note: Marcel Tournier, one whose chamber-pieces was played month in Boston at a Flute-Players' cert, is professor of the harp in the conservatory at Paris. He was born 1879; received a "first prize" at the conservatory in 1899; won the "Prix Rome" in 1909, and succeeded Hasmans as professor in 1912. He writes extensively and pleasingly for his chosen instrument. . . . The chief interest of "Faerie" lies in the solo-part. The orchestral score is slight. The monies, to the present-day ear, are mildly dissonant, as becomes a picture written well before the late war. A introductory measures a very simple melody forms the basis of many harmonizations, arpeggios, broken chords, devices which sound well and are natural language of the instrument. It becomes aware that "harp-style," as is called, has much in common with "prelude-style" as laid down by many master since the days of Sebastian Bach. The Prelude runs through a "modéré," the dance begins with "Allegretto scherzando." There measures of obvious dance-accompaniment, and a sprightly dance-figure emerges, the chief theme of the day. Several times the music broadens into lyric utterance. Each time the day theme returns. Once, such broadening rises to greater heights than before, carries the significant direction "Crescendo." At the close there are the characteristic harp arpeggios, a moment of pianissimo, and then a steady crescendo to climax and end.

MUSIC

Monitor Dec. 21, 1929
Boston Symphony Orchestra
 The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, submitted the ninth program of the day afternoon series of concerts at Symphony Hall, Boston, on the afternoon of Dec. 20. Two Russian pieces inaugurated the afternoon. The Prelude to Moussorgsky's "Khovantchina" and Rimsky-Korsakov's "Sadko." Then came two samples of French writing, Tournier's "Féerie" Prelude and Dance for Harp and Orchestra, given its first performance with orchestra yesterday (Bernard Zighera, member of the orchestra, was the soloist) and the Suite from Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloé." For larger work, the audience heard Dvořák's Symphony in minor, "From the New World."

Mr. Koussevitzky's program, as he outlined it yesterday, was not the most stimulating combination of music imaginable. "Sadko" had been heard quite recently. The music from "Khovantchina," for all its barbaric splendor and deep, gaunt effectiveness, is by no means unfamiliar fare. Yet, accustomed or not, these Russians proved good to listen to. How Mr. Koussevitzky revels in the grandeur, the stern magnificence of the Prelude! And how he sweeps his men through the swiftly changing pictures of "Sadko"! The instruments etch in the rumbling, charging waves of the music with sureness and power. And there is something of the glamour of the ancient folk tale, with its colorful elaborations of musical detail.

In Tournier's "Féerie" one found a contrast to the Russian music, a contrast of delicacy and grace and swirling lightness. If there was no startling exhibition of originality or any particular indication of the stature of genius in this piece, it did nevertheless suggest the charm and graciousness of the finished technician. The composer is professor of the harp at the Conservatory in Paris and was the teacher of Mr. Zighera, yesterday's soloist. His music is characteristically conceived for the solo instrument and the instrumentation is well handled. A pleasant and dexterous bit, without any pretensions to greatness, it held a creditable place on the program.

Mr. Koussevitzky brings to Ravel's music a warmth and a brilliance which to many listeners is his most interesting manner. He finds all the rhythmic patterns and sets them forth incisively and sharply. He contrasts these rhythms one against another until all the intricate lines merge into one exposition. He accents melodies skillfully. And never does he verge into sentimental ruts, since Ravel's music simply refuses to lend itself thereto. Perhaps the innate irony combined with the sparkling abilities of the composer are Mr. Koussevitzky's best spur. At any rate, few writers route him to similar effectiveness.

With the Dvořákian music, the anticipated came to pass. For here were the Slavic warmth, the melancholic songs, the lush sweetness, which so tempt the conductor. Here he drove his players into ardors which doubtless lend this music its most popular appeal, but which some few find a little tiresome. Yet there is no gainsaying the appeal of this music to many, especially when players of such skill and a conductor of such finesse traverse its measures. Yesterday's program book pointed out that the old controversies which waged about this symphony have fortunately subsided, and that now the work may be regarded simply as music, and not as a work with or without spirituals or plantation songs, or, for that matter, songs of Brittany. As music, per se, it does not own the acidity of challenge.

C. S. B.

HARP SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Bernard Zighera Plays
 Tournier's "Feerie"

Dr Koussevitzky Interprets Dvorak's
 "New World" Symphony

Yale Dec. 21, 1929
 Bernard Zighera, first harpist of the Boston Symphony, appeared as soloist at yesterday's Symphony concert, playing a composition by his teacher, Marcel Tournier, professor in the Paris Conservatoire, entitled "Feerie." The program, altered from that announced in advance, began with the overture to Musorgsky's opera "Khovantchina" and Rimsky-Korsakov's "Sadko." It concluded with Dvorak's "New World" Symphony, which Dr Koussevitzky had not previously conducted in Boston.

Mr Zighera, as those who have listened to his playing in the orchestra will not need be told, is a fine harpist. Tournier in the little prelude and dance entitled "Feerie" has written music agreeable enough to listen to if lacking in musical distinction. It goes without saying that the performer is given ample opportunity to display his virtuosity. There were many recalls from a pleased and demonstrative audience.

The general public is unquestionably delighted at the chance to listen to an occasional harp solo. Yet one cannot but feel the harp to be a monotonous instrument when brought into prominence throughout a piece, effective as it is in its usual subordinate place in the orchestra. One had as lief hear a solo on the contrabassoon as a harp solo.

The prelude to "Khovantchina," which depicts dawn in the Kremlin at Moscow, is music which gives Dr Koussevitzky full scope for his remarkable gift of dramatic and pictorial interpretation. The listener, however skeptical he may be about the possibility of tone painting, cannot but be impressed by a reading as eloquent as yesterday's. That Dr Koussevitzky fully believes in the possibility of evoking pictures and stories in the minds of listeners to music seems certain. Such pieces as this prelude almost invariably show him at his best.

Yesterday's program was, as more than one of Dr Koussevitzky's programs this season have been, apparently chosen with a view to artistic unity. This way of planning a concert with a view to its total effect on the listener, instead of grouping pieces on a program haphazard, is commendable. Slavic composers of the last quarter of the 19th century occupied the whole concert, save for the brief and musically not highly significant harp solo.

Rimsky-Korsakov's "Sadko," an attempt to make music tell an elaborate Russian legend about a shipwrecked mariner, sounded yesterday curiously old fashioned. Not all Dr Koussevitzky's eloquence and fervor could make one think of the legend that suggested the piece and ignore its defects as music, its meaningless repetition of themes which lack the intrinsic interest of those in "Scheherazade," its relatively colorless orchestration.

Dvorak's "New World" Symphony, about which commentators discoursed so learnedly and so lengthily when it was an epoch-making novelty, back in the 1890s, also sounded very old-fashioned yesterday. Its composer, a Czech peasant, had an apparent inexhaustible, but wholly naive and uncritical musical gift. For this symphony he used themes which, though wholly his own inventions, suggest at times the American Negro tunes he heard during his sojourn in the United States. Many of them are sufficiently ingratiating to have won for this symphony wide popularity. Its slow movement has become what some publishers would call "a popular classic." The orchestration, though simple, is also highly effective. But again the tendency to meaningless repetition, and the lack of elaborate musical structure that are the universal defects of Slavic music have now become painfully obvious.

Compare this symphony with one of Haydn's. Haydn was also of peasant origin, and, as Sir Henry Hadow has shown, strongly influenced by Croatian folk tunes. Haydn's music seems like Dvorak's to have been written with effortless ease. But Haydn had a far subtler and finer musical gift than Dvorak. He could not merely invent lovely themes, he could build from them admirable and by no means naive musical structures. Haydn is still a genuine classic, which merely means that his music can be heard repeatedly with permanent and increasing delight. But Dvorak and Rimsky have begun already to pall on many musical listeners, so that their music may not last.

Dr Koussevitzky had his own notions, as usual, about tempi and dynamics. He made of all these pieces something eloquent, something impressive, something persuasive, but sometimes did it by violating the letter and spirit of the printed texts. He claims for the interpreter a greater and more prominent role than one persuaded that nothing should stand between composer and listener is willing to grant him.

The program announced for next week includes Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture, Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, Bloch's "Solomon" for cello and orchestra, and Gllere's "Saporotchy Cossacks." The soloist is to be Felix Salmond.

P. R.

Zighera, Harpist, as Soloist, Delights Hearers

Post Dec. 21, 1931
BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

At the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon a programme of music predominantly light, brilliant, cheerful and familiar suited well the holiday season. There was a touch of relative novelty, too, in the appearance of Bernard Zighera, accomplished first harpist of the orchestra, by the little known French lude and dance for harp with orchestra by the little known French composer, Marcel Tournier.

MOUSSORGSKY'S PRELUDE

In detail this amiable list assembled Moussorgsky's prelude to the opera "Khovantchina." Rimsky-Korsakov's musical picture, "Sadko," the piece by Tournier aforementioned, the second suite from Ravel's ballet "Daphnis and Chloe," and lastly Dvorak's Symphony "From the New World," hitherto absent from the Symphony programmes since the coming of Dr. Koussevitzky. Music, all of this, in which conductor and orchestra naturally excel, and played yesterday with remarkable brilliance and finish. That the audience received some of it rather coolly may be attributed in part to a lack of contrast and diversity of appeal.

Viewed in retrospect, the most vital piece of the afternoon was Moussorgsky's prelude. Notable composers each were Modest Petrovitch Moussorgsky and Nicolai Andreievitch Rimsky-Korsakov, but in combination they surpassed in certain respects their separate selves. Let Moussorgsky furnish the musical ideas and Rimsky-Korsakov the instrumentation, as in this prelude to "Khovantchina" or in "Boris," and there emerges a work of which neither would have been capable single-handed. "Sadko" is, of course, not a composition by which Rimsky-Korsakov may fairly be judged. As the first Russian symphonic poem it is of greater historic than actual importance, despite much in the score that is undeniably attractive. The essential Rimsky was to come later.

Monsieur Tournier's piece, to continue, is of itself of little interest, but it afforded Mr. Zighera a chance to display his undoubted prowess in the full glare of the spotlight, and the audience, which always welcomes a soloist, applauded him heartily.

The performance yesterday of Ravel's Suite was one of extraordinary virtuosity, of glowing and effulgent tone. Yet it fell upon ears relatively indifferent. Is it not possible that Ravel's music in general and "Daphnis and Chloe" in particular, has of late years been played over-frequently in Symphony Hall?

The New World Again

Finally, to exemplify the tragic mortality of music, there came Dvorak with a symphony once admired, not only in the new world which inspired it, but likewise in the old, and that after but 26 years has become scarcely more than an exaltation of the trite and obvious.

In justice to the composer as well as to the performance, however, it must be added that a portion of yesterday's audience found such pleasure in this symphony that it recalled the conductor to the stage and prevailed upon him to bring the players to their feet.

FORTY-NINTH SEASON, NINETEEN HUNDRED TWENTY-NINE AND THIRTY

Tenth Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, DECEMBER 27, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, DECEMBER 28, at 8.15 o'clock

Mozart Overture to "The Magic Flute"

Beethoven Symphony No. 4 in B-flat Major, Op. 60

- I. Adagio; Allegro vivace.
- II. Adagio.
- III. Allegro vivace. Trio: Un poco meno allegro.
- IV. Finale: Allegro, ma non troppo.

Bloch "Schelomo" ("Solomon")
Hebrew Rhapsody for Violoncello
and Orchestra

Tchaikovsky Ouverture Solennelle, "1812," Op. 49

SOLOIST

FELIX SALMOND

There will be an intermission after the symphony

The works to be played at these concerts may be seen in the Allen A. Brown Music Collection of the Boston Public Library one week before the concert

structure that are the universal defects of Slavic music have now become painfully obvious.

Compare this symphony with one of Haydn's. Haydn was also of peasant origin, and, as Sir Henry Hadow has shown, strongly influenced by Croatian folk tunes. Haydn's music seems like Dvorak's to have been written with effortless ease. But Haydn had a far subtler and finer musical gift than Dvorak. He could not merely invent lovely themes, he could build from them admirable and by no means naive musical structures. Haydn is still a genuine classic, which merely means that his music can be heard repeatedly with permanent and increasing delight. But Dvorak and Rimsky have begun already to pall on many musical listeners, so that their music may not last.

Dr Koussevitzky had his own notions, as usual, about tempi and dynamics. He made of all these pieces something eloquent, something impressive, something persuasive, but sometimes did it by violating the letter and spirit of the printed texts. He claims for the interpreter a greater and more prominent role than one persuaded that nothing should stand between composer and listener is willing to grant him.

The program announced for next week includes Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture, Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, Bloch's "Solomon," for cello and orchestra, and Gliere's "Saporotchky Cossacks." The soloist is to be Felix Salmond.

Zighera, Harpist, as Soloist, Delights Hearers

Post Dec. 21, 1939
BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

At the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon a programme of music predominantly light, brilliant, cheerful and familiar suited well the holiday season. There was a touch of relative novelty, too, in the appearance of Bernard Zighera, accomplished first harpist of the orchestra, by the little known French lute and dance for harp with orchestra by the little known French composer, Marcel Tournier.

MOUSSORGSKY'S PRELUDE

In detail this amiable list assembled Moussorgsky's prelude to the opera "Khovantchina," Rimsky-Korsakov's musical picture, "Sadko," the piece by Tournier aforementioned, the second suite from Ravel's ballet "Daphnis and Chloe," and lastly Dvorak's Symphony "From the New World," hitherto absent from the Symphony programmes since the coming of Dr. Koussevitzky. Music, all of this, in which conductor and orchestra naturally excel, and played yesterday with remarkable brilliance and finish. That the audience received some of it rather coolly may be attributed in part to a lack of contrast and diversity of appeal.

Viewed in retrospect, the most vital piece of the afternoon was Moussorgsky's prelude. Notable composers each were Modest Petrovitch Moussorgsky and Nicolai Andreievitch Rimsky-Korsakov, but in combination they surpassed in certain respects their separate selves. Let Moussorgsky furnish the musical ideas and Rimsky-Korsakov the instrumentation, as in this prelude to "Khovantchina" or in "Boris," and there emerges a work of which neither would have been capable single-handed. "Sadko" is, of course, not a composition by which Rimsky-Korsakov may fairly be judged. As the first Russian symphonic poem it is of greater historic than actual importance, despite much in the score that is undeniably attractive. The essential Rimsky was to come later.

Monsieur Tournier's piece, to continue, is of itself of little interest, but it afforded Mr. Zighera a chance to display his undoubted prowess in the full glare of the spotlight, and the audience, which always welcomes a soloist, applauded him heartily.

The performance yesterday of Ravel's Suite was one of extraordinary virtuosity, of glowing and effulgent tone. Yet it fell upon ears relatively indifferent. Is it not possible that Ravel's music in general and "Daphnis and Chloe" in particular, has of late years been played over-frequently in Symphony Hall?

The New World Again

Finally, to exemplify the tragic mortality of music, there came Dvorak with a symphony once admired, not only in the new world which inspired it, but likewise in the old, and that after but 36 years has become scarcely more than an exaltation of the trite and obvious.

In justice to the composer as well as to the performance, however, it must be added that a portion of yesterday's audience found such pleasure in this symphony that it recalled the conductor to the stage and prevailed upon him to bring the players to their feet.

FORTY-NINTH SEASON, NINETEEN HUNDRED TWENTY-NINE AND THIRTY

Tenth Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, DECEMBER 27, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, DECEMBER 28, at 8.15 o'clock

Mozart Overture to "The Magic Flute"

Beethoven Symphony No. 4 in B-flat Major, Op. 60

- I. Adagio; Allegro vivace.
- II. Adagio.
- III. Allegro vivace. Trio: Un poco meno allegro.
- IV. Finale: Allegro, ma non troppo.

Bloch "Schelomo" ("Solomon")
Hebrew Rhapsody for Violoncello
and Orchestra

Tchaikovsky Ouverture Solennelle, "1812," Op. 49

SOLOIST

FELIX SALMOND

There will be an intermission after the symphony

The works to be played at these concerts may be seen in the Allen A. Brown Music Collection of the Boston Public Library one week before the concert

BLOCH'S RHAPSODY

Herald By PHILIP HALE Dec. 12, 1925
The Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr.

Koussevitzky conductor, gave its 10th concert of the 49th season yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Mozart, overture to "The Magic Flute;" Beethoven, symphony No. 4; Bloch, "Schelomo" ("Solomon"); Hebrew rhapsody for violoncello (Felix Salmond) and orchestra; Tchaikovsky, overture, "1812."

Mr. Bloch is most inspired when he stands firmly and proudly on Jewish ground. The well equipped composer is seen in all that he writes, but his three Jewish poems for orchestra, his Psalms, for voice and orchestra, two of which have been sung here by Mme. Povla Frijsh and in a memorable manner; his "Schelomo" are far above his what might be called Gentile work, even above his concerto, not to mention the cycloramic "America." As he has written in an account of himself and his artistic beliefs, it is the Jewish soul that interests him; "the complex, glowing, agitated soul" that he feels vibrating through the Bible. No wonder that the despair of the Preacher in Jerusalem and the splendor of Solomon alike appealed to him; the monarch in all his glory; the Preacher, who when he looked on all the works that his hands had wrought and on the labor that he had labored to do, could only exclaim: "And behold, all was vanity, and vexation of spirit, and there was no profit under the Sun." And so Mr. Bloch might have taken as a motto for this Hebrew rhapsody the lines of Rueckert:

"Solomon! Where is thy throne? It is gone in the wind.
* * * * *

Say, what is pleasure? A phantom, a mask undefined;

Science? An almond, whereof we can pierce but the rind;

Honor and Affluence? Firmans that Fortune hath signed

Only to glitter and pass on the wings of the wind."

Other composers have taken Solomon for their hero; as Handel in his oratorio; Goldmark, representing him as mighty and jealous in "The Queen of Sheba"; Gounod in the opera similarly entitled, based on the wildly fantastic tale of Gerard de Nerval; there are older operas, but all, or nearly all, are concerned with the "Grande Turke," the Sultan of the Ottomans. It was left for Mr. Bloch to express in music the magnificence and the pessimistic, despairing philosophy of the ruler to whom is falsely attributed the book, Ecclesiastes.

Here is music that does not brook conventional analysis: music that is now purely lyrical, now dramatic, now pictorial; music that rises to gorgeous heights and sinks to the depths; with a conclusion that is not of the Preacher, the pious admonition after summing up the whole matter; but a conclusion voiced by the violoncello: "There is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom in the grave, whither thou goest." Here is no Solomon, lord of all creatures, at whose name Afrites and evil jinn trembled, the Solomon of the "Thousand Nights and a Night"; here is the monarch that having known power and all pleasures, enumerating them—even to "the delights of the sons of men, as musical instruments, and that of all sorts"—reasoned that everything was futile; that all was vanity.

One might therefore infer that this Rhapsody is distressingly sombre, for nothing is more wearisome than a long drawn-out complaint. The inference would be wrong, for Mr. Bloch has imagined in tones, in superbly exultant measures the pomp and sumptuousness of the King enthroned. There are orchestral bursts of glorification; between them are recitatives and lyric reflections for the jaded voluptuary, the embittered philosopher. The ingenuity displayed is as remarkable as the individuality, the originality shown by the composer stirred in his soul not only by the story of Solomon; moved mightily by the thought of ancient days, the succeeding trials and persecution of his race. More than once in the Rhapsody, if there is a suggestion of Solomon's court and Temple, there is also the suggestion of the Wailing Wall.

The performance by Mr. Salmond, whose musicianship and art were already known in Boston, and by the orchestra was of the utmost eloquence. A violoncellist, seeking only for applause, would have chosen a concerto that would inevitably by its obvious tunefulness, have won him easy recognition. Bloch's rhapsody is not a parade piece for a virtuoso regarding the orchestra only as a necessary appendage. The Rhapsody is orchestral with violoncello obligato. Without an orchestra like the one heard yesterday; without Dr. Koussevitzky, imbued with the spirit of the composition, appreciating the interpretation of the soloist, the Rhapsody might have seemed enigmatical to many. There were yesterday three interpreters, all in aesthetic rivalry. One tribute was paid to them by the audience. The enthusiasm was genuine.

The concert was otherwise of a high standard; even Tchaikovsky's overture, written for an occasion, music that should be heard out-of-doors if possible, gained a certain dignity by the dramatic rendering. For once there was music, not merely bustle and noise. Mozart's overture, ever fresh and sparkling; Beethoven's symphony—they were performed in a vital, necessarily romantic manner; the symphony in the poetically grand style—not with the perfunctory respect paid to a name that is often supposed to guarantee a performance, though it be pedestrian and boresome.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is as follows: Walton, overture "Portsmouth Point," Bax, Symphony No. 2. Loeffler, "Cantum Fratris Solis" (after St. Francis of Assisi) for voice (Povla Frijs) and orchestra (first time here). Ravel, "Bolero."

CELLIST IS SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY

Concert Ends With
"1812" and Audience Likes It

Post Dec. 28, 1929
BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Like the Colonel's lady and Judy O'Grady of Kipling's poem, the subscribers to the Friday afternoon Symphony Concerts and those denied that cultural advantage are, musically speaking, sisters under their skins. For final number at the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon, wrested from the Pops, came that clap-trap in excelsis, Tchaikovsky's "1812." And when the last resounding note had ceased did the assembled dowagers, debutantes and those between lift a supercilious eyebrow? Emphatically they did not. They went, as the expression goes, quite wild with delight.

BEETHOVEN'S FOURTH

There was variety aplenty in yesterday's list, and in the presentation of it. To Mozart's Overture to "The Magic Flute," with which the concert began, Dr. Koussevitzky would impart the qualities of a sonorous, dramatic, brilliant theatrically effective curtain-raiser; but in the process the essential Mozartean spirit, as precious as it is indefinable, evaporated. There was brilliance, but there was hardly the requisite lucidity in the weaving of the voices, the euphony, the formal beauty.

On the other hand, Beethoven's Fourth Symphony that followed was nobly played. This performance might be described as Beethovenish, in the fullest, truest, most flattering sense of the term. Not in long recollection, even at Dr. Koussevitzky's own hands, has this symphony, admittedly one of the lesser ones, proved so engrossing in Symphony Hall, seemed so worthy of its fellowship in the immortal nine.

And if Dr. Koussevitzky was yesterday eloquent with Beethoven, he was nothing less than inspired in his conducting of Ernest Bloch's "Schelemo" (Solomon), Hebrew Rhapsody for violoncello and orchestra, in which Felix Salmond, notable cellist, but newcomer to the Symphony Concerts, bore the solo part.

It was good yesterday to hear Mr. Salmond, who played with his customary full and firm yet beautifully modulated tone, with a fervor and poetry and a feeling for the savage magnificence of the music, its epic voice and stride, that matched Dr. Koussevitzky's own. It was good, too, after two performances last season of the pot-boiler "America," to be reminded again of the greater, the essential Bloch.

This Swiss Jew, who now honors this country with his residence, is not only the unequalled tonal prophet of his race; he is, and the fact becomes clearer with each succeeding year, one of the foremost figures in contemporary musical life.

Elder Masters, A Nondescript, And A Genius

Substitution and an Incident, Mozart, Bloch, Beethoven,
At Symphony Hall

Trans.

Dec. 28, 1929

THE PRIGS were severe and withering. The cynics were wry and sneering. Perhaps it was wisest to be mildly amused at the ordinary courses of human nature in public assembled. . . . Dr. Koussevitzky had persuaded himself, or been persuaded, that a "symphonic tone-picture ballet"—whatever such a triple-headed curiosity may be—deserved performance at the Symphony Concerts. It was all about "The Saporoshhtzy Cosacks," who had a habit of defying Turkish Sultans in phrases that the Watch and Ward Society would surely find "objectionable." Having written them on fair white paper—if we are to believe the subtitles of the "symphonic tone-picture ballet"—they further released their feelings in laughter and the dance. One Glière, a workaday Russian composer, "now living in Moscow," civilly "musicked" them. . . . Well, as the clergymen say by way of clearing their throats, the oftener Dr. Koussevitzky read and rehearsed Glière's Muscovite masterpiece, the less worthy and desirable it seemed for performance in Symphony Hall. At last disinclination mounted to decision, and he tossed the score into the discard. Something must be substituted in the twinkling of an eye. Lo and behold, when the elect ladies of Friday afternoon opened program-books, the final number was the "Overture Solennelle" of Chaikovsky, more briefly known as "1812."

Now, "1812" is well enough in its way to light and air and fire—so swift, so well indeed that it has been played weekly at the Pop Concerts summers beyond recall. Year in and year out, it has landed near the top of the list when audiences were polled for a request night. Whether or not it had been heard before at a Symphony Concert, no man knoweth, since the conductor, like we others, found it irresistible.

ing program-book gave it only one forty-odd letters. Long memories eted it at a concert for the Peninsula; while a waif and stray from elphia said that it was "a great te" with Mr. Stokowski, his orchestra his public. And all of us Bos-is (amongst whom she had the luck le) know what they are! . . . Any the "Overture Solennelle" was played as though Dr. Koussevitz- believed in it as, perhaps, he did. It ated a stirring motion and tuneful ment as it proceeded, say with La illaise in one hand and the Russian al hymn—Tsarist, not Soviétique—e other. It ended with stringy s and brazen clangors, high heaven- ing.

en ensued the event of the after- Bach, Beethoven and Brahms been played at the Symphony Con- Schubert and Schumann, Mozart Vagner, have sounded there—clas- all, and twenty others with them. ssy, Ravel, Strauss, Stravinsky, has had his sonorous inning. Yet in a er-century at Symphony Hall, not or any masterpiece, has received applause than yesterday belauded Overture Solennelle." There were s and murmurs; volleys of hand- ing; eager recalls for the conductor. nce, the matinée audience was ling- to release its fervors of delight. ew what it liked, received it and- ngs on it!—testified a hearty, hon- them on fair white paper—if we are to lation. . . . So runs the world believe the subtitles of the "symphonic and it is pleasant to watch it from tone-picture ballet"—they further re- ank with a half-smile. "It is holi- leased their feelings in laughter and the ime, you know," said a kindly men- dance. One Glière, a workaday Russian Symphony Hall. Bien ça!, as the composer, "now living in Moscow," civilly have it. Or in the American ver- "musicked" them. . . . Well, as thear, "You bet!"

of the preliminaries to the "Ouver- masterpiece, the less worthy and desirable Solennelle" was another overture, by it seemed for performance in Symphony: set before his opera of "The Magic Hall. At last disinclination mounted to With the grave, mysterious decision, and he tossed the score into the still sounding retrospectively in our discard. Something must be substituted some of us may crave permission to in the twinkling of an eye. Lo and be- hem more sonorous, not to say sol- hold, when the elect ladies of Friday than the subsequent Chaikovskian afternoon opened program-books, the ts. We may even lay our hands on final number was the "Overture Solen- earts and declare them close to gran- nelle" of Chaikovsky, more briefly known while as for the intervening as "1812."

ires, was there ever a music more Now, "1812" is well enough in its way to light and air and fire—so swift, so well indeed that it has been played atile, so bright? In the overture weekly at the Pop Concerts summers; the effortless magic which Moz- beyond recall. Year in and year out, be- stilled from what he liked to call sides, it has landed near the top of the agic play—distilled and touched it, list when audiences were polled for a he would, even with sublimity. Dr. "Request Night." Whether or not itievitzky toiled over "1812"; but ob- had been heard before at a Symphony him winging Mozart's overture into Concert, no man knoweth, since the in- ed flight. It was as though the con- ductor, like we others, found it irresistible.

written for an occasion, music that should be heard out-of-doors if possible, gained a certain dignity by the dramatic rendering. For once there was music, not merely bustle and noise. Mozart's overture, ever fresh and sparkling; Beethoven's symphony—they were performed in a vital, necessarily romantic manner; the symphony in the poetically grand style—not with the perfunctory respect paid to a name that is often supposed to guarantee a performance, though it be pedestrian and boresome.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is as follows: Walton, overture "Portsmouth Point," Bax, Symphony No. 2. Loeffler, "Cantatum Fratris Solis" (after St. Francis of Assisi) for voice (Povla Friish) and orchestra (first time here). Ravel, "Bolero."

CELLIST IS SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY

Concert Ends With "1812" and Audience Likes It

Post Dec. 28, 1929
BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Like the Colonel's lady and Judy O'Grady of Kipling's poem, the subscribers to the Friday afternoon Symphony Concerts and those denied that cultural advantage are, musically speaking, sisters under their skins. For final number at the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon, wrested from the Pops, came that clap-trap in excelsis, Tchaikovsky's "1812." And when the last resounding note had ceased did the assembled dowagers, debutantes and those between lift a supercilious eyebrow? Emphatically they did not. They went, as the expression goes, quite wild with delight.

BEETHOVEN'S FOURTH

There was variety aplenty in yesterday's list, and in the presentation of it. To Mozart's Overture to "The Magic Flute," with which the concert began, Dr. Koussevitzky would impart the qualities of a sonorous, dramatic, brilliant theatrically effective curtain-raiser; but in the process the essential Mozartean spirit, as precious as it is indefinable, evaporated. There was brilliance, but there was hardly the requisite lucidity in the weaving of the voices, the euphony, the formal beauty.

On the other hand, Beethoven's Fourth Symphony that followed was nobly played. This performance might be described as Beethovenish, in the fullest, truest, most flattering sense of the term. Not in long recollection, even at Dr. Koussevitzky's own hands, has this symphony, admittedly one of the lesser ones, proved so engrossing in Symphony Hall, seemed so worthy of its fellowship in the immortal nine.

And if Dr. Koussevitzky was yesterday eloquent with Beethoven, he was nothing less than inspired in his conducting of Ernest Bloch's "Schelemo" (Solomon), Hebrew Rhapsody for violoncello and orchestra, in which Felix Salmond, notable 'cellist, but newcomer to the Symphony Concerts, bore the solo part.

It was good yesterday to hear Mr. Salmond, who played with his customary full and firm yet beautifully modulated tone, with a fervor and poetry and a feeling for the savage magnificence of the music, its epic voice and stride, that matched Dr. Koussevitzky's own. It was good, too, after two performances last season of the pot-boiler "America," to be reminded again of the greater, the essential Bloch.

This Swiss Jew, who now honors this country with his residence, is not only the unequalled tonal prophet of his race; he is, and the fact becomes clearer with each succeeding year, one of the foremost figures in contemporary musical life.

Elder Mas A Nonde Fra And A

Substitution and Mozart, Bloch, At Symph

Trans.

THE PRIGS withering. The and sneering. wisest to be the ordinary courses in public assembled. sevitzy had persuaded, that a "sy ture ballet"—whatever headed curiosity may formance at the Sympl was all about "The Sa Paper Bo sacks," who had a 1 Piece Dy Turkish Sultans in pl Piece Dy Watch and Ward Socid Stores pf find "objectionable." 1 Stores A them on fair white pap press.... believe the subtitles of For Sec.... tone-picture ballet"—t For Sec pf leased their feelings in tributing. dance. One Ghère, a eight.... composer, "now living in dus Alco... "musicked" them. rather.... clergymen say by way rather A.... throats, the oftener lather pr pf read and rehearsed Coe & Found masterpiece, the less wope & F 1st it seemed for performace & F 2d pf Hall. At last disinclin alty & Im. decision, and he tossed bber.... discard. Something m bber 1st pf in the twinkling of an elt & Ref. hold, when the elect elt & Ref p afternoon opened pr el pf.... final number was the bacco.... nelle" of Chaikovsky, n Leaf Tob as "1812." Pict 1st pf. Now, "1812" is well Pipe & Rad —so well indeed that Popper.... weekly at the Pop ou ff & Lt beyond recall. Year in no Sales.... list when audiences o Sales pf. "Request Night." Wium.... had been heard bef alite pf.... Concert, no man know hem....

forming program-book gave it only one line of forty-odd letters. Long memories recollected it at a concert for the Pension Fund; while a wail and stray from Philadelphia said that it was "a great favorite" with Mr. Stokowski, his orchestra and his public. And all of us Bostonians (amongst whom she had the luck to settle) know what they are! . . . Anyhow, the "Ouverture Solennelle" was played—played as though Dr. Koussevitzky believed in it as, perhaps, he did. It generated a stirring motion and tuneful excitement as it proceeded, say with La Marseillaise in one hand and the Russian national hymn—Tsarist, not Soviétique—in the other. It ended with stringy whirrs and brazen clangors, high heaven-rending.

Then ensued the event of the afternoon. Bach, Beethoven and Brahms have been played at the Symphony Concerts. Schubert and Schumann, Mozart and Wagner, have sounded there—classics all, and twenty others with them. Debussy, Ravel, Strauss, Stravinsky, has each had his sonorous inning. Yet in a quarter-century at Symphony Hall, not one, for any masterpiece, has received more applause than yesterday belauded this "Ouverture Solennelle." There were shouts and murmurs; volleys of hand-clapping; eager recalls for the conductor. For once, the matinée audience was lingering to release its fervors of delight. It knew what it liked, received it and—blessings on it!—testified a hearty, honest elation. . . . So runs the world away and it is pleasant to watch it from the bank with a half-smile. "It is holiday time, you know," said a kindly mentor at Symphony Hall. Bien ça!, as the French have it. Or in the American vernacular, "You bet!"

One of the preliminaries to the "Ouverture Solennelle" was another overture, by Mozart set before his opera of "The Magic Flute." With the grave, mysterious chords still sounding retrospectively in our ears, some of us may crave permission to find them more sonorous, not to say solemn, than the subsequent Chaikovskian tumults. We may even lay our hands on our hearts and declare them close to grandeur: while as for the intervening measures, was there ever a music more akin to light and air and fire—so swift, so volatile, so bright? In the overture abides the effortless magic which Mozart distilled from what he liked to call his magic play—distilled and touched it, when he would, even with sublimity. Dr. Koussevitzky toiled over "1812"; but observe him winging Mozart's overture into inspired flight. It was as though the conductor, like we others, found it irresistible.

And in this Symphony, written only six years into the nineteenth century, hear Beethoven as the man of sentiment by the eighteenth bred. In the introduction, he is not quite sure of this new character; gropes amiably for the mood; finds it in the lively violins; runs through a first movement benign, gay, light-handed with themes and voices, ever in happy curve. In the slow movement, he is all for songful sentiment with the play of instruments for piquant sauce to sweetness. The light-footed finale, with nothing much to say but a mercurial animation in the saying, is neither more nor less than eighteenth-century leave-taking with an elegant, confident air. Call this Fourth, Beethoven's Symphony of sentiment and virtuosity, with the responsive Dr. Koussevitzky and his virtuoso-orchestra lying in wait for it. Granted this view, he did not refine too much on the golden melody of the slow-movement; while virtuoso after virtuoso had his turn to shade it with a little solo. Even the kettle-drum, beloved of Beethoven, took its chance.

xaltation; cries out in sharp rend acrid scorn. There is no end all iversity of its speech; its very will is prevail; throughout it is the awa voice of Solomon and the tone-the splendor charged, to bitterness orchestra is both complement and fast, deepening sensuous lusters, four song as though it were the temple; answering proclamation with tribal tumults; turning and shadowed, brooding and fatal. The hand of power stretches wealth of resource fills it; imagination clothes it; racial ignates it; a very fire of creation. Voice against voice beat and the spiritual; splendor shadow while across it wisdom. Music of a power that American composers none but Bloch has conceived and achieved, our time. And Mr. Salmond, Dr. Koussevitzky, orchestra, enkindled rather shared and outspread.

H. T. P.

Almond Soloist in New Rhapsody

Switzky's Interpretation of Tsky's "1812" Applauded

Dec. 12, 1929

Bloch's "Solomon," or oio," a "Hebrew Rhapsody" for cilo and orchestra was the only hpiece on yesterday's Symphony o program. The solo cellist was saimond, an Englishman, who tven several recitals in Boston.
ther numbers were Mozart's he Flute" overture, Beethoven's h Symphony, and, instead of g's "Saporotzy Cossacks," Tschai-ky's "1812" overture.

Jolomon," first played at these cont in 1923, with Mr Bedetti as solo-as one of the finest of Bloch's ositions. Here his melodic and Jone originality, his flair for disrive tone color, his emotional inaty find full scope. Interested, as as written, by "the Jewish soul

His creative power stimulated by thoughts of the magnificent sensualism and despair of the great king of Hebrew tradition, Bloch has written glowingly, rhapsodically, powerfully. Dr Koussevitzky's intense and dramatic interpretation of the purely orchestral measures made Mr Saimond's conception of the solo part seem tepid and tame.

Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture, one of the most marvelous pure patterns in tone yet created, was gracefully and fluently played. Here Dr Koussevitzky had not Mozartian melody, with which he is out of sympathy, to baffle him in his endeavors for a sympathetic performance. He was, accordingly, more successful than he has yet been in Boston with any work by Mozart.

Beethoven's Fourth Symphony has from its first performances been more or less eclipsed in the minds and memories of musicians by the Third and Fifth Symphonies. Why, it is hard to explain. The music is original and in its way wholly delightful, but somehow neither the themes nor the working out of them have the intense creative energy felt by everyone in the "Eroica" and Fifth symphonies.

Dr Koussevitzky excelled yesterday in the slow introduction to the first movement, which he made sound more deeply significant than it usually has. Where he fell short was where he so often fails with the great classics. Again and again, in the slow movement, in the trio of the scherzo, with the second theme of the first allegro, he did not clearly grasp Beethoven's melodic line and reveal all its subtlety and purity of design. From the printed music he drew melody, to be sure, but a stickier, stodgier melody in slow passages, and a flimsier, more trivial melody in rapid passages, than Beethoven wrote.

It was a surprise to some to find Tchaikovsky's "1812" overture on the program of a pair of symphony concerts. In Boston that piece has for a good many years been relegated to the Pops and the movie houses. Many listeners, among them the present writer, dislike the "1812" overture intensely, not merely because it is now hopelessly hackneyed, but because of the over-emphasis of its final climax, one of the emptiest and noisiest in all music.

But even listeners thus prejudiced against the piece could not fail to be struck with the tremendous dramatic power of Dr Koussevitzky's interpretation and impressed by the ingenuity

After hearing Dvorak's "New World" symphony the other day and "1812" yesterday one is inclined to surmise that Dr Koussevitzky intends this season occasionally to regale the Boston Symphony audiences with "popular classics," with the sort of piece that is the mainstay of the Pops programs. By so doing he would undoubtedly please very many of the subscribers. If Grieg's "Peer Gynt" suite, and Victor Herbert's arrangement of "The Rosary" are played in due course, they will be heartily applauded, let the musical intelligentsia sneer, as it unquestionably will.

But, after all, is not the purpose of these Symphony concerts the performance, not of the most popular music in the world, but of the best? From Bach to Stravinsky the repertory of orchestral music is full of things that are not, and will probably never be popular in the sense that "1812" is popular. No audience large enough to fill Symphony Hall exists anywhere in the world, which is devoted only to the best music. In these matters the subscribers trust the conductor to maintain a standard most of them would not attempt to decide upon for themselves.

Next week, if the announced program is not altered, the audience will hear Bax' Second Symphony and Ravel's Bolero repeated, also Walton's "Portsmouth Point" and Mr Loeffler's new "Cantum fratris Solis," with Povla Frijsh as soloist.

Because of the postponed arrival of the Society of Ancient Instruments, Ernest Schelling proposes to feature the woodwinds instead of the string choir at his opening concert next Saturday morning at 11. The Society of Ancient Instruments will assist at the concert on Jan. 18.

The following pieces will be played on Saturday morning by a large orchestra from the Boston Symphony. As usual Mr. Schelling will talk. Lantern slides, notebooks and prizes add interest to the series.

Overture to "The Sold Bride" Smetana
Scherzo from "Midsummer Night's Dream" . . . Mendelssohn
Quator concertante for oboe, clarinet, horn
and bassoon Mozart
"L'Apprenti Sorcier" Dukas
"Silent Night, Holy Night"
"Berceuse" from "The Fire Bird" . . . polka
and galop from Second Suite . . . Stravinsky

There is something to be said, to even with the "Overture Solennelle" come after—for the Fourth Symphony of Beethoven. How well for example, accompanied the overture of Mozart, though nowhere does it rise to the grandeur of the Mozartean sonorities. Composers seem writing out of an awful readiness and abundance; both make a music akin to light; both their several instruments sounding fully in their ears. In the maturer phonic Beethoven bent choirs and individual voices to his will. In this Foh he often plays with them gracefully (him), even affectionately, as though cherished their quality and diversity would persuade and not drive to have their charm and not their power. Fancy runs free, alert and still through the unfolding and the upbuilding of the melodies, in the wreathing of ment, in the incessant animation of ginning and end, in the third movement that is neither minuet nor scherzo caprice playing over both.

In this Symphony, written

BLOCH'S 'SOLOMON' AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Felix Salmond Soloist in Hebrew Rhapsody

Dr Koussevitzky's Interpretation of Tschaikowsky's "1812" Applauded

Globe — Dec. 18, 1929
Ernest Bloch's "Solomon," or "Schelomo," a "Hebrew Rhapsody" for violin and orchestra was the only violinello and orchestra was the only modern piece on yesterday's Symphony concert program. The solo cellist was Felix Sammond, an Englishman, who has given several recitals in Boston. The other numbers were Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture, Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, and, instead of Gliere's "Saporotzy Cossacks," Tschalkowsky's "1812" overture.

"Solomon," first played at these concerts in 1923, with Mr Bedetti as soloist, is one of the finest of Bloch's compositions. Here his melodic and harmonic originality, his flair for distinctive tone color, his emotional intensity find full scope. Interested, as he has written, by "the Jewish soul

... the complex, glowing, agitated soul ... vibrating throughout the Bible," Bloch has not tried to be a musical archaeologist, or to base his music on more or less authentic Hebrew themes.

His creative power stimulated by thoughts of the magnificent sensualism and despair of the great king of Hebrew tradition, Bloch has written glowingly, rhapsodically, powerfully. Dr Koussevitzky's intense and dramatic interpretation of the purely orchestral measures made Mr Saimond's conception of the solo part seem tepid and tame.

Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture, one of the most marvelous pure patterns in tone yet created, was gracefully and fluently played. Here Dr Koussevitzky had not Mozartian melody, with which he is out of sympathy, to baffle him in his endeavors for a sympathetic performance. He was, accordingly, more successful than he has yet been in Boston with any work by Mozart.

Beethoven's Fourth Symphony has from its first performances been more or less eclipsed in the minds and memories of musicians by the Third and Fifth Symphonies. Why, it is hard to explain. The music is original and in its way wholly delightful, but somehow neither the themes nor the working out of them have the intense creative energy felt by everyone in the "Eroica" and Fifth symphonies.

Dr Koussevitzky excelled yesterday in the slow introduction to the first movement, which he made sound more deeply significant than it usually has. Where he fell short was where he so often fails with the great classics. Again and again, in the slow movement, in the trio of the scherzo, with the second theme of the first allegro, he did not clearly grasp Beethoven's melodic line and reveal all its subtlety and purity of design. From the printed music he drew melody, to be sure, but a stickier, stodgier melody in slow passages, and a flimsier, more trivial melody in rapid passages, than Beethoven wrote.

It was a surprise to some to find Tchaikovsky's "1812" overture on the program of a pair of symphony concerts. In Boston that piece has for a good many years been relegated to the Pops and the movie houses. Many listeners, among them the present writer, dislike the "1812" overture intensely, not merely because it is now hopelessly hackneyed, but because of the overemphasis of its final climax, one of the emptiest and noisiest in all music.

But even listeners thus prejudiced against the piece could not fail to be struck with the tremendous dramatic power of Dr Koussevitzky's interpretation and impressed by the ingenuity with which he avoided wherever possible all suggestion of the commonplace of music. He made the "1812" overture sound much better than it has sounded before, and won rapturous applause from the audience.

After hearing Dvorak's "New World" symphony the other day and "1812" yesterday one is inclined to surmise that Dr Koussevitzky intends this season occasionally to regale the Boston Symphony audiences with "popular classics," with the sort of piece that is the mainstay of the Pops programs. By so doing he would undoubtedly please very many of the subscribers. If Grieg's "Peer Gynt" suite, and Victor Herbert's arrangement of "The Rosary" are played in due course, they will be heartily applauded, let the musical intelligentsia sneer, as it unquestionably will.

But, after all, is not the purpose of these Symphony concerts the performance, not of the most popular music in the world, but of the best? From Bach to Stravinsky the repertory of orchestral music is full of things that are not, and will probably never be popular in the sense that "1812" is popular. No audience large enough to fill Symphony Hall exists anywhere in the world, which is devoted only to the best music. In these matters the subscribers trust the conductor to maintain a standard most of them would not attempt to decide upon for themselves.

Next week, if the announced program is not altered, the audience will hear Bax' Second Symphony and Ravel's Bolero repeated, also Walton's "Portsmouth Point" and Mr Loeffler's new "Cantum fratris Solis," with Povla Frijsh as soloist.

SCHELLING CONCERTS

Because of the postponed arrival of the Society of Ancient Instruments, Ernest Schelling proposes to feature the woodwinds instead of the string choir at his opening concert next Saturday morning at 11. The Society of Ancient Instruments will assist at the concert on Jan. 18.

The following pieces will be played on Saturday morning by a large orchestra from the Boston Symphony. As usual Mr. Schelling will talk. Lantern slides, notebooks and prizes add interest to the series.

Overture to "The Sold Bride" Smetana
Scherzo from "Midsummer Night's Dream" . . . Mendelssohn
Quator concertante for oboe, clarinet, horn
and bassoon Mozart
"L'Apprenti Sorcier" Dukas
"Silent Night, Holy Night"
"Berceuse" from "The Fire Bird" . . . polka
and galop from Second Suite . . . Stravinsky

120

121

SYMPHONY HALL, BOSTON
SUNDAY AFTERNOON, DEC. 29, 1929, at 3.00

60th CONCERT IN AID OF THE ORCHESTRA'S

PENSION FUND

BY THE

BOSTON SYMPHONY
ORCHESTRA

Dr. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor

FLORENCE AUSTRAL

Dr. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

PROGRAMME

Overture to "The Flying Dutchman"
Senta's Ballad. from "The Flying Dutchman"
Bacchanale, "The Hill of Venus" from "Tannhäuser"
Air of Elizabeth, "Dich, Theure Halle," from "Tannhäuser"
Introduction to Act III, "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"
Ride of the Valkyries from "The Valkyrie"
Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde"

RICHARD WAGNER

SOLOIST

FLORENCE AUSTRAL
THE GREAT DRAMATIC SOPRANO

TICKETS AT BOX OFFICE

SYMPHONY HALL, BOSTON
SUNDAY AFTERNOON, DEC. 29, 1929, at 3.00

60th CONCERT IN AID OF THE ORCHESTRA'S

PENSION FUND

BY THE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Dr. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor

FLORENCE AUSTRAL

Dr. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

PROGRAMME

Overture to "The Flying Dutchman"
Senta's Ballad. from "The Flying Dutchman"
Bacchanale, "The Hill of Venus" from "Tannhäuser"
Air of Elizabeth, "Dich, Theure Halle," from "Tannhäuser"
Introduction to Act III, "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"
Ride of the Valkyries from "The Valkyrie"
Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde"

RICHARD
WAGNER

SOLOIST

FLORENCE AUSTRAL

THE GREAT DRAMATIC SOPRANO

TICKETS AT BOX OFFICE

The Wagner That Boston Still Craves

Excerpts from His Operas
By Dr. Koussevitzky
Variously

FOR once in a way, may not the reviewer take his ease—not in the inn as the familiar quotation has it—but in the concert-hall? On twenty-odd occasions in the course of a musical year, here in Boston he sits before Dr. Koussevitzky and the Symphony Orchestra; listens under more or less tension to their playing; collects in print the residue of his impressions. To him they set forth works—as the trade-dialect names them—by composers. In duty to his calling, his readers and his own secret vanities, he tries to suggest in words the contents and the quality, knowing well how impossible with music is that self-imposed task. Warning to it nevertheless, he weaves backgrounds; arrays deductions; ventures opinions; on a brave day may even reason high—like Milton's fallen angels—on the art of music and the art of life. Usually, he has his labor for his pains. He does not, for example, share the prejudices of some of his readers, naturally preferring his own. Therefore, as their notes, usually anonymous, remind him, he is knave, fool, falsifier, oftenest all three. Satisfied once more that the world is, fundamentally, an amusing place, he persists in his calling; grows gray, if not ripe, within it.

Once and again, however, the reviewer pines for a concert at which he shall be listener like the rest; hear receptively, not analytically; store up less opinions for print than obiter dicta for his neighbor at the dinner-table. He shall gabble them as well, trying not at all to give them shape and shadings. Forthwith he looks about—especially at mid-season—for the occasion. Yesterday afternoon he believed he had found it—at the concert of the Symphony Orchestra for the increase of its Pension Fund. Considering its deserts, well may one and all hold their critical peace. The program assembled excerpts from the operas and the music-dramas of Wagner, all familiar.

THE FLYING MAN'S NEWSPAPER An Evening Transcript

Member of the Aeronautical of Commerce of America, Inc.

THE NEWS OF AVIATION
DAY IN THE TRANSCRIPT

IT PAGE EVERY MONDAY

Transcript by mail, one year, $2
Address Subscription Dept.

Summary of 1929 Boston Air Event

Continued from Preceding Page

my airport head, visits Boston, home of the air.
Harold Moon to Rockland as Curtiss.
Bruce Stuart and Bugs Raymond (world's record) fly from Boston to Springfield.
Edward Fischer becomes airpilot.
Major General John F. O'Rourke, president of American Motorless Aviation, Robert Warren buys 300-acre airport for New England Aeronautical, Inc. Inspector O'Brien leads Y camp at Cape.
Count shows fifty-seven planes at airport, with a number about New Bedford.

Mrs. Clarence Shankle, former pilot, gets first Massachusetts pilot license. First glider school in America opened at Wellfleet. Towed glider meet on.

Transcripts flown to Bar Harbor. Amphibian. Gliders arrive in Boston from Gloucester.

Vermont bans all but native sport. East Coast opens Wright depot. Keystone Patrician goes home. Boston loses National Air Show. Rochford goes for a balloon ride. Mayflower, loaned to Tech for experimental purposes. Sport biplane of New England Aircraft Company of Hills Grove, R. I., visits port. Savola-Marchetti New York-Boston service opens. Frank Blunk, general manager of Gliders, Inc., of Orion, Mich., and Walker, manager of National Glider Club of Detroit, visit Cape Cod glider. Year-old woman taken up at Muller Cape traffic so heavy that two needed. East Coast builds new Muller Field. Flying grocery store lands at night.

the shorter curve wearily drooping, the intermediate measures breathless with suspense, the final mounting through Holde's monologue, the dissolution into ecstasy of an ineffable melody. Dr. Koussevitzky holds the line, intensifies the progress; sounds the tragic passion. Indescent is the orchestral tone; through the chromatic harmonies pierce and now. It is the whole music and nothing but the music—the conductor's superlative Wagner, comparable only to his version of the march of mourning and of memory that bears the dead Siegfried onward. And Miss Austral at last to music in which she could release all her voice and all her powers. . . . One of these listener's impressions of a full afternoon. A review could do no more than co-ordinate and turn them apely. H. T. P.

PENSION FUND CONCERT

Yesterday's concert in aid of the Symphony Orchestra's Pension Fund, the sixtieth, no less, for the purpose, proved an occasion of beauty and splendor, almost of solemnity. People knew it would be an event. They "sensed" as much in the air, forbidding and damp though it was, on the way to Symphony Hall; once in a way a happy presentiment of the sort does make itself felt, although nobody can quite tell why. Perhaps the press of cars at the corner, which raised crossing the street to the pitch of a perilous adventure, had a hand in spreading the right atmosphere abroad.

The right atmosphere, at all events, prevailed, inside the hall as well as out. An audience filling every seat sat mighty expectant, all looking for something apart. For the spell of Wagner still holds its power unless need by one iota. For real romance the world is still eager. But of course the romance must be genuine, not commonplace ragged out.

So wild a note of high romance Dr. Koussevitzky found in the "Flying

Dutchman" overture that he startled some of his hearers. He made the music sound not early Wagner, but at the least of it post-Ring. He also made it hard for Mme. Florence Austral, who sang Senta's ballad, to follow him to the same dizzy level of expression and picturesqueness.

With less of novelty but with a finer beauty Dr. Koussevitzky read the Bacchanale from the first act of "Tannhaeuser." Magnificently, in very truth, he blazoned forth this glorified ballet music. Leda's swan, satyrs and the three graces—not for one second were they missed. Also Mme. Austral, more at home with "Tannhaeuser" than with the Hollaender, gave of her beautiful voice successfully in Elizabeth's aria "Dich, Heurle Halle."

All this was lofty. But loftier followed when Dr. Koussevitzky played the prelude to the third act of "Die Meistersinger." Every exquisite melodious phrase, as it fell, rhythmically right and entrancingly sonorous, on the refreshed and satisfied ear, stirred memories of the blessed Sunday calm that the Hans Sachs of Emil Fischer, when the curtain rose on act three, personified.

Here was the solemnity of the afternoon, crowning perfect beauty. But there was a second solemn moment, when Dr. Koussevitzky, after the frenzy of applause that greeted the Valkyries' ride, motioned the orchestra to stand. This was a significant moment.

It led to a thrillingly beautiful performance of the prelude to "Tristan," and the Love-Death in which Mme. Austral joined. For sheer musicianship surely Dr. Koussevitzky has never surpassed the high point he reached in this prelude. Since emotion held pace with musicianship, the performance, moving as well as beautiful, was one to be remembered this many a day.

The audience applauded Mme. Austral, Dr. Koussevitzky and the players with enthusiasm. R. R. G.

The Pension Fund of the Symphony Orchestra is the larger by $10,000—gift last Sunday of a friend and benefactor who prefers to go unnamed. Evidently he, or she, directs generosity wisely.

The W Th

Excerpts

By Dr

FOR once the reviewer has it—on twenty-odd years before Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra were on their mettle, as always at such concerts. How often in these stimulating conditions has he set down their praises! Miss Florence Austral was the assisting singer. Was it incumbent upon him to add one more leaf to her Wagnerian laurels? The audience filled Symphony Hall eager to hear, quick with response—for the sixtieth time in the count of these concerts.

In a word, the long-desired occasion in which the reviewer could be one more listener, with no malaise of conscience while he heard, and no disappointment to his readers when he confessed as much in print next day. Yet no sooner had he taken his seat than the Old Adam of his calling stirred in him. He surveyed the audience. Yes; outside the subscribers to the Symphony Concerts, there was an occasional public for the orchestra—intelligent, interested, not without proper pride in one of the chief Bostonian glories. Among others than those subscribers were the fame of Dr. Koussevitzky, and also curiosity over him, spread abroad. True, Wagner had helped to assemble this audience—Wagner in the concert-hall, whereas his natural and revealing seat is the opera house. By inference, not few prefer the musical to the scenic Wagner and willingly seek him stage-stripped. By inference again, many of us hear so little Wagner in an annual fortnight of opera—say four or five performances—that they would have the concert-hall for introduction or supplement. Boston is nearly operaless; yet craves excerpts from operas when it is assured of able performance. Quite so; some of his recollections. . . . Now if this were so . . . and usually anonymous that could be done . . . and in Germany, you know. . . .

The beginning of the concert recalls the reviewer from such wool-gathering. Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra are playing the Overture to "The Flying Dutchman." Has he ever ventured it before in Boston? Possibly not. Certainly he is in the vein. How well he is characterizing the measures of the Hollander and of Senta! How he and the orchestra toss up the sea-music! The middle turbulence is no "working out," as the analysts have it. There is drama in it and drama at climax and consummation when Senta's motif finally ascends and the outlaw by the "woman-soul" is saved. Thus early did the idea haunt Wagner. Thus early did he write it in terms of music-drama. And now Dr. Koussevitzky reads it out full and plain. Not all music-dramas of Wagner, all familiar.

Government license to fly. . . .
ant E. H. Under comes here to to adets. Harvard Fly of East Coast.
voloff buys Great Lake shows air mail recor July. Moth gets orde for Curtiss Company.
General O'Ryan makes sol Eight ships of General T fleet visit Boston.
erkins qualifies in bas at South Wellfleet. Ol ers electric refrigerators ew England.
id D. Thomas, former com um Naval air station, ar building Viking seaplanes a class Falcon. Prestone cool osilindale joints communit buildings. Airvia puts New ane service on twice-a-da Savage Aircraft Corporation port for five years.
puts in speedboats for trans from planes to shore.
Angeles flies over New Eng

Smith here demonstratin Barnaby wins three glider rat first American to qualify a alter S. Rogers and associ Davis V-3. Volonial join on for air package delivery.
e Davison, Army air secr Terry Kenyon solos at Beverl
ays moves into new airport Hinds boundary lights bein
t. Curtiss organizes women
Devereaux and Edward Reis Devereaux fatally injured as Cessna monoplane in Phila Cleveland air races falls int ain Mackie breaks world's re outside loops at Cleveland ai al Boston-New York serv es.
ed in Tomorrow's Transcript)

the shorter curve wearily drooping, the intermediate measures breathless with suspense, the final mounting through Solde's monologue, the dissolution into ecstasy of an ineffable melody. Dr. Koussevitzky holds the line, intensifies the progress; sounds the tragic passion. Indescent is the orchestral tone; through the chromatic harmonies pierce and low. It is the whole music and nothing but the music—the conductor's superlative Wagner, comparable only to his version of the march of mourning and of memory that bears the dead Siegfried homeward. And Miss Austral at last to music in which she could release all her voice and all her powers. . . . One of these listener's impressions of a full afternoon. A review could do no more than co-ordinate and turn them capely.
H. T. P.

PENSION FUND CONCERT

Yesterday's concert in aid of the Symphony Orchestra's Pension Fund, the sixtieth, no less, for the purpose, proved an occasion of beauty and splendor, almost of solemnity. People knew it would be an event. They "sensed" as much in the air, forbidding and damp though it was, on the way to Symphony Hall; once in a way a happy presentiment of the sort does make itself felt, although nobody can quite tell why. Perhaps the press of cars at the corner, which raised crossing the street to the pitch of a perilous adventure, had a hand in spreading the right atmosphere abroad. The right atmosphere, at all events, prevailed, inside the hall as well as out. An audience filling every seat sat mighty expectant, all looking for something apart. For the spell of Wagner still holds its power unless negated by one iota. For real romance the world is still eager. But of course the romance must be genuine, not commonplace ragged out. So wild a note of high romance Dr. Koussevitzky found in the "Flying Dutchman" overture that he startled some of his hearers. He made the music sound not early Wagner, but at the least of it post-Ring. He also made it hard for Mme. Florence Austral, who sang Senta's ballad, to follow him to the same dizzy level of expression and picturesqueness.

With less of novelty but with a finer beauty Dr. Koussevitzky read the Bacchanale from the first act of "Tannhaeuser." Magnificently, in very truth, he blazoned forth this glorified ballet music. Leda's swan, satyrs and the three graces—not for one second were they missed. Also Mme. Austral, more at home with "Tannhaeuser" than with the Hollaender, gave of her beautiful voice successfully in Elizabeth's aria "Dich, Heure Halle."

All this was lofty. But loftier followed when Dr. Koussevitzky played the prelude to the third act of "Die Meistersinger." Every exquisite melodious phrase, as it fell, rhythmically right and entrancingly sonorous, on the refreshed and satisfied ear, stirred memories of the blessed Sunday calm that the Hans Sachs of Emil Fischer, when the curtain rose on act three, personified.

Here was the solemnity of the afternoon, crowning perfect beauty. But there was a second solemn moment, when Dr. Koussevitzky, after the frenzy of applause that greeted the Valkyries' ride, motioned the orchestra to stand. This was a significant moment.

It led to a thrillingly beautiful performance of the prelude to "Tristan," and the Love-Death in which Mme. Austral joined. For sheer musicianship surely Dr. Koussevitzky has never surpassed the high point he reached in this prelude. Since emotion held pace with musicianship, the performance, moving as well as beautiful, was one to be remembered this many a day.

The audience applauded Mme. Austral, Dr. Koussevitzky and the players with enthusiasm.
R. R. G.

The Pension Fund of the Symphony Orchestra is the larger by $10,000—gift last Sunday of a friend and benefactor who prefers to go unnamed. Evidently he, or she, directs generosity wisely.

The W Th

Excerpts

By Dr

FOR once the reviewer called stirred in the inf audience. Yes; he has it to the Symphony. On twenty-odd occasions public a musical year intelligent, interest before Dr. Koussevitzky and the phony Orchestra. Among less tension to scribes were the print the resident vitzky, and also cu him they set f abroad. True, W dialect names semble this audi duty to his ca concert-hall, wher own secret va vealing seat is th in words the ference, not few knowing well the scenic Wagn is that self-im him stage-stripped it nevertheless many of us hear arrays deduct annual fortnight a brave day five performances like Milton's fa the concert-hall to music and the plement. Boston has his labor craves excerpts fi not, for examp assured of able p some of his rea that insoluble pro his own. Thon. . . . Now if usually anony that could be done knave, fool, fa you know. . . . Satisfied once The beginning he reviewer from Dr. Koussevitzky he persists in his Dr. Koussevitzky playing the Ove ripe, within it. Dutchman." Has conductors of the old Overture are as fortunate. . . . Here is Miss Austral singing Senta's ballad, as she looks up at the Hollander's picture on Daland's wall. She does all she may for the music; but the ballad is early and ageing Wagner.

Once and ag pines for a cor listener like t fore in Boston? he is in the vein. not analytical tering the meas for print than and of Senta! H bor at the dim tra toss up the them as well, turbulence is no analysts have it. them shape an and drama at cli looks about—e when Senta's mo for the occasio the outlaw by the cert of the Sy Thus early did t increase of its Thus early did t ing its deserts, of music-drama. And now Dr. Kousse their critical p vitzky reads it out vled excerpts from the operas and the music-dramas of Wagner, all familiar.

On, next, to "Tannhäuser" but with the reviewer resolute not to renew an old quarrel with the conductor over his version of the Bacchanale. To the reviewer's ear there is no bite in the sensual frenzy, no voluptuous dalliance in the long-drawn close. He has searched the score to find the wherewithal to reproach the conductor; finds it not; confesses himself beaten. Perhaps the frenzy is rushed and blurred; perhaps the dalliance is over-sentimentalized. Sensuous as is the tone of the orchestra, it may lack the ultimate operatic accent. Vanity of vanities! There is only to take cover in a personal impression: "My Bacchanale is not your Bacchanale." Yet there was a crumb of comfort. Least applauded of all the chosen numbers went this music of Venus's hill. For foil, the elate Elisabeth hailing the Hall of Song. Miss Austral's singing lacked nothing but tones of virginal timbre. But a youthful Elisabeth, like a youthful Gilda, finds the music too difficult.

Dr. Koussevitzky's Valkyrs ride the skies at a furious pace. They are Wotan's whirlwind daughters. No technician, flashing his theater-lightnings, could possibly keep pace with them. Yet the rhythms drive, the clang resounds; the clouds are cloven; upon their rock are the Valkyrs alighted. Out of the simplest means Wagner compasses his illusion of an heroic world. . . . The Parisians say that every non-French conductor takes Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" too slowly, too seriously. By the same token we Bostonians may retort that every non-German conductor takes "Die Meistersinger" too intensely, too seriously. They are all for Hans Sachs the poet, who by chance, rather than by inclination, was shoemaker and burgher of Nuremberg. It was so with Mr. Toscanini; it is so with Dr. Koussevitzky.

His playing of the Introduction to the Third Act, in pace, in phrase, in tonal color, is the poetry of musical sound, grave and earnest and deep-wrought, but who would suspect that the curtain was about to rise on Hans Sachs in his shirt-sleeves reading in the morning light in his great book? The homely note is lacking.

To crown the concert and send these doubts and demurs down the wind, the Prelude and the Closing Scene from "Tristan." The haunting fate, the long ascending curve of sateless longing, and now Dr. Koussevitzky reads it out full and plain. Not all the shorter curve wearily drooping, the intermediate measures breathless with suspense, the final mounting through Isolde's monologue, the dissolution into ecstasy of an ineffable melody. Dr. Koussevitzky holds the line, intensifies the progress; sounds the tragic passion. Incandescent is the orchestral tone; through it the chromatic harmonies pierce and glow. It is the whole music and nothing but the music—the conductor's superlative Wagner, comparable only to his version of the march of mourning and of memory that bears the dead Siegfried homeward. And Miss Austral at last to music in which she could release all her voice and all her powers. . . . One by one these listener's impressions of a full afternoon. A review could do no more than co-ordinate and turn them shapely.

H. T. P.

PENSION FUND CONCERT

Yesterday's concert in aid of the Symphony Orchestra's Pension Fund, the sixtieth, no less, for the purpose, proved an occasion of beauty and splendor, almost of solemnity. People knew it would be an event. They "sensed" as much in the air, forbidding and damp though it was, on the way to Symphony Hall; once in a way a happy presentiment of the sort does make itself felt, although nobody can quite tell why. Perhaps the press of cars at the corner, which raised crossing the street to the pitch of a perilous adventure, had a hand in spreading the right atmosphere abroad.

The right atmosphere, at all events, prevailed, inside the hall as well as out. An audience filling every seat sat mighty expectant, all looking for something apart. For the "spell" of Wagner still holds its power unless need by one iota. For real romance the world is still eager. But of course the romance must be genuine, not commonplace ragged out.

So wild a note of high romance Dr. Koussevitzky found in the "Flying

Dutchman" overture that he startled some of his hearers. He made the music sound not early Wagner, but at the least of it post-Ring. He also made it hard for Mme. Florence Austral, who sang Senta's ballad, to follow him to the same dizzy level of expression and picturesqueness.

With less of novelty but with a finer beauty Dr. Koussevitzky read the Bacchanale from the first act of "Tannhäuser." Magnificently, in very truth, he blazoned forth this glorified ballet music. Leda's swan, satyrs and the three graces—not for one second were they missed. Also Mme. Austral, more at home with "Tannhäuser" than with the Hollaender, gave of her beautiful voice successfully in Elizabeth's aria "Dich, Heure Halle."

All this was lofty. But loftier followed when Dr. Koussevitzky played the prelude to the third act of "Die Meistersinger." Every exquisite melodious phrase, as it fell, rhythmically right and entrancingly sonorous, on the refreshed and satisfied ear, stirred memories of the blessed Sunday calm that the Hans Sachs of Emil Fischer, when the curtain rose on act three, personified.

Here was the solemnity of the afternoon, crowning perfect beauty. But there was a second solemn moment, when Dr. Koussevitzky, after the frenzy of applause that greeted the Valkyries' ride, motioned the orchestra to stand. This was a significant moment.

It led to a thrillingly beautiful performance of the prelude to "Tristan," and the Love-Death in which Mme. Austral joined. For sheer musicianship surely Dr. Koussevitzky has never surpassed the high point he reached in this prelude. Since emotion held pace with musicianship, the performance, moving as well as beautiful, was one to be remembered this many a day.

The audience applauded Mme. Austral, Dr. Koussevitzky and the players with enthusiasm.

R. R. G.

The Pension Fund of the Symphony Orchestra is the larger by $10,000—gift last Sunday of a friend and benefactor who prefers to go unnamed. Evidently he, or she, directs generosity wisely.

125

Eleventh Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, JANUARY 3, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, JANUARY 4, at 8.15 o'clock

Walton Overture, "Portsmouth Point"

Bax Symphony No. 2 in E minor and C
I. Allegro moderato.
II. Andante.
III. Allegro feroce.

Loeffler Canticum Fratris Solis (After St. Francis of Assisi) for Voice and Orchestra
(First time in Boston)

Ravel "Bolero"

SOLOIST

POVLA FRIJSH

STEINWAY PIANO USED

There will be an intermission after the symphony

The works to be played at these concerts may be seen in the Allen A. Brown Music Collection of the Boston Public Library one week before the concert

These Later Honored Years

Charles Martin Loeffler

Once More Returned to the Symphony Concerts

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The program of the 11th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, which took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall, was as follows:

Walton, overture, "Portsmouth Point." Bax, Symphony No. 2, E minor and C. Loeffler, Canticum Fratris Solis—after St. Francis of Assisi (first time in Boston; Povla Frijs, soprano). Ravel, Bolero.

Walton and Bax are together in the catalogue as British composers; Walton born in Lancashire; Bax in London. The two were educated musically in England. How different their musical natures as exemplified in the overture and the symphony heard yesterday.

Walton's music is of the hearty John Bull type; roast beef, flagons of ale, the England of Captain Marryatt, "Rule Britannia," "The British Grenadiers," "Down Among the Dead Men," "God Save the King." To music this overture is as the prints of Rowlandson to art—and Rowlandson found his musical translator in Walton. Or the Walton of this overture is to music as Daniel Defoe and William Cobbett to English literature. Music that is sturdy, self-reliant, not without a suggestion of insular arrogance. Walton wisely did not attempt an interlinear translation into tones of Rowlandson's print of a quayside in confusion; no sentimental passage for the officer farewelling his lady love; no grotesque dance for the wooden legged sailor. The composer strove to picture the hurry, the bustle, what one might call the fury of departure. He did not strive in vain.

Bax, on the other hand, has been known to us by his musical sojourn in fairy land. He dwelt in western Ireland for a time, nor was he a stranger among the artists and writers of Dublin. His visit to Russia did not affect him musically to any noticeable extent.

It was said of the pugilist Sir Daniel Donnelly that there were Iricisms in his style. In the music of Arnold Bax there are Celticisms: the romantic melancholy, the Donnybrook defiant outbursts, the fancy that has been nourished on Irish legends. He has seen "the good people"; he has visited the Faery Hills and sailed to the island of Pfand; he has listened to the men and women known to Synge; exchanged mystical revelations with the poet Yeats, yet Bax is no idle dreamer of an empty lay; he dreams—even in this symphony—but here he is also a purposeful man of action. He is profoundly musical and feels no need of a program to fire his imagination. (The symphony is a highly imaginative work.) Mr. Edwin Evans is not extravagant in saying that Irish legends, landscapes and songs have contributed to the characteristic style by which one knows the music of Bax. His music is intensely emotional, but in an individual manner. To some this symphony is a stumbling block; even if they have emotions, they wish them to be aroused in a more familiar and genteel manner. They have ears, but they do not hear. There is nothing cryptic in the music. Everywhere is strength, even in the beauty of the work. Is anyone left unmoved by the Celtic sadness of the ending? Suppose Bax had ended with a roaring fortissimo, with the organ thundering, drums beating, cymbals crashing fanfares of trumpets in what is sometimes called "the apotheosis" would not some have then applauded tempestuously, and said as they went out: "I didn't get on to a good deal of the music, but I liked the ending."

A third hearing confirms one hearer in the impression made by the first; here is one of the most important musical works that have crossed the Atlantic for many years. The sympathetic, eloquent, superb performance yesterday turned impression into conviction.

Mr. Loeffler is a man of fine literary taste and wide reading as well as a singularly skilled composer of exquisite fancy. It is not surprising that this "Hymn of Brother Sun" appealed to him and led him to seek out the fitting music. The Hymn has attracted many composers. Some of them have written in heroic, bravura manner, singularly out of keeping with the text. There are lovely pages in Mr. Loeffler's work—charming melodic lines, an assisting not distracting, always pertinent use of liturgical motives, a poetic blending of instrumental timbres. Mme. Frijs, the one great interpreter of songs, now before the American public, did not fail to realize and express the sentiments of the Saint and the illuminating commentary of the composer. Mr. Loeffler, Mme. Frijs, Dr. Koussevitzky and the

These Later Honored Years

Charles Martin Loeffler

Once More Returned to the Symphony Concerts

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The program of the 11th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, which took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall, was as follows:

Walton, overture, "Portsmouth Point." Bax, Symphony No. 2, E minor and C. Loeffler, Canticum Fratris Solis—after St. Francis of Assisi (first time in Boston; Povia Friish, soprano). Ravel, Bolero.

Walton and Bax are together in the catalogue as British composers: Walton born in Lancashire; Bax in London. The two were educated musically in England. How different their musical natures as exemplified in the overture and the symphony heard yesterday.

Walton's music is of the hearty John Bull type; roast beef, flagons of ale, the England of Captain Marryat, "Rule Britannia," "The British Grenadiers," "Down Among the Dead Men," "God Save the King." To music this overture is as the prints of Rowlandson to art—and Rowlandson found his musical translator in Walton. Or the Walton of this overture is to music as Daniel Defoe and William Cobbett to English literature. Music that is sturdy, self-reliant, not without a suggestion of insular arrogance. Walton wisely did not attempt an interlinear translation into tones of Rowlandson's print of a quayside in confusion; no sentimental passage for the officer farewelling his lady love; no grotesque dance for the wooden legged sailor. The composer strove to picture the hurry, the bustle, what one might call the fury of departure. He did not strive in vain.

Bax, on the other hand, has been known to us by his musical sojourn in fairy land. He dwelt in western Ireland for a time, nor was he a stranger among the artists and writers of Dublin. His visit to Russia did not affect him musically to any noticeable extent.

It was said of the pugilist Sir Daniel Donnelly that there were Irishisms in his style. In the music of Arnold Bax there are Celticisms: the romantic melancholy, the Donnybrook defiant outbursts, the fancy that has been nourished on Irish legends. He has seen "the good people"; he has visited the Faery Hills and sailed to the island of Pfand; he has listened to the men and women known to Synge; exchanged mystical revelations with the poet Yeats, yet Bax is no idle dreamer of an empty lay; he dreams—even in this symphony—but here he is also a purposeful man of action. He is profoundly musical and feels no need of a program to fire his imagination. (The symphony is a highly imaginative work.) Mr. Edwin Evans is not extravagant in saying that Irish legends, landscapes and songs have contributed to the characteristic style by which one knows the music of Bax. His music is intensely emotional, but in an individual manner. To some this symphony is a stumbling block; even if they have emotions, they wish them to be aroused in a more familiar and genteel manner. They have ears, but they do not hear. There is nothing cryptic in the music. Everywhere is strength, even in the beauty of the work. Is anyone left unmoved by the Celtic sadness of the ending? Suppose Bax had ended with a roaring fortissimo, with the organ thundering, drums beating, cymbals crashing fanfares of trumpets in what is sometimes called "the apotheosis" would not some have then applauded tempestuously, and said as they went out: "I didn't get on to a good deal of the music, but I liked the ending."

A third hearing confirms one hearer in the impression made by the first; here is one of the most important musical works that have crossed the Atlantic for many years. The sympathetic, eloquent, superb performance yesterday turned impression into conviction.

Mr. Loeffler is a man of fine literary taste and wide reading as well as a singularly skilled composer of exquisite fancy. It is not surprising that this "Hymn of Brother Sun" appealed to him and led him to seek out the fitting music. The Hymn has attracted many composers. Some of them have written in heroic, bravura manner, singularly out of keeping with the text. There are lovely pages in Mr. Loeffler's work—charming melodic lines, an assisting not distracting, always pertinent use of liturgical motives, a poetic blending of instrumental timbres. Mme. Friish, the one great interpreter of songs, now before the American public, did not fail to realize and express the sentiments of the Saint and the illuminating commentary of the composer. Mr. Loeffler, Mme. Friish, Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra were obliged more than once to acknowledge the hearty tribute paid them.

There were many requests during the last fortnight for a repetition of Ravel's "Bolero." Ravel did not fare the better by the granting of the request. This "Bolero" is the clever trick of a super-refined composer. The trick is amazingly well performed, but it is only a trick. The surprise of a first performance does not affect one a second. Indeed, the first 10 minutes in performance yesterday, owing to the inevitable monotony, were rather boring. Still there was the expectation of something going to happen, of a final thunderous proclamation of the inherently negligible tune. According to the old saw, surprise is the chief element of wit. Perhaps—but honest laughter follows the first cracking of a joke. After that the laughter is only courteous.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The orchestra will give concerts in New York and Brooklyn next week. Alexander Glazounov will be the "guest conductor" here on Jan. 17, 18. The program will comprise his sixth symphony; his violin concerto (Benno Rabinooff, violinist), and his symphonic poem, "Stenka Razin."

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The punishment of cleverness is swift. Ravel's "Bolero," which on Dec. 6, 1929, shattered the decorum of a Friday afternoon Boston Symphony audience, all but fell flat on the afternoon of Jan. 3, 1930. No cheers, no stamping on the floor this time. Cordial enough applause, yes; but nothing to joggle the classic statues high on the walls of Symphony Hall. The trick worked once.

But the habit of stamping one's feet cannot be acquired with impunity. The Boston Symphony concerts for the last month have been so exciting that it would hardly do to see them slump into routine. Fortunately, at the latest concert, the audience found another occasion for pedal acclamation. This was provided by Charles Martin Loeffler's "Canticle of the Sun," after St. Francis of Assisi, for voice and orchestra, with Povla Frijsch for soloist. Mr. Loeffler, a native of Alsace, has long been a resident of Boston or its vicinity, and is a composer internationally admired. This work was written for Mrs. F. S. Coolidge and was first performed at the Washington Festival of 1925, with Mme. Frijsch as singer and Frederick Stock conducting. The score contains much beauty. Harps, woodwind, horns, muted strings are employed to produce an other-worldly atmosphere, and liturgical motives intensify the supernal effect achieved by impressionist means. Mme. Frijsch, who is more at home perhaps in terrestrial song, nevertheless projected admirably the content of the verses.

Working backward in this program, we arrive at the principal item which, like the "Bolero," was a repetition from a recent concert. But the result of a second hearing of Arnold Bax's Symphony in two keys (No. 2) was quite different. The re-examination served to strengthen our first impression of a poetically conceived and firmly knit work. If some of the material sounds familiar, its treatment is highly characteristic, and the total result is unified and impressive. This seems by all means the most considerable novelty introduced this season by Dr. Koussevitzky, who was well advised to repeat it within three weeks.

The concert was opened with Walton's lively and amusing Overture, "Portsmouth Point." L. A. S.

In Place at Last

Mr. Loeffler's Hymn of St. Francis at the Symphony Concerts

IT is pleasure to announce that one of Mr. Loeffler's major and characteristic works, long overlooked at the Symphony Concerts will be heard there during the current season—his setting for orchestra and soprano voice of the Hymn to the Sun of St. Francis of Assisi. It was originally written for performance by small orchestra and Mme. Povla Frijsch at the first Festival of Chamber Music in the Library of Congress at Washington. It was subsequently heard at concerts of the Philadelphia Orchestra at home and in New York. More recently Messrs. Schirmer published the full score. At Symphony Hall, Mme. Frijsch will again be the singer.

Rarest Music Of Loeffler's Present Day

St. Francis's Canticle Heard At The Symphony Concert, Britons Besides

THE implacable program-book, which must print dates or perish, reminded the audience, yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall, that Mr. Loeffler nears his seventieth year. His aspect does not alter; his capacity for work does not lessen. Yet, as mortality fates us, he cannot many more times receive the tribute of his fellow-townsmen when a piece from his hand is newly heard in Boston. The keener the pleasure, then, to hear him warmly acclaimed, on Friday, after the first performance hereabouts of his setting of St. Francis's "Hymn to the Sun." Summoned twice and thrice to the stage by hearers eager to do him honor, he would not keep these plaudits to himself, but bade his coadjutors—Mme. Frijsch, Dr. Koussevitzky and the Symphony Orchestra—share them. With quick and happy impulse, the conductor called the players to their feet; but already Mr. Loeffler had spoken congratulatory words to those nearest him. Not for nothing did he himself sit through many years in an orchestra, subsequently become his sympathetic mouth-piece.

This play of feeling was the more significant and treasurable, because it ensued upon a piece, come belatedly to Bostonian hearing and singularly characteristic of Mr. Loeffler's later days. He wrote his music to St. Francis's canticle early in 1925. In the autumn of that year it was heard for the first time in Washington at the Festival of Chamber-Music in the Congressional Library. In the following January Mr. Stokowski, the Philadelphia Orchestra and the indispensable Mme. Frijsch repeated it at home and in New York. Forthwith it passed into that state of suspended animation customarily following first performances. Last autumn, doubtless after the revision that Mr. Loeffler seldom denies himself, the score was published by Schirmer. Once more it caught the ear of conductors and Dr. Stokowski quickly fastened upon it. Nothing else in the composer's work has waited so long for hearing and dwelling-place.

Nothing that Mr. Loeffler has in recent years is so finely and himself. ("Memories of Childhood," comparison, skims surfaces; a jazz-piece for Mr. Reismann's spirit.) Long before he rears Coolidge's and Mr. Engel's son, he had been minded to set St. Francis's hymn. He approached it as a composer ordinarily approaches his subject-matter. For him, to write verses was not merely to enfold fertile material for music. To be in mind and heart, to ponder consciously or sub-consciously, was his way to find his musical and creative enkindled. Mr. Loeffler is not only a son of the church of St. Francis; he is perdurable glory, he is the faith of that saint and seer and poet, who loved God and mankind and loved the world that therein is, so long as it be alive. It is neither sentimentality nor wishfulness to write that in Mr. Loeffler abides something of that spirit which in his last days St. Francis shed upon his disciples and the world these seven centuries to endure. He is he stranger to those mystical fuses into devout and songful passion of the soul, an imagery rare, an exaltation unfaltering death itself.

Death itself, spiritual ardors, distilled and fused into musical creation, into being this setting of the holy canticle; from first measure to the last. Released as they were by the actor and a singer (though Mme. Frijsch has been in freer voice) who can the works of another's imagination imposed themselves upon hearers. Some among them are of another temperament. Yet they find minds and hearts to this act of music prevailing. The memory of St. Francis's canticle, once faded before the radiance of another beauty and another power. Upon the "La Bonne Chanson" of a most Christian poet he saw the rising sun on the earth, of his sensuous music. Now he stands beside the sun on the brown Umbrian hills and finds tones for the vision of a sun in humility, sung in transfiguration—the outer sight, the inner vision. Scarcely another living composer may compass this two-fold vision.

Almost none would it possess; none could thrust all else out of its place.

orchestra were obliged more than once to acknowledge the hearty tribute paid them.

There were many requests during the last fortnight for a repetition of Ravel's "Bolero." Ravel did not fare the better by the granting of the request. This "Bolero" is the clever trick of a super-refined composer. The trick is amazingly well performed, but it is only a trick. The surprise of a first performance does not affect one a second. Indeed, the first 10 minutes in performance yesterday, owing to the inevitable monotony, were rather boresome. Still there was the expectation of something going to happen, of a final thunderous proclamation of the inherently negligible tune. According to the old saw, surprise is the chief element of wit. Perhaps—but honest laughter follows the first cracking of a joke. After that the laughter is only courteous.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The orchestra will give concerts in New York and Brooklyn next week. Alexander Glazounov will be the "guest conductor" here on Jan. 17, 18. The program will comprise his sixth symphony; his violin concerto (Benno Rabinoff, violinist), and his symphonic poem, "Stenka Razin."

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The punishment of cleverness is swift. Ravel's "Bolero," which on Dec. 6, 1929, shattered the decorum of a Friday afternoon Boston Symphony audience, all but fell flat on the afternoon of Jan. 3, 1930. No cheers, no stamping on the floor this time. Cordial enough applause, yes; but nothing to joggle the classic statues high on the walls of Symphony Hall. The trick worked once.

But the habit of stamping one's feet cannot be acquired with impunity. The Boston Symphony concerts for the last month have been so exciting that it would hardly do to see them slump into routine. Fortunately, at the latest concert, the audience found another occasion for pedal acclamation. This was provided by Charles Martin Loeffler's "Cantic of the Sun," after St. Francis of Assisi, for voice and orchestra, with Povla Frijsch for soloist. Mr. Loeffler, a native of Alsace, has long been a resident of Boston or its vicinity, and is a composer internationally admired. This work was written for Mrs. F. S. Coolidge and was first performed at the Washington Festival of 1925, with Mme. Frijsch as singer and Frederick Stock conducting. The score contains much beauty. Harps, woodwind, horns, muted strings are employed to produce an other-worldly atmosphere, and liturgical motives intensify the supernal effect achieved by impressionist means. Mme. Frijsch, who is more at home perhaps in terrestrial song, nevertheless projected admirably the content of the verses.

Working backward in this program, we arrive at the principal item which, like the "Bolero," was a repetition from a recent concert. But the result of a second hearing of Arnold Bax's Symphony in two keys (No. 2) was quite different. The re-examination served to strengthen our first impression of a poetically conceived and firmly knit work. If some of the material sounds familiar, its treatment is highly characteristic, and the total result is unified and impressive. This seems by all means the most considerable novelty introduced this season by Dr. Koussevitzky, who was well advised to repeat it within three weeks.

The concert was opened with Walton's lively and amusing Overture, "Portsmouth Point." L. A. S.

In Place at Last

Mr. Loeffler's Hymn of St. Francis at the Symphony Concerts

IT is pleasure to announce that one of Mr. Loeffler's major and characteristic works, long overlooked at the Symphony Concerts will be heard there during the current season—his setting for orchestra and soprano voice of the Hymn to The Sun of St. Francis of Assisi. It was originally written for performance by small orchestra and Mme. Povla Frijsch at the first Festival of Chamber Music in the Library of Congress at Washington. It was subsequently heard at concerts of the Philadelphia Orchestra at home and in New York. More recently Messrs. Schirmer published the full score. At Symphony Hall, Mme. Frijsch will again be the singer.

Rarest Investment Of Life Pittcock

St. Francis's At The Syn

Briton

THE impl which mu ish, remin terday afi Hall, that Mr. Lc tieth year. His his capacity for Yet, as mortality many more times his fellow-townsmen his hand is newly keener the pleasur warmly acclaimed, first performance ting of St. Francis's Summoned twice ar by hearers eager t would not keep th self, but bade hi Frijsch, Dr. Koussev phony Orchestra— quick and happy in called the players ready Mr. Loeffler latory words to tho for nothing did he many years in a quently become his piece.

This play of feelir nificant and treasur sued upon a piece Bostonian hearing acteristic of Mr. He wrote his music ticle early in 1925. that year it was he in Washington at t ber-Music in the C In the following Ja the Philadelphia Or pensable Mme. Frijs and in New York. into that state of customarily follow Last autumn, do vision that Mr. I himself, the scor

Messrs. Schirmer. Once more it caught the eye and ear of conductors and Dr. Koussevitzky quickly fastened upon it. Possibly nothing else in the composer's major work has waited so long for hearing in his dwelling-place.

Certainly nothing that Mr. Loeffler has written in recent years is so finely and deeply of himself. ("Memories of Childhood," in comparison, skims surfaces; while the jazz-piece for Mr. Reismann is jeu d'esprit.) Long before he received Mrs. Coolidge's and Mr. Engel's commission, he had been minded to set St. Francis's hymn. He approached it not as a composer ordinarily approaches stimulating subject-matter. For him, to read the verses was not merely to encounter fertile material for music. To carry them in mind and heart, to ponder them consciously or sub-consciously, was not merely to find his musical and creative imagination enkindled. Mr. Loeffler is sincerely religious and truly devout. He is not only a son of the church of which Francis is perdurable glory, he shares also the faith of that saint and sage, that seer and poet, who loved God and loved mankind and loved the world and all that therein is, so long as it be not sinful. It is neither sentimentality nor priggishness to write that in Mr. Loeffler abides something of that spiritual emotion which in his last days St. Francis shed upon his disciples and the folk, these seven centuries to endure. No more is he stranger to those mystical moods that fuse into devout and songful ecstasy a passion of the soul, an imagery of nature, an exaltation unfaltering before Death itself.

Such spiritual ardors, distilled and concentrated into musical creation, brought into being this setting of the holy Francis's canticle; from first measure to last inform it. Released as they were by a conductor and a singer (though Mme. Frijsch has been in freer voice) who can project the works of another's imagination, they imposed themselves upon sensitive hearers. Some among them are of quite another temperament. Yet they yielded minds and hearts to this act of faith out of music prevailing. The memory of pagan spells by Mr. Loeffler once evoked faded before the radiance of another beauty and another power. Upon a time in "La Bonne Chanson" of a most un-Christian poet he saw the rising sun rekindling the earth, of his sensations made music. Now he stands beside St. Francis on the brown Umbrian hillside and finds tones for the vision of a world seen in humility, sung in transfiguring emotion—the outer sight, the inner illumination. Scarcely another living composer may compass this two-fold illusion. Almost none would it possess; almost none could thrust all else out of the listening.

For the composition of such music the later Loeffler is full-furnished. He is quick with the suggestion that springs out of the page, is caught as quickly into it, yet leaves instant mark behind. The waters, the winds, the fire, the stars, the moon, sound or shine from their several measures; forthwith are blent into the on-sweeping hymn of all-enfolding praise. Francis, the holy man to be thereafter sainted, was of the mediæval age. Mr. Loeffler has long been assimilating student of its churchly "modes"; has so mastered them that into the texture of a music written in the nineteen-twenties he can wind them. Give him an orchestra as sensitive and fine-toned as that which yesterday served him, and not one of these felicities of suggestion or of scholarship passes unheard or fails to contribute to illusion. Mr. Loeffler is long-standing master of the harmonic and instrumental devices that generate tonal radiance. Upon the hymn, he employs them to suffuse, brighter and brighter, the prelude, to sublimate the outburst of the end.

Yet it is not of this mediæval learning, of this orchestral mastery, of this quasi-programmatic suggestion that the music is made. Rather it is born of that kindling creative ardor in which the image writes itself in notes, the word melts and crystallizes into tones, the mounting emotion maintains the continuing flood. The composer may revise to his mind's content such music as Mr. Loeffler has set to St. Francis's hymn. It springs, none the less, from a spiritual rapture, possessive and luminous. Mr. Loeffler dipped his pen in ink and wrote in flame. Out of it, as from the refiner's fire, the artless simplicities of Francis emerge clothed in the sophisticated beauty of another time. From the thirteenth into the twentieth century goes the ecstatic canticle—yet in spirit and in truth.

The afternoon, to which Mr. Loeffler's piece was climax, began with a revival and continued with a repetition. These youngest Englishmen are composers of be reckoned with, not in their own country only. Last summer, Constant Lambert won a London audience with the warm-blooded modernism, at need finely touched, of his "Music for Orchestra." More recently, he set another agog by the symphonic jazz of his "Rio Grande." Now Dr. Koussevitzky remembers William Walton, Lambert's friend, and revives his Overture, "Portsmouth Point," by the conductor fathered in America three years back. None that hears may say that the modernists are a dry, wizened, incessantly cerebrating breed—un-

would 1100
that 200 Row 200
in 200
..... 84500
ims. 4000
..... 3700
al.... 400

t Quinn

es of Car Edward
ises in t

Walt presented the Was dge Scho
departme naylor, p urse of g
City Ha
ayor's pe large po
o be hur
, and Mi
er depart
h a bask
In makin bute to a n said nds, man is twent as mayo

d he ha
He sa
he city
s not lea
He aske
t he wou
t interes t the en
ed suppor
incomin

Filed

bankrupt
ing:
Worceste
00.
New Be $250. le deale
o assets
liabilitie

Mr. Walton the ex-the rule. A drawsone and folk of a in the sea-going ed the composer to its motifs are robust on the orchestra is
from hand to mouth.
ists of melody; race of rhythm; pause for tal turn; send themnding orchestra into ng head. Beef and isto, a youthful comto kick out his heels with a mind to guide gone modernist and ad print and a gamin-

Walt presented the Was dge Scho
departme naylor, p urse of g
City Ha
ayor's pe large po
o be hur
, and Mi
er depart
h a bask
In makin bute to a n said

nds, man
is twent
as mayo
d he ha
He sa
he city
s not lea
He aske
t he wou
t interes t the en
ed suppor
incomin

bankrupt
ing:
Worceste
00.
New Be $250. le deale
o assets
liabilitie

Madame POVLA FRIJSCH was born at Marstal, Denmark. She studied singing in Paris with Mme. Sarah de Lande; in the United States with Mrs. Sarah Robinson Duff. Her first important engagement in Paris was in May, 1910, when Alfred Cortot accompanied her. She had already toured with Raoul Pugno, pianist, and Pablo Casals, violoncellist. From 1900 to 1915 she sang frequently with Parisian orchestras, with celebrated visiting conductors, in chamber concerts, and in recitals. She gave recitals also in London, Copenhagen, and cities of Switzerland. Her first recital in New York was on November 10, 1915; in Boston on December 15, 1915. She sang at concerts of the Cecilia Society, 1916 and 1917; has taken part in other concerts, and given recitals in more recent years. She sang at concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston on November, 14, 15, 1919. Mr. Monteux, conductor: César Franck, "Les Rois dont vous vantez la Gloire" from "La Rédemption". Duparc, "Invitation au Voyage"; Moussorgsky, "Hopak"; Bloch Psalms 137 and 114.

For the composition of such music the later Loeffler is full-furnished. He is quick with the suggestion that springs out of the page, is caught as quickly into it, yet leaves instant mark behind. The waters, the winds, the fire, the stars, the moon, sound or shine from their several measures; forthwith are blent into the on-sweeping hymn of all-enfolding praise. Francis, the holy man to be thereafter sainted, was of the mediaeval age. Mr. Loeffler has long been assimilating student of its churchly "modes"; has so mastered them that into the texture of a music written in the nineteen-twenties he can wind them. Give him an orchestra as sensitive and fine-toned as that which yesterday served him, and not one of these felicities of suggestion or of scholarship passes unheard or fails to contribute to illusion. Mr. Loeffler is long-standing master of the harmonic and instrumental devices that generate tonal radiance. Upon the hymn, he employs them to suffuse, brighter and brighter, the prelude, to sublimate the outburst of the end.

Yet it is not of this mediaeval learning, of this orchestral mastery, of this quasi-programmatic suggestion that the music is made. Rather it is born of that kindling creative ardor in which the image writes itself in notes, the word melts and crystallizes into tones, the mounting emotion maintains the continuing flood. The composer may revise to his mind's content such music as Mr. Loeffler has set to St. Francis's hymn. It springs, none the less, from a spiritual rapture, possessive and luminous. Mr. Loeffler dipped his pen in ink and wrote in flame. Out of it, as from the refiner's fire, the artless simplicities of Francis emerge clothed in the sophisticated beauty of another time. From the thirteenth into the twentieth century goes the ecstatic canticle—yet in spirit and in truth.

The afternoon, to which Mr. Loeffler's piece was climax, began with a revival and continued with a repetition. These youngest Englishmen are composers of be reckoned with, not in their own country only. Last summer, Constant Lambert won a London audience with the warm-blooded modernism, at need finely touched, of his "Music for Orchestra." More recently, he set another agog by the symphonic jazz of his "Rio Grande." Now Dr. Koussevitzky remembers William Walton, Lambert's friend, and revives his Overture, "Portsmouth Point," by the conductor fathered in America three years back. None that hears may say that the modernists are a dry, wizened, incessantly cerebrating breed—un-would that Mr. Walton the ex-that 200 the rule. A draw-Rowle 200 scene and folk of a un 200 in the sea-going

... 84500 red the composer to ams. *600 his motifs are robust
... 3700 on the orchestra is al... 400 from hand to mouth.

t Quinn

es of Car gone modernist and Edward old print and a gaminises in ti

Walt was the Symphony presented "at these concerts"
the Was gaining under this secdge Schoo ing. The composer is departme nglish generation; but navor, prific Englishry. Whatrse of go eeding and present en-City Ha gainst any background ayor's pe tten. Mr. Loeffler him-large po t more solitary and o be hur In Mr. Bax, likewise, , and M n a salient, significant er depart Symphony, renewing
h a bask every distinctive trait, in makin s canvas, amply fills it.
bute to ds largely, boldly, vari-

n said r of motifs, expanding nds, man the upspringing of mood is twent from another, hold it as mayo plastic. Movement, add he ha cumulation vitalize it.
He sa tion is rich, forceful,
he city development, multifold;
s not le ent. Here is ascent He aske ness and conflict into t he wou freedom; the pause of t interest ood, by sentiment unt the en lows fall; the conflict ed support e close is less end than incomin e. No program shaped affirms Mr. Bax; the icance, are wholly musi-

Filed

ankrupt lon—of Ravel's "Bolero" ing: table concert and wrote Worceste However many the re-
00. no repeating a tour de New Be a month's interval, and $250. rimal sensation. The le deale remembers. Memory o assets. nse. In recollection liabilitie H. T. P.

Madame POVLA FRIJS was born at Marstal, Denmark. She studied singing in Paris with Mme. Sarah de Lande; in the United States with Mrs. Sarah Robinson Duff. Her first important engagement in Paris was in May, 1910, when Alfred Cortot accompanied her. She had already toured with Raoul Pugno, pianist, and Pablo Casals, violoncellist. From 1900 to 1915 she sang frequently with Parisian orchestras, with celebrated visiting conductors, in chamber concerts, and in recitals. She gave recitals also in London, Copenhagen, and cities of Switzerland. Her first recital in New York was on November 10, 1915; in Boston on December 15, 1915. She sang at concerts of the Cecilia Society, 1916 and 1917; has taken part in other concerts, and given recitals in more recent years. She sang at concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston on November, 14, 15, 1919. Mr. Monteux, conductor: César Franck, "Les Rois dont vous vantez la Gloire" from "La Rédemption". Duparc, "Invitation au Voyage"; Moussorgsky, "Hopak"; Bloch Psalms 137 and 114.

For the composition of such the later Loeffler is full-furnished is quick with the suggestion that out of the page, is caught as into it, yet leaves instant me hind. The waters, the winds, the stars, the moon, sound or sh their several measures; forthw blent into the on-sweeping hy all-enfolding praise. Francis, th man to be thereafter sainted, was mediaeval age. Mr. Loeffler ha been assimilating student of its ly "modes"; has so mastered the into the texture of a music in the nineteen-twenties he car them. Give him an orchestra as tive and fine-toned as that which day served him, and not one o felicities of suggestion or of scho passes unheard or fails to contri illusion. Mr. Loeffler is long-s master of the harmonic and instru devices that generate tonal ra Upon the hymn, he employs ti suffuse, brighter and brighter, ti luding, to sublimate the outburst end.

Yet it is not of this mediaeval le of this orchestral mastery, of this programmatic suggestion that the n made. Rather it is born of th dling creative ardor in which the writes itself in notes, the word m crystallizes into tones, the mounti tion maintains the continuing floo composer may revise to his min tent such music as Mr. Loeffler to St. Francis's hymn. It spring the less, from a spiritual rapture, sive and luminous. Mr. Loeffler di pen in ink and wrote in flame. O as from the refiner's fire, the artl plicities of Francis emerge clo the sophisticated beauty of anoth From the thirteenth into the tv century goes the ecstatic canticle spirit and in truth.

The afternoon, to which Mr. L piece was climax, began with a and continued with a repetition. youngest Englishmen are comp be reckoned with, not in their ow try only. Last summer, Constabert won a London audience w warm-blooded modernism, at nee touched, of his "Music for Orc More recently, he set another a—the symphonic jazz of his "Rio Gits own moral. However many the Now Dr. Koussevitzky remembe quests, there is no repeating a tour de liam Walton, Lambert's friend, force, after only a month's interval, and vives his Overture, "Portsmouth renewing the primal sensation. The by the conductor fathered in audience soon remembers. Memory three years back. None that hea strangles suspense. In recollection say that the modernists are a d drowns surprise. H. T. P. ened, incessantly cerebrating bre less he would have Mr. Walton the ex-ception that proves the rule. A draw-ling of Rowlandson—scene and folk of a rowdy landing place in the sea-going England of 1814—stirred the composer to his music-making. His motifs are robust and free-footed. Soon the orchestra is tossing them lustily from hand to mouth. They shape into gusts of melody; race away into tumults of rhythm; pause for breath and sentimental turn; send them-selves and the sounding orchestra into the listener's bursting head. Beef and beer, gayety and gusto, a youthful com-poser unashamed to kick out his heels yet plainly enough with a mind to guide them. Englishry gone modernist and musical, with an old print and a gamin-spirit for spur.

The repeated piece was the Symphony of Mr. Bax produced "at these concerts" three weeks ago, gaining under this second or third hearing. The composer is of the middle English generation; but in him is no specific Englishry. What-ever his birth, breeding and present en-vironment, so against any background might he have written. Mr. Loeffler him-self has not kept more solitary and individual course. In Mr. Bax, likewise, it has flowered in a salient, significant music. The new Symphony, renewing under repetition every distinctive trait, spreads a spacious canvas, amply fills it. The design unfolds largely, boldly, vari-ously. Interplay of motifs, expanding musical content, the upspringing of mood and emotion, one from another, hold it both firm and plastic. Movement, ad-vance, ascent, cumulation vitalize it. The musical invention is rich, forceful, characterized; the development, multifold; the progress ardent. Here is ascent from tonal darkness and conflict into tonal light and freedom; the pause of contemplative mood, by sentiment un-tarnished. Shadows fall; the conflict storms anew. The close is less end than descending silence. No program shaped the Symphony, affirms Mr. Bax; the course, the significance, are wholly musi-cal. Yet clearly here is a music of pas-sion not mathematics; of imagination, not formula, of wealth unskimping. The undying romantic vein, and Mr. Bax unashamed to open it.

Another repetition—of Ravel's "Bolero"—ended a remarkable concert and wrote the symphonic jazz of his "Rio Gits own moral. However many the Now Dr. Koussevitzky remembe quests, there is no repeating a tour de liam Walton, Lambert's friend, force, after only a month's interval, and vives his Overture, "Portsmouth renewing the primal sensation. The by the conductor fathered in audience soon remembers. Memory three years back. None that hea strangles suspense. In recollection say that the modernists are a d drowns surprise. H. T. P. ened, incessantly cerebrating bre

Madame POVLA FRIJS was born at Marstal, Denmark. She studied singing in Paris with Mme. Sarah de Lande; in the United States with Mrs. Sarah Robinson Duff. Her first important engagement in Paris was in May, 1910, when Alfred Cortot accompanied her. She had already toured with Raoul Pugno, pianist, and Pablo Casals, violon-cellist. From 1900 to 1915 she sang frequently with Parisian orchestras, with celebrated visiting conductors, in chamber concerts, and in recitals. She gave recitals also in London, Copenhagen, and cities of Switzerland. Her first recital in New York was on November 10, 1915; in Boston on December 15, 1915. She sang at concerts of the Cecilia Society, 1916 and 1917; has taken part in other concerts, and given recitals in more recent years. She sang at concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston on November, 14, 15, 1919. Mr. Monteux, conductor: César Franck, "Les Rois dont vous vantez la Gloire" from "La Rédemption". Duparc, "Invitation au Voyage"; Moussorgsky, "Hopak"; Bloch Psalms 137 and 114.

LOEFFLER'S LATEST BY SYMPHONY

Mme. Frijsh in Voice Part of "Canticle of the Sun"

Post — Jan. 4, 1930

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Four contemporary composers; two Londoners, a Parisian and a Bostonian (by long residence), shared the programme of yesterday afternoon's Symphony concert. And it is a pleasure to be able to record, as an impartial and unprejudiced opinion, that for sheer musical quality the composition of last-named had much the best of it.

POVLA FRIJSH, SOLOIST

In detail these composers, representative of four periods and phases of modern music, were William Walton, Arnold Bax, Maurice Ravel and Charles Martin Loeffler, and their pieces were, respectively, the overture, "Portsmouth Point," the Symphony No. 2 in E minor and C, the "Bolero" of recent sensation in Symphony Hall, and the "Canticle of the Sun" (after St. Francis of Assisi) for voice and orchestra. The singer in Mr. Loeffler's piece, which was heard yesterday for the first time in Boston, was Povla Frijsh, who also sang it on the occasion of its first performance anywhere, at the Library of Congress Festival of Chamber Music, in the fall of 1925.

The Canticle of St. Francis, a rhapsody in praise of God and nature, is a poetic outburst that not only cried aloud for a musical setting but that also was ideally suited to the peculiar genius of Mr. Loeffler. That his tonal investment of the lines would have the mystical rapture, the poignant beauty, the soaring eloquence, the charm of instrumental color yesterday disclosed, was almost a foregone conclusion. In Mme. Frijsh, in Dr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra, this "Canticum Fratris Solis" found yesterday fitting interpreters, and at the conclusion of the performance all concerned received an ovation.

Bax Heard Again

The overture of the youthful Walton, first played here three seasons ago, deserved at least one re-hearing. There is in the piece a bluff English quality, a rearing vigor, a disdain of tonal politeness that is in a way exhilarating and refreshing. Of actual thematic substance the music has but little.

That Dr. Koussevitzky should have repeated the Symphony of Bax, dedicated to himself and played for the first times at the symphony concerts of three weeks ago, was altogether fitting. A piece of symphonic dimensions from the hand of so gifted a composer as Bax deserves such consideration. That a second hearing of the symphony revealed in it attributes of greatness undiscovered at first may, however, not be said. Bax says his say often gracefully, movingly and even impressively, but most of what he says has been uttered before in one form or another.

Not only is this music of Bax in the last analysis unoriginal, it is at times disconcertingly reminiscent of other composers.

"Bolero" Falls to Excite

Finally Ravel's "Bolero," which provoked a demonstration of historic vehemence at the Friday afternoon Symphony concert of Dec. 6, last, was received by the audience yesterday with relative apathy. There was applause at the end, to be sure, but no untoward excitement.

A good story should be told once, and once only. "Bolero" depends for its effect on a mere musical trick, though executed with infinite cleverness. Heard a second time the constantly repeated tune (uninteresting of itself), the reiterated rhythm, the long crescendo, the sudden modulation near the end, all fail greatly to stir and excite the listener.

FRIJSH SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Loeffler's "Canticle of the Sun" Performed

gave — Jan. 4, 1930
Ravel's Bolero and Bax' Symphony

Repeated From Previous Programs

Charles Martin Loeffler's "Canticle of the Sun," a setting for soprano and orchestra of verses attributed to St. Francis of Assisi, was performed for the first time in Boston at yesterday's Symphony concert, with Povla Frijsh as soloist. There was hearty and prolonged applause for composer, soloist and conductor, when they came out to bow at the end of the piece. Finally the orchestra was bidden to rise and share the plaudits.

Ravel's Bolero and Bax' "Second Symphony," repeated from previous programs of the current season; and Walton's "Portsmouth Point" were the other numbers on a program drawn wholly from the work of living composers.

Mr. Loeffler wrote his "Canticle of the Sun" in 1925 at the request of Mrs. F. S. Coolidge for the first of her Washington festival concerts of chamber music. He set for soprano and chamber orchestra a modernized Italian version of the hymn said to have been written by St. Francis, prepared for his use by Gino Perera of Boston. Mr. Loeffler's music has been performed at concerts of the Philadelphia Orchestra, as well as at the Washington festival in 1925. Mme. Frijsh has sung the soprano solo at each performance.

The hymn, a naive medieval rhapsody, demands of a modern composer the evocation of a mood wholly alien to his own day and age. Mr. Loeffler has used modal harmonies, and woven into the texture of his music many liturgical motives. He succeeds as well as anyone now could in creating the atmosphere of St. Francis' rhapsody. One listens to his music in the spirit of a modern tourist in Assisi. But, as some modern visitors there have done, one feels a certain monotony, a certain barrenness, a lack of enduring vitality.

Try as one may to view the middle ages reverently, one cannot but recall at times the mockery of Anatole France in such pages as the famous one in his "Penguin Island" about the paintings of Margaritone of Arezzo. Mr. Loeffler has done in this Canticle all that taste and skill can do to recreate something vanished, something even more alien to us than Periclean Athens, or than the Scythians whom those other modern composers, Stravinsky and Prokofieff have evoked for us (from the pages of Herodotus), with such astonishing power.

Mme. Frijsh has long been admired here as an interpreter of music. Her tact and intuition are remarkable. Not so her voice, however. Yesterday she made very skilful use of her vocal resources, but in so large a hall neither the quality nor the volume of tone were wholly adequate. Furthermore she was unable to convey the nuances she wished, and would certainly have made in a smaller room.

Mr. Walton's "Portsmouth Point" was suggested by a print by Rowlandson, published in 1814, depicting a scene on which Fanny Price, when temporarily banished from Mansfield Park must often have looked with eyes quite other than those of the celebrated caricaturist, either Miss Austen nor her heroine would have approved of Mr. Walton's music. To them gusto, youthful high spirits noisily happy, were only to be condemned. Yet it is this same gusto which makes Mr. Walton's hastily written and not profoundly original overture not merely endurable but enjoyable, though scarcely memorable. This piece was first heard here in 1926. Its composer is an Englishman born in 1902.

Ravel's Bolero made nothing like the same effect on the audience yesterday that it made at the recent first performances here. There were no cheers, no stamping of feet, only about the usual amount of handclapping. A second hearing made one admire even more than before the cleverness with which the piece has been contrived. But hearing it twice in quick succession is like rereading a detective story before you have forgotten any of its plot. The artistic value of this Bolero is about that of the general run of detective stories.

Mr. Bax says that his Second Symphony, also repeated yesterday, is written in cyclic form. It certainly makes considerable use of the motto theme, but, as at the first performance, one was unable to feel that the structure of the music is sound. The piece is an overlong rhapsody with some fine moments, such as the simple melody, surprising in a modern work, near the opening of the slow movement. Its ceaseless modulations, and ever shifting rhythmic figures grow monotonous. As a whole this symphony does not compel one's attention. The music is at once too fragmentary and too monotonous. To it one is tempted to apply at least part of Gounod's well-known sneer at the Franck Symphony, "incompetence elevated into a dogma." Franck did not deserve this taunt from the composer of "Faust."

Perhaps Bax does not wholly deserve it either, but his symphony heard twice in close succession becomes boresome.

There are no symphony concerts in the regular series here next week, as the orchestra goes on tour. Jan 17 and 18 the Russian composer Glazunov will conduct as guest a program of his own works. P. R.

Concert-Chronicle

Jan. 2, 1930
St. Francis at Symphony Hall

UPON the program of the Symphony Concerts tomorrow and Saturday Dr. Koussevitzky has placed a notable work by a composer dwelling in the environs of Boston; for the performance has called in the singer from the outset associated with it. The work is Mr. Charles Martin Loeffler's "Canticum Fratris Solis" or "Song of Brother Sun," more often called "The Canticle of the Sun"; the singer is that intelligent musician, Mme. Povla Frijsch. The "Canticle of the Sun" is one of the last great hymns of St. Francis of Assisi. Mr. Loeffler's musical setting was written on commission for the first festival of chamber music in the Library of Congress, to which institution upon her own "foundation," Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge had confided the perpetuation of her annual rites at Pittsfield. At Washington, on Oct. 28, 1925, the new "Canticle" was heard for the first time from Mme. Frijsch and a chamber-orchestra of about thirty players, with Mr. Frederick Stock of Chicago as conductor.

When in 1224, at the age of forty-four, the gentle Francis, broken in body, sore in heart at the crudities of a world so completely the opposite of himself, gave vent to his feelings, it was not to utter lamentations or complaints, but to raise a hymn of praise. For all the material and elemental blessings of life he lauded "the good Lord God." When the surgeons of the day administered treatment which nowadays seems brutal, when there was no relief in sight, he added significantly the verse in praise of "our sister, the death of the body." And, since he considered the sun the crown of creation, since he recalled that "in Scripture the

FIENCE The Sun of Right-his verses for ther Sun."
Post] was not then, of cteristically dis-mong Senatus Latin for his sident's lawed the Umbrian ries with his scholars have founder of Italian his setting Mr.
odern Italian ver-Mr. Gino Perera. arried an English
w Arnold, as fol-

ear's
to Addition:
Becon
By Oliver

mighty, good Lord praise, glory,
ing!
rd for our mother
a doth sustain us ngth forth divers
many colors, and

ord for our sister serviceable unto nd precious, and

ord for our brother
r and cloud, calms
y which thou upreatures.

at a cost for our brother st become n thou givest us s; and he is bright, e fact that very mighty, and beds to the usetts has ord for our sister, lation. For body, from whom the House! Woe to him who Blessed are they the controlling by the most broader as second death shall therein in to them harm.

ith Nourse Lord for all those ther for his love's ne bill, and weakness and her efforts are they who of commit-ure, for thou, O ve them a crown!

vice chair-ord for our sister Committee stars, the which ower cham- lovely in heaven.
eems to be Lord God, with all mely, that specially our uld pay the who brings us the veterans of us the light; fair eir disabili with a very great vice in the he signifies to us iblic either

bless ye the Lord.
ds that i to Him, and serve out to it, milly."

Government his score late in the ses of hos ring and summer of atter wha hree flutes, English or how able ta, piano, two harps, the cost o and, of course, the Suppose

solo-voice. Each verse has its own characterizing music, be the source of the characterization an appropriate Gregorian motif from the church liturgy or the free, delineative imaginings of the composers's own spirit. Mr. Loeffler does not write a music of ascetic mysticism. More deeply does he penetrate into the heart of the saint. His setting is, rather, a music of great spiritual radiance, of rapt, inward exultation. And in this place no technical labels shall be applied to it.

Since the poem is a hymn of praise, it is fitting that the first verse (after some preluding) should sound the music of the "Deo gratias"; that in the final exulting climax about "our brother, the sun," the same motif should again gloriously recur. Writes Mr. Gilman: "Here the music of Loeffler is irradiated from within, as horns and organ, and finally the whole orchestra, join in a superb outburst on the 'Deo gratias.'" Further, one hears undulating harps in praise of "our sister water" in the third verse; tremulous and sighing harps, strings and winds, for "our brother the wind" of the fourth verse; the flickering of celesta, piano, harps and winds for "our brother fire" of the fifth verse. Then follows the verse in praise of "our sister, the death of the body." Mr. Loeffler prefaces it with music in which the introit "Ressurexit" occurs: accompanies it with an English horn singing the penitential "Kyrie eleison." After which a quickening of tempo, a music growing more and more radiant, bring us to tones of ineffable light in the apostrophe to the stars of the eighth verse. After which the climax as already described.

When New York heard Mr. Loeffler's "Canticle of the Sun" (from Madame Frijsch, Dr. Stokowski and his Philadelphians on Jan. 5, 1926) reviewers gave it warm praise. Mr. Downes wrote of it as a music of "grave and constrained nobility and of simple exaltation." And Mr. Gilman thus expressed himself: "The matchless words of Saint Francis have evidently stirred Loeffler very deeply. We recall no music of his since 'Hora Mystica' which has seemed to us so searching in its beauty and intensity. It is rare music, exalted, unsullied, rapt. It is worthy of the poem."

A. H. M.

Koussevitzky to Bax

Telegrams from Conductor to Composer About a Current Symphony

HE mails bring two telegrams sent by Dr. Koussevitzky in London to Arnold Bax in London proposing the production at the Symphony Concerts of the composer's Second Symphony, first heard there Dec. 13 and 14, related last week. After the final rehearsal, Dr. Koussevitzky wired:

The orchestra and I wish to express to you our profound admiration of this work. We are proud to give it its first performance, which will be a considerable date for the Boston Symphony.

Again after the first performance:

With greatest joy am sending you my heartiest congratulations on the exceptional success of your symphony.

Cultured Boston

of the Morning:
cently at a Saturday evening performance of the Boston Symphony orchestra I was amazed! In front of me a man who chewed gum the entire half; and a woman two seats behind me, who was frantically knitting played Christmas gift, no doubt. a music of "grave and constrained nobility and of simple exaltation." And Mr. Gilman thus expressed himself: "The matchless words of Saint Francis have evidently stirred Loeffler very deeply. We recall no music of his since 'Hora Mystica' which has seemed to us so searching in its beauty and intensity. It is rare music, exalted, unsullied, rapt. It is worthy of the poem."

E. L. T.

Perhaps Bax does not wholly Program books have carried an English it either, but his symphony heard translation by Matthew Arnold, as fol- in close succession becomes below:

There are no symphony con-the regular series here next v
the orchestra goes on tour. Jan 18 the Russian composer Glazu conduct as guest a program of works.

Concert-Chronic

St. Francis at Symphony Hall

When in 1224, at the age of forty, the gentle Francis, broken in body and heart at the crudities of a world completely the opposite of himself, vent to his feelings, it was not in lamentations or complaints, but in a hymn of praise. For all the material and elemental blessings of life he called "the good Lord God." When the dragons of the day administered to him which nowadays seems brutal, when there was no relief in sight, he added to the verse in praise of "our Father" the death of the body." And, since he considered the sun the crown of the world, since he recalled that "in Scripture

Lord Himself is called 'The Sun of Righteousness' he gave to his verses for name, "The Song of Brother Sun."

Francis of Assisi (he was not then, of course, a saint) characteristically disdained the use of pompous Latin for his poem. Instead, he used the Umbrian dialect of his day—and scholars have given him credit as a founder of Italian religious poetry. For his setting Mr. Loeffler has used a modern Italian version furnished him by Mr. Gino Perera. Program books have carried an English translation by Matthew Arnold, as fol-

"O most high, almighty, good Lord God, to thee belong praise, glory, honor, and all blessing!

"Praised be my Lord for our mother the earth, the which doth sustain us and keep us, and bringeth forth divers fruits, and flowers of many colors, and grass.

grass.
"Praised be my Lord for our sister water, who is very serviceable unto us, and humble, and precious, and clean.

"Praised be my Lord for our brother
the wind, and for air and cloud, calms and all weather. by which thou upholdest in life all creatures.

"Praised be my Lord for our brother fire, through whom thou givest us light in the darkness; and he is bright, and pleasant, and very mighty, and strong.

"Praised be my Lord for our sister, the death of the body, from whom no man escapeth. Woe to him who dieth in mortal sin! Blessed are they who are found walking by the most holy will, for the second death shall have no power to do them harm.

“Praised be my Lord for all those who pardon one another for his love's sake, and who endure weakness and tribulation; blessed are they who peaceably shall endure, for thou, O most High, shalt give them a crown!”

"Praised be my Lord for our sister the moon, and for the stars, the which he has set clear and lovely in heaven.

“Praised be my Lord God, with all his creatures; and specially our brother the sun, who brings us the day, and who brings us the light; fair is he, and shining with a very great splendor: O Lord, he signifies to us thee!

"Praise ye, and bless ye the Lord, and give thanks unto Him, and serve Him with great humillty."

Mr. Loeffler wrote his score late in the "our winter and in the spring and summer of '25; scored it for three flutes, English horn, two horns, celesta, piano, two harps, cello and strings, and, of course, the solo-voice. Each versè has its own characterizing music, be the source of the characterization an appropriate Gregorian motif from the church liturgy or the free, delineative imaginings of the composers's own spirit. Mr. Loeffler does not write a music of ascetic mysticism. More deeply does he penetrate into the heart of the saint. His setting is, rather, a music of great spiritual radiance, of rapt, inward exultation. And in this place no technical labels shall be applied to it.

Since the poem is a hymn of praise, it is fitting that the first verse (after some preluding) should sound the music of the "Deo gratias"; that in the final exulting climax about "our brother, the sun," the same motif should again gloriously recur. Writes Mr. Gilman: "Here the music of Loeffler is irradiated from within, as horns and organ, and finally the whole orchestra, join in a superb outburst on the 'Deo gratias.'" Further, one hears undulating harps in praise of "our sister water" in the third verse; tremulous and sighing harps, strings and winds, for "our brother the wind" of the fourth verse: the flickering of celesta, piano, harps and winds for "our brother fire" of the fifth verse. Then follows the verse in praise of "our sister, the death of the body." Mr. Loeffler prefaces it with music in which the introit "Ressurexit" occurs: accompanies it with an English horn singing the penitential "Kyrie eleison." After which a quickening of tempo, a music growing more and more radiant, bring us to tones of ineffable light in the apostrophe to the stars of the eighth verse. After which the climax as already described.

When New York heard Mr. Loeffler's "Canticle of the Sun" (from Madame Frijsh, Dr. Stokowski and his Philadelphians on Jan. 5, 1926) reviewers gave it warm praise. Mr. Downes wrote of it as a music of "grave and constrained nobility and of simple exaltation." And Mr. Gilman thus expressed himself; "The matchless words of Saint Francis have evidently stirred Loeffler very deeply. We recall no music of his since "Hora Mystica" which has seemed to us so searching in its beauty and intensity. It is rare music, exalted, unsullied, rapt. It is worthy of the poem." A. H. M.

Koussevitzky to Bax

Telegrams from Conductor to Composer About a Current Symphony

HE mails bring two telegrams sent by Dr. Koussevitzky in London to Arnold Bax in London reposing the production at the symphony Concerts of the composer's Second Symphony, first heard there Dec. 13 and 14, related last week. After the final rehearsal, Dr. Koussevitzky wired:

The orchestra and I wish to express to you our profound admiration of this work. We are proud to give it its first performance, which will be a considerable date for the Boston Symphony.

Again after the first performances:

With greatest joy am sending you my heartiest congratulations on the exceptional success of your symphony.

Cultured Boston

o' the Morning:
cently at a Saturday evening pera of the Boston Symphony or-tra I was amazed! In front of me a man who chewed gum the entire half; and a woman two seats bet me, who was frantically knitting elayed Christmas gift, no doubt.
re the symphony of Beethoven No.
flat major op. 60 was finished, I was led to know which I was counting, number of times the man's jaws
t up and down with such rapidity it e me quite dizzy, or the stitches of knitting lady, or the time of the luctor's baton. Shades of our great ical masters, what are we coming to his city of culture?
E. L. T.

near the opening of the slow movement. Its ceaseless modulations, and shifting rhythmic figures grow monotonous. As a whole this symphony does not compel one's attention. It is at once too fragmentary and monotonous. To it one is tempted to apply at least part of Gounod's known sneer at the Franck Symphony: "incompetence elevated into a masterpiece." Franck did not deserve this from the composer of "Faust's Song of the Sun."

Perhaps Bax does not wholly Program books have carried an English translation by Matthew Arnold, as follows:

There are no symphony concerts in the regular series here next week. The orchestra goes on tour. Jan. 18 the Russian composer Glazunov conducts as guest a program of works.

Concert-Chronic

Jan. 2
St. Francis at Symphony Hall

UPON the program of the Symphony Concerts tomorrow and Sunday Dr. Koussevitzky has placed a notable work by a composer dwelling in the environs of Boston; for the performance has called in the singer the outset associated with it. This is Mr. Charles Martin Loeffler's "Canticum Fratris Solis" or "Song of the Sun," more often called "The Sun of the Sun"; the singer is that gentle musician, Mme. Povla Frijsh. "Canticum of the Sun" is one of the great hymns of St. Francis of Assisi. Mr. Loeffler's musical setting was written on commission for the first of chamber music in the Library of Congress, to which institution upon "foundation," Mrs. Elizabeth Coolidge had confided the perpetuation of her annual rites at Pittsfield, Washington, on Oct. 28, 1925. "Canticum" was heard for the first time from Mme. Frijsh and a chamber orchestra of about thirty players, under the baton of Frederick Stock of Chicago as conductor.

When in 1224, at the age of forty, the gentle Francis, broken in body and heart at the crudities of a winter completely the opposite of himself, vent to his feelings, it was not lamentations or complaints, but a hymn of praise. For all the elemental blessings of life he gave thanks to the good Lord God. When the preachers of the day administered to him which nowadays seems brutal, when there was no relief in sight, he added to the verse in praise of "our brother the death of the body." And, since he recalled that "in Scripture God is called 'The Sun of Righteousness'," he gave to his verses for a name, "The Song of Brother Sun."

Francis of Assisi (he was not then, of course, a saint) characteristically disdained the use of pompous Latin for his poem. Instead, he used the Umbrian dialect of his day—and scholars have given him credit as a founder of Italian religious poetry. For his setting Mr. Loeffler has used a modern Italian version furnished him by Mr. Gino Perera.

"O most high, almighty, good Lord God, to thee belong praise, glory, honor, and all blessing!"

"Praised be my Lord for our mother the earth, the which doth sustain us and keep us, and bringeth forth divers fruits, and flowers of many colors, and grass."

"Praised be my Lord for our sister water, who is very serviceable unto us, and humble, and precious, and clean."

"Praised be my Lord for our brother the wind, and for air and cloud, calms and all weather, by which thou upholdest in life all creatures."

"Praised be my Lord for our brother fire, through whom thou givest us light in the darkness; and he is bright, and pleasant, and very mighty, and strong."

"Praised be my Lord for our sister, the death of the body, from whom no man escapeth. Woe to him who dieth in mortal sin! Blessed are they who are found walking by the most holy will, for the second death shall have no power to do them harm."

"Praised be my Lord for all those who pardon one another for his love's sake, and who endure weakness and tribulation; blessed are they who peaceably shall endure, for thou, O most High, shalt give them a crown!"

"Praised be my Lord for our sister the moon, and for the stars, the which he has set clear and lovely in heaven."

"Praised be my Lord God, with all his creatures; and specially our brother the sun, who brings us the day, and who brings us the light; fair is he, and shining with a very great splendor: O Lord, he signifies to us thee!"

"Praise ye, and bless ye the Lord, and give thanks unto Him, and serve Him with great humility."

Mr. Loeffler wrote his score late in the winter and in the spring and summer of 1925; scored it for three flutes, English horn, two horns, celesta, piano, two harps, and strings, and, of course, the soló-voicé. Each characterizing music, a characterization and a rian motif from the free, delineative in posers's own spirit, write a music of as deeply does he permit of the saint. His music of great spirit inward exultation. technical labels shall

Since the poem is is fitting that the prelude should so "Deo gratias"; that climax about "our brother the sun" should be the same motif should be. Writes Mr. Gilman: Loeffler is irradiating horns and organ, a orchestra, join in a the "Deo gratias." undulating harps in water" in the third, sighing harps, strings, "our brother the sun" verse: the flickering harps and winds of the fifth verse. T in praise of "our sister body." Mr. Loeffler sic in which the intricate accompaniment horn singing the poem. After which po, a music growing diant, bring us to the in the apostrophe eighth verse. After already described.

When New York "Canticum of the Sun" was heard for the first time from Mme. Frijsh and a chamber orchestra of about thirty players, under the baton of Frederick Stock of Chicago as conductor. When in 1224, at the age of forty, the gentle Francis, broken in body and heart at the crudities of a winter completely the opposite of himself, vent to his feelings, it was not lamentations or complaints, but a hymn of praise. For all the elemental blessings of life he gave thanks to the good Lord God. When the preachers of the day administered to him which nowadays seems brutal, when there was no relief in sight, he added to the verse in praise of "our brother the death of the body." And, since he recalled that "in Scripture God is called 'The Sun of Righteousness'," he gave to his verses for a name, "The Song of Brother Sun."

hospitality. Each characterizing music, a characterization and a rian motif from the free, delineative in posers's own spirit, write a music of as deeply does he permit of the saint. His music of great spirit inward exultation. technical labels shall week to visiting hand w Year's 1 Kendall, the child The d and 54. pleasing of indivi he enjoy scorer he had first hol he had feet. H

Scores

Freak surfaces were us preferre and large totals to the sam tions.

most ha who sav their ar scored a merish-lo the 1930 tion.

From I as high a higher ha ers kept What par twenty-fo higher. three fig "no cards

Koussevitzky to Bax

Telegrams from Conductor to Composer About a Current Symphony

THE mails bring two telegrams sent by Dr. Koussevitzky in Boston to Arnold Bax in London apropos the production at the Symphony Concerts of the composer's Second Symphony, first heard there Dec. 13 and 14, repeated last week. After the final rehearsal, Dr. Koussevitzky wired:

The orchestra and I wish to express to you our profound admiration of this work. We are proud to give it its first performance, which will be a considerable date for the Boston Symphony.

Again after the first performances:

With greatest joy am sending you my heartiest congratulations on the exceptional success of your symphony.

Cultured Boston

Top o' the Morning:

Recently at a Saturday evening performance of the Boston Symphony orchestra I was amazed! In front of me sat a man who chewed gum the entire first half; and a woman two seats beyond me, who was frantically knitting a delayed Christmas gift, no doubt. Before the symphony of Beethoven No. 4 B-flat major op. 60 was finished, I was puzzled to know which I was counting, the number of times the man's jaws went up and down with such rapidity it made me quite dizzy, or the stitches of the knitting lady, or the time of the conductor's baton. Shades of our great musical masters, what are we coming to in this city of culture? E. L. T.

Concert-Chronicle

Three for Luck Jan 8, 1930

NO less than three printed programs were spread before the concert-goer at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. First (in the sense of being oldest) was the program of Mr. Hale's notes. But fine print above those notes gave information, "The program was changed too late to make a corresponding change in the notes." One turned to the front page, on which the numbers are listed—found program number two, with Schumann's "Manfred" overture replacing Schubert's "Rosamunde" music of the original program. And then there was an insert, the third program, reciting simply: "The program has been changed as follows": And this time Siegfried's funereal music out of Wagner's "Götterdämmerung" had been removed to make place for the same composer's "Ride of the Valkyries." From all of which one suspects that Dr. Koussevitzky's program-complex had been even more active than usual. And the result was that the hearers were given a Schumann-Wagner afternoon.

To begin, the hearer who may have been drowsing in his place on an unseasonably warm winter's afternoon, was startled out of his day dreaming by the three vigorous introductory chords of the "Manfred" overture. Few there are who could charge, as if with electricity, such simple matter as does Dr. Koussevitzky. There could be no more drowsing after those chords. In due time followed the sombre but restlessly melancholy theme of Manfred, and in its turn the plaintive tender melody of Astarte. Of the two is this overture compounded. The subject matter is such as to appeal to the romanticist who was Schumann. He characterizes his hero, his heroine, sets emotional background for them, brings to climax their music, at end in summing up, writes his quiet epilogue—which tendency toward "epilogues" commentators have called Schumannesque. And to Byron and to Schumann, that other romanticist who is Koussevitzky, yesterday was perfect counterpart.

Came next the same composer's Symphony in C major. Both in Cambridge and in Boston has the conductor played it. Now he brings it to his "series of classics" which is the Tuesday concerts. Once again we heard the simple motto which "unifies" (as the phrase goes) the movements; once again lived through alternately the fun and the romance which are the first movement; the lively play, only briefly interrupted by quasi-seriousness, which is the scherzo—remembered that here Schumann is in highly characteristic vein; the long, lyric melody which is the Adagio, and which is also one of the "famous" passages in all

Schumann; the solidities and the dignities, the pomp and the impelling onward rush which is the finale. By the way we noted this or that figure which seemed essentially "modern." Above all we were impressed with Dr. Koussevitzky's way with Schumann. For some years it has seemed as if neglect were to be Schumann's portion. He is not "in tune" with the tendencies of the present day. His ardent, passionate romanticism is at the opposite pole from present "mechanistic" practices. Into this present Dr. Koussevitzky brings Schumann, rekindles the flame that is in him, gives persuasive and eloquent voice to his idealism, better than most others minimize his faults, and behold, the "hard-as-tack" contemporary world (which, however, beneath the surface still clings to not a little of its romanticism) finds this Schumann good. Of a truth, not far behind the conductor's illuminating way with Brahms is his revitalizing of Schumann. After an intermission, the Wagner of "Lohengrin" with its prelude; of "The Valkyrie" with its "Ride"; of "The Mastersingers" with preludes to the third act, to the opera as a whole. Another type of romanticist is this; Wagner, who is continually scaling the heavens, who would wrest from the gods their secrets—but who could stoop also to write of a simple, honest cobbler, and a "green," poetically naive young singer, investing them with all the grandeur of a background of music otherwise reserved for his gods. Thus we listened to that long cumulative ascent, that glorious consummation, which introduces into the realm of the magic land of Lohengrin. Thus we listened to the tumults and the clangors of the warrior-maidens of the Wagnerian brand of Norse mythology—played with a punch which an opera-house would find it hard to equal. Then we followed conductor and composer and orchestra through an exceedingly lyric, emotionally finely wrought version of the introduction to the third act of the "Mastersingers." And at last came to a heroic playing of the prelude to the same work. In this prelude it seemed the conductor exceeded himself. If ever there may be proof of the thesis that a concert version of an operatic excerpt may differ from operatic performance itself, such playing of this prelude would be first line evidence. As climax to a concert in which high points were not lacking, it gave enough and to spare. A. H. M.

FORTY-NINTH SEASON, NINETEEN HUNDRED TWENTY-NINE AND THIRTY

Next week the orchestra will give concerts in New York and Brooklyn. The next regular pair of concerts will take place on January seventeenth and January eighteenth

Twelfth Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, JANUARY 17, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, JANUARY 18, at 8.15 o'clock

ALEXANDER GLAZOUNOW will conduct these concerts

Glazounow Symphony No. 6, in C minor, Op. 58

- I. Adagio—allegro
- II. Tema con variazioni
- III. Intermezzo
- IV. Finale

Glazounow Concerto for Violin, Op. 82

- I. Moderato
- II. Andante
- III. Allegro

Glazounow "Stenka Razin," Symphonic Poem, Op. 13

SOLOIST

BENNO RABINOFF

There will be an intermission after the symphony

A lecture on this programme will be given by A. H. Meyer and R. G. Appel, on Thursday, January 16, at 5.15 o'clock in the Lecture Hall, Boston Public Library.

The works to be played at these concerts may be seen in the Allen A. Brown Music Collection of the Boston Public Library one week before the concert

Concert-Chronicle

Three for Luck Jan 8, 1930

NO less than three printed programs were spread before the concert-goer at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. First (in the sense of being oldest) was the program of Mr. Hale's notes. But fine print above those notes gave information, "The program was changed too late to make a corresponding change in the notes." One turned to the front page, on which the numbers are listed—found program number two, with Schumann's "Manfred" overture replacing Schubert's "Rosamunde" music of the original program. And then there was an insert, the third program, reciting simply: "The program has been changed as follows": And this time Siegfried's funeral music out of Wagner's "Götterdämmerung" had been removed to make place for the same composer's "Ride of the Valkyries." From all of which one suspects that Dr. Koussevitzky's program-complex had been even more active than usual. And the result was that the hearers were given a Schumann-Wagner afternoon.

To begin, the hearer who may have been drowsing in his place on an unseasonably warm winter's afternoon, was startled out of his day dreaming by the three vigorous introductory chords of the "Manfred" overture. Few there are who could charge, as if with electricity, such simple matter as does Dr. Koussevitzky. There could be no more drowsing after those chords. In due time followed the sombre but restlessly melancholy theme of Manfred, and in its turn the plaintive tender melody of Astarte. Of the two is this overture compounded. The subject matter is such as to appeal to the romanticist who was Schumann. He characterizes his hero, his heroine, sets emotional background for them, brings to climax their music, at end in summing up, writes his quiet epilogue—which tendency toward "epilogues" commentators have called Schumannesque. And to Byron and to Schumann, that other romanticist who is Koussevitzky, yesterday was perfect counterpart.

Came next the same composer's Symphony in C major. Both in Cambridge and in Boston has the conductor played it. Now he brings it to his "series of classics" which is the Tuesday concerts. Once again we heard the simple motto which "unifies" (as the phrase goes) the movements; once again lived through alternately the fun and the romance which are the first movement; the lively play, only briefly interrupted by quasi-seriousness, which is the scherzo—remembered that here Schumann is in highly characteristic vein; the long, lyric melody which is the Adagio, and which is also one of the "famous" passages in all

Schumann; the solidities and the dignities, the pomp and the impelling onward rush which is the finale. By the way we noted this or that figure which seemed essentially "modern." Above all we were impressed with Dr. Koussevitzky's way with Schumann. For some years it has seemed as if neglect were to be Schumann's portion. He is not "in time" with the tendencies of the present day. His ardent, passionate romanticism is at the opposite pole from present "mechanistic" practices. Into this present Dr. Koussevitzky brings Schumann, rekindles the flame that is in him, gives persuasive and eloquent voice to his idealism, better than most others manifesting his faults, and behold, the "hard-as-lack" contemporary world (which, however, beneath the surface still clings to not a little of its romanticism) finds this Schumann good. Of a truth, not far behind the conductor's illuminating way with Brahms is his revitalizing of Schumann. After an intermission, the Wagner of "Lohengrin" with its prelude; of "The Valkyrie" with its "Ride"; of "The Mastersingers" with preludes to the third act to the opera as a whole. Another type of romanticist is this; Wagner, who is continually scaling the heavens, would wrest from the gods their secrets—but who could stoop also to write of a simple, honest cobber, and a "green," poetically naive young singer, investing them with all the grandeur of a background of music otherwise reserved for his gods. Thus we listened to that long cumulative ascent, that glorious consummation, which introduces into the realm of the magic land of Lohengrin. Thus we listened to the tumults and the clangors of the warrior-maidens of the Wagnerian brand of Norse mythology—played with a punch which an opera-house would find it hard to equal. Then we followed conductor and composer and orchestra through an exceedingly lyric, emotionally finely wrought version of the introduction to the third act of the "Mastersingers." And at last came to a heroic playing of the prelude to the same work. In this prelude it seemed the conductor exceeded himself. If ever there may be proof of the thesis that a concert version of an operatic excerpt may differ from operatic performance itself, such playing of this prelude would be first line evidence. As climax to a concert in which high points were not lacking, it gave enough and to spare. A. H. M.

FORTY-NINTH SEASON, NINETEEN HUNDRED TWENTY-NINE AND THIRTY

Next week the orchestra will give concerts in New York and Brooklyn. The next regular pair of concerts will take place on January seventeenth and January eighteenth

Twelfth Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, JANUARY 17, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, JANUARY 18, at 8.15 o'clock

ALEXANDER GLAZOUNOW will conduct these concerts

Glazounow Symphony No. 6, in C minor, Op. 58

- I. Adagio—allegro
- II. Tema con variazioni
- III. Intermezzo
- IV. Finale

Glazounow Concerto for Violin, Op. 82

- I. Moderato
- II. Andante
- III. Allegro

Glazounow "Stenka Razin," Symphonic Poem, Op. 13

SOLOIST

BENNO RABINOFF

There will be an intermission after the symphony

A lecture on this programme will be given by A. H. Meyer and R. G. Appel, on Thursday, January 16, at 5.15 o'clock in the Lecture Hall, Boston Public Library.

The works to be played at these concerts may be seen in the Allen A. Brown Music Collection of the Boston Public Library one week before the concert

ALEXANDER GLAZOUNOV

GLAZOUNOV. Herald By PHILIP HALE Jan. 14/1930

Alexander Glazounov conducted yesterday, as a guest, the 12th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra. The program comprized his Sixth Symphony; violin concerta (Benno Rabinoff, violinist); Symphonic Poem, "Stenka Razin."

Those who are fond of dividing a composer's musical life into periods will note that there was an interval of 11 years between the symphonic poem written when Glazounov was 20 years old, and about 10 years between the composition of the symphony (1896) and the violin concerto (1905). "Stenka Razin" is among the works that one might call pictorial-descriptive, suggested by Nature, or historical and legendary. To say that such works, as "Stenka Razin," "The Kremlin," "The Forest," "The Sea" are "romantic" while the symphony and the concerto are "classic," would be wrong; classical compositions may be romantic, not dryly academic. A wildly romantic work, romantic in the judgment of those hearing its early performances often becomes in later years acknowledged as "classic." Thus the foolish think to pay it honor, though the musical contents have remained the same. The symphony performed yesterday is as romantic and as imaginative as the symphonic poem. The former has no "program"; the latter is an illustration in tones of a legendary historical event; but the latter does not depend for enjoyment wholly on the fantastic tale. As for the concerto, it is a romantic piece for a virtuoso performance; but not written for the empty and vainglorious display of an accomplished violinist; not primarily planned as an applause trap; in fact the cadenza in which the violinist is expected to shine and "bring down the house" is the least interesting portion of the work, except possibly to violinists regarding first of all technical ingenuity on the part of the composer and technical proficiency on the part of the player.

Glazounov was congratulated by some of his Russian co-mates for abandoning pictorial and descriptive music and devoting himself to what they called "classic form." Whether they accepted his gorgeously orchestrated ballets is not known to us. His love of the ballet is hinted at in the Intermezzo of the Sixth symphony and even in the finale; but not in a too light, flippant and "popular" manner for symphonic dignity. This symphony is as conspicuous for melodic wealth as for contrapuntal skill, and cunning of instrumentation. The melodic lines are frank and appealing, as is the theme for the variations in the second movement; melodic material, which, often simple in itself, is developed by one well-versed in composition, who does not allow knowledge to choke beauty. When a man reads "Theme With Variations" on a program he trembles; he is prepared for the worst and steels himself not to express boredom, but keep a facial showing of reasonable interest and intelligence. Even when Vincent d'Indy's "Istar" is performed, one finds oneself wondering how long it will be before the whole theme will be revealed in its splendid nudity. These variations by Glazounov are a delight from first to last; truly varied, admirably contrasted; orchestrated in a surprising and fascinating manner; the technical skill displayed serves only to enhance the euphonious and poetic charm. The first movement, with its mysterious opening arouses anticipation for a tragic, or heroic mood, which is interrupted only by the suavity and tenderness of the expressive song theme. And here as in the Variations and the following pages with the changing tempi and rhythmic devices is the abundant reason for the reputation that Glazounov enjoys of being a master of his art.

From a purely technical standpoint, the pedant might justly say that "Stenka Razin" is not to be ranked with the symphony or the concerto; but who would have this musical story of the Volga's savage ruler, the Persian Princess and Stenka's supreme sacrifice told differently? Here we have the wild irregularity that Bacon, discussing "Beauty," found necessary.

Mr. Rabinoff of New York played the concerto, introduced here by Mr. Zimbalist 18 years ago, and revived by Mr. Burgin early in 1927. The youth of the violinist, the honesty of his performance with an emotional quality that was within the bounds of the concerto, and the music itself, won instant and hearty recognition.

Mr. Glazounov conducted simply and modestly but none the less effectively. The orchestra responded affectionately, not merely respectfully, to his directions. It was a pleasure to see on the platform of Symphony hall a man interested in his music, but not parading it; appreciating the desire of the orchestra to further his wishes; apparently unconscious of the fact that his name and his works have been honored for many years in the whole world of music.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Eugene Goossens, as a guest, will conduct the concert of next week. Wagner, a "Faust" overture. Schumann, Symphony B flat major, No. 1. Goossens, Concertino for double String-Orchestra (1st time in Boston). Respighi, Roman Festivals (1st time in Boston).

GLAZOUNOV CONDUCTS SYMPHONY

Distinguished Russian Composer Plays Own Pieces

Past Jan. 18, 1930
BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Twenty times since 1897, the name of Alexander Glazounov had appeared upon the programmes of the Symphony Concerts, and by 14 pieces was it thus represented. Yesterday afternoon three of these pieces were repeated, and under the direction of the composer himself, now on his first visit to the United States.

LINK WITH GREAT PAST

To many in yesterday's audience Glazounov, the man, was more interesting, at least for the moment, than Glazounov, the musician. Here was a composer in his 65th year whose career has extended over nearly half a century—for Glazounov was uncommonly precocious—who had won for himself an honorable place in music and who, above all, is a living link with a great past. For Glazounov, though much younger than Balakirev, Cui, Borodin and Rimsky-Korsakov, was first their protegee and then their colleague. In particular did he work shoulder to shoulder with Borodin and Rimsky; and when the former died, leaving behind him uncompleted his "Prince Igor," it was Glazounov who wrote down from memory the overture and who, with Rimsky-Korsakov, completed the orchestration of that opera.

Throughout his useful life Glazounov has lived in the former capital of Russia. During the years of privation following the revolution it was reported that with many other artists he was in sore straits. It was even said that so wasted of body had he become that he could wrap his overcoat twice around him.

Economical of Gesture

No such emaciation, however, was observable in the man who yesterday walked forth upon the stage of Symphony Hall to face an orchestra standing in his honor and an applauding, though (for the most part) seated, audience. Indeed, the Glazounov of today is a portly figure, and his movements recall the old saying, "Large bodies move slowly." In conducting Mr. Glazounov proved singularly economical of movement and gesture, though the lethargy that characterizes his walk was absent from his beat. That was sufficiently clear-cut and decided. And if in directing he did not inspire the players to untoward exertions, at least, in the language of the orchestral musician, "he knows what he wants."

The development of Glazounov, the composer, has been curious. Some might even call it a retrogression. Beginning under the influence of the Russian "Five" he, too, wrote as a "nationalist"; witness the tone poem "Stenka Razin," a product of his 21st year, with which yesterday's concert closed.

More German Than Russian

But in time he seems to have felt this musical dialect, half slavie, half near-eastern, too confining. He yearned, it would appear, to become cosmopolitan, universal, in his speech. And the later Glazounov is far more German than Russian; witness the Sixth Symphony and the Violin Concerto that made the rest of yesterday's programme. In them is displayed abundant mastery of the resources of composition. As a musical scholar Glazounov has surpassed all of the five, save Rimsky, and even Rimsky had not the younger man's ability to fill a large canvas to sustain himself through a symphony without losing his sense of direction.

But the music of the later Glazounov, well made, well sounding (if at times skirting the edge of the superficial), has little distinctive voice, either racial or personal. It is sonorous, it is melodious, it is brilliantly orchestrated, it shows the hand of a master contrapuntist, but at the most it leaves the listener feeling comfortable and secure. It does not thrill or excite. It fails to quicken the deeper emotions.

"Stenka Razin" Lives

Report has it that Mr. Glazounov now holds "Stenka Razin," vivid musical picture of the River Volga and of the Cossack bandit that ravaged its shores, in small esteem. Yet it were kinder of him to respect the piece, for the signs are not wanting that it will remain his monument.

In conclusion a word should be said regarding the excellent playing of Benno Rabinoff, who, as solo violinist in the Concerto, made yesterday his first appearance in Boston. He was deservedly applauded. And it need hardly be added that the audience from first to last received both the distinguished guest and his music with genuine cordiality.

GLAZUNOV CONDUCTS SYMPHONY CONCERT

Russian Composer Leads Program of His Works

Sixth Symphony, Violin Concerto, and "Stenka Razin" Heard yesterday Jan. 18, 1930

Alexander Glazounov, the noted Russian composer, conducted a program of his own works at yesterday's Boston Symphony concert. Dr. Koussevitzky is taking his annual midseason vacation of two weeks. Next week the guest leader will be Eugene Goossens, the English composer and conductor now head of the Eastman School of Music at Rochester, N. Y.

Mr Glazounov's program included his Sixth Symphony, opus 58; his Concerto for violin, opus 82, and his symphonic poem, "Stenka Razin," opus 13, all of them previously performed at these concerts.

The soloist in the concerto was Benno Rabinoff, son of Max Rabinoff, remembered here as manager of the "Boston-National Opera Company," which purchased the settings and costumes of the Boston Opera and engaged some of its singers to tour the country the season after the resident company here was given up. Benno Rabinoff gave a Jordan Hall recital Jan 23, 1928. He is a pupil of Auer.

Mr Glazounov's program included his as are all Russian names when translated into our alphabet, in half a dozen different ways, of which the simplest is here followed), is, since 1922, director of the Leningrad Conservatory of Music, a position he had held from 1909-12, before the revolution. An account of his long and distinguished career as composer and teacher was printed in last Sunday's Globe. He is now making his first visit to this country, and has already appeared as guest conductor in Chicago, Detroit and New York.

Few Gestures

Yesterday's audience saw a tall, heavily built man, quiet and dignified in manner, who conducts with the fewest possible gestures, and never makes an unnecessary motion. Only his slow and rather hesitant gait betrays the fact that he is in his 65th year, and recovering from an illness which caused him to cancel an engagement in Cleveland the other day. He was quick to share the hearty applause which greeted his music with the orchestra, and with the young and almost unknown soloist.

In the 1890's the musical conservatives denounced Glazounov as a modernist composer, but a comparison of his works with those his contemporaries, Debussy and Richard Strauss, produced between 1880 and 1905, since which date Glazounov has published almost nothing, proves the essentially conservative and academic character of Glazounov's music.

The sixth of his eight symphonies was published in 1897. It is well written music, with fluent melody and interesting rhythmic effects. The themes were apparently chosen with a view to the artistic unity of the work, so marked are the resemblances between the chief melodic ideas. This symphony shows the influence on Glazounov of the more conservative and, in America, least known works of Rimsky Korsakov, whose pupil he was. But the side of Rimsky's genius which influenced so strongly the first notable work, "The Firebird," of his later pupil Stravinsky is apparently alien to Glazounov's musical imagination.

Glazounov is not, and has made no pretention of being, a virtuoso conductor. He is, however, competent to get from an orchestra the effects he wishes in his music, as the admirably clear and sanely balanced performance of this symphony yesterday proved. The audience obviously enjoyed the music. Its applause was no mere polite tribute to the composer's presence, but heartfelt.

Show Piece

The violin concerto, which has been played at these concerts by Zimbalist and by Richard Burgin, is a skillfully written and ingratiating show piece, offering a soloist ample opportunities to display his abilities. Mr Rabinoff used a warm, rather too vibrant tone. His technique is considerable, though not sufficiently impeccable to save him from occasionally faulty information. He was very cordially applauded. One's impression of his musical gifts was distinctly more favorable yesterday than at his last Boston appearance, but he is not yet a mature and polished artist.

The other number on the program, "Stenka Razin," twice played here under Mr. Monteux, was written in 1885. It is a product of the movement for nationalism in Russian music begun by Borodin, Rimsky-Korsakov and their group, of whom Glazunov at 20 was the brilliant protege. It was suggested by a half-legendary, half-historical Cossack bandit. The first theme is the "Volga Boatman's Song," now thrice-familiar to audiences here, but still one of the best of Russian folk tunes. The scoring for orchestra is, as always with Glazunov, notably skillful, but the piece yesterday seemed immature and old-fashioned. The Sixth Symphony is more genuine and more interesting music.

Next week Mr. Goossens, as guest conductor, proposes a program including Wagner's "A Faust Overture," Schumann's First Symphony, his own Concertino, and Respighi's "Feste Romane," the latest issued of his now lengthy series of musical guide books to Rome. P. R.

Music in Boston

Monitor Jan. 18, 1936
Glazounoff in Boston

Alexander Glazounoff directed the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall, Boston, Jan. 17, as first of the guests chosen to occupy the dais for Dr. Koussevitzky's midwinter vacation of two weeks. The program was made up of three of the visitor's compositions: the Sixth Symphony, in C minor; the Violin Concerto, and the symphonic poem, "Stenka Razin." Benno Rabinoff was soloist.

It was a pleasure to welcome this distinguished Russian composer, a pupil of Rimsky-Korsakov and a link with the now almost legendary period during which the Russian "Five" flourished. Mr. Glazounoff brings to us the tradition of the great "Nationalist" group, whose members he knew.

Mr. Glazounoff was already well known to Boston audiences through his music. Many of his compositions had been performed at concerts of the Boston Orchestra, including those on the present program; but the Sixth Symphony had not been heard in Boston for nearly 30 years, and hence came as a virtual novelty. If it is not so impressive as the Eighth Symphony, which Dr. Koussevitzky introduced several years ago, it nevertheless is an interesting score, which reveals the composer's characteristic abilities. The first movement is musically the most interesting of the four, but the Theme and Variations and the Intermezzo have a charming simplicity and the Finale makes effective use of typical themes and rhythms. The work shows the influence of other composers, notably Wagner and Brahms, but is nevertheless distinctly Russian. Mr. Glazounoff is clearly a master of musical form and of the orchestra, but his scores are surprisingly lacking in instrumental color for a pupil of Rimsky's. In this respect, and in a certain nostalgic quality, Mr. Glazounoff seems curiously closer to Tchaikovsky than to the "Nationalists" who waged open war upon that master.

The Concerto, which was played several seasons ago by Richard Burgin, concertmaster of the Boston Orchestra, offers not only the expected technical problems but a solid musical content as well. Mr. Rabinoff brought to its interpretation an adequate technique and a rather slender tone of a pale sweetness. It was necessary for the orchestra to suppress its voice radically in order to permit the soloist to be heard. One missed also in Mr. Rabinoff's playing the musicianship and the vitality which are both necessary, in addition to technical power, to bring this piece to life. He was applauded warmly by the audience.

"Stenka Razin," one of Mr. Glazounoff's earliest works, written indeed in his youth, still retains its appeal, not only for the charm of the Russian tunes which forms its material, but for the resourcefulness and imagination with which they are treated.

As a conductor Mr. Glazounoff is sparing of motions, but obviously he had the respect and co-operation of the players. He is as reserved and conservative in performance as in composition. He allows no exaggeration, keeps his brass down in proportion to his winds, displays a strong feeling for rhythm and for subtle nuance. He was most cordially and warmly received by audience and orchestra. L. A. S.

Glazunov for Conservative Elder Master

Trans. Jan. 18, 1936
The Eminent Russian Through An Amiable Afternoon
At Symphony Hall

IT WAS mid-season yesterday at the Symphony Concerts. Since the beginning last October they have not generated so amiable an afternoon. Nor are they likely to produce another more amiable before the end next May. In historian-phrase "an era of good feeling" persisted through an hour and three-quarters. As the rural vernacular might put it, "a good time was had by all present." The occasion, almost needless to say, was the coming of Mr. Alexander Constantinovitch Glazunov, the distinguished and conservative Russian, to be guest of the orchestra, primarily as composer, incidentally as conductor in his own music. At Dr. Koussevitzky's winter holiday, each year of late has brought to Symphony Hall a guest-composer-conductor. Last January, it was Monsieur Honegger; twelve months earlier, Monsieur Ravel; in 1927, unless memory slips, Signor Respighi. Honegger is an able modernist, believing and practising, as the French phrase runs. There were those a year ago, who groaned in secret or cried aloud and openly under his ministrations. In modernistic waters Ravel has long dabbled with more than toe and finger-tips. Taking the apostle at his word, Respighi is wont to be a thing to all men—each with a plentiful gusto. Add Signor Glazunov, and the guest-composers at Symphony Hall under the Koussevitzkian régime, have tended to be musical modernists.

"Is it quite fair?" august ladies of conservative leanings have asked this concert-chronicler whose pleasure it is—with in his convictions—to be their comforter. He has agreed that it was not. The ists were having considerably the of it. Now in the twinkling of an through no less than three cons the balance redressed. A more ative composer than Mr. Glazunows not breath within the present All his life, which now numbers t-sixty years, he has hewed to one ie line of musical orthodoxy. A more innocent than his of all isms has not been heard at the ony Concerts since the days in Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" and inn's Serenade for Strings were d pieces. Though the extremists her wing believe it, the trustees reserve the Symphony Orchestra; nductor who rules over its con- the management, sitting at the of custom, do try to play fair in turn, from the loosest radical strictest constructionist, his inning. the variegated brood of Euterp. tful mother—may ultimately have in these concerts."

remove the final fly in the oint- it is true that Mr. Glazunov lives tedly as may be under the rule Union of Socialist Soviet Repub- at he serves that State as Director Conservatory in Leningrad, s not few of his former colleagues ill prefer voluntary exile—say aninov in New York or Stravin- Paris. To each of us his own after revolution; but it is possible that Mr. Glazunov chose to re- n Leningrad out of loyal regard ost and a work that he cherishes. decision does him credit, even At the least, his presence in a need stir no alarms in those nd amusing, ladies who, it is said, r a Communist behind every tem in the newspapers. In point concerts by Mr. Glazunov in New nd other cities of this diversified ve re-assembled Russian exiles and ally suggested a Tsarist "manifes-

It had signalled Alexander Constan- ch as a portly personage. Rather, a huge bulk of a man, seemingly g well over six feet; his broad rs little bent by years of unre- work; his sturdy body still firm- without a hint, as amongst us ans, of too many motor-cars, ele- oil-heaters and overlaid tables. trast, he walks with a singularly low, tentative step, not unlike the most of us when we thread the ss toward the commutator. As ducts, he also makes curiously light, angular gestures with a stick over a narrow radius, using hand hardly at all. Far indeed

used a warm, rather too vibrant tone. His technique is considerable, though not sufficiently impeccable to save him from occasionally faulty information. He was very cordially applauded. One's impression of his musical gifts was distinctly more favorable yesterday than at his last Boston appearance, but he is not yet a mature and polished artist.

The other number on the program, "Stenka Razin," twice played here under Mr. Monteux, was written in 1885. It is a product of the movement for nationalism in Russian music begun by Borodin, Rimsky-Korsakov and their group, of whom Glazunov at 20 was the brilliant protege. It was suggested by a half-legendary, half-historical Cossack bandit. The first theme is the "Volga Boatman's Song," now thrice-familiar to audiences here, but still one of the best of Russian folk tunes. The scoring for orchestra is, as always with Glazunov, notably skillful, but the piece yesterday seemed immature and old-fashioned. The Sixth Symphony is more genuine and more interesting music.

Next week Mr. Goossens, as guest conductor, proposes a program including Wagner's "A Faust Overture," Schumann's First Symphony, his own Concertino, and Respighi's "Feste Romane," the latest issued of his now lengthy series of musical guide books to Rome. P. R.

Music in Boston

Monitor Jan. 12, 1936
Glazounoff in Boston

Alexander Glazounoff directed the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall, Boston, Jan. 17, as first of the guests chosen to occupy the days for Dr. Koussevitzky's midwinter vacation of two weeks. The program was made up of three of the visitor's compositions: the Sixth Symphony, in C minor; the Violin Concerto, and the symphonic poem, "Stenka Razin." Benno Rabinoff was soloist.

It was a pleasure to welcome this distinguished Russian composer, a pupil of Rimsky-Korsakov and a link with the now almost legendary period during which the Russian "Five" flourished. Mr. Glazounoff brings to us the tradition of the great "Nationalist" group, whose members he knew.

Mr. Glazounoff was already well known to Boston audiences through his music. Many of his compositions had been performed at concerts of the Boston Orchestra, including those on the present program; but the Sixth Symphony had not been heard in Boston for nearly 30 years, and hence came as a virtual novelty. If it is not so impressive as the Eighth Symphony, which Dr. Koussevitzky introduced several years ago, it nevertheless is an interesting score, which reveals the composer's characteristic abilities. The first movement is musically the most interesting of the four, but the Theme and Variations and the Intermezzo have a charming simplicity and the Finale makes effective use of typical themes and rhythms. The work shows the influence of other composers, notably Wagner and Brahms, but is nevertheless distinctly Russian. Mr. Glazounoff is clearly a master of musical form and of the orchestra, but his scores are surprisingly lacking in instrumental color for a pupil of Rimsky's. In this respect, and in a certain nostalgic quality, Mr. Glazounoff seems curiously closer to Tchaikovsky than to the "Nationalists" who waged open war upon that master.

The Concerto, which was played several seasons ago by Richard Burgin, concertmaster of the Boston Orchestra, offers not only the expected technical problems but a solid musical content as well. Mr. Rabinoff brought to its interpretation an adequate technique and a rather slender tone of a pale sweetness. It was necessary for the orchestra to suppress its voice radically in order to permit the soloist to be heard. One missed also in Mr. Rabinoff's playing the musicianship and the vitality which are both necessary, in addition to technical power, to bring this piece to life. He was applauded warmly by the audience.

"Stenka Razin," one of Mr. Glazounoff's earliest works, written indeed in his youth, still retains its appeal, not only for the charm of the Russian tunes which forms its material, but for the resourcefulness and imagination with which they are treated.

As a conductor Mr. Glazounoff is sparing of motions, but obviously he had the respect and co-operation of the players. He is as reserved and conservative in performance as in composition. He allows no exaggeration, keeps his brass down in proportion to his winds, displays a strong feeling for rhythm and for subtle nuance. He was most cordially and warmly received by audience and orchestra. L. A. S.

Glazunov

Conse

Elde

Thans.

The Eminent R

An Amiable

At Symph

IT WAS mid-sea

Symphony Conce

ginning last Oct generated so amie

Nor are they likely t

more amiable before t

In historian-phrase "ar

ing" persisted through quarters. As the rural-put it, "a good time wa-ent." The occasion, al-say, was the coming o

Constantinovitch Glazu-

guished and conservati-

guest of the orchestra, pposer, incidentally as cown music. At Dr. Kouter holiday, each year of

to Symphony Hall a gueductor. Last January, it

Honegger; twelve month-

sieur Ravel; in 1927, unle-

Signor Respighi. Honegmodernist, believing and the French phrase runs-those a year ago, who gr-or cried aloud and openly istrations. In modernistic has long dabbled with me-and finger-tips. Taking s his word, Respighi is we-things to all men—each wgusto. Add s—t—st—

flev for single pairs of co-

guest-compos rs at symph-

the Koussevitzkian régime to be musical modernists.

"Is it quite fair?" august servative leanings have ar

cert-chronicler whose pleas

in his convictions—to be th

He has agreed that it w modernists were having considerably the better of it. Now in the twinkling of an eye, or through no less than three concerts, is the balance redressed. A more conservative composer than Mr. Glazunov draws not breath within the present hour. All his life, which now numbers five-and-sixty years, he has hewed to one line—the line of musical orthodoxy. A music more innocent than his of all modernisms has not been heard at the Symphony Concerts since the days in which Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" and Volkmann's Serenade for Strings were standard pieces. Though the extremists of neither wing believe it, the trustees who preserve the Symphony Orchestra; the conductor who rules over its concerts; the management, sitting at the receipt of custom, do try to play fair. To each in turn, from the loosest radical to the strictest constructionist, his inning, that all the variegated brood of Euterpe—a fruitful mother—may ultimately have place "in these concerts."

To remove the final fly in the ointment, it is true that Mr. Glazunov lives as contentedly as may be under the rule of the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics; that he serves that State as Director of the Conservatory in Leningrad, whereas not few of his former colleagues or pupils prefer voluntary exile—say Rakhmaninov in New York or Stravinsky in Paris. To each of us his own course after revolution; but it is possible to hear that Mr. Glazunov chose to remain in Leningrad out of loyal regard for a post and a work that he cherishes. Such decision does him credit, even honor. At the least, his presence in America need stir no alarms in those good, and amusing, ladies who, it is said, discover a Communist behind every tenth item in the newspapers. In point of fact concerts by Mr. Glazunov in New York and other cities of this diversified land, have re-assembled Russian exiles and occasionally suggested a Tsarist "manifestation."

Report had signalled Alexander Constantinovitch as a portly personage. Rather, he is a huge bulk of a man, seemingly standing well over six feet; his broad shoulders little bent by years of unremitting work; his sturdy body still firm-set, without a hint, as amongst us Americans, of too many motor-cars, elevators, oil-heaters and overlaid tables. In contrast, he walks with a singularly short, slow, tentative step, not unlike the gait of most of us when we thread the darkness toward the commutator. As he conducts, he also makes curiously short, light, angular gestures with a short stick over a narrow radius, using the left hand hardly at all. Far indeed is he from the outswEEPing or the in-beckoning ardors of our own Serge Alexandrovitch or from the flappings and fannings, say, of Sir Thomas Beecham. Baronet. None the less Mr. Glazunov disclosed his wishes to the orchestra; imposed them, yesterday, upon it; had clearly won its good will. To a man it must have perceived that he is a composer "who also conducts"—in his own music, even as did Monsieur Ravel. It played, however, as though it "really cared" and in the degree and quality of the chosen pieces returned him better voice than it gave to the authoritative and practised Honegger.

By other tokens this cordiality was manifest. The orchestra rose eagerly to welcome Mr. Glazunov at his first entrance; while each man made whatever applause sound was easiest. The audience covered every place and each performance with warm and general plaudits. Quickly by a gesture the guest would transfer them to the standing musicians. They, however, declined to accept them; applauding in their turn, thrust them back upon the composer-conductor. His only recourse was to outstretch a grateful hand not only to Mr. Burgin as concert-master but to whom ever was in reach. To the end of the concert, these tokens of appreciation and good will were variously renewed. The matinee audience at Symphony Hall may be this, that or the other musically, but it is a courteous assemblage; while the Boston Orchestra is both quick-witted and well-bred. In no warmth bask the artists of the old régime who now serve the Soviets. The more welcome our American fervors to Mr. Glazunov, modestly receiving the remotest laurels of his long career.

Upon the music of the afternoon it is superfluous to descant. Each of the three pieces was as clear as the day; made instant and just impression. For the first time in thirty years Mr. Glazunov's Sixth Symphony, in C minor—familiarily heard during Gerlicke's second conductorship—was repeated "at these concerts." The remembered Concerto for Violin, last played at Symphony Hall by Mr. Burgin in 1927, was middle number. (This time the violinist was Mr. Benno Rabinov, personable, skilful, sensitive, but under this one test hardly distinctive, musician.) For ending, the symphonic poem, "Stenka Razin," from Russian legend about a Cossack chieftain and his host whose river was the Volga and whose beauteous leman was thrown as gift therein. Mr. Glazunov, precocious as he was, wrote the poem in his twentieth year and is currently all store, nowadays, nonage. To glance of his compositions of the program such task, was to might better have allet-suites, for ex- unov's ballet-music sla; the Symphonic least a fascinating ed and richer-filled played under Dr. ars ago. As it is, much as it contains ell-worn "Song of sses for the best- in America of all ement ns of lg

ER

O

ore ers

CS

ader

1 interest and gave bstance and logical ean-lined workman- the melodic matter s; by the larger vig- nent of the finale; armths of the more vement; throughout ss and ingenuity. ations that is sub- low movement, both graces and dexteri- in lieu of a scherzo. Russian fancy with e Glazunov who was -romantic, wrote the he Glazunov of pure in the soil, the finale, features in this day the like of them in gn of Tsar Boris of

Violin is flowing, red working of a y may become dry. For once a Con- be fanciful rather oos—and displays—ful artifice rather ts. A Concerto, in- its difficulties and as a singing instru- virtuosi keep it ka Razin" there it even to us West- er, the youthful romantic imagina- The more the pity ently withered in at he resolutely ll these pieces the strumental color ent, the latest of while through the us, from Mr. s sworn to amia- H. T. P.

issues to place Suburbs pre- NGHAM, 183 of us, from Mr. 028G) ja 18 s wishet nish best of

Glazunov Makes Orchestral Bow Jan. 17. 30 — Trans. With Cambridge to Give First Warm Welcome to the Conductor-Composer

SINCE the annual Koussevitzkian vacation takes two weeks, and since it is preceded by a week-end in New York, it comes about that Cambridge each year hears one of the noted guests who fill those two weeks. And since the Cantabrigian concert falls on Thursday, it is the university audience which has the honor of first greeting the visitor. Last evening it was the Russian composer and educator, Alexander Glazunov. And the greeting which the university audience gave him, was one to warm the heart of any man. When he made his way slowly to the conductor's podium, the orchestra rose to a man. The audience, not to be outdone, quickly followed. Of course there was applause, long and hearty.

It is written that when the unorganized Israelites looked about them for a king, they chose Saul because he stood a head taller than all his brethren. One ventures that if conductors were chosen by the same process, Mr. Glazunov would have an excellent chance to become conductor of almost any group in which he might find himself. And what is more, if circumstance were to be taken into consideration, his chances would be increased several-fold. Looking upon the conductor-composer in his sixty-fifth year, one can discover from the reviewer's seat in Sanders Theater not a single gray hair upon his head. If advancing years have left any mark upon him, it is to retard a bit his pace as he walks to the conductor's stand. In his place before the orchestra he conducts with a minimum of effort. His beat is clear, firm, decisive. But it never describes a wide arc. The left hand is almost never brought into play except to indicate a cue here, a diminuendo there. But from the orchestra come energies, sharp rhythms, dynamic fervors which might have assumed a conductor willing his collar to the very roots.

course the program was entirely nov. With the sixth symphony it After the intermission it con- with the violin concerto, Opus 82, by Mr. Benno Rabinov. And it with the youthful symphonic "Stenka Razin." Mr. Glazunov is rful with his own works. Per- ely he leads one through an as- ng introduction, a well-charactered theme, a song of arresting melody second; through resourceful and rly development, more songful res, energetic conclusion. The va- ns of the second movement he out- each in its own mood, each with particular sonorities and timbres, gh fugue and nocturne, scherzo and tic finale, to mention only a few. hen came playful Intermezzo, full of wn especial charm. At last the

Of the Russian dance it reminds Energies are released, sonorities upon each other. A powerful move- and last evening powerfully played, which came the principal demon- on of the evening. Applause came antly. Mr. Glazunov shook hands Mr. Burgin; then with Mr. Theo- lcz. Still it continued. The or- a was asked to rise to its feet. And handshaking; through many of the the principals of the string choir. till the audience would not let the ser go. But the resources of wledge were at an end. And lazunov had to fall back upon sim- wing until the enthusiasm of the ice had spent itself.

concerto is grateful piece for the nstrument. Though it is played ously, it suggests the usual four ents. A long cadenza gives the especial opportunity. To it Mr. v and Mr. Glazunov and a hundred also gave charactering voice. ough it is an early work, "Stenka" must rank high among the works Glazunov's. The Cossack ruffian nominal hero of the piece, but the ero is of course the River Volga, place before the orchestra he conducts furnishes the background for the with a minimum of effort. His beat is characters. It is well known how clear, firm, decisive. But it never de- composer takes the familiar boat- scribes a wide arc. The left hand is al- song for unifying theme. Against most never brought into play except to hears Stenka, one hears his Persian ss, and through it one hears the umult. Vigorous and imaginative Vigorously and imaginatively it ayed last evening. A. H. M.

is he from the outswEEPing or beckoning ardors of our own Alexandrovitch or from the flapping fannings, say, of Sir Thomas Be Baronet. None the less Mr. Glazunov disclosed his wishes to the orchestra, yesterday, upon which he clearly won its good will. To a man who must have perceived that he is a conductor "who also conducts"—in his music, even as did Monsieur Rabinov, played, however, as though it were "cared" and in the degree and quality of the chosen pieces returned him a voice than it gave to the author and practised Honegger.

By other tokens this cordiality was manifest. The orchestra rose eagerly to welcome Mr. Glazunov at his first appearance; while each man made his own applause sound was easiest. The orchestra covered every piece and each performance with warm and general applause. Quickly by a gesture the conductor would transfer them to the standing audience. They, however, declined to do so; applauding in their own way, thrust them back upon the conductor. His only recourse was to stretch a grateful hand not only to Mr. Burgin as concert-master but to every one in reach. To the end of the concert, these tokens of appreciation and good will were variously renewed. The audience at Symphony Hall was this, that or the other musical; it is a courteous assemblage; while the Boston Orchestra is both quick and well-bred. In no warmth has the artists of the old régime who now the Soviets. The more welcome American fervors to Mr. Glazunov, especially receiving the remotest laurels of his long career.

Upon the music of the afternoon concert, superfluous to descant. Each of the three pieces was as clear as the made instant and just impression. The first time in thirty years Mr. Glazunov's Sixth Symphony, in C minor, familiarly heard during Gerike's student conductorship—was repeated "at the concert." The remembered Concerto for Violin, last played at Symphony Hall by Mr. Burgin in 1927, was middle-aged. (This time the violinist was Benno Rabinov, personable, skillful, sensitive, but under this one test hardly distinctive, musician.) For ending, symphonic poem, "Stenka Razin," Russian legend about a Cossack leader and his host whose river was Volga and whose beautiful leman thrown as gift therein. Mr. Glazunov, precocious as he was, wrote the piece in his twentieth year and is currently reported as setting small store, nowadays, by such work of his nonage. To glance over the long list of his compositions compiled by the editor of the program-book, unwearied at such task, was to note pieces that might better have served—one of the ballet-suites, for example, since Mr. Glazunov's ballet-music is renowned in Russia; the Symphonic Picture, "Kremlin," at least a fascinating title; the larger-schemed and richer-filled Eighth Symphony, played under Dr. Koussevitzky five years ago. As it is, "Stenka Razin," inasmuch as it contains in fragments the well-worn "Song of the Volga Boatmen," passes for the best-known and best-liked in America of all the composer's music.

The Symphony won interest and gave pleasure by clear substance and logical course; by apt and clean-lined workmanship; by the suavity of the melodic matter in the middle divisions; by the larger vigor and weightier content of the finale; by the gravities and warmth of the more emotionalized first movement; throughout by musical readiness and ingenuity. The Theme with Variations that is substitute for the usual slow movement, both charms and cloys by graces and dexterity. The Intermezzo, in lieu of a scherzo, disclosed the innate Russian fancy with such movements. The Glazunov who was half-scholar and half-romantic, wrote the Allegro Passionato; the Glazunov of pure Russian stock rooted in the soil, the finale. (Note the composer's features in this day and year; then recall the like of them in old prints in the reign of Tsar Boris of Musorgsky's opera.)

The Concerto for Violin is flowing, felicitous, light-fingered working of a form that too readily may become dry, awkward, mannered. For once a Concerto that prefers to be fanciful rather than scholarly, that woos—and displays—the violinist in songful artifice rather than in arbitrary feats. A Concerto, indeed, that smiles away its difficulties and remembers the violin as a singing instrument. No wonder the virtuosi keep it green. . . . In "Stenka Razin" there are folk-flavors pungent even to us Westerners; what is better, the youthful Glazunov quick with romantic imagination and suggestion. The more the pity that the vein subsequently withered in his composing, or that he resolutely choked it. And if in all these pieces the harmonic and the instrumental color seemed singularly innocent, the latest of them dated from 1896, while through the afternoon every one of us, from Mr. Glazunov downward, was sworn to amiable.

H. T. P.

Glazunov Makes Orchestral Bow Jan. 17-30 — Trans. With Cambridge to Give First Warm Welcome to the Conductor-Composer

SINCE the annual Koussevitzkian vacation takes two weeks, and since it is preceded by a week-end in New York, it comes about that Cambridge each year hears one of the noted guests who fill those two weeks. And since the Cantabrigian concert falls on Thursday, it is the university audience which has the honor of first greeting the visitor. Last evening it was the Russian composer and educator, Alexander Glazunov. And the greeting which the university audience gave him, was one to warm the heart of any man. When he made his way slowly to the conductor's podium, the orchestra rose to a man. The audience, not to be outdone, quickly followed. Of course there was applause, long and hearty.

It is written that when the unorganized Israelites looked about them for a king, they chose Saul because he stood a head taller than all his brethren. One ventures that if conductors were chosen by the same process, Mr. Glazunov would have an excellent chance to become conductor of almost any group in which he might find himself. And what is more, if circumstance were to be taken into consideration, his chances would be increased several-fold. Looking upon the conductor-composer in his sixty-fifth year, one can discover from the reviewer's seat in Sanders Theater not a single gray hair upon his head. If advancing years have left any mark upon him, it is to retard a bit his pace as he walks to the conductor's stand. In his place before the orchestra he conducts with a minimum of effort. His beat is clear, firm, decisive. But it never describes a wide arc. The left hand is almost never brought into play except to indicate a cue here, a diminuendo there. But from the orchestra come energies, sharp rhythms, dynamic fervors which might have assumed a conductor willing his collar to the very roots.

course the program was entirely nov. With the sixth symphony it After the intermission it continued with the violin concerto, Opus 82, by Mr. Benno Rabinov. And it with the youthful symphonic "Stenka Razin." Mr. Glazunov is careful with his own works. Particularly he leads one through an absorbing introduction, a well-characterized theme, a song of arresting melody second; through resourceful and truly development, more songful and energetic conclusion. The various of the second movement he outlines each in its own mood, each with particular sonorities and timbres, a fugue and nocturne, scherzo and a finale, to mention only a few. Then came playful intermezzo, full of its own especial charm. At last the

Of the Russian dance it reminds. Energies are released, sonorities upon each other. A powerful movement and last evening powerfully played, which came the principal demonstration of the evening. Applause came promptly. Mr. Glazunov shook hands with Mr. Burgin; then with Mr. Theodor. Still it continued. The orchestra was asked to rise to its feet. And handshaking; through many of the principals of the string choir. till the audience would not let the conductor go. But the resources of the orchestra were at an end. And Glazunov had to fall back upon something until the enthusiasm of the audience had spent itself.

The concerto is grateful piece for the instrument. Though it is played vigorously, it suggests the usual four elements. A long cadenza gives the conductor an especial opportunity. To it Mr. Glazunov and a hundred voices also gave characterizing voice. Though it is an early work, "Stenka Razin" must rank high among the works of Glazunov. The Cossack ruffian, nominal hero of the piece, but the hero is of course the River Volga, place before the orchestra he conducts furnishes the background for the characters. It is well known how the composer takes the familiar boat-song for unifying theme. Against this, and through it one hears the sharp rhythms, dynamic fervors which might have assumed a conductor willing his collar to the very roots. Vigorously and imaginatively it played last evening. A. H. M.

is he from the outswEEPing or beckoning ardors of our own Alexandrovitch or from the flapping fannings, say, of Sir Thomas Be Baronet. None the less Mr. Glazunov disclosed his wishes to the orchestra yesterday, upon which clearly won its good will. To a must have perceived that he is a poser "who also conducts"—in his music, even as did Monsieur Rabinov, played, however, as though it cared" and in the degree and quality the chosen pieces returned him a voice than it gave to the author and practised Honegger.

By other tokens this cordiality manifest. The orchestra rose eagerly to welcome Mr. Glazunov at his first appearance; while each man made his own applause sound was easiest. The orchestra covered every piece and each performance with warm and general applause. Quickly by a gesture the conductor would transfer them to the stand of the musicians. They, however, declined to accept them; applauding in their own way, thrust them back upon the conductor. His only recourse was to stretch a grateful hand not only to Mr. Burgin as concert-master but to every one in reach. To the end of the concert, these tokens of appreciation and good will were variously renewed. The audience at Symphony Hall was this, that or the other musical assemblage; while the Boston Orchestra is both quick and well-bred. In no warmer atmosphere of the old régime who now the Soviets. The more welcome American fervors to Mr. Glazunov, especially receiving the remotest laurels in his long career.

Upon the music of the afternoon concert, each of the three pieces was as clear as the made instant and just impression. The first time in thirty years Mr. Glazunov's Sixth Symphony, in C minor, familiarly heard during Gerike's symphonies—was repeated "at the concert." The remembered Concerto for Violin, last played at Symphony Hall by Mr. Burgin in 1927, was middle of the concert. (This time the violinist was Benno Rabinov, personable, skilful, sensitive, but under this one test hardly distinctive, musician.) For ending, symphonic poem, "Stenka Razin," Russian legend about a Cossack captain and his host whose river was Volga and whose beautiful leman thrown as gift therein. Mr. Glazunov precocious as he was, wrote the first in his twentieth year and is currently reported as setting small store, nowadays, by such work of his nonage. To glance over the long list of his compositions compiled by the editor of the program-book, unwearying at such task, was to note pieces that might better have been reserved—one of the ballet-suites, for example, since Mr. Glazunov's ballet-music is renowned in Russia; the Symphonic Picture, "Kremlin," at least a fascinating title; the larger-schemed and richer-filled Eighth Symphony, played under Dr. Koussevitzky five years ago. As it is, "Stenka Razin," inasmuch as it contains in fragments the well-worn "Song of the Volga Boatmen," passes for the best-known and best-liked in America of all the composer's music.

The Symphony won interest and gave pleasure by clear substance and logical course; by apt and clean-lined workmanship; by the suavity of the melodic matter in the middle divisions; by the larger vigor and weightier content of the finale; by the gravities and warmth of the more emotionalized first movement; throughout by musical readiness and ingenuity. The Theme with Variations that is substitute for the usual slow movement, both charms and cloys by graces and dexterity. The Intermezzo, in lieu of a scherzo, disclosed the innate Russian fancy with such movements. The Glazunov who was half-scholar and half-romantic, wrote the Allegro Passionato; the Glazunov of pure Russian stock rooted in the soil, the finale. (Note the composer's features in this day and year; then recall the like of them in old prints in the reign of Tsar Boris of Musorgsky's opera.)

The Concerto for Violin is flowing, felicitous, light-fingered working of a form that too readily may become dry, awkward, mannered. For once a Concerto that prefers to be fanciful rather than scholarly, that woos—and displays—the violinist in songful artifice rather than in arbitrary feats. A Concerto, in deed, that smiles away its difficulties and remembers the violin as a singing instrument. No wonder the virtuosi keep it green. In "Stenka Razin" there are folk-flavors pungent even to us Westerners; what is better, the youthful Glazunov quick with romantic imagination and suggestion. The more the pity that the vein subsequently withered in his composing, or that he resolutely choked it. And if in all these pieces the harmonic and the instrumental color seemed singularly innocent, the latest of them dated from 1896, while through the afternoon every one of us, from Mr. Glazunov downward, was sworn to amiable.

H. T. P.

Glazunov M Orche Jan. 17. 30 With Cambridge Warm Welc Conductor-

SINCE the annual season takes two it is preceded by New York, it comes about each year hears one who fill those two weeks Cantabrigian concert it is the university the honor of first Last evening it was a poser and educator, And the greeting w audience gave him, v heart of any man. way slowly to the the orchestra rose t ence, not to be outdo Of course there was hearty.

It is written that ized Israelites look king, they chose S a head taller than a ventures that if cor by the same process have an excellent c ductor of almost ar might find himself. if circumference w consideration, his creased several-fold conductor-composer year, one can disc er's seat in Sande gle gray hair up vancing years hav him, it is to retar walks to the cond place before the with a minimum clear, firm, decis scribes a wide arc most never broug indicate a cue he But from the or sharp rhythms, might have asst ing his collar to

Herbert Hu

Of course the program was entirely Glazunov. With the sixth symphony it began. After the intermission it continued with the violin concerto, Opus 82, played by Mr. Benno Rabinov. And it ended with the youthful symphonic poem, "Stenka Razin." Mr. Glazunov is masterful with his own works. Persuasively he leads one through an ascending introduction, a well-charactered chief theme, a song of arresting melody as a second; through resourceful and scholarly development, more songful measures, energetic conclusion. The variations of the second movement he outlined, each in its own mood, each with its particular sonorities and timbres, through fugue and nocturne, scherzo and majestic finale, to mention only a few. And then came playful intermezzo, full of its own especial charm. At last the finale. Of the Russian dance it reminds one. Energies are released, sonorities piled upon each other. A powerful movement, and last evening powerfully played. After which came the principal demonstration of the evening. Applause came abundantly. Mr. Glazunov shook hands with Mr. Burgin; then with Mr. Theodorowicz. Still it continued. The orchestra was asked to rise to its feet. And more handshaking; through many of the rest of the principals of the string choir. And still the audience would not let the composer go. But the resources of acknowledgement were at an end. And Mr. Glazunov had to fall back upon simple bowing until the enthusiasm of the audience had spent itself.

The concerto is grateful piece for the solo instrument. Though it is played continuously, it suggests the usual four movements. A long cadenza gives the soloist especial opportunity. To it Mr. Rabinov and Mr. Glazunov and a hundred others also gave charactering voice.

Although it is an early work, "Stenka Razin" must rank high among the works of Mr. Glazunov. The Cossack ruffian is the nominal hero of the piece, but the real hero is of course the River Volga, which furnishes the background for the other characters. It is well known how the composer takes the familiar boatman's song for unifying theme. Against it one hears Stenka, one hears his Persian princess, and through it one hears the final tumult. Vigorous and imaginative it is. Vigorously and imaginatively it was played last evening.

A. H. M.

1460

Russian Composer Given Reception by Conservatory

Russian Composer Given Reception by Conservatory

The director and faculty of the New England Conservatory of Music gave a reception in George W. Brown Hall in honor of Alexander Glazounow, Russian composer. Mr. Glazounow spoke about musical conditions in Europe. At the tea tables were Mrs. George W. Chadwick, Mrs. Ralph L. Flanders, Mrs. Wallace Goodrich, Mrs. Timothee Adamowski, Mrs. Albert Lothian and Miss Elizabeth I. Samuel. Many members of the faculty and many officers and members of the alumni association attended. Among invited guests were Mr. and Mrs. Robert W. Atkinson, Mr. and Mrs. Horace Binney, Mrs. de Menocal, Clarence W. Colburn, Emor H. Harding, Professor and Mrs. Edward B. Hill, Miss Mabel W. Daniels, Mrs. Chester B. Humphrey, Professor and Mrs. Walter R. Spalding, Mr. and Mrs. Henry B. Sawyer, Mr. and Mrs. Edward A. Taft, Mr. and Mrs. G. W. Woodworth, Miss Mary E. Williams, Mrs. J. Lovell Little, E. Howard Gay, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur W. Wellington.

1417

Abbott, Gordon	Cabot, Frederick P.	Emery, Mr. and Mrs.	Homans, Miss Katharine A.	Lyman, Arthur	Remick, Mrs. Frank W.
Adams, Mrs. E. C.	Cabot, Mr. and Mrs. Henry B.	Frederick L.	Hopkins, Mrs. A. L.	Lyman, Herbert	Richardson, Nicholas
Adams, Mrs. Karl	Carter, Mrs. Albert P.	Endicott, S. C.	Hornblower, Henry	Lyon, Mrs. George Armstrong	Richardson, W. K.
Allen, Mrs. Thomas	Carter, Mrs. J. W.		Hornblower, Mrs. Henry		Robb, Mrs. Russell
Ames, Dr. and Mrs. John L.	Carter, Miss Nina	Farlow, Dr. and Mrs. John W.	Houghton, Miss Elizabeth G.	Machin, Joseph	Robinson, Miss Katherine
Anderson, Mrs. C. S.	Case, Miss Louise W.	Farnsworth, William	Houser, Mrs. H. M.	Mason, Miss Fanny P.	Rogers, Mr. and Mrs. Henry M.
Anthony, Miss Margaret	Champlin, Mrs. George P.	Fay, Mrs. D. B.	Howe, Henry S.	Merrill, Mr. and Mrs. C. H. S.	Rogers, Howard L.
Appleton, Miss Mary	Chapin, Horace D.	Fenollosa, William S.	Howe, Mrs. Henry S.	Miller, Miss Mildred A.	Rothwell, Bernard J.
Atherton, Percy L.	Chard, Mrs. Walter G.	Fish, Frederick P.	Howe, Mrs. J. Murray	Milliken, Arthur N.	Russell, Mr. and Mrs. H. B.
	Clark, Mrs. Myron H.	Fitch, Miss Carrie T.	Howe, M. A. DeWolfe	Moir, Mrs. John
Babcock, Mrs. D. M.	Cochran, Mrs. Edwin Paul	Foote, Arthur	Hunnewell, Mrs. Henry S.	Moore, Mrs. Edward C.	Sachs, Prof. Paul J.
Bacon, Mr. and Mrs. Charles E.	New Haven, Conn.	Foote, George L.	Hunt, Mr. and Mrs. Albert W.	Moors, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur W.	Sampson, Mrs. Robert deW.
Bacon, William	Codman, Miss C. A.	Forbes, Edward W.		Morey, Mrs. Edwin	Sampson, Mrs. W. R.
Baker, G. B.	Codman, Mrs. Russell S.	French, Miss Katharine	Ivers, Miss Ella F.	Morison, Samuel Eliot	Sanger, Mrs. Charles R.
Bancroft, Mrs. Hugh	Colt, Mr. and Mrs. James D.	Frost, Mr. and Mrs. Donald		Morse, Miss J. G.	Saville, Mrs. William
Barlow, R. S.	Conant, Mrs. William C.	McKay	Jack, Dr. Edwin E.	Motley, Mrs. E. Preble	Sawyer, Mr. and Mrs. Henry B.
Barnard, Mrs. William L.	Converse, Miss Luna B.	Frothingham, Dr. and Mrs.	Jackson, Miss Annie H.	Mower, Penfield	Scott, Mrs. Arnold
Barnard, William L.	Woodstock, Vt.	Langdon	Jackson, Dr. Henry	Mumford, Mrs. George S.	Scranton, Mrs. Gilmore G.
Barnet, Mr. and Mrs. S. J.	Coolidge, Mrs. Algernon	Frothingham, Mrs. Louis A.	Jackson, Mrs. James	McCreary, Mrs. Lewis S.	Sears, Miss Annie L.
Barrett, Mrs. William E., Sr.	Coolidge, Miss Elsie W.		Jackson, Miss Margaret	McGinley, Mrs. Holden	Sears, Mrs. Francis B.
Bartlett, Mrs. Matthew	Coolidge, Mrs. J. G.	Gay, E. Howard	Jamieson, Mrs. J. B., Jr.	McKibbin, Miss Emily W.	Sears, Mr. and Mrs. Henry F.
Bartlett, Mrs. Nelson S.	Coolidge, Julian L.	Gilchrist, Miss Olive B.	Jaques, Miss H. L.		Sears, Richard D.
Beal, Mrs. Boylston A.	Coonley, Mr. and Mrs. Howard	Gilmore, Mrs. G. L.	Johnson, Arthur S.	Nash, F. H.	Sigourney, Miss Edith
Bearse, Mrs. Horace L.	Crehore, Miss Lucy C.	Ginn, Mrs. Edwin	Johnson, Mrs. E. J.	Nichols, Mrs. Henry G.	Silabee, Mrs. George S.
Beckwith, Mrs. Daniel	Cross, Mr. and Mrs. Grosvenor M.	Gray, Mrs. John Chipman	Johnson, Miss Edith Morse	Nickerson, William E.	Slattery, Mrs. Charles Lewis
Providence, R. I.	Cummings, Charles K.	Gray, Morris	Johnson, Mrs. Otis S.	Nourse, Miss Annie Endicott	Slocum, William H.
Beebe, Miss Sylenda	Cummings, Miss Margaret	Greene, Edwin Farnham			Slocum, Mrs. Winfield S.
Bell, Mrs. Jaffrey de Hauteville	Curtis, Charles P.	Greene, Mrs. Kathleen T.	Kaffenburgh, Mr. and Mrs.	Osgood, Miss Emily L.	Smith, Mr. and Mrs. F. Morton
Bemis, Mr. and Mrs. A. Farwell	Curtis, Miss Harriot S.	Greenslet, Ferris	Albert W.		Smith, Mrs. S. Abbot
Bemis, Frank B.	Curtis, Miss Louis	Grover, Mrs. Frances L.	Kaffenburgh, Mrs. Donald	Paine, Rev. George L.	Sonnabend, A. M.
Bird, Mrs. Frances A. M.	Cushing, Miss Sarah P.	Grozier, Mrs. E. A.	Kaufman, M. B.	Paine, R. T. 2d.	Spalding, Mr. and Mrs. Walter R.
Blake, Mrs. Arthur W.	Cushing, Mrs. W. E.		Keeler, Mrs. L. M.	Parker, Haven	Spaulding, Miss Emma F.
Bliss, Henry W.	Cutler, Miss Elisabeth A.	Hall, Gordon Rexford	Kent, Mrs. Edward L.	Parker, Mrs. Henry	Sprague, Mrs. Charles
Boydén, Charles	In Memory of C. S. D.	Hall, Mrs. H. S.	Kibrick, I. S.	Parkman, Mrs. Henry	Stackpole, Mrs. Frederick D.
Bradlee, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas S.		Hallowell, Mr. and N. Mrs.	King, Mrs. Henry P.	Patton, James E.	Stackpole, Mr. and Mrs.
Bradley, Mr. and Mrs. J.	Dabney, Mr. and Mrs. George B.	Penrose	King, The Misses	Peabody, Mrs. W. Rodman	Pierpont L.
Gardner	Daniels, Miss Mabel W.	Harmon, Miss Lilian	Kittredge, Edward H.	Perera, G. L.	Staniford, Mrs. Daniel
Brandegge, Mrs. E. D.	Davenport, Mr. and Mrs.	Hartwell, Miss Mary A.		Pickman, Dudley L.	Stanton, Miss Katharine
Bray, Robert C.	George H.	Harvey, Mrs. Elbert A.	Lamb, Miss Aimee	Pickman, Edward M.	Steinert, Mr. and Mrs. Alexander
Brewer, F. R.	Day, Mrs. Frank A.	Harwood, Mrs. John H.	Lane, Chester T.	Pierce, Mrs. Edgar	Stevens, Moses T.
Brewer, Robert	Dean, Paul Dudley	Haughton, Mrs. M. G.	Lang, Miss Margaret Ruthven	Pierce, Mrs. M. V.	Stevenson, Mrs. Robert H. Jr.
Briggs, Miss Helen S.	Derr, Thomas S.	Hawley, Mr. and Mrs. George	Laughlin, Henry A.	Pitman, Mrs. Harold	Stone, Mrs. Galen L.
Brigham, Mrs. D. S.	Dexter, Miss Rose L.	Hayden, Mrs. Harold B.	Lee, Mr. and Mrs. George C.	Post, Mrs. John R.	Streeter, Mrs. E. C.
Brook, Harry C., Hartford, Conn.	Donald, Mrs. Malcolm	Hayden, Sherman S.	Leland, Mrs. Lester	Pratt, Mrs. Walter M.	Sturgis, The Misses
Bullard, Miss Ellen T.	Duff, John	Herman, Mrs. Joseph M.	Leman, J. Howard	Prendergast, Miss Julia C.	Swain, Mrs. Howard T.
Bullard, Mrs. W. N.		Hicks, Mrs. John Jay	Lewis, Mrs. George	Putnam, Mrs. James J.
Newport, R. I.	Eager, Miss Mabel T.	Higginson, Charles	Lewis, Mr. and Mrs. Leo Rich	Putnam, Miss Louisa H.	Taft, Edward A.
Burnham, Miss Helen C.	Eaton, Miss L. H.	Higginson, Mrs. F. L.	Little, Mrs. David M.	Putnam, Miss Marian C.	Taintor, Mrs. Charles W.
Burnham, Mrs. Henry D.	Edwards, Miss Grace M.	Higginson, F. L.	Longfellow, Estate Alice M.	Rackliffe, Mrs. John B.	Tapley, Miss Alice P.
Burnham, Miss M. C.	Edwards, Miss Hannah M.	Hill, Arthur D.	Lord, Mrs. W. H.	Rand, Mr. and Mrs. E. K.	Taussig, F. W.
Burnham, Mrs. W. A.	Edwards, Mrs. L. F.	Hill, Mrs. John F.	Loring, Miss Marjorie C.	Ranney, Miss Helen M.	Thomas, Mrs. Giles W.
Burr, I. Tucker	Ehrlich, Mrs. Henry	Holmes, Alice Marion	Lothrop, Mrs. Thornton K.	Rantoul, The Misses	Thorndike, Albert
Cabot, Miss Amy W.	Eisemann, Julius	Holmes, Mr. and Mrs. E. J.	Lothrop, Mrs. W. S. H.	Rantoul, Mrs. Neal	Thoron, Mr. and Mrs. Ward
Cabot, Mrs. Arthur T.	Ely, Miss Elizabeth B.	Holmes, Miss	Luce, Stephen B.	Ratshesky, Mr. and Mrs. A. C.	(Continued on following page)

The Orchestra can be carried on only by the generosity of those who believe it important in the life of Boston and are willing to help it financially. All such are invited to join in sustaining the Orchestra.

ALEXANDER CONSTANTINOVITCH GLAZOUNOV

Glazounov was born on August 10, 1865, at St. Petersburg, now Leningrad. His father was a prosperous publisher and bookseller; the grandfather had established the firm at Moscow in 1782. Alexander's mother was a pianist, a cultured musician, a friend of Balakirev. As a small boy, Alexander did not show any pronounced musical gift, but he had a taste for pictures. He liked to copy the designs of playing cards, and, after he began to take piano lessons, pictures of wind instrument players, puffing out their cheeks, delighted him. "He had," as Ossovsky informs us, "a great respect for the pictures of conductors holding the magic baton in uplifted hand."

Russian Composer Given Reception by Conservatory

The director and faculty of the New England Conservatory of Music gave a reception in George W. Brown Hall in honor of Alexander Glazounow, Russian composer. Mr. Glazounow spoke about musical conditions in Europe. At the tea tables were Mrs. George W. Chadwick, Mrs. Ralph L. Flanders, Mrs. Wallace Goodrich, Mrs. Timothee Adamowski, Mrs. Ralph Lothian and Miss Elizabeth I. Samuel. Many members of the faculty and many officers and members of the alumni association attended. Among invited guests were Mr. and Mrs. Robert W. Atkinson, Mr. and Mrs. Horace Binney, Mrs. de Menocal, Clarence W. Colburn, Emor H. Harding, Professor and Mrs. Edward B. Hill, Miss Mabel W. Daniels, Mrs. Chester B. Humphrey, Professor and Mrs. Walter R. Spalding, Mr. and Mrs. Henry B. Sawyer, Mr. and Mrs. Edward A. Taft, Mr. and Mrs. G. W. Woodworth, Miss Mary E. Williams, Mrs. J. Lovell Little, E. Howard Gay, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur W. Wellington.

The annual expenses of the Boston Symphony Orchestra exceed its income. These concerts are made possible only by the generosity of the public in subscribing funds to meet the operating deficit. A list of those who have subscribed for the season 1929-30 follows:

Abbott, Gordon
Adams, Mrs. E. C.
Adams, Mrs. Karl
Allen, Mrs. Thomas
Ames, Dr. and Mrs. John L.
Anderson, Mrs. C. S.
Anthony, Miss Margaret
Appleton, Miss Mary Atherton, Percy L.

Babcock, Mrs. D. M.
Bacon, Mr. and Mrs. Charles E.
Bacon, William
Baker, G. B.
Bancroft, Mrs. Hugh
Barlow, R. S.
Barnard, Mrs. William L.
Barnard, William L.
Barnet, Mr. and Mrs. S. J.
Barrett, Mrs. William E., Sr.
Bartlett, Mrs. Matthew Bartlett, Mrs. Nelson S.
Beal, Mrs. Boylston A.
Bearse, Mrs. Horace L.
Beckwith, Mrs. Daniel
Providence, R. I.

Beebe, Miss Sylenda
Bell, Mrs. Jafirey de Hauteville
Bemis, Mr. and Mrs. A. Farwell
Bemis, Frank B.
Bird, Mrs. Frances A. M.
Blake, Mrs. Arthur W.
Bliss, Henry W.
Boyden, Charles
Bradlee, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas S.
Bradley, Mr. and Mrs. J. Gardner
Brandee, Mrs. E. D.
Bray, Robert C.
Brewer, F. R.
Brewer, Robert
Briggs, Miss Helen S.
Brigham, Mrs. D. S.
Brook, Harry C., Hartford, Conn.
Bullard, Miss Ellen T.
Bullard, Mrs. W. N.

Newport, R. I.
Burnham, Miss Helen C.
Burnham, Mrs. Henry D.
Burnham, Miss M. C.
Burnham, Mrs. W. A.
Burr, I. Tucker
Cabot, Miss Amy W.
Cabot, Mrs. Arthur T.

Cabot, Frederick P.
Cabot, Mr. and Mrs. Henry B.
Carter, Mrs. Albert P.
Carter, Mrs. J. W.
Carter, Miss Nina
Case, Miss Louise W.
Champlin, Mrs. George P.
Chapin, Horace D.
Chard, Mrs. Walter G.

Cochran, Mrs. Edwin Paul
New Haven, Conn.
Codman, Miss C. A.
Codman, Mrs. Russell S.
Colt, Mr. and Mrs. James D.
Conant, Mrs. William C.
Converse, Miss Luna B.
Woodstock, Vt.
Coolidge, Mrs. Algernon
Coolidge, Miss Elsie W.
Coolidge, Mrs. J. G.
Coolidge, Julian L.
Coonley, Mr. and Mrs. Howard Crehore, Miss Lucy C.
Cross, Mr. and Mrs. Grosvenor M.
Cummings, Charles K.

Cummings, Miss Margaret
Curtis, Charles P.
Curtis, Miss Harriot S.
Curtis, Mrs. Louis
Cushing, Miss Sarah P.
Cushing, Mrs. W. E.
Cutler, Miss Elisabeth A.
In Memory of C. S. D.
Dabney, Mr. and Mrs. George B.
Daniels, Miss Mabel W.
Davenport, Mr. and Mrs.
George H.
Day, Mrs. Frank A.
Dean, Paul Dudley
Derr, Thomas S.
Dexter, Miss Rose L.
Donald, Mrs. Malcolm
Duff, John

Eager, Miss Mabel T.
Eaton, Miss L. H.
Edwards, Miss Grace M.
Edwards, Miss Hannah M.
Edwards, Mrs. L. F.
Ehrlich, Mrs. Henry Eisemann, Julius
Ely, Miss Elizabeth B.

Emery, Mr. and Mrs.
Frederick L.
Endicott, S. C.

Farlow, Dr. and Mrs. John W.
Farnsworth, William
Fay, Mrs. D. B.
Fenollosa, William S.
Fish, Frederick P.
Fitch, Miss Carrie T.
Foote, Arthur
Foote, George L.
Forbes, Edward W.
French, Miss Katharine Frost, Mr. and Mrs. Donald McKay
Frothingham, Dr. and Mrs.
Langdon
Frothingham, Mrs. Louis A.

Gay, E. Howard
Gilchrist, Miss Olive B.
rd Gilmore, Mrs. G. L.
Ginn, Mrs. Edwin
I. Gray, Mrs. John Chipman
Gray, Morris
Greene, Edwin Farnham
Greene, Mrs. Kathleen T.
Greenslet, Ferris
Grover, Mrs. Frances L.
Grozier, Mrs. E. A.

Hall, Gordon Rexford
Hall, Mrs. H. S.
Hallowell, Mr. and N. Mrs.
3. Penrose

Harmon, Miss Lilian
Hartwell, Miss Mary A.
Harvey, Mrs. Elbert A.
Harwood, Mrs. John H.
Haughton, Mrs. M. G.
Hawley, Mr. and Mrs. George Hayden, Mrs. Harold B.
Hayden, Sherman S.
Herman, Mrs. Joseph M.
Hicks, Mrs. John Jay
Higginson, Charles
Higginson, Mrs. F. L.
Higginson, F. L.
Hill, Arthur D.
Hill, Mrs. John F.
Holmes, Alice Marion
Holmes, Mr. and Mrs. E. J.
Holmes, Miss

Homans, Miss Katharine A.
Hopkins, Mrs. A. L.
Hornblower, Henry
Hornblower, Mrs. Henry
Houghton, Miss Elizabeth G.
Houser, Mrs. H. M.
Howe, Henry S.
Howe, Mrs. Henry S.
Howe, Mrs. J. Murray
Howe, M. A. DeWolfe
Hunnewell, Mrs. Henry S.
Hunt, Mr. and Mrs. Albert W.

Ivers, Miss Ella F.

Jack, Dr. Edwin E.
Jackson, Miss Annie H.
Jackson, Dr. Henry
Jackson, Mrs. James
Jackson, Miss Margaret
Jamieson, Mrs. J. B., Jr.
Jaques, Miss H. L.
Johnson, Arthur S.
Johnson, Mrs. E. J.
Johnson, Miss Edith Morse
Johnson, Mrs. Otis S.

Kaffenburgh, Mr. and Mrs.
 Albert W.
 Kaffenburgh, Mrs. Donald
 Kaufman, M. B.
 Keeler, Mrs. L. M.
 Kent, Mrs. Edward L.
 Kibrick, I. S.
 King, Mrs. Henry P.
 King, The Misses
 Kittredge, Edward H.

Lamb, Miss Aimee
Lane, Chester T.
Lang, Miss Margaret Ruthven
Laughlin, Henry A.
Lee, Mr. and Mrs. George C.
Leland, Mrs. Lester
Leman, J. Howard
Lewis, Mrs. George
Lewis, Mr. and Mrs. Leo Rich
Little, Mrs. David M.
Longfellow, Estate Alice M.
Lord, Mrs. W. H.
Loring, Miss Marjorie C.
Lothrop, Mrs. Thornton K.
Lothrop, Mrs. W. S. H.
Luce, Stephen B.

Lyman, Arthur
Lyman, Herbert
Lyon, Mrs. George Armstrong

Machin, Joseph
 Mason, Miss Fanny P.
 Merrill, Mr. and Mrs. C. H. S.
 Miller, Miss Mildred A.
 Milliken, Arthur N.
 Moir, Mrs. John
 Moore, Mrs. Edward C.
 W. Moors, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur W.
 Morey, Mrs. Edwin Morison, Samuel Eliot
 Morse, Miss J. G.
 Motley, Mrs. E. Preble
 Mower, Penfield
 Mumford, Mrs. George S.
 McCreary, Mrs. Lewis S.
 McGinley, Mrs. Holden
 McKibbin, Miss Emily W.

Nash, F. H.
Nichols, Mrs. Henry G.
Nickerson, William E.
Nourse, Miss Annie Endicott

S. Osgood, Miss Emily L.

Paine, Rev. George L.
Paine, R. T. 2d.
Parker, Haven
Parkman, Mrs. Henry
Patton, James E.
Peabody, Mrs. W. Rodman Perera, G. L.
Pickman, Dudley L.
Pickman, Edward M.
Pierce, Mrs. Edgar
Pierce, Mrs. M. V.
Pitman, Mrs. Harold
Post, Mrs. John R.
Pratt, Mrs. Walter M.
Prendergast, Miss Julia C.

Putnam, Mrs. James J.
Putnam, Miss Louisa H.
Putnam, Miss Marian C.
Rackliffe, Mrs. John B.
Rand, Mr. and Mrs. E. K.
Ranney, Miss Helen M.
Rantoul, The Misses
Rantoul, Mrs. Neal
Ratshesky, Mr. and Mrs. A. C.

Remick, Mrs. Frank W.
Richardson, Nicholas
Richardson, W. K.
Robb, Mrs. Russell
Robinson, Miss Katherine
Rogers, Mr. and Mrs. Henry M.
Rogers, Howard L.
Rothwell, Bernard J.
Russell, Mr. and Mrs. H. B.

Sachs, Prof. Paul J.
Sampson, Mrs. Robert deW.
Sampson, Mrs. W. R.
Sanger, Mrs. Charles R.
Saville, Mrs. William
Sawyer, Mr. and Mrs. Henry B.
Scott, Mrs. Arnold
Scranton, Mrs. Gilmore G.
Sears, Miss Annie L.
Sears, Mrs. Francis B.
Sears, Mr. and Mrs. Henry F.
Sears, Richard D.

Sigourney, Miss Edith Silsbee, Mrs. George S.
Slattery, Mrs. Charles Lewis
Slocum, William H.
Slocum, Mrs. Winfield S.
Smith, Mr. and Mrs. F. Morton
Smith, Mrs. S. Abbot
Sonnabend, A. M.
Spalding, Mr. and Mrs. Walter R.
Spaulding, Miss Emma F.
Sprague, Mrs. Charles
Stackpole, Mrs. Frederick D.
Stackpole, Mr. and Mrs.
Pierpont L.

Stanford, Mrs. Daniel
Stanton, Miss Katharine
Steinert, Mr. and Mrs. Alexander
Stevens, Moses T.
Stevenson, Mrs. Robert H. Jr.
Stone, Mrs. Galen L.
Streeter, Mrs. E. C.
Sturgis, The Misses
Swain, Mrs. Howard T.

Taft, Edward A.
Taintor, Mrs. Charles W.
Tapley, Miss Alice P.
Taussig, F. W.
Thomas, Mrs. Giles W.
Thorndike, Albert
Thoron, Mr. and Mrs. Ward
C. (Continued on following page)

The Orchestra can be carried on only by the generosity of those who believe it important in the life of Boston and are willing to help it financially. All such are invited to join in sustaining the Orchestra.

ALEXANDER CONSTANTINOVITCH

Glazounov was born on August 10, 1865, at Leningrad. His father was a prosperous publisher; the grandfather had established the firm. Alexander's mother was a pianist, a cultured woman. Balakirev. As a small boy, Alexander did not have a musical gift, but he had a taste for pictures. He was fond of designs of playing cards, and, after he began to draw pictures of wind instrument players, puffing and smoking lighted him. "He had," as Ossovsky informs us, for the pictures of conductors holding the mace in their hand."

Russian Composer Given Reception by Conservatory

The director and faculty of the New England Conservatory of Music gave a reception in George W. Brown Hall in honor of Alexander Glazounov, composer. Mr. Glazounov spoke of the musical conditions in Europe. At the tables were Mrs. George W. Clapp, Mrs. Ralph L. Flanders, Mrs. Goodrich, Mrs. Timothee Adams, Mrs. Albert Lothian and Miss Ellen Samuel. Many members of the faculty and many officers and members of the alumni association attended. Among the invited guests were Mr. and Mrs. W. Atkinson, Mr. and Mrs. Honey, Mrs. de Menocal, Clarence Burn, Emor H. Harding, Professor Mrs. Edward B. Hill, Miss M. Daniels, Mrs. Chester B. Humphreys and Mrs. Walter R. Spalding and Mrs. Henry B. Sawyer, Mr. Edward A. Taft, Mr. and Mrs. Woodworth, Miss Mary E. Willis, J. Lovell Little, E. Howard Gay, Mrs. Arthur W. Wellington.

Thorp, Miss Alice A.
Thorp, J. G.
Tozzer, Mr. and Mrs. Alfred M.

Vaughan, Miss Bertha H.

Wadsworth, Eliot
Wallace, Charles F.
Ware, Henry
Warren, Bentley W.
Warren, Mrs. George E.
Watson, Mrs. Thomas R.
Webster, Mr. and Mrs. Edwin S.
Weeks, Mr. and Mrs. Robert S.

Weidhorn, Leo
Welch, Mr. and Mrs. E. Sohler
Weston, Charles H.
Wetherbee, Miss Martha Wheelwright, Miss Mary C.
White, Miss Gertrude R.
Whitney, Mrs. Margaret F. G.
Wilder, Mrs. Edward F.
Williams, Moses
Willson, Donald B.
Winsor, Mrs. Frederick
Wolcott, Mrs. Roger Woolley, Mrs. Edith Christiana
Wrenn, Philip W.

Subscribers to Endowment Fund for the season 1929-30

Bancroft, Mrs. Hugh
Fay, A. D.

Harding, Emor H.

Subscriptions to date for season of 1929-30	$63,247.67
Endowment Fund	305,408.41
Endowment Fund, in memory of Henry L. Higginson	70,310.18
Endowment Fund, in memory of Richard C. and Ellen Sturgis Dixey	5,000.00
Endowment Fund, The Adele Wentworth Jones Trust
Income dedicated to purposes other than running expenses	10,000.00

Subscriptions are applicable to deductions from the Federal Income Tax

Subscriptions to annual deficit and to the Endowment Fund should be sent to E. B. Dane, Treasurer, 6 Beacon Street, Boston, Mass.

Thirteenth Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, JANUARY 24, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, JANUARY 25, at 8.15 o'clock

EUGENE GOOSSENS will conduct these concerts

Wagner A Faust Overture

Schumann Symphony in B-flat major, No. 1, Op. 38
 I. Andante un poco maestoso; Allegro molto vivace.
 II. Larghetto.
 III. Scherzo: Molto vivace. Trio I: Molto più vivace; Trio II.
 IV. Allegro animato e grazioso.

Goossens Concertino for Double String-Orchestra
 (First time in Boston)

Respighi Feste Romane
 I. Circus Maximus.
 II. The Jubilee.
 III. The October Excursions.
 IV. Epiphany.
 (First time in Boston)

There will be an intermission after the symphony

A lecture on this programme will be given by Eugene Goossens, on Thursday, January 23, at 5.15 o'clock in the Lecture Hall, Boston Public Library.

The works to be played at these concerts may be seen in the Allen A. Brown Music Collection of the Boston Public Library one week before the concert

EUGENE GOOSSENS

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

Eugene Goossens, as a guest, conducted the 13th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. His program was as follows: Wagner, A Faust Overture; Schumann, Symphony No. 1, B flat major; Goossens, Concertino for Double String Orchestra; Respighi, Roman Festivals. The Concertino and the Roman Festivals were played in Boston for the first time.

Mr. Goossens's Concertino was originally written in 1927 as a String Octet and as such was performed for the first time in London last March. The first performance of the work in its present shape was in New York at a concert of the Composers' League in December of last year. The Concertino is interesting: not only as showing the technical skill of the composer; the music is alive, with a vivacity that is not academically perfunctory; it is new and sparkling wine in bottles that have not been covered with dust in the bin of a poker-backed conservative. The modern spirit that enlivens certain harmonic schemes is not that coming from an experimenter relying on polytony or any other "tony" for effect, in the desire to be abreast, or a little ahead, of the times. While the work is, as Mr. Goossens says, somewhat in the style of the old Italian concertos—Vivaldi, for example—it might be by a Vivaldi writing today.

For the theme of the slow section Mr. Goossens invented a melody in folksong fashion, a charming melody without affectation of simplicity but as appealing as though it expressed the emotion of some unknown, humble singer moved to vocal expression of what was felt within him.

The Concertino was brilliantly performed by the incomparable string section of the orchestra. The melody in the slow section was beautifully sung by the first viola, Mr. Lefranc, whose full, rich tone was not allowed to degenerate into cloying sentimentalism or lacrymose wailing. The audience evidently and fully appreciated the music and the performance.

Respighi's "Roman Festivals" was a disappointment, not wholly unanticipated. In 1916 the "Fountains of Rome" appeared; eight years later the "Pines of Rome;" to form a trilogy, Mr. Respighi completed the "Roman Festivals" in 1928: "Visions and evocations of Roman fetes." Mr. Toscanini brought out the composition for the first time anywhere in New York from manuscript last February. Mr. Goossens was the first to conduct it in London (June 13, 1929).

Mr. Respighi glorifies Rome again by describing in tones: First, the martyrs in the Circus Maximus, singing cheerfully in spite of the fact that wild beasts are about to devour them. Though the crowd at first shouts: "Hail! Nero!" the calmness of the martyrs is disquieting, and the people rise from their seats as agitated as those about to die are unperturbed. The second section portrays praying pilgrims on the highway, finally reaching a height from which the holy city is seen. A hymn of praise—church bells ring in answer. An October Festival is the subject of the third section—tinkling of bells, songs of love, a serenade. In the fourth section it is the night before the Epiphany. Fanfares of trumpets, country tunes, a barrel-organ and the voice of a "barker" sounding from a booth—a frantically jovial populace; in fact a "whoop it up," with the full strength of the company.

The composer is quoted as saying that his instrumentation represents "the maximum of orchestral sonority and color." One might say "noise and gaudy coloring." The most musical, and at the same time truly descriptive pages are those in which the pilgrims on their march finally arrive at the summit of the hill. And in the fourth section the wild tune of a pleasing vulgarity with the cadence used by Mascagni in "Cavalleria Rusticana" has true character befitting the scene. But too often the instrumentation is thick, not allowing contrasting themes to work fully their will, nor are the musical contents, even for festival representation, as significant as those of the "Fountains" and the "Pines." Yet the spirited performance, the admirable conducting by Mr. Goossens, the final blare, crash and general hullabaloo excited the audience to stormy applause.

The ability of Mr. Goossens as a conductor, his musically intelligent interpretations, his authority and his excellent taste, added to an ingratiating presence and a magnetic personality were made known to the Symphony audiences when he was invited to conduct this orchestra four years ago last Wednesday. His fine qualities were again revealed in his masterly, romantically poetic interpretation of the overture, much of which has aged, and the ever fresh symphony by Schumann.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week will be as follows: Mozart, Eine Kleine Nachtmusik; Prokofieff, Scythian Suite; Prokofieff, piano concerto in G minor, No. 2 (first time in the United States, Mr. Prokofieff, pianist); Albeniz-Arbois, La Fete-Dieu a Seville and Triana (from "Iberia").

GOOSSENS CONDUCTS SYMPHONY

Concertino for Strings
From His Pen Proves Agreeable

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The annual mid-season vacat of Dr. Koussevitzky is an excellent institution. The conductor needs and deserves his holiday. It was a pleasure last week both to hear and to see so distinguished a musician as Mr. Glazounov. Eugene Goossens, who conducted yesterday afternoon and who leads the band again this evening, has his points as director. And when Dr. Koussevitzky returns to his post next week he will be more than ever appreciated.

LACKS DRAMATIC FORCE

An admirable interpreter of contemporary music, Mr. Goossens appears to have little feeling for the music of the romantic composers. Yet he delights to place it upon his programmes. Presumably, like many another artist, he does not recognize his limitations. Yesterday, for example, Mr. Goossens began with Wagner's "A Faust Overture," and followed that piece with Schumann's First Symphony. Of the passages in Wagner's early score in which the composer anticipates his later methods and procedures, such as the sombre and brooding introduction, Mr. Goossens made much. But he could not reanimate those pages that have become relatively old-fashioned. Here and there is need of a transfiguring imagination, of a strong lyric and dramatic feeling. And Mr. Goossens lacks these things. Where Wagner most required help, he received it least.

And so with Schumann's symphony. Gone from yesterday's performance were the rapture, the ardor, the songful warmth that Dr. Koussevitzky brings to this often inept yet essentially rhapsodic and exuberant score. Mr. Goossens would revitalize the music by means of rhythmic energy and a general quickening of the pace, but his efforts were in vain. Lifeless the music hung on his hands. Indeed, to hear the symphony yesterday was to realize even more keenly the almost miraculous transformation wrought by Dr. Koussevitzky when he conducts it. The notes were played yesterday, but of themselves they will no longer serve.

Own Concertino Admirable

Of the second part of the programme there is a different tale to tell. Not only was Mr. Goossens's own Concertino for double string orchestra, heard for the first time here, excellently played, the music itself proved altogether agreeable. As composer Mr. Goossens has no very individual voice, but he can write effectively and with charm.

In the matter of performance the final number, Respighi's new "Feste Romana," also received, so far as might be gathered, its due. As to the value of the work itself, that is another matter. Respighi's music, in fact, seems to be undergoing a process of spiritual degeneration. Despite its obvious effectiveness, the "Pines of Rome" was a distinct fall-off from its predecessor, the "Fountains of Rome," and now this latest addition to Respighi's tonal guide-book or Musical Baedeker of the Eternal City, "Roman Festivals," is considerably lower in the aesthetic scale.

Of the four sections—"Circus Maximus," "The Jubilee," "The October Excursions" and "Epiphany"—the two middle ones have the most of musical quality. The first of all is mere movie-music; the last is best described as a "filthy din." Of course the audience liked it, and applauded it, and applauded piece, band and conductor to the echo. And had the music been even noisier and more blatantly vulgar the audience would have liked it even better.

It was long ago demonstrated that the worth of music is not to be gauged by the fervor with which the general public receives it. Even the subscribers to the Symphony Concerts are, after all, only human.

Early Wagner, Late Respighi, Another Guest

Eugene Goossens as Conductor
Through A Variegated
Symphony Concert

NOT until Monday does the master of the house return. Consequently on Friday the weekly shifting of the symphonic scene. To the stage across which the elderly Glazounov had lumbered, now loomed the relatively youthful Eugene Goossens. His slight, trim figure, from top to toe stamped Sackville Street, replaced, on the director's stand, the bulky presence of the local Russian. The conductor-composer from London, via Rochester which is in New York, swung a long stick through longer arcs, or pointing it now to floor, again to ceiling, beat the measure; whereas the professor from Leningrad plied a short baton in narrow radius. Inviting the orchestra to his will, Mr. Glazounov stood as firm as a rock; urging it to his purpose. Mr. Goossens whipped and tossed about pictorially. The all-father of musical Russia only incidentally a conductor, trusted his symphony, his concerto, his tone-poem to the band as one trusts a friend to the conveying ship or airplane. The busy Briton, who composes in the intervals of conducting, had an explicit notion of what he wished for Schumann, Wagner and Respighi, no less than for his own Concertino.

Mr. Glazounov's program, a week ago, was the choice of a composer setting thrice over, before a friendly audience, his characteristic work. Mr. Goossens assembled a list that ranged out of the middle nineteenth century into the early twentieth; gave diversified room for his prowess as conductor; accorded with the custom of these concerts. Only incidentally, as it seemed, was one of the chosen pieces—and the briefest—his own. With Wagner's "Faust Overture" he restored a long-neglected music to Symphony Hall. With Respighi's "Roman Festivals" he proffered to the audience the newest specimen of a composer whom it had often applauded. If with Schuman's "Spring Symphony," he poached one of Dr. Koussevitzky's happiest grounds, he wished plainly to the "Faust Overture" with an example of mid-nineteenth century eclecticism. In turn, the tone-picturing of Respighi descends in direct line to Berlioz and Liszt. Indeed, through fourths and more of the concert, Goossens might have been a conductor whose specialty was the romantic. Only in the Concertino for Strings did he disclose himself as the temperate artist he is. In form, the piece harks to the ancients; in substance, it is retained music of fine rather than of native music of color. In performance the composer-conductor measured his ground. For what child of the twentieth age does not feel his lip tight or sound of that benighted

"Roman Festivals" is orchestral sound and interjected tunes and pasted signs, signifying musically next to nothing for a season or two back Schumann's symphony in B-flat has become a time story at Symphony Hall that are to smile contentedly from our lips. Dr. Koussevitzky must tell in his own way. Mr. Goossens's Concertino proved interesting and pleasurable in a modest fashion. Of no consequence it be high point. Consequently the programme began at the peak with Wagner's "Faust Overture"; thereafter descended gradually toward the lush Italianate Wagner's Overture dates from 1855, though it had been in his head, and on his work-table through the years. When it was last heard at the Symphony Concerts escaped even the all-remembering editor of the programme. Some said in Mr. Montoux's time; as far back as Dr. Muck's. How many the years, it was fresh and pleasing to hear; while Mr. Goossens, forth as painstakingly, warmly, sympathetically, as though he were reading a piece.

There are many Wagners in the Overture; the Wagner who about this time wrote "Rienzi" and "The Flying Dutchman"; the Wagner who was to write "Tristan" and "The Twilight of the Gods"; the Wagner who in those days could put to paper as mechanical form-filling measures as any routine Wagner who could invent and melodies that still arrest the ear; who already had the instinct of finding the means to tonal color, and suggestion. Dismiss the thought that to the nineteenth-thirties exhibit the padding conventions of the nineteenth-fifties; put aside clear resemblances to the earliest operas and vague suggestions of the later music-dramas.

GOOSSENS CONDUCTS SYMPHONY

Concertino for Strings From His Pen Proves Agreeable

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The annual mid-season vacat of Dr. Koussevitzky is an excellent institution. The conductor needs and deserves his holiday. It was a pleasure last week both to hear and to see so distinguished a musician as Mr. Glazounov. Eugene Goossens, who conducted yesterday afternoon and who leads the band again this evening, has his points as director. And when Dr. Koussevitzky returns to his post next week he will be more than ever appreciated.

LACKS DRAMATIC FORCE

An admirable interpreter of contemporary music, Mr. Goossens appears to have little feeling for the music of the romantic composers. Yet he delights to place it upon his programmes. Presumably, like many another artist, he does not recognize his limitations. Yesterday, for example, Mr. Goossens began with Wagner's "A Faust Overture," and followed that piece with Schumann's First Symphony. Of the passages in Wagner's early score in which the composer anticipates his later methods and procedures, such as the sombre and brooding introduction, Mr. Goossens made much. But he could not reanimate those pages that have become relatively old-fashioned. Here and there is need of a transfiguring imagination, of a strong lyric and dramatic feeling. And Mr. Goossens lacks these things. Where Wagner most required help, he received it least.

And so with Schumann's symphony. Gone from yesterday's performance were the rapture, the ardor, the songful warmth that Dr. Koussevitzky brings to this often inept yet essentially rhapsodic and exuberant score. Mr. Goossens would revitalize the music by means of rhythmic energy and a general quickening of the pace, but his efforts were in vain. Lifeless the music hung on his hands. Indeed, to hear the symphony yesterday was to realize even more keenly the almost miraculous transformation wrought by Dr. Koussevitzky when he conducts it. The notes were played yesterday, but of themselves they will no longer serve.

Own Concertino Admirable

Of the second part of the programme there is a different tale to tell. Not only was Mr. Goossens's own Concertino for double string orchestra, heard for the first time here, excellently played, the music itself proved altogether agreeable. As composer Mr. Goossens has no very individual voice, but he can write effectively and with charm.

In the matter of performance the final number, Respighi's new "Festo Romana," also received, so far as might be gathered, its due. As to the value of the work itself, that is another matter. Respighi's music, in fact, seems to be undergoing a process of spiritual degeneration. Despite its obvious effectiveness, the "Pines of Rome" was a distinct fall-off from its predecessor, the "Fountains of Rome," and now this latest addition to Respighi's tonal guide-book or Musical Baedeker of the Eternal City, "Roman Festivals," is considerably lower in the aesthetic scale.

Of the four sections—"Circus Maximus," "The Jubilee," "The October Excursions" and "Epiphany"—the two middle ones have the most of musical quality. The first of all is mere movie-music; the last is best described as a "filthy din." Of course the audience liked it, and applauded it, and applauded piece, band and conductor to the echo. And had the music been even noisier and more blatantly vulgar the audience would have liked it even better.

It was long ago demonstrated that the worth of music is not to be gauged by the fervor with which the general public receives it. Even the subscribers to the Symphony Concerts are, after all, only human.

Early V Late Ano

Eugene Goossens
Through Symphony

NOT until the honited Gas & Imp on Fridmited Piece Dye the syns & For Sec... stage across whs & For Sec pf... had lumbered, is Distributing... youthful Eugen, S Distributing... trim figure, from S Freight... ville Street, res S Hoffman... stand, the bulk S Indus Alco... clad Russian. S Leather... from London, vis Leather pr pf... New York, swus Pipe & Found... longer arcs, or S Pipe & F 1st... again to ceiling, S Pipe & F 2d pf... as the professor S Realty & Im... short baton in S Rubber... the orchestra t S Rubber 1st pf... stood as firm as S Smelt & Ref... purpose. Mr. Go S Smelt & Ref... about pictorially S Steel... sical Russia only S Steel pf... trusted his sym S Steel pf... tone-poem to the S Tobacco... friend to the com S Leaf Tob... The busy Brito S Pict 1st pf... intervals of cor S Pipe & Rad... notion of what S Utilities Pr & Lt A... Wagner and Re Sisco Sales... his own Concert Sadium... Mr. Glazounov S in Raalte... was the choice Sck Chem... thrice over, bel S Car Chem... his characterist S Car Chem 7%... assembled a list S Car Chem 6%... middle nineteen S Elec & Pr 7%... twentieth; gave Sulecan Detin... prowess as con Sulecan Detin A... custom of the Sulecan Detin pf... dentally, as it S... chosen pieces— S abash... With Wagner's S abash pf A... stored a long S abash pf B... phony Hall. S aldorf... Festivals" he p S algreen pf... newest specim S alworth Co... had often ap S ard Baking A...

mann's "Spring Symphony," he poached upon one of Dr. Koussevitzky's happiest hunting-grounds, he wished plainly to follow the "Faust Overture" with another example of mid-nineteenth century romanticism. In turn, the tone-picturing of Signor Respighi descends in direct line from Berlioz and Liszt. Indeed, through three-fourths and more of the concert, Mr. Goossens might have been a conductor whose specialty was the romantics. Only in the Concertino for Strings did he disclose himself as the temperate modernist he is. In form, the piece harks back to the ancients; in substance, it is self-contained music of fine rather than suggestive music of color. In performance, the composer-conductor measured "expression." For what child of the Stravinskian age does not feel his lip curl at sight or sound of that benighted word?

"Roman Festivals" is orchestral sound and fury, interjected tunes and pasted labels, signifying musically next to nothing. For a season or two back Schumann's Symphony in B-flat has become a bedtime story at Symphony Hall that, if we are to smile contentedly from our cribs, Dr. Koussevitzky must tell in his inimitable way. Mr. Goossens's Concertino proved interesting and pleasurable in slender, modest fashion. Of no concert could it be high point. Consequently the matinee began at the peak with Wagner's "Faust Overture"; thereafter descended gradually toward the lush Italian bombast. Wagner's Overture dates from 1855, though it had been in his head, his letters and on his work-table through the forties. When it was last heard at the Symphony Concerts escaped even the all-remembering editor of the program-book. Some said in Mr. Montoux's time; others as far back as Dr. Muck's. However many the years, it was fresh and interesting to hear; while Mr. Goossens set it forth as painstakingly, warmly, sympathetically, as though he were reading a masterpiece.

There are many Wagners in the Overture—the Wagner who about this time had written "Rienzi" and "The Flying Dutchman"; the Wagner who was to write "Tristan" and "The Twilight of The Gods"; the Wagner who in those days could put to paper as mechanical and form-filling measures as any routine; the Wagner who could invent themes and melodies that still arrest the hearer; who already had the instinct and was finding the means to tonal color, atmosphere, suggestion. Dismiss the pages that to the nineteenth-thirties exhibit only the padding conventions of the eighteen-fifties; put aside clear resemblances to the earliest operas and vague anticipations of the later music-dramas.

Even so, a considerable residue remains. The motif of the brooding, despairing Faust, the motif of the longing that comforts and haunts him, are salient, defining, well imagined materia musica. Within the form Wagner treats them graphically, intensively, for themselves, in contrast, in conflict, in final ebb to weary silence.

Here unmistakably is music that evokes a figure, infuses it with emotion. Outside the padded or the mechanized pages, development and delineation go mated. Already Wagner feels his orchestra; uses it imaginatively; more than once, individually. The "Faust Overture" is romantic music according to the prescriptions of the time, yet uneasy and straining within them. If the hearer likes, it is as conventional of the eighteen-forties as many a page of "The Flying Dutchman" or "Tannhäuser"; yet quite as often and more compactly and insistently, it is foreshadowing of the mature Wagner. To many a listener, it was no curiosity that Mr. Goossens was upturning.

"I am a Roman citizen" said the loyal Respighi to himself, and first the fountains, then the pines, now the festivals of his city, stirred him to musical composition. The earliest impact was the most spontaneous. "Roman Fountains," expands in well-devised, well-conducted tonal and pictorial design; the music speaks agreeably for itself; enforced by program-claws, works pleasurable illusion. A kindling Italian warmth, an honest Italian liveliness, suffuse the tone-poem. "Roman Pines" would do it all again, self-consciously, calculatingly, laboriously. The children on the Pincian must play like little modernists; a phonograph-nightingale sing from the Janiculum; the legions stamp and clatter along the Appian Way. Swell your sensations, Citizen Respighi seems to believe, and there-with are they intensified. Sound and fury delight him but he still skirts the edge of bombast. With "Roman Festivals" into that pit he lurches and wallows.

At the Circus Maximus of the Emperors the tone-poem begins, but the song of the Christian martyrs is barely audible through the brazen clamors of the amphitheater—a truly circus-music. . . . The pilgrims climb the hill road; for the while reiterated accent and dun color suggest their weary, monotonous tread. (Il Signore fancies marching rhythms.) Afar they see the church that's goal and vision. A second brazen result of rejoicing, a-boom with bells, for no th engulfs them. . . . Out into the to 102 8 w October festivals.

155 8 w night-wanderers
361 2 w with a pretty sere-100 5 w espihi gains his 103 5 w e away the listen-191 1 w he Piazza Navona
30 2 w at Epiphany. Be-70 w ghi has rhythmed
25 2 w a hand-organ—the 27 2 w en him and Stra-27 18 w "Petrushka"—sung
1 w
12 1 w his orchestra nigh
19 2 1/2 w
123 12 w an Festivals" con-
51 1.20 w ne, eclectic details
65 7 w ignore's habit, but 3 w pierce only to be 65 w Not sonority bu
35 1/2 w goal: like the toper
32 1/2 2.40 w ne that he drowned 43 w the composer per-66 6 w The fountains have 30 2 w from the pines gone
55 4 w es may yet roar and 7 1/2 w With sonorities as 33 1/2 3 w re may be delusions 31 6 w Goossens and the orto the composer.

63 1/2 w rambunctious and vidend.  hark back to Mr.
regular rate. Concertino. Good to is a music that ran that out of flowing, rfections interpoint wove them
ay wear si or the mated voices tive clothed them piquant-that coms timbres; spiced in ed America, obtrusive modern-discreet animation.
It seen the discreet sentine term "si" action; thence to the s an oppo-darkened, of the ive of weal. Concertino is no of the cois the poised and eferred to: fertile mind and king crowd is science in it, zed as try desired at the mo-ntingent; ce'sful of bombast.
the target leny the possessor m the "si" rapturous, the y all of thul, temperament.
the vario nn of the "Spring passed away as November
ed as a nee'ssomed like May.
ardors. Not once
e and humas or muse in the girls of thushed him when-same urge pace; cooled and heir sisters he would sing.
look attracti'ful horn and Mr.
n owes to he in the Scherzo—of small We than brief regs are Tr. Koussevitzky, and
ess. [Inn's prophet.
H. T. P.

GOOSSENS CONDUCTS SYMPHONY CONCERT

Guest Leader Cordially Applauded

First Performance in Boston of Respighi's New "Roman Festivals"

Eugene Goossens, the English conductor and composer now associated with the Eastman School of Music at Rochester, N. Y., appeared as guest conductor at yesterday's Boston Symphony concert. His program included Wagner's "A Faust Overture," Schumann's First Symphony, and the first Boston performances of his own Concertino, and of Respighi's new "Roman Festivals." Mr. Goossens was cordially applauded at every opportunity by orchestra and audience. He first appeared at these concerts as guest conductor Jan 22, 1926.

Wagner's "A Faust Overture," an early work intended originally as the first section of a grand "Faust Symphony" which was never completed, has not been heard here for some years past. It was meant to depict "Faust in Solitude." Wagner revised it rather perfunctorily and published it in 1855, apparently because he needed money. This score proves that Wagner could never have written a symphony that would have equalled his "music dramas." Yesterday's performance was painstakingly eloquent. It did not save the piece from dullness.

Schumann's Symphony in B flat, after Wagner's overture, sounded like a greater masterpiece than one has been accustomed to deem it. Mr. Goossens, like Dr. Koussevitzky, seems thoroughly convinced of the eloquence and significance of this symphony. His reading of it gets full value from every melody and every rhythm, and manages to make the scoring for orchestra sound effective, despite the proverbial ineptitudes of Schumann's instrumentation. All that one missed was the dreamy romanticism, the essentially Teutonic emotionalism characteristic of Schumann. Mr. Goossens is too efficient, too deep in love with brilliance for its own sake, to get at the heart of Schumann's mystery. With a modesty and good judgment rare among composers who serve as guest conductors, Mr. Goossens put only one of his own works on yesterday's program. This was a Concertino for Double String Orchestra, which he has lately made from an octet for strings written in 1927, by adding an independent bass part and dividing the eight solo parts among first violins, second violins, violas and violoncellos. This concertino is terse, vivacious, unpretentious music, clearly and fluently written in a style not obtrusively modern.

Respighi's latest addition to his series of musical guides to Rome is entitled "Roman Festivals," and its predecessors, "Fountains of Rome" and "Pines of Rome," Boston audiences have frequently applauded. Like all writers of "best sellers" who try to repeat themselves, Respighi has now exhausted this vein of inspiration. "Roman Festivals" is almost a "reductio ad absurdum" of his whole procedure in his earlier successes.

There is a program note explaining that the four sections of the piece depict (1) the "Circus Maximus" in the days of Nero, with Christians being thrown to the lions. (2) Pilgrims in the Middle Ages jubilant at their first glimpse of the holy city from Monte Mario. (3) A harvest festival in the country near Rome with "hunting" echoes, tinkling of bells, songs of love. Then in the tender evenfall arises a romantic serenade. (4) The night before Epiphany in the Piazza Navona. This last seems to be a Roman equivalent of the raucous Halloween of the old-fashioned American small town.

Respighi has chosen themes ranging from a German Easter hymn to the sort of popular Italianate tune ground out by old-fashioned hand organs. He has scored the piece for an orchestra to which almost every conceivable instrument from pipe organ to mandolin is added, always with a keen sense of sonority, and a megalomaniac frenzy to produce volume of tone as an end in itself. There is a sort of picture-postcard realism to the piece. The Pilgrim's hymn sounds like a pilgrim's hymn, the mandolin tune is just what one would expect of a mandolin player, the hand organ tune sounds like an amalgam of a dozen familiar specimens. But one passes in listening from amusement to boredom.

Now, if Respighi had only read Shaw's "Androcles and the Lion," he might have written appropriate, if obstreperous, music for that delicious farce about Roman martyrs saved by a fluke. But, one fears, Respighi takes himself too seriously for that.

The performance yesterday was worthy of the piece, save for a few

Here unmistakably is music prize is divided between him and Stravinsky of a scene in "Petrushka"—sung Outside the padded or the mechanical low ditty; blown up his orchestra night pages, development and delineated to bursting.

Already Wagner feels At a guess "Roman Festivals" contains adroit, avorsome, eclectic details chestra; uses it imaginatively; tains adroit, avorsome, eclectic details than once, individually. The according to the Signore's habit, but Overture" is romantic music ac out of the din they pierce only to be blunted in bombast. Not sonority but to the prescriptions of the time, sound is Respighi's goal: like the toper who so loved the wine that he drowned himself in the cask, the composer perishes in his own din. The fountains have yet quite as often and more com run dry; the echoes from the pines gone and insistently, it is foreshadow mute; but the brasses may yet roar and the drums bang. With sonorities as the mature Wagner. To many a with much else, there may be delusion of grandeur. Mr. Goossens and the orchestra were dutiful to the composer.

"I am a Roman citizen," said the Respighi to himself, and first the fountains, then the pines, now the of his city, stirred him to musical sition. The earliest impact was th spontaneous. "Roman Fountain pands in well-devised, well-con tonal and pictorial design; the speaks agreeably for itself; enfor program-clews, works pleasurable f
A kindling Italian warmth, an Italian liveliness, suffuse the tone
"Roman Pines" would do it all self-consciously, calculatingly, labor
The children on the Pincian mu like little modernists; a phond nightingale sing from the Jani
the legions stamp and clatter alo Appian Way. Swell your sensatio izen Respighi seems to believe; and with are they intensified. Sour fury delight him but he still ski edge of bombast. With "Roman vals" into that pit he lurches an lows.

At the Circus Maximus of the ors the tone-poem begins, but the of the Christian martyrs is barely ble through the brazen clamors amphitheater—a truly circus-music.
The pilgrims climb the hill road the while reiterated accent and du suggest their weary, monotonous (Il Signore fancies marching rhy Afar they see the church that and vision. A second brazen of rejoicing, a-boom with bells, fo engulfs them. . . . Out into the

Listen to such rambunctious and empty stuff. Then hark back to Mr. Goossens's own Concertino. Good to hear and to feel was a music that ran in long lean lines; that out of flowing, fanciful, skillful counterpoint wove them through the divided or the mated voices of the string choir; clothed them piquantly or pungently in its timbres; spiced in not too many or too obtrusive modernisms; passed from the discreet animation of the beginning to the discreet sentiment of the songful section; thence to the tempered gayety, once darkened, of the end. Mr. Goossens's Concertino is no masterpiece; but it is the poised and practised music of a fertile mind and an alert hand. There is science in it, which was more to be desired at the moment than Respighi's fistful of bombast.

Science is likely to deny the possessor the expansive and rapturous, the dreamful and the blissful, temperament. Mr. Goossens's Schumann of the "Spring Symphony" was as dry as November when he should have blossomed like May. In him were no songful ardors. Not once did he stride the hillsides or muse in the shade. The conductor rushed him whenever he quickened the pace; cooled and checked him, whenever he would sing. Even Mr. Boettcher's soulful horn and Mr. Laurent's trilling flute—in the Scherzo—could gain him no more than brief release. Hereabouts Dr. Koussevitzky, and no other, is Schumann's prophet.

H. T. P.

H. T. P.

Eugene Goossens, the English conductor and composer now associated with the Eastman School of Music at Rochester, N Y, appeared as guest conductor at yesterday's Boston Symphony concert. His program included Wagner's "A Faust Overture," Schumann's First Symphony, and the first Boston performances of his own Concertino, and of Respighi's new "Roman Festivals." Mr Goossens was cordially applauded at every opportunity by orchestra and audience. He first appeared at these concerts as guest conductor Jan 22, 1926.

Jan. 22, 1920.
Wagner's "A Faust Overture," an early work intended originally as the first section of a grand "Faust Symphony" which was never completed, has not been heard here for some years past. It was meant to depict "Faust in Solitude." Wagner revised it rather perfunctorily and published it in 1855, apparently because he needed money. This score proves that Wagner could never have written a symphony that would have equalled his "music dramas." Yesterday's performance was painstakingly eloquent. It did not save the piece from dullness.

the piece from dullness. Schumann's Symphony in B flat, after Wagner's overture, sounded like a greater masterpiece than one has been accustomed to deem it. Mr Goossens, like Dr Koussevitzky, seems thoroughly convinced of the eloquence and significance of this symphony. His reading of it gets full value from every melody and every rhythm, and manages to make the scoring for orchestra sound effective, despite the proverbial ineptitudes of Schumann's instrumentation. All that one missed was the dreamy romanticism, the essentially Teutonic emotionalism characteristic of Schumann. Mr Goossens is too efficient, too deep in love with brilliance for its own sake, to get at the heart of Schumann's mystery.

With a modesty and good judgment

rare among composers who serve as guest conductors, Mr Goossens put only one of his own works on yesterday's program. This was a Concertino for Double String Orchestra, which he has lately made from an octet for strings written in 1927, by adding an independent bass part and dividing the eight solo parts among first violins, second violins, violas and violoncellos. This concertino is terse, vivacious, unpretentious music, clearly and fluently written in a style not obtrusively modern.

Respighi's latest addition to his series of musical guides to Rome is entitled "Roman Festivals," and its predecessors, "Fountains of Rome" and "Pines of Rome," Boston audiences have frequently applauded. Like all writers of "best sellers" who try to repeat themselves, Respighi has now exhausted this vein of inspiration. "Roman Festivals" is almost a "reductio ad absurdum" of his whole procedure in his earlier successes.

There is a program note explaining that the four sections of the piece depict (1) the "Circus Maximus" in the days of Nero, with Christians being thrown to the lions. (2) Pilgrims in the Middle Ages jubilant at their first glimpse of the holy city from Monte Mario. (3) A harvest festival in the country near Rome with "hunting" echoes, tinkling of bells, songs of love. Then in the tender evenfall arises a romantic serenade." (4) The night before Epiphany in the Piazza Navena. This last seems to be a Roman equivalent of the raucous Halloween of the old-fashioned American small town.

Respighi has chosen themes ranging from a German Easter hymn to the sort of popular Italianate tune ground out by old-fashioned hand organs. He has scored the piece for an orchestra to which almost every conceivable instrument from pipe organ to mandolin is added, always with a keen sense of sonority, and a megalomaniac frenzy to produce volume of tone as an end in itself. There is a sort of picture-postcard realism to the piece. The Pilgrim's hymn sounds like a pilgrim's hymn, the mandolin tune is just what one would expect of a mandolin player, the hand organ tune sounds like an amalgam of a dozen familiar specimens. But one passes in listening from amusement to boredom.

Now, if Respighi had only read Shaw's "Androcles and the Lion," he might have written appropriate, if obstreperous, music for that delicious farce about Roman martyrs saved by a fluke. But, one fears, Respighi takes himself too seriously for that.

The performance yesterday was worthy of the piece, save for a few

muddled bits. Why is it that under no conductor can the Boston Symphony, as at present constituted, succeed in getting through an entire concert with no obvious wrong notes and false entrances?

Dr Koussevitzky will return from his vacation next week. The program now announced, subject, of course, to change with or without notice, includes Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," Prokofieff's "Scythian Suite," his new piano concerto and two of Mr Arbos' admirable arrangements of numbers from Albeniz' "Iberia." Prokofieff will appear as pianist in his concerto, but, unlike rival composers, he will leave the conducting to Dr Koussevitzky.

P. R.

Music

Goossens in Boston

For the second and last week of Dr. Koussevitzky's midwinter vacation, Eugene Goossens held his long baton over the Boston Symphony Orchestra. On the afternoon of Jan. 24, in Symphony Hall, Boston, he directed this program: Wagner's "Faust Overture," Schumann's B flat Symphony, Goossens's Concertino for double-string orchestra and Respighi's "Feste Romane." The two last-mentioned items were then heard for the first time in Boston.

Known to Bostonians through his music and through former visits, Mr. Goossens is always a welcome visitor. He was greeted warmly by audience and orchestra. An authoritative conductor, he has developed since his last sojourn in Boston a more vehement technique with his stick, which, however, did not interfere with enjoyment of the music he directs.

The constitution of his program puzzled us somewhat. Here was a man, conducting a single program in the season with one of the finest orchestras in the world, and he chose to open his list with an overture which is interesting chiefly for its forecasting of the great music-dramas, conspicuously "Tristan"; and to set down in the place of honor the "Spring" Symphony, which is one of Dr. Koussevitzky's favorite repertory pieces. His readings were meticulous, but they did not throw upon this music the dazzling light of revelation.

It is true that Mr. Goossens is not the only conductor to hesitate about venturing outside the safe symphonic enclosure of Beethoven, Brahms and Schumann. But here was an opportunity. The Boston Orchestra has never played, for example, Vaughan Williams's "Pastoral" Symphony nor has it been heard for some years in the "London" Symphony. There is music of Bax and of Delius which would have been welcome, all without going outside the conductor's homeland; and symphonic music has been written in France, Russia, even Finland. Why Schumann?

For novelties, first, Mr. Goossens's Concertino, remade from a string octet and first performed in its present form at a concert of the League of Composers in New York last December. It is a well-formed, rhythmically lively piece, based as to its first and last movements on a not particularly salient figure. The slow movement, with a theme in folk song style, is the most appealing of the three. In it some charming effects are achieved with the divided strings.

Finally, what is said to be the concluding volume of Respighi's sesquipedalian Roman directory. This reporter heard the first performance of this work under Toscanini in New York a year ago, and so perhaps was too well prepared for it. With its cries of wild beasts, resounding church bells, barrel organs, guitar, and battery requiring 10 artillerymen, it caused on the present occasion some excited applause and a few shouts; but its essential meretriciousness cannot be concealed.

L. A. S.

Fourteenth Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, JANUARY 31, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, FEBRUARY 1, at 8.15 o'clock

Mozart Eine Kleine Nachtmusik (K. No. 525)

- I. Allegro.
- II. Romanza: Andante.
- III. Menuetto: Allegretto.
- IV. Rondo: Allegro.

Prokofieff Scythian Suite, Op. 20

- I. The adoration of Veles and Ala.
 - II. The Enemy God and the Dance of the Black Spirits.
 - III. Night.
 - IV. The Glorious Departure of Lolly and the Procession of the Sun.
-

Prokofieff Second Piano Concerto, in G minor Op. 16

- I. Andantino; Allegretto.
- II. Scherzo.
- III. Intermezzo.
- IV. Finale.

(First time in Boston)

Albeniz "Iberia" (Arranged for Orchestra by F. Arbos)

- a. La Fête-Dieu à Séville.
 - b. Triana.
-

SOLOIST
SERGE PROKOFIEFF

STEINWAY PIANO USED

There will be an intermission after Prokofieff's Scythian Suite

A lecture on this programme will be given on Thursday, January 30, at 5.15 o'clock in the Lecture Hall, Boston Public Library.

The works to be played at these concerts may be seen in the Allen A. Brown Music Collection of the Boston Public Library one week before the concert

muddled bits. Why is it that under no conductor can the Boston Symphony, as at present constituted, succeed in getting through an entire concert with no obvious wrong notes and false entrances?

Dr Koussevitzky will return from his vacation next week. The program now announced, subject, of course, to change with or without notice, includes Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," Prokofieff's "Scythian Suite," his new piano concerto and two of Mr Arbos' admirable arrangements of numbers from Albeniz' "Iberia." Prokofieff will appear as pianist in his concerto, but, unlike rival composers, he will leave the conducting to Dr Koussevitzky. P. R.

Music

Goossens in Boston

For the second and last week of Dr. Koussevitzky's midwinter vacation, Eugene Goossens held his long baton over the Boston Symphony Orchestra. On the afternoon of Jan. 24, in Symphony Hall, Boston, he directed this program: Wagner's "Faust Overture," Schumann's B flat Symphony, Goossens's Concertino for double-string orchestra and Respighi's "Feste Romane." The two last-mentioned items were then heard for the first time in Boston.

Known to Bostonians through his music and through former visits, Mr. Goossens is always a welcome visitor. He was greeted warmly by audience and orchestra. An authoritative conductor, he has developed since his last sojourn in Boston a more vehement technique with his stick, which, however, did not interfere with enjoyment of the music he directs.

The constitution of his program puzzled us somewhat. Here was a man, conducting a single program in the season with one of the finest orchestras in the world, and he chose to open his list with an overture which is interesting chiefly for its forecasting of the great music-dramas, conspicuously "Tristan"; and to set down in the place of honor the "Spring" Symphony, which is one of Dr. Koussevitzky's favorite repertory pieces. His readings were meticulous, but they did not throw upon this music the dazzling light of revelation.

It is true that Mr. Goossens is not the only conductor to hesitate about venturing outside the safe symphonic enclosure of Beethoven, Brahms and Schumann. But here was an opportunity. The Boston Orchestra has never played, for example, Vaughan Williams's "Pastoral" Symphony nor has it been heard for some years in the "London" Symphony. There is music of Bax and of Delius which would have been welcome, all without going outside the conductor's homeland; and symphonic music has been written in France, Russia, even Finland. Why Schumann?

For novelties, first, Mr. Goossens's Concertino, remade from a string octet and first performed in its present form at a concert of the League of Composers in New York last December. It is a well-formed, rhythmically lively piece, based as to its first and last movements on a not particularly salient figure. The slow movement, with a theme in folk song style, is the most appealing of the three. In it some charming effects are achieved with the divided strings.

Finally, what is said to be the concluding volume of Respighi's sesquipedalian Roman directory. This reporter heard the first performance of this work under Toscanini in New York a year ago, and so perhaps was too well prepared for it. With its cries of wild beasts, resounding church bells, barrel organs, guitar, and battery requiring 10 artillerymen, it caused on the present occasion some excited applause and a few shouts; but its essential meretriciousness cannot be concealed.

L. A. S.

Fourteenth Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, JANUARY 31, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, FEBRUARY 1, at 8.15 o'clock

Mozart Eine Kleine Nachtmusik (K. No. 525)

- I. Allegro.
- II. Romanza: Andante.
- III. Menuetto: Allegretto.
- IV. Rondo: Allegro.

Prokofieff Scythian Suite, Op. 20

- I. The adoration of Veles and Ala.
- II. The Enemy God and the Dance of the Black Spirits.
- III. Night.
- IV. The Glorious Departure of Lolly and the Procession of the Sun.

Prokofieff Second Piano Concerto, in G minor Op. 16

- I. Andantino; Allegretto.
- II. Scherzo.
- III. Intermezzo.
- IV. Finale.

(First time in Boston)

Albeniz "Iberia" (Arranged for Orchestra by F. Arbos)

- a. La Fête-Dieu à Séville.
- b. Triana.

SOLOIST

SERGE PROKOFIEFF

STEINWAY PIANO USED

There will be an intermission after Prokofieff's Scythian Suite

A lecture on this programme will be given on Thursday, January 30, at 5.15 o'clock in the Lecture Hall, Boston Public Library.

The works to be played at these concerts may be seen in the Allen A. Brown Music Collection of the Boston Public Library one week before the concert

COMPOSED BY AVO

joke that "he plays like a composer."
On the contrary, he plays like a pianist.

The Eaglet of Russian Music Grows Into a Big Eagle

it not think only in- es for oy his

ed yes- nposer, ore in- rs ago. ion de- a prop- o that writers ace as- a fash- of the is pro- the or- points

Proko- Saint- le, with ks, but g scale piration size of renade, of the works n" and estored values regret t in so rmance graceful s. Dr rather ounded ig tune l Snuff

m Man- ee Cor- for the Arbos This to the manded to. De est and delight- aneous, before. ir next and 15 ed per- ebussy. s music Martyr- fill the Society assist. n opera P. R.

COMPOSER PLAYS PIANO CONCERTO

Prokofieff Is Soloist at
Symphony Concert

Koussevitzky Conducts "Scythian
Suite, Mozart and De Falla

Globe Feb. 1, 1926

Serge Prokofieff, the noted Russian modernist composer, appeared as soloist in his own G minor concerto for piano at yesterday's Symphony concert. Dr Koussevitzky, returning after two weeks' absence, was warmly applauded. He conducted Mozart's "Kleine Nachtmusik," Prokofieff's "Scythian Suite," and three dances from de Falla's "Three-Cornered Hat" with his usual fervor.

Prokofieff played his third piano concerto at these concerts Jan 29, 1926. Dr Koussevitzky, a firm believer in Prokofieff's genius, has conducted a number of his works here in the past five seasons, notably the little "Classical Symphony," the "Sept, ils sont Sept," for tenor, chorus, and orchestra, and the "Scythian Suite," each of which has been much talked of.

The second piano concerto, played yesterday, is a rewritten version of an early work, using the same themes, but treating them in a more modernistic style. The themes date from 1913, the revision from 1923. This concerto has not previously been heard in the United States. It gives the soloist ample opportunity to display technique, but is not as interesting musically as Prokofieff's violin concerto.

The orchestral accompaniment, like the solo part, is intricate in texture, full of the acrid harmonies and strident rhythms characteristic of Prokofieff, yet one felt that the music had been first conceived in a far simpler and more conventional idiom and form. Its elaboration seemed a tour de force.

Prokofieff, like other modernist composers, thinks of the piano as primarily an instrument of percussion. This concerto makes no attempts at lyricism. There are no slow, sweet melodies, no grand, sonorous climaxes. Nothing, in short, at all after the style of Liszt or Rubinstein.

The piece makes great demands on the skill of the soloist. Nobody can crack at Prokofieff's expense the old joke that "he plays like a composer." On the contrary, he plays like a pianist of very unusual ability. Were it not for his other works, one would think from this concerto that he was only interested in writing show pieces for piano to astonish audiences by his muscular energy and agility.

The "Scythian Suite," repeated yesterday in honor of the composer, sounded less startling and more intelligible than it did five years ago. One noted in the instrumentation details that have become common property in the past 15 years, so that such assimilative and eclectic writers as Respighi now use these once astonishing procedures in routine fashion. One discovered how much of the dissonance in Prokofieff's score is produced by carrying the use of the orthodox harmonic device of organ points to a perfectly logical extreme.

One's general impression of Prokofieff's music is that he is the Saint-Saens of our day, extremely able, with genuine originality in small works, but incapable of working on a big scale without borrowing from the inspiration of greater men.

Dr Koussevitzky reduced the size of the orchestra for Mozart's serenade, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," one of the most ingratiating of the lesser works of the composer of "Don Juan" and the G minor Symphony. This restored the original balance of tonal values in the orchestra, but made one regret the necessity of playing Mozart in so large a hall.

The chief defect of the performance was a failure to follow the graceful curves of Mozart's melodies. Dr Koussevitzky made them all rather stiff and angular, so that they sounded a bit too much like the tinkling tune Liadov entitled "The Musical Snuff Box."

The three familiar dances from Manuel de Falla's ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat," were substituted for the announced arrangements by Arbos from Albeniz' piano music. This change was probably owing to the amount of rehearsal time demanded by Prokofieff's exacting concerto. De Falla's music, played with zest and rhythmic intensity, was again delightful. It sounded more spontaneous, simpler, and less studied, than before.

The orchestra goes on tour next week. The concerts of Feb 14 and 15 will bring the long anticipated performance of choral works by Debussy. His "Blessed Damsel," and his music from d'Annunzio's play "The Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian" will fill the program. The Radcliffe Choral Society and the Cecilia Society will assist. Mme Ritter-Ciampi, a Parisian opera singer, will be the soloist. P. R.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, gave its 14th concert yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Mozart, Eine kleine Nachtmusik. Prokofieff, Scythian Suite. Prokofieff, Piano Concerto No. 2, G minor (Mr. Prokofieff, pianist. First performance in the United States). De Falla, Three Dances from the "Three Cornered Hat."

No doubt some in the audience yesterday were disconcerted by the splendid savagery of the "Scythian Suite." What would they have had? The Scythians were not a genteel folk, nor did they discuss philosophy in sacred groves. The men had bloody hands; they drank the blood of the first men they killed in battle; they cut off heads; they scalped and made themselves cloaks of scalps; sometimes they flayed the entire body of an enemy; they valued drinking cups made from skulls; they were cunning in the art of impalement. They strangled native men, to accompany a dead king, stuffed their bodies and mounted them on beautiful horses in a circle to guard the tomb.

If a composer chooses to take a Scythian legend for his subject—it would be interesting to know where Mr. Prokofieff found this legend—would the disgruntled have had him write suave music, mellifluous melodies, interwoven with academic precision, with familiar progressions and cadences, discreetly orchestrated, possibly with the introduction of a mandolin and a celesta for pretty tinkling and gum-drop effects, all in orthodox form?

How some amiable souls are frightened by music that departs in any way from a long-established order! How they delight in condemning individuality, originality; in finding the unfamiliar, or the unexpected disagreeable! "Let us dream again," they say at a concert; "waking would be pain." Mr. Prokofieff, selecting a barbaric legend, writing in superbly barbaric vein, awakens the sleepers and all those who demand sweet music as an aid to digestion, with occasional loud pages to permit conversation with those seated near them.

Is it possible that there were any in the audience yesterday who failed to appreciate the wild imagination of the composer, the originality of his thought and the musical expression of his thought; who were not thrilled and excited by the long and magnificent crescendo and climax depicting the rising of the sun; or by the demoniacal fury of the Evil-God and the pagan monsters dancing their delirious dance?

Mr. Prokofieff's second concerto written and performed in 1913 was remade from sketches in 1923. The score left in his apartment when he first came to this country was lost when the Soviet Government took possession of his rooms. The concerto, as played by him yesterday, is an engrossing work, unusual in its construction, unusual in the musical ideas and the handling of them. There is the incredible cadenza in the first movement; the Scherzo with its perpetual movement, music for frenzied whirling dervishes. The one obviously melodic line is in the finale, a haunting theme suggestive of melancholy folk song, which is treated in a masterly manner. In this finale there is abundant evidence of technical skill, especially when two themes are united, but by no means in the perfunctory school-prize-composition manner for class-room admiration.

The piano is used chiefly as a percussion instrument; and there is great dependence, as in so many contemporaneous compositions for piano and orchestra, on percussion effects and rhythm. Farewell to the long cantilena, to the worship of sensuous sounds. Is this to be deplored? Music is for the most part an expression of the life and thought of its period. Long before the war Thomas Hardy wrote: "Gay prospects wed happily with gay times, but also, if times be not gay! . . . Haggard Egdon appealed to a subtler and scarier instinct, to a more recently learned emotion, than that which responds to the sort of beauty called charming. Indeed, it is a question if the exclusive reign of this orthodox beauty is not approaching its last quarter. The new vale of Tempe may be a gaunt waste in Thule."

Mr. Prokofieff played in the already well-known Prokofieff manner, brilliantly; yet as if he were playing for his own enjoyment, with little or no regard for what the audience might think; sure of himself but never in the flaming yet restless manner of a virtuoso speeding his way in the full expectation of thunderous applause and opera glasses glued to the eyes of palpitating dames. He played as a man and a musician considering his technical dexterity as taken for granted; busied in the revelation through sound of that which stirred him to composition. Not only was he loudly applauded by the audience; at the end the orchestra, standing, joined the conductor in doing him homage.

What is it that makes the music of Mozart a lasting joy? The perfect expression of pure beauty. Here is this little serenade, which simple as it seems demands the utmost sympathy and the keenest sense of loveliness for conveying its enchantment to men and women of the present generation. The performance yesterday was beyond all praise. And if Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra shone gloriously in the playing of Mozart's music, their interpretation of the far different speech of Prokofieff and De Falla was equally resplendent.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The orchestra will be out of town next week. The program of Feb. 14 and 15 will comprise Debussy's "Blessed Damsel" and "The Martyrdom of Saint-Sebastian." The former has been performed at these concerts and at other concerts in Boston. "Saint-Sebastian" was performed in full at a concert by the Boston opera company, Andre Caplet, conductor, and orchestral excerpts from it have been played at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. At the concerts of the 14th and 15th Mme. Ritter-Ciampi, the Radcliffe Choral Society, and the Cecilia Chorus will assist.

CONDUCTOR RETURNS TO SYMPHONY

Prokofieff Plays Own Piano Concerto With

Virtuosity

Post — Feb. 1, 1930

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The annual interregnum at Symphony Hall is over. Dr. Koussevitzky has returned as conductor to the regular series of concerts. Yesterday's audience welcomed him with a fervor that allowed of but one interpretation, and the orchestra played as it has not played on a Friday afternoon since Dr. Koussevitzky began his holiday.

PROKOFIEFF AT PIANO

A silence the world over respond to personalities, and there were two yesterday in Symphony Hall, the returning conductor and the composer-soloist, Serge Prokofieff. The latter played his Second Piano Concerto, hitherto unheard in the United States, and, together with orchestra and conductor, acknowledged the long-protracted applause bestowed upon his Scythian Suite.

This, it may be remarked in passing, was not Mr. Prokofieff's initial appearance at these concerts. Four years ago he played at a pair of them his Third Concerto and since 1922 his name had appeared no less than 14 times on the symphony programmes, a substantial total for a modernist composer.

Similar to Suite

The Concerto of yesterday, played by Mr. Prokofieff with unassuming virtuosity, by no means compares in interest with its immediate successor. This earlier music, composed in 1913, when Mr. Prokofieff was but 23, is so similar in general character to the Scythian Suite, a product of the ensuing year, that it suffered by following the latter piece on yesterday's programme. There was a disturbing suggestion that the savage rites of the Scythian barbarians were over-long continued. To speak technically, there was too much of the principal musical ingredients of the young Prokofieff's style: His insistent quadruple rhythms; his persistent diatonic dissonance; his love of shrill, highly percussive orchestration.

Not before had the Scythian Suite been so brilliantly played here. And had the Concerto not come after it, there would have been no need for complaining. This Suite is a remarkable achievement, especially for so young a man, and it owes little to any other composer, even to Stravinsky.

All Too Brilliant

All in all, yesterday's was a brilliant, even a too brilliant concert, with the dances from De Falla's "The Three-Cornered Hat," more sharp rhythms and highly spiced if somewhat more sensuous orchestration, succeeding to Prokofieff's pieces.

Only Mozart's unpretending "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" which, in a performance of rare grace and deftness by a portion of the string choir, began the concert, offered a note of genuine contrast.

CHORAL SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its annual southern tour in the coming week, appearing in Richmond, Baltimore, Washington, New York and Brooklyn. The next regular pair of concerts in Symphony Hall will take place on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Feb. 14 and 15.

Two choruses will then join with the orchestra in Debussy's "Blessed Damsel" and "The Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian." In the "Blessed Damsel," the Radcliffe Choral Society will be heard, and in the Saint Sebastian, the Cecilia Society, which has been trained by Arthur Fiedler. Mme. Ritter-Ciampi, operatic soprano, will be the soloist.

Dr. Koussevitzky Also Returns, The "Scythian Suite" and A Masterly Concerto

SIDE by side, yesterday, Dr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Prokofiev shared the Symphony Concert. The conductor returned from his winter holiday; for three weeks his faithful audience had not looked upon him. Renewing annual custom, it clapped him, as he walked to his place, with general, hearty warmth. By exception the orchestra joined in this greeting, or so much of it as was on the stage—the string choir assembled for Mozart's "Eine kleine Nachtmusik." It rose, applauded, received the conductor's collective handclasp laid between Mr. Burgin's fingers. . . . The first turn of the guest came at the end of his "Scythian Suite." Dr. Koussevitzky had not only loosed its force, vividness and sweeps of savage power. He had also given just quality to its finer-strung, less overt pages. Applause mounted, quickly summoning Mr. Prokofiev from balcony to stage.

The "Scythian Suite" dates from 1914 and from the composer's twenty-third year. It is "early Prokofiev," as the chroniclers now reckon his work. The more minute even assign it to his "Stravinskian period." It was played in 1924 at the Symphony Concerts and carried all before it. Repeated in 1928, it seemed

...ollath 63 1/4, impressive.
extremely ed the "Scythian
ng. Primo quasi-barbaric music.
which shook frenzied invocation, of one on a "egro ferocce," of the w, a left to malignant, distorted sent him; and his monsters;
egs. Three the finale into the ed for three ties of an orchestral ore a final iting ears was the d beat of Prokofiev's sconant, quasi-primipiercing, again pun-

“My secretary. Yet as it might which, Koussevitzky was my glove, the invocation, the shoulder and the sunrise, went on his head in effect of that stunned megal power. The arms ex-ard Prokofiev from id”; but was more

But Flowlin.
two rounds these sensations the invocation of programatically daughter. There-music of simple rhythms, thin
Yet from it mysterious rites when dreading rough the veils

Mr. Prokofiev does not write piano-concertos as a composer who fears that he will fail to set hand to them, he would neglect his duty to his God, to man and to the art of music. By clear evidence of the Second heard yesterday, of the Third, heard four years ago, he writes them out of musical fecundity and inclination, not to say prepossession, for the form and the instrument. In these latter days, with many a composer, a piano-concerto seems a determined task at last accomplished. With Mr. Prokofiev, it is spontaneous self-expression. Moreover, he can design and fill a piano-concerto in the grand style—not the style of Liszt and the romantics; but rather of the lesser, half-forgotten virtuoso-composers at the middle of the last century who derived their piano-style from Beethoven and mixed it with Hummel. For musical paradox over the supper table, it is quite possible to argue that—virtuoso-display aside—this Second Concerto of Prokofiev is more akin to the symphonic concertos of Brahms than to either by Liszt.

companionment, but intrinsic and distinctive part of a symphonic design. Neither it, the conductor nor the pianist may escape the incessant exactions. Mr. Prokofiev's seeming simplicities are sometimes more difficult than another composer's elaboration. (No wonder Dr. Koussevitzky judged the preparation of this Concerto, with a revival of the "Scythian Suite," quite enough for four days' rehearsal).

The familiar, anticipated Prokofiev sounds from the insistent duple rhythms, the short-breathed motifs, the simplified melody, the contrasts of diatonic and chromatic measures, with a recurring preference for the diatonic; the thin, monod and Washington and Baltimore shall also know the vallance and e of the orchestra with rhythm and And New York, hearing both serious and ballet-music, shall again be aware.

H. T. P.

H. T. P.

The Afternoon Of Prokofiev, Double Guest

Dr. Koussevitzky Also Returns
The "Scythian Suite" and
A Masterly Concerto

Trans. — Feb. 1, 19

SIDE by side, yesterday, Dr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Prokofiev shared the Symphony Concert. The conductor returned from his winter holiday; for three weeks his faithful audience had not looked upon him. Re-igning annual custom, it clapped him, and walked to his place, with general warmth. By exception the orchestra joined in this greeting, or so much of it as was the stage—the string choir assembled Mozart's "Eine kleine Nachtmusik." rose, applauded, received the conductor's collective handclasp laid between Burgin's fingers. . . . The first of the guest came at the end of "Scythian Suite." Dr. Koussevitzky not only loosed its force, vividness, sweeps of savage power. He had given just quality to its finer-strung, overt pages. Applause mounted, quick, summoning Mr. Prokofiev from balcony stage.

At the end of his second Concerto with the composer as pianist, the hour prolonged its plaudits. His upstanding figure had caught its eye; the like mannerism of little jerky bows pleased its fancy. Whether it liked or disliked the surface and the substance of the piece, its ears told it that it had listened to a remarkable music in as remarkable performance. Mr. Prokofiev claimed his lion's share, to conductor and orchestra, turning applause indeed intended for three. Upon this triple or quadruple exercise in good feeling silence finally descended and the concert came to a close with the three familiar dances from Falla's ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat."

The "Scythian Suite" dates from 1912 and from the composer's twenty-third year. It is "early Prokofiev," as chroniclers now reckon his work. More minute even assign it to his "Stravinskian period." It was played in 1912 at the Symphony Concerts and carried all before it. Repeated in 1928, it seemed less impressive. Recently, in the maturity of the later thirties, Mr. Prokofiev has written a Third Symphony, produced last spring by the Paris Symphony Orchestra; a Divertimento in four divisions, heard last December at the Lamoureux Concerts. Some would have had one or both at Symphony Hall, though practical difficulties stood in the way; were prepared to demur to the repetition of the "Scythian Suite." The event silenced them. For in Dr. Koussevitzky's performance of Friday, maybe with the composer sitting by at rehearsals, the music gained new quality, different from that remembered and more impressive.

Most of us recalled the "Scythian Suite" as a graphic, quasi-barbaric music. We remembered the frenzied invocation, at the beginning, "Allegro feroce," of the tribal sun-god; the malignant, distorted dance of the evil-god and his monsters; the race and clash of the finale into the sonorities and intensities of an orchestral sunrise. In our waiting ears was the rough, tense, reiterated beat of Prokofiev's rhythms; his harsh, dissonant, quasi-primitive harmony, now piercing, again puny; his hard, sharp, astringent use of the orchestra; his liking for quasi-metallic timbres; his writing of a colorless music, in the romantic sense of the words, that yet generated both pictorial and emotional effect. The performance of yesterday transmuted most of these memories into renewed and immediate sensations; took also another course.

Recollection is untrustworthy when it stretches over six years. Yet as it seemed yesterday, Dr. Koussevitzky was less vehement with the invocation, the dance, the combat and the sunrise, whereby all four gained in effect of stripped, savage, primeval power. The listener may have heard Prokofiev from a "Stravinskian period"; but was more inclined to hear him as one who had taken the same road under the same promptings—reaction from the romanticism and mysticism, the elaborating, refining and impressionizing of the last preceding musical time. For Prokofiev, the road led into the "Scythian Suite" and "They Are Seven"; for Stravinsky into "Le Sacre" and, ultimately, "Noces." Such work of the two composers marches side by side, rather than with Prokofiev in imitation of Stravinsky and competition with him.

The complement to these sensations was the new effect of other pages in the "Scythian Suite." To the invocation of the sun-god succeeds programatically the sacrifice to Ala, his daughter. There in Prokofiev sounds a music of simple melodic outline, softened rhythms, thin harmonies, sparse color. Yet from it proceeds an illusion of mysterious rites in a primitive world, when dreading tribes would pierce through the veils upon the kindlier gods, and propitiate them. The dance of the monsters ended, the musical scene shifts to Ala in the moon-crossed darkness and the evil-god stealing upon her to do her "great harm." Again Prokofiev writes his simplified, thin-coated, dissonant, astringent music, but with an illusion at odds with the means. For this tonal scene of Ala and the evil-god is woven into ominous atmosphere; while through it goes bare, melancholy, bitter suggestion, sensuous, but far removed from romantic cast. Both are of no "Stravinskian period," but of Prokofiev's own imagination. In a word, less a repetition of the "Scythian Suite" than fresh revelation of the music and the composer.

Mr. Prokofiev does not write piano-concertos as a composer who fears that he did he fail to set hand to them, he would neglect his duty to his God, to man and to the art of music. By clear evidence, they will not have the piano and of the Second heard yesterday, of the Third, heard four years ago, he writes them out of musical fecundity and inclination, not to say prepossession, for the form and the instrument. In these latter days, with many a composer, a piano-concerto seems a determined task at last accomplished. With Mr. Prokofiev, it is spontaneous self-expression. Moreover, he can design and fill a piano-concerto in the grand style—not the style of Liszt and the romantics; but rather of the lesser, half-forgotten virtuoso-composers at the middle of the last century who derived their piano-style from Beethoven and mixed it with Hummel. For musical paradox over the supper table, it is quite possible to argue that—virtuoso-display aside—this Second Concerto of Prokofiev is more akin to the symphonic concertos of Brahms than to either by Liszt.

Be that as it may (as they wave aside troublesome matters in the musical plays), Mr. Prokofiev stretches a wide canvas in this Concerto in G minor and fills it full. There are four movements; none lengthy, but each abounding in appropriate matter. The piano and the pianist are displayed in a curious, intricate, teeming scherzo; again in the variations of the finale. The orchestra is not merely accompaniment, but intrinsic and distinctive part of a symphonic design. Neither it, the conductor nor the pianist may escape the incessant exactions. Mr. Prokofiev's seeming simplicities are sometimes more difficult than another composer's elaboration. (No wonder Dr. Koussevitzky judged the preparation of this Concerto, with a revival of the "Scythian Suite," quite enough for four days' rehearsal).

The familiar, anticipated Prokofiev sounds from the insistent duple rhythms, the short-breathed motifs, the simplified melody, the contrasts of diatonic and chromatic measures, with a recurring preference for the diatonic; the thin, harmonies, the sparing timbres; the fluency or the driving force of the sequence; even the wit of the finalissimo flourished out at the end, gamin taking leave around the and (probably) making the long, with both hands. Throughout also, "classical" Prokofiev. Under the and glitter of the scherzo, toccata—in the finale, canons. An Inter-moment—of formal pattern impeccable, first movement, first subject, second subject, passage-work, cadenza—all in the classic model descending from the oven rather than in the romantic incarnation in Liszt; yet with to spare for range and caprice, throughout a complex technique stripped than luxuriant.

course, there are those who care not for such a piano-concerto, or for neglect of piano-playing that makes it to the art of music. They will not have the piano and of percussion, of hammers and wires all compact with relatively vitalized by rhythm; that returns and again to the capricious play of s; that contents itself with a melody some label crude and others naive. prefer sentiment to sonorities; emotional austerities. They would have a lishing luxuriance caress them; not pulsive force to whip them forward. thrill to the technique that dazzles; sit stony before another that ers complexities. A colorless piano-tone, sublimating hammers and is vexation to their ears. They for the old richness and glamour; ave none of the new bareness and ness. There is no altering our tic prepossessions; to everyone his though they be changeless. But is a new-old way in which to compose piano-concertos and in this Second Concerto of Prokofiev it is exemplified, fulfilled. There is also a new-old way, high to play and disclose them, of yesterday, Mr. Prokofiev and Dr. Koussevitzky were imparting and pre-g masters. So runs the world away.

The afternoon began with the little serenade of Mozart, on next week's tour to pose the virtuoso graces of the string; its bright, transparent, fine-textured tone; its happy felicities, supplementing the conductor's, with a music which adept artifice ripples suave the one as spontaneous as the other. The afternoon ended with the es from "The Three-Cornered Hat." Mond and Washington and Baltimore shall also know the valiance and e of the orchestra with rhythm and And New York, hearing both serene and ballet-music, shall again be aware.

H. T. P.

The Afternoon Of Prokofiev. Double Gue

Dr. Koussevitzky Also Return
The "Scythian Suite" and
A Masterly Concerto
Trans. — Feb. 1, 19

SIDE by side, yesterday, Dr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Prokofiev shared the Symphony Concert. The conductor returned from his winter holiday; for three weeks his faithful audience had not looked upon him. Re-igning annual custom, it clapped him, a walked to his place, with general, he warmth. By exception the orchestra joined in this greeting, or so much of it as was the stage—the string choir assembled Mozart's "Eine kleine Nachtmusik." rose, applauded, received the conductor's collective handclasp laid between Burgin's fingers. . . . The first of the guest came at the end of "Scythian Suite." Dr. Koussevitzky not only loosed its force, vividness sweeps of savage power. He had given just quality to its finer-strung, overt pages. Applause mounted, quick summoning Mr. Prokofiev from balcony stage.

At the end of his second Concerto with the composer as pianist, the hour prolonged its plaudits. His upstanding figure had caught its eye; the like mannerism of little jerky bows pleased its fancy. Whether it liked or disliked the surface and the substance of piece, its ears told it that it had listened to a remarkable music in as remarkable performance. Mr. Prokofiev claimed his share, to conductor and orchestra, turning applause indeed intended for three. Upon this triple or quadruple exercise in good feeling silence finally descended and the concert came to a close with the three familiar dances from Falla's ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat."

The "Scythian Suite" dates from 1912 and from the composer's twenty-third year. It is "early Prokofiev," as chroniclers now reckon his work. More minute even assign it to his "Stravinskian period." It was played in 1912 at the Symphony Concerts and carried all before it. Repeated in 1928, it seemed less impressive. Recently, in the maturity of the later thirties, Mr. Prokofiev has written a Third Symphony, produced last spring by the Paris Symphony Orchestra; a Divertimento in four divisions, heard last December at the Lamoureux Concerts. Some would have had one or both at Symphony Hall, though practical difficulties stood in the way; were prepared to demur to the repetition of the "Scythian Suite." The event silenced them. For in Dr. Koussevitzky's performance of Friday, maybe with the composer sitting by at rehearsals, the music gained new quality, different from that remembered and more impressive.

Most of us recalled the "Scythian Suite" as a graphic, quasi-barbaric music. We remembered the frenzied invocation, at the beginning, "Allegro feroce," of the tribal sun-god; the malignant, distorted dance of the evil-god and his monsters; the race and clash of the finale into the sonorities and intensities of an orchestral sunrise. In our waiting ears was the rough, tense, reiterated beat of Prokofiev's rhythms; his harsh, dissonant, quasi-primitive harmony, now piercing, again pungent; his hard, sharp, astrigent use of the orchestra; his liking for quasi-metallic timbres; his writing of a colorless music, in the romantic sense of the words, that yet generated both pictorial and emotional effect. The performance of yesterday transmuted most of these memories into renewed and immediate sensations; took also another course.

Recollection is untrustworthy when it stretches over six years. Yet as it seemed yesterday, Dr. Koussevitzky was seized vehement with the invocation, the dance, the combat and the sunrise, whereby all four gained in effect of stripped, savage, primeval power. The listener may have heard Prokofiev from a "Stravinskian period"; but was more inclined to hear him as one who had taken the same road under the same promptings—reaction from the romanticism and mysticism, the elaborating, refining and impressionizing of the last preceding musical time. For Prokofiev, the road led into the "Scythian Suite" and "They Are Seven"; for Stravinsky and "Le Sacre" and, ultimately, "Noces." Such work of the two composers marches side by side, rather than with Prokofiev in imitation of Stravinsky and competition with him.

The complement to these sensations was the new effect of other pages in the "Scythian Suite." To the invocation of the sun-god succeeds programatically the sacrifice to Ala, his daughter. There the sacrifice to Ala, his daughter. There in Prokofiev sounds a music of simple melodic outline, softened rhythms, thin harmonies, sparse color. Yet from it proceeds an illusion of mysterious rites in a primitive world, when dreading tribes would pierce through the veils upon the kind them. The dance the musical scene moon-crossed day stealing upon her. Again Prokofiev thin-coated, dissonant but with an ill means. For this the evil-god is a atmosphere; while melancholy, bitter but far removed. Both are of no but of Prokofiev's a word, less a Russian Suite" than music and the color

Mr. Prokofiev concertos as a color did he fail to set neglect his duty to the art of music of the Second Third, heard four them out of music elination, not to the form and the latter days, with piano-concerto at last accomplished it is spontaneous over, he can describe in the grand Liszt and the lesser, half-ers at the middle derived their pi and mixed it with paradox over the possible to argue aside—this Second is more akin to of Brahms than Be that as it troublesome Mr. Prokofiev this Concerto there are four but each about ter. The piano played in a scherzo; again finale. The orchestral accompaniment, five part of a suite, the conductor may escape Mr. Prokofiev sometimes more composer's elder Koussevitzky this Concerto "Scythian Suite" days' rehearsal The familiar sounds from the short-breathed melody, and chromatic ring preference

Be that as it troublesome Mr. Prokofiev this Concerto there are four but each about ter. The piano played in a scherzo; again finale. The orchestral accompaniment, five part of a suite, the conductor may escape Mr. Prokofiev sometimes more composer's elder Koussevitzky this Concerto "Scythian Suite" days' rehearsal The familiar sounds from the short-breathed melody, and chromatic ring preference

Ernest Simon, Fred A. Joslin and

BEA
OF 1, 2 AND kitchenette, very reasonable Boston.

UNIVERSITY recp. hall; room (6)6t:

A—WOMEN tion of and pleasing and 45. allows use travel. Gu bonus. See Room 303.

ALSTON continue 4 rooms with Suite 5. A (6)17t

MARRIED or people with LEAGUE

FOR SALE mental small hall MEL rose 33

BROOKLINE room, 11 ferred; no (6)6t (120

FOR SALE CHANDLER ABLE FOR Milford, Ma

COMMONWEALTH SUFFOLK the heirs-at-

Pay over

Pay profits

Two stock ended

rude harmonies, the sparing timbres; the swift fluency or the driving force of every sequence; even the wit of the final G fortissimo flourished out at the end, like a gamin taking leave around the corner and (probably) making the long nose with both hands. Throughout also, the "classical" Prokofiev. Under the rush and glitter of the scherzo, toccata-form; in the finale, canons. An Intermezzo—the nearest approach to a slow movement—of formal pattern impeccable. In the first movement, first subject, second subject, passage-work, cadenza—all on the classic model descending from Beethoven rather than in the romantic procedure incarnate in Liszt; yet with room to spare for range and caprice. And throughout a complex technique oftener stripped than luxuriant.

Of course, there are those who care not at all for such a piano-concerto, or for the sort of piano-playing that makes it sound. They will not have the piano an instrument of percussion, of hammers and wires all compact with relatively incidental pedals. It must be made to sing, if not to smear. They resent a music vitalized by rhythm; that returns again and again to the capricious play of figures; that contents itself with a melody that some label crude and others naive. They prefer sentiment to sonorities; emotion to austerities. They would have a languishing luxuriance caress them; not a propulsive force to whip them forward. They thrill to the technique that dazzles out bravura; sit stony before another that conquers complexities. A colorless piano-forte-tone, sublimating hammers and wires, is vexation to their ears. They pine for the old richness and glamour; will have none of the new bareness and directness. There is no altering our pianistic prepossessions; to everyone his own, though they be changeless. But there is a new-old way in which to compose piano-concertos and in this Second Concerto of Prokofiev it is exemplified and fulfilled. There is also a new-old way in which to play and disclose them, of which, yesterday, Mr. Prokofiev and Dr. Koussevitzky were imparting and prevailing masters. So runs the world away.

The afternoon began with the little serenade of Mozart, on next week's tour to disclose the virtuoso graces of the string choir; its bright, transparent, fine-textured tone; its happy felicities, supplementing the conductor's, with a music in which adept artifice ripples suave flow, the one as spontaneous as the other. The afternoon ended with the dances from "The Three-Cornered Hat." Richmond and Washington and Baltimore shall also know the valiance and range of the orchestra with rhythm and color. And New York, hearing both serenade and ballet-music, shall again be made aware.

H. T. P.

Monitor Feb 1, 1930.
Boston Symphony Orchestra

Serge Prokofiev was honored at the fourteenth pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra by the placing of his "Scythian" Suite and his Second Piano Concerto, in G minor, on the program. The concerto had its first American performance on the afternoon of Jan. 31 in Symphony Hall, Boston, with the composer as soloist.

Mr. Prokofiev is of course well known to Boston audiences. He played his Third Piano Concerto in the same hall four years ago. His Violin Concerto had its first American performance by Richard Burgin, concertmaster of the Boston orchestra. Besides the "Scythian" Suite, Bostonians had also heard previously the "Classical" Symphony, the choral piece, "Sept, Ils sont Sept," and the suites from the opera, "The Love for Three Oranges," and from the ballets, "Chout" and "Le Pas d'Acier."

The Second Piano Concerto, Mr. Prokofiev says, is "really the fourth." By that he means that although it was composed in 1913, it was remade completely in 1923. This was because the orchestral parts were lost when his Leningrad apartment was confiscated by order of the Soviet Government. Sketches of the piano part were saved, and from these the composer reconstructed the present version, which differs greatly from the original.

The performance of the work was received with far more than ordinary enthusiasm, and the composer was recalled repeatedly, until he brought back Dr. Koussevitzky, who made the orchestra share in the ovation. The response of the audience was due in part no doubt to the virtuosity of Mr. Prokofiev as pianist—he tosses off astonishing technical feats without apparent effort; but it was no less a tribute to his talent as composer. The concerto speaks in an idiom at once Russian and individual. The four movements, built on classic models, utilize contemporary resources. The themes are salient, and their treatment is musicianly.

Rhythmic vigor marks the work throughout. There is liberal opportunity for display of pianistic abilities. Besides two cadenzas, there is a scherzo in the nature of a moto perpetuo, in sixteenth notes by the two hands in the interval of an octave. This was accomplished by the player with nonchalance and brilliance.

The "Scythian" Suite, written in 1914, when the composer was only 23, has a vitality that makes it seem extraordinarily fresh today. It received a scintillant publication at the hands of Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra. Another compelling utterance was that of Three Dances from De Falla's "Three-Cornered Hat," which closed the program.

Yet none of these contemporary items can dull the memory of the exquisite performance of the opening number, Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," by a reduced string orchestra. The only difficulty is that Dr. Koussevitzky, possessed of so sensitive and obedient an instrument, tends at times to show off its paces at a speed somewhat detrimental to Mozart's aristocratic art. L. A. S.

Feb 12, 1930 - Man
"The New York Manner"

REVISITING Manhattan last week, the Symphony Orchestra shifted its evening concert from the usual Thursday to an exceptional Friday. Custom permitted only meager reviews in the newspapers of a Saturday. At the matinee Dr. Koussevitzky filled his program with pieces recently played in New York by the orchestra. Hence paragraphs instead of articles. Mr. Prokofiev was the pianist on both occasions playing, as in Boston, his Second Concerto. On Friday his "Scythian Suite" was also on the list. The reviews traverse these numbers in familiar comment whenever the music of Mr. Prokofiev is in debate. Two paragraphs, however, deserve quotation. The first, from The Sun, is amusing:

The program was various, indefinite and nevertheless prevailingly Muscovitish expatriate. There were two compositions by Serge Prokofiev, whose abode is Paris, and there also Mr. Koussevitzky lingers in the lap of approbation when he is not enrapturing Boston or amazing New York. Before the intermission Mr. Prokofiev's "Scythian Suite" was performed; after it the composer appeared in person as the solo-executant in his own Second Concerto for piano and orchestra. Mr. Prokofiev's Scythians have descended upon our coasts from time to time since 1924 and have persuaded us that barbarians knew how to make noises in several keys at once and to disturb the atmosphere violently to no special end. It does not impress itself upon this chronicler as imperative that he should write another essay on the "Scythian Suite." Let it speak for itself. It does so very loudly and in several keys at once. The piano concerto being new to these avenues of culture calls for pause and pondering.

The second paragraph, from The Times notes the atmosphere of the evening concert:

Mr. Prokofiev, who is scant of hair, but tall, blonde, with an appearance of boyishness, figured on the program as composer and also as pianist in the performance of his Second Concerto, heard for the first time in this city. Mr. Koussevitzky gave an amazingly brilliant performance of Mr. Prokofiev's "Scythian Suite." Suite and Concerto evoked storms of applause. The composer, after both performances, was repeatedly called out, bowing from the platform. Mr. Koussevitzky, who greatly admires Mr. Prokofiev's talents, signaled the orchestra to rise in his honor, while the conductor himself applauded. All this bordered on unconditional triumph. Those who had reservations were silent and outnumbered.

Fifteenth Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, FEBRUARY 14, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, FEBRUARY 15, at 8.15 o'clock

Debussy "La Dame à la Lueur"
(Lyric Poem after Dante Gabriel Rossetti)

RADCLIFFE CHORAL SOCIETY (G. WALLACE WOODWORTH, Conductor)

Soprano Solo: Mme. RITTER-CIAMPI

Contralto Solo: JEAN MACDONALD

Debussy "Le Martyre de Saint Sebastien"
(Mystery Play of Gabrielle d'Annunzio)

- I. The Court of Lilies.
- II. The Magic Chamber.
- III. The Council of the False Gods.
- IV. The Broken Laurel.
- V. Paradise.

(First time as a whole at these concerts)

THE CECILIA SOCIETY (ARTHUR FIEDLER, Conductor)

Soprano Solo: Mme. RITTER-CIAMPI

There will be an intermission after the "La Dame à la Lueur"

The works to be played at these concerts may be seen in the Allen A. Brown Music Collection of the Boston Public Library one week before the concert

Monitor Feb. 1, 1930.
Boston Symphony Orchestra

Serge Prokofiev was honored at the fourteenth pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra by the placing of his "Scythian" Suite and his Second Piano Concerto, in G minor, on the program. The concerto had its first American performance on the afternoon of Jan. 31 in Symphony Hall, Boston, with the composer as soloist.

Mr. Prokofiev is of course well known to Boston audiences. He played his Third Piano Concerto in the same hall four years ago. His Violin Concerto had its first American performance by Richard Burgin, concertmaster of the Boston orchestra. Besides the "Scythian" Suite, Bostonians had also heard previously the "Classical" Symphony, the choral piece, "Sept, Ils sont Sept," and the suites from the opera, "The Love for Three Oranges," and from the ballets, "Chout" and "Le Pas d'Acier."

The Second Piano Concerto, Mr. Prokofiev says, is "really the fourth." By that he means that although it was composed in 1913, it was remade completely in 1923. This was because the orchestral parts were lost when his Leningrad apartment was confiscated by order of the Soviet Government. Sketches of the piano part were saved, and from these the composer reconstructed the present version, which differs greatly from the original.

The performance of the work was received with far more than ordinary enthusiasm, and the composer was recalled repeatedly, until he brought back Dr. Koussevitzky, who made the orchestra share in the ovation. The response of the audience was due in part no doubt to the virtuosity of Mr. Prokofiev as pianist—he tosses off astonishing technical feats without apparent effort; but it was no less a tribute to his talent as composer. The concerto speaks in an idiom at once Russian and individual. The four movements, built on classic models, utilize contemporary resources. The themes are salient, and their treatment is musicianly.

Rhythmic vigor marks the work throughout. There is liberal opportunity for display of pianistic abilities. Besides two cadenzas, there is a scherzo in the nature of a moto perpetuo, in sixteenth notes by the two hands in the interval of an octave. This was accomplished by the player with nonchalance and brilliance.

The "Scythian" Suite, written in 1914, when the composer was only 23, has a vitality that makes it seem extraordinarily fresh today. It received a scintillant publication at the hands of Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra. Another compelling utterance was that of Three Dances from De Falla's "Three-Cornered Hat," which closed the program.

Yet none of these contemporary items can dull the memory of the exquisite performance of the opening number, Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," by a reduced string orchestra. The only difficulty is that Dr. Koussevitzky, possessed of so sensitive and obedient an instrument, tends at times to show off its paces at a speed somewhat detrimental to Mozart's aristocratic art. L. A. S.

Feb 12, 1930 Man
"The New York Manner"

REVISITING Manhattan last week, the Symphony Orchestra shifted its evening concert from the usual Thursday to an exceptional Friday. Custom permitted only meager reviews in the newspapers of a Saturday. At the matinee Dr. Koussevitzky filled his program with pieces recently played in New York by the orchestra. Hence paragraphs instead of articles. Mr. Prokofiev was the pianist on both occasions playing, as in Boston, his Second Concerto. On Friday his "Scythian Suite" was also on the list. The reviews traverse these numbers in familiar comment whenever the music of Mr. Prokofiev is in debate. Two paragraphs, however, deserve quotation. The first, from The Sun, is amusing:

The program was various, indefinite and nevertheless prevailingly Muscovitish expatriate. There were two compositions by Serge Prokofiev, whose abode is Paris, and there also Mr. Koussevitzky lingers in the land of approbation when he is not enrapturing Boston or amazing New York. Before the intermission Mr. Prokofiev's "Scythian Suite" was performed; after it the composer appeared in person as the solo-executant in his own Second Concerto for piano and orchestra. Mr. Prokofiev's Scythians have descended upon our coasts from time to time since 1924 and have persuaded us that barbarians knew how to make noises in several keys at once and to disturb the atmosphere violently to no special end. It does not impress itself upon this chronicler as imperative that he should write another essay on the "Scythian Suite." Let it speak for itself. It does so very loudly and in several keys at once. The piano concerto being new to these avenues of culture calls for pause and pondering.

The second paragraph, from The Times notes the atmosphere of the evening concert:

Mr. Prokofiev, who is scant of hair, but tall, blonde, with an appearance of boyishness, figured on the program as composer and also as pianist in the performance of his Second Concerto, heard for the first time in this city. Mr. Koussevitzky gave an amazingly brilliant performance of Mr. Prokofiev's "Scythian Suite." Suite and Concerto evoked storms of applause. The composer, after both performances, was repeatedly called out, bowing from the platform. Mr. Koussevitzky, who greatly admires Mr. Prokofiev's talents, signaled the orchestra to rise in his honor, while the conductor himself applauded. All this bordered on unconditional triumph. Those who had reservations were silent and outnumbered.

Fifteenth Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, FEBRUARY 14, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, FEBRUARY 15, at 8.15 o'clock

Debussy "La Damoselle Élué"
(Lyric Poem after Dante Gabriel Rossetti)

RADCLIFFE CHORAL SOCIETY (G. WALLACE WOODWORTH, Conductor)

Soprano Solo: Mme. RITTER-CIAMPI

Contralto Solo: JEAN MACDONALD

Debussy "Le Martyre de Saint Sebastien"
(Mystery Play of Gabrielle d'Annunzio)

- I. The Court of Lilies.
- II. The Magic Chamber.
- III. The Council of the False Gods.
- IV. The Broken Laurel.
- V. Paradise.

(First time as a whole at these concerts)

THE CECILIA SOCIETY (ARTHUR FIEDLER, Conductor)

Soprano Solo: Mme. RITTER-CIAMPI

There will be an intermission after the "La Damoselle Élué"

The works to be played at these concerts may be seen in the Allen A. Brown Music Collection of the Boston Public Library one week before the concert

Gabrielle Ritter-Ciampi

Afternoon of Debussy and St. Sebastian

Signs and Miracles, a Visitor,
Radcliffe and a Cecilia
Revitalized

MIRACLE! Miracle!—Thus the d'Annunzian crowd cries at this or that occurrence connected with their saint. A "sign" they repeatedly demand. With such words in mind, one began unconsciously to connect them with what took place in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Then and there, through the greater part of two hours, was played and sung music of the late Claude Achilles Debussy; music, further, in which there could be no opportunity for humor or levity; music on the one hand to deepen and to amplify and to enhance the peculiar type of beauty to be found in a poem of one of the pre-Raphaelite brotherhood of painters and poets, Dante Gabriel Rossetti; music on the other hand to set an atmosphere for the passion, the ecstasy, the mystic translation of a great martyr. Those there were who had whispered that a whole afternoon of music so circumscribed in emotional range would turn to monotony. Boredom would result. Debussy is excellent, one could hear, but an entire afternoon of him, with scant variety of subject, will be too much. And yet, in the actual even, faces remained rapt, attitudes attentive. The number of those who departed early—to suburbia—was not large; and more noiselessly than sometimes, they whisked themselves out of the room.—More. There were five divisions in the music after the intermission. But not a soul offered to clap hands. Too deeply did the spell hold, that spell wrought by music just heard; too eager was this audience for what was to come. No wonder that one who knew that he must make words about the things going on about him, began to find emerging from his sub-consciousness the scenes in which the cry "Miracle" is heard. For, that this amount of music of this narrow emotional range should work with this high degree of effectiveness, bordered indeed on the miraculous.—The doubters had their sign.

157

is a host of new things to relate. Terpiece, Debussy's "Martyrdom of Sebastian," was receiving its first hearing in these parts; a notable Madame Ritter Ciampi, was making American debut; a revitalized society with an honorable past, Cecilia, was being put to the test for the first time under a new regime; a group of singers usually heard in connection with others was being heard "on its own," the Radcliffe Choral Society, singing Debussy's setting of Rossetti's "The Blessed Damsel"; a soloist in a minor part, Miss MacDonald, almost merged in the wealth of matters demanding attention, who might have fared had it been possible for a little of this attention to come her way. The afternoon was divided, then, between a Debussy just out of his student and a Debussy just about to round off his lifetime of as original creative as the world has yet seen. "The Blessed Damsel" was written while he was in Italy as a "prix de Rome"; "The Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian" is considered by some his last really great work. Rossetti, reading with a thrill of Allan Poe's supreme teaming of grief of a love here on earth, depicted (as might have been expected) to voice "the yearning of the one in heaven." Thus the damsel, her heaven, adorned only as Mary Virgin would have her adorned, but chastely but warmly her soul in anticipation of the lover who will bring her to this heaven. But her end must end in the mild sadness of his is when he comes"—and vague—and tears. The very words are a for the music of their sound. The young Debussy, meditating in sunny Italy upon the evils in the world of music (as young people are to do) decided upon an ideal not far removed from that of the pre-Raphaelites. He seized upon Rossetti's "The Blessed Damsel" as his. Its deliciousness was his, became it with a like quality of tone. Yesterday afternoon it lived again as it is often given a work to receive living. It could not have been more for in its chorus. The freshness of the young ladies from Radcliffe, original purity of that tone seemed made for this music. And other things were by no means lacking—clarity of voice, beauty of shading, nuance, perfection of intonation of enunciation; not possibly could Woodworth's youngsters have scored better than they did yesterday. To them Madame Ritter-Ciampi the words of the damsel. Here is the crystalline purity it would be worth going miles to hear. (Indeed, may invert and say that this voice many miles so that we could hear

Gabrielle Ritter-Ciampi

Afternoon of Debussy and St. Sebastian

Signs and Miracles, a Visitor,
Radcliffe and a Cecilia
Revitalized

MIRACLE! Miracle!—Thus the d'Annunzian crowd cries at this or that occurrence connected with their saint. A "sign" they repeatedly demand. With such words in mind, one began unconsciously to connect them with what took place in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Then and there, through the greater part of two hours, was played and sung music of the late Claude Achilles Debussy; music, further, in which there could be no opportunity for humor or levity; music on the one hand to deepen and to amplify and to enhance the peculiar type of beauty to be found in a poem of one of the pre-Raphaelite brotherhood of painters and poets, Dante Gabriel Rossetti; music on the other hand to set an atmosphere for the passion, the ecstasy, the mystic translation of a great martyr. Those there were who had whispered that a whole afternoon of music so circumscribed in emotional range would turn to monotony. Boredom would result. Debussy is excellent, one could hear, but an entire afternoon of him, with scant variety of subject, will be too much. And yet, in the actual even, faces remained rapt, attitudes attentive. The number of those who departed early—to suburbia—was not large; and more noiselessly than sometimes, they whisked themselves out of the room.—More. There were five divisions in the music after the intermission. But not a soul offered to clap hands. Too deeply did the spell hold, that spell wrought by music just heard; too eager was this audience for what was to come. No wonder that one who knew that he must make words about the things going on about him, began to find emerging from his sub-consciousness the scenes in which the cry "Miracle" is heard. For that this amount of music of this narrow emotional range should work with this high degree of effectiveness, bordered indeed on the miraculous.—The doubters had their sign.

There is a host of new things to relate. Debussy's "Martyrdom of St. Sebastian," was receiving its first hearing in these parts; a notable Madame Ritter-Ciampi, was making an American debut; a revitalized society with an honorable past, Cecilia, was being put to the test for the first time under a new regime; a group of singers usually heard in connection with others was being heard "on its own," the Radcliffe Choral Society, singing Debussy's setting of Rossetti's "The Blessed Damsel"; a soloist in a minor part, Miss MacDonald, almost merged in the wealth of matters demanding attention, who might have fared had it been possible for a little of this attention to come her way. Yesterday afternoon was divided, then, between a Debussy just out of his student days and a Debussy just about to round off his lifetime of as original creative work as the world has yet seen. "The Blessed Damsel" was written while he was in Italy as a "prix de Rome"; "The Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian" is connected by some of his last really great work. Rossetti, reading with a thrill of Allan Poe's supreme teaming of grief of a love here on earth, dedicated (as might have been expected) to voice "the yearning of the lone in heaven." Thus the damsel, her heaven, adorned only as Mary, Virgin would have her adorned, without chastely but warmly her soul participation of the lover who will lead her to this heaven. But her must end in the mild sadness of his is when he comes"—and vague—and tears. The very words are a for the music of their sound. The young Debussy, meditating in sunny Italy upon the evils in the world of music (as young people are to do) decided upon an ideal not far removed from that of the pre-Raphaelites. He seized upon Rossetti's "The Blessed Damsel" as his. Its deliciousness was his, became his with a like quality of tone. Yesterday afternoon it lived again as it is often given a work to receive living life. It could not have been more for in its chorus. The freshness of the young ladies from Radcliffe, of the young ladies from Radcliffe, of the young ladies from Radcliffe, made for this music. And other things were by no means lacking—lity of voice, beauty of shading, nuance, perfection of intonation, enunciation; not possibly could Woodworth's youngsters have scored better than they did yesterday. To them Madame Ritter-Ciampi the words of the damsel. Here is the crystalline purity it would be worth going miles to hear. (Indeed, may invert and say that this voice many miles so that we could hear

Gabrielle Ritter-Ciampi

After Deb St

Signs and M Radcliff Re

MIRACLE d'Annu or tha with t they repeatedly words in mind, o to connect them Symphony Hall Then and there, t of two hours, was of the late Claude sic, further, in w opportunity for h on the one hand to and to enhance beauty to be foun the pre-Raphaelite ers and poets, D music on the other phere for the pas mystic translation Those there were w a whole afternoon scribed in emotional monotony. Boredom sy is excellent, on entire afternoon of h of subject, will be in the actual even, attitudes attentive, who departed earl not large; and ms sometimes, they w of the room.—Me divisions in the mus sion. But not a hands. Too deeply that spell wrought too eager was this was to come. No knew that he mus the things going on find emerging from the scenes in which heard. For, that t of this narrow em work with this hig ness, bordered inde —The doubters had

(photo)

Old B. in 41st

sey said
The Mac
rects the receipt Schmelin

New

Dailey
Son i
Is h

St. Lo
Louis B.
United S an action annual n
Mid-Wes though I city.

There is a host of new things to relate. A masterpiece, Debussy's "Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian," was receiving its first complete hearing in these parts; a notable singer, Madame Ritter Ciampi, was making her American debut; a revitalized choral society with an honorable past, the Cecilia, was being put to the test for the first time under a new regime; a group of singers usually heard in conjunction with others was being heard freshly "on its own," the Radcliffe Choral Society, singing Debussy's setting of Rossetti's "The Blessed Damsel"; a soloist in a minor part, Miss MacDonald, almost submerged in the wealth of matters demanding attention, who might have fared better had it been possible for a little more of this attention to come her way.

The afternoon was divided, then, between a Debussy just out of his student years and a Debussy just about to round out a lifetime of as original creative work as the world has yet seen. "The Blessed Damsel" was written while he was in Italy as a "prix de Rome"; "The Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian" is considered by some his last really great work. Rossetti, reading with a thrill Edgar Allan Poe's supreme treatment of the grief of a love here on earth, determined (as might have been expected of him) to voice "the yearning of the loved one in heaven." Thus the damsel in her heaven, adorned only as Mary the Virgin would have her adorned, pours out chastely but warmly her soul in anticipation of the lover who will follow her to this heaven. But her speech must end in the mild sadness of "All this is when he comes"—and vague smiles—and tears. The very words are chosen for the music of their sound. And the young Debussy, meditating in his sunny Italy upon the evils in the world of music (as young people are wont to do) decided upon an ideal not too far removed from that of the pre-Raphaelites. He seized upon Rossetti's poem. Its deliciousness was his, became clothed with a like quality of tone. Yesterday afternoon it lived again as it is not often given a work to receive living tone. It could not have been more fortunate in its chorus. The freshness of tone of the young ladies from Radcliffe, the virginal purity of that tone seemed as if made for this music. And other qualities were by no means lacking—flexibility of voice, beauty of shading and nuance, perfection of intonation and of enunciation; not possibly could Mr. Woodworth's youngsters have scored higher than they did yesterday.

Add to them Madame Ritter-Ciampi with the words of the damsel. Here is a voice the crystalline purity it would be worth going miles to hear. (Indeed, one may invert and say that this voice came many miles so that we could hear it. And with the voice is a simplicity, an artless directness and sincerity that makes it the voice par excellence for the unrhymed Debussy. If one must (or may) mention a lack it would be lack of volume. Of beauty, of oneness with the music, there can be no question. Nor must Miss Jean MacDonald, singing the alto solo parts of the "narrator" in Rossetti's poem, go without words of praise. No mere damning "adequate" need be her lot. Beauty of voice, understanding of the spirit of text and music, she brought to her measures.

The story of "The Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian" of d'Annunzio and of Debussy, of Ida Rubinstein and of Leon Bakst, has been told too fully in these pages to require or justify repetition. In "the Court of Lilies" Sebastian fortifies the faith of two brothers tied to columns to await their fate; by his sincerity converts their father and mother and sisters; performs the miracle of dancing upon a bed of live coals, exclaiming the while that he is dancing upon lilies. In the "Magic Chamber," surrounded by all the soothsayers and sorcerers of Paganism, he hears the story of a woman of the world who carried from the tomb of Christ the shroud in which he lay; witnesses her translation. In the court of the emperor before the whole "Council of False Gods" he makes his own confession of Christ, defies the emperor, and dances his "Dance of the High Drama of the Son of Man." Before "the Wounded Laurel" he is shot through and through with arrows at the command of the emperor, but lives and enters "Paradise" singing there with Apostles and Martyrs, with Virgins and with Angels, with the company of All the Saints.

It is mystery as well as miracle that this music does not bring monotony. Within a single group of closely related moods it holds itself with but few exceptions. Those exceptions are the short and curiously dissonant dance on the bed of coals, the martial prelude to "the Council of False Gods" (played almost entirely by brass), one or two short choruses of praise in this same act, the final choruses of glorification. All the remainder is music that relates to suffering. It may be of the beauty of the fortitude of Christian martyrs, as in the prelude to the first act and much of the rest of that act—yet it relates to suffering. It may be the music of sympathy of choruses of women as Sebastian (Act III) tells of the passion and death and resurrection of Christ; or as, in the same act, he mimes the dance of ecstatic anguish of that passion—it relates similarly. It may be the music of his own passion, as arrows strike him, as that "with" from this earth; or tonight will the act, music of bearing in the relation is. Probably no consistently, in a single mood or, without causing A. instead of a supreme penalty, Cutbill, by himself in his "big city, le." And more, the is that he is one of the heart for a composer could use "Child" thus to sustain er as "the freedom with it than ver lived, that could be attachment a Friday audience appeals from!

that our this masterpiece of diversified youthfulness of a Rome He's off for the Debussy comeback his mature self into ticle about d'Annunzio. The right, I re ce seemed of the the holder of Sebastian. For or the 100 of flesh and blood, in a come Sebastian's heroism attempted heroisms of another n and his is his age. Cecilia Society was hat Cutbill on in itself. Report gn a year her had weeded out from the process was made with the able to fill the yo to be elated with useful singers because the difficult music would his world's report correct. The Last year Radcliffians, his al A. A. U not, have. But for Ray Conger fuller bodied tom's B. A. A. serviceable in any tin, Charles gent also furnished and one or, sonority and is entirely ple rehearsal had Cutbill will in the necessary provided his they were able to his strength what he desired started in sixive effect. Slight representing of the first se races he come and must two thirds negligible.

up '1000' in this machinery ten starter: the proper time 2.17 4-5," de it? Even as a rther doubt with pen on paper make a rearing upon and a 'flu' bug ave it living yam put a crimpster of the bus strong again blended together well tonight. ble. The, after elapsed since saving this voice elaps by win m. of securing intercollegiate, eager attention. Since then text to Debussy as a club is the creator ar Jole Rav A. H. H

Symphony Concert

By PHILIP HALE

The program of the Boston Symphony orchestra's 15th concert yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, comprised Debussy's "Blessed Damsel" and "Martyrdom of St. Sebastian," both sung in French. The Radcliffe Choral Society, trained by G. Wallace Woodworth, was the chorus for the "Blessed Damsel"; the Cecilia Society, Arthur Fiedler, conductor, sang in the "Martyrdom of St. Sebastian." Mme. Ritter-Ciampi was entrusted with the solo soprano music in both works. The music of the Reciter in the "Blessed Damsel" was sung by Jean Macdonald.

Here we had music by the Debussy of 1887 and the Debussy of 1911. As the works were performed yesterday the younger Debussy was preferred by the great majority of the audience. The reason for this is not far to seek. First of all there was the familiar poem, and although it is the fashion in some quarters to underrate Rossetti, "the Blessed Damsel" is still a poem of exquisite beauty. The music is as exquisite as the verses. The charge of preciousness cannot justly be brought against either. Again, there is a continuous emotional, appealing story. The music, furthermore, has apparent simplicity. It is at once appreciated, enjoyed, gratefully remembered. Nor are the choral measures beyond the ability of a well-trained chorus of women. Last of all, the choral measures were sung with delightful purity of tone; with an expressiveness that was not forced nor incompatible with the sentiment of the poem; and Miss Macdonald, as the reciter, delivered her lines with refreshing clearness and significance of diction, not forcing her fine voice, though her position on the stage might have tempted her to do it. It might be pertinently asked why she was not seated by the solo soprano.

The chorus in the "Martyrdom of Saint-Sebastian" had a more difficult task. That it was so well accomplished reflects credit on Mr. Fiedler, who was recently appointed the conductor of the Cecilia. It might be said of the two choruses, with regard to the women's voices, par nobile sororum. Nor did the men of the Cecilia fall behind their sisters in art, when the great technical difficulties in the Mystery are considered. It is needless to say that Dr. Koussevitzky had rehearsed the orchestra with sympathetic care; that the orchestral performance was, after all, the one that was most enjoyed.

Admirers of the work, who speak of it as Debussy's crowning achievement, insist that it should not be performed on the stage of a theatre. What is the result when it is heard in a concert hall? The work then appears to be a series of episodes, loosely strung together. Unless the hearer has thoroughly acquainted himself with d'Annunzio's drama for which the music was composed, he wonders what is happening; what Sebastian is doing or suffering; what is going on in the "Magic Chamber"; why in a Mystery with a Christian Saint, the chorus should now hurrah for Apollo, now mourn the beautiful Adonis. Is the death of the latter symbolical of Sebastian's tortured passing? And who, pray, the hearer might ask, is the Virgin Erigone and what has she to do with it all? Nor is the hearer, unable to read any printed synopsis of the drama on account of the dimly lighted hall, a Philistine, because he rubs his eyes, wonders, and questions.

He is unable, under those conditions, to find dramatic, pictorial, or strikingly impressive music in these choral episodes thrown together as if at random. Here and there are passages of genuine beauty, especially for the female voices; but these passages are to him merely agreeable sounds; he is unable, hearing them, "to dilate with the proper emotion." Having read of the "majestic," also "exultant" final chorus when Sebastian takes the seat of St. John and drinks out of his cup, with the combined chorus of Martyrs, Virgins, Apostles, Angels,—the whole company of the heavenly host praising the Lord Omnipotent, he is grievously disappointed and is not to be blamed if he remembers choruses by Handel. Nor, again, does he find emotion of any sort in the music written for the solo soprano voice.

Mme. Ritter-Ciampi sang in Boston for the first time. Her voice is light and flexible, pleasing in the lower register. In many measures where the tones should have been well sustained, they lacked body and were not firmly held.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program for next week is as follows: Haydn, Symphony D major, "The Horn Call" (B. & H. No. 31, first time at those concerts). Lazar, Concerto Grosso No. 1 for orchestra (first performance). De Falla, "Nights in the Gardens of Spain" (Mr. Sanroma, pianist). Gruenberg, Jazz Suite, op. 28.

it. And with the voice is a sir an artless directness and sincerity makes it the voice par excellence unrhetoric Debussy. If one may mention a lack it would be volume. Of beauty, of oneness of music, there can be no question must Miss Jean MacDonald, sing alto solo parts of the "narrative" Rossetti's poem, go without praise. No mere damning "ad need be her lot. Beauty of voice standing of the spirit of text and she brought to her measures.

The story of "The Martyrdom of Sebastian" of d'Annunzio and of Ida Rubinstein and of Leon Babin has been told too fully in these pages to require or justify repetition. In "The Court of Lilies" Sebastian fortifies faith of two brothers tied to await their fate; by his sincerity he converts their father and mother and performs the miracle of dancing upon a bed of live coals, exclaiming that he is dancing upon lilies. "Magic Chamber," surrounded by the soothsayers and sorcerers of the world, he hears the story of a woman who carried from the Christ the shroud in which he lies and sees her translation. In the "Dance of the False Gods" he makes his own confession of Christ, defies the emperor, dances his "Dance of the High Drums of the Son of Man." Before "the Wreath of Laurel" he is shot through and through with arrows at the command of the emperor, but lives and enters "Paradise" singing there with Apostles and with Virgins and with Angels, in the company of All the Saints.

It is mystery as well as miracle this music does not bring more. Within a single group of closely related moods it holds itself with but few exceptions. Those exceptions are the and curiously dissonant dance on a bed of coals, the martial prelude to the Council of False Gods" (played entirely by brass), one or two short uses of praise in this same act, the choruses of glorification. All the remainder is music that relates to the fortitude of Christian martyrs, as prelude to the first act and much rest of that act—yet it relates to suffering. It may be the music of the pathy of choruses of women as Sebastian (Act III) tells of the passion, death and resurrection of Christ; in the same act, he mimes the ecstatic anguish of that passion—relates similarly. It may be the music of his own passion, as arrows strike he supposedly passes from this earth; or again, through the same act, music of lamenting women, bewailing the fate of their beautiful "Adonis"—the relation is still the same: suffering. Probably no composer has ever thus consistently, in a long work, maintained a single mood or group of related moods, without causing that work to suffer the supreme penalty, unless it be Debussy himself in his "Pelleas and Melisande." And more, the somber, poignant mood is one of the most dangerous that a composer could possibly have chosen thus to sustain. Easier to fall into boredom with it than with almost any mood that could be actively rhythmical. But a Friday audience kept waiting for more!

As fortunate was this masterpiece of Debussy in its performance as was his earlier work. If Madame Ritter-Ciampi seemed ideal for the youthful Debussy toying with the smooth felicities of a Rossetti, she was revelation for the Debussy putting the best of his mature self into the mystery play of d'Annunzio. The lightness of her voice seemed of the essence of the character of Sebastian. For Sebastian is no hero of flesh and blood, of bulk and brawn; Sebastian's heroisms are all of the spirit, heroisms of another world.

The chorus of the Cecilia Society was no less than revelation in itself. Report had it that Mr. Fiedler had weeded out mercilessly where that process was needed, that he had been able to fill the vacancies thus caused, with useful singers. Performance in a difficult music would seem to prove the report correct. The ethereal tones of the Radcliffians, his sopranos did not, could not, have. But for all this lamentation the fuller bodied tone of his ladies was more serviceable in any case. The male contingent also furnished its chorus of laudable sonority and respectable timbre. Ample rehearsal had schooled these singers in the necessary perfections, so that they were able to give to Dr. Koussevitzky what he desired in the way of expressive effect. Slight hesitancy at the beginning of the first chorus was quickly overcome and must be considered entirely negligible.

But what would all this machinery have come to without the proper hand guiding and controlling it? Even as a single mind created it with pen on paper, so a single mind, working upon and through other minds, gave it living voice. Dr. Koussevitzky is master of the long, expressive line of subtly blended sonority, of rhythm fluid and flexible. His, after all, is the chief honor in saving this somber music from boredom, of leading it from it and for it, the rapt, eager attention which it received. Next to Debussy, for us here in Boston, he is the creator of this music.

Symphony Concert

By PHILIP HALE

The program of the Boston Symphony orchestra's 15th concert yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, comprised Debussy's "Blessed Damsel" and "Martyrdom of St. Sebastian," both sung in French. The Radcliffe Choral Society, trained by G. Wallace Woodworth, was the chorus for the "Blessed Damsel"; the Cecilia Society, Arthur Fiedler, conductor, sang in the "Martyrdom of St. Sebastian." Mme. Ritter-Ciampi was entrusted with the solo soprano music in both works. The music of the Reciter in the "Blessed Damsel" was sung by Jean Macdonald.

Here we had music by the Debussy of 1887 and the Debussy of 1911. As the works were performed yesterday the younger Debussy was preferred by the great majority of the audience. The reason for this is not far to seek. First of all there was the familiar poem, and although it is the fashion in some quarters to underrate Rossetti, "the Blessed Damsel" is still a poem of exquisite beauty. The music is as exquisite as the verses. The charge of preciousness cannot justly be brought against either. Again, there is a continuous emotional, appealing story. The music, furthermore, has apparent simplicity. It is at once appreciated, enjoyed, gratefully remembered. Nor are the choral measures beyond the ability of a well-trained chorus of women. Last of all, the choral measures were sung with delightful purity of tone; with an expressiveness that was not forced nor incompatible with the sentiment of the poem; and Miss Macdonald, as the reciter, delivered her lines with refreshing clearness and significance of diction, not forcing her fine voice, though her position on the stage might have tempted her to do it. It might be pertinently asked why she was not seated by the solo soprano.

The chorus in the "Martyrdom of Saint-Sebastian" had a more difficult task. That it was so well accomplished reflects credit on Mr. Fiedler, who was recently appointed the conductor of the Cecilia. It might be said of the two choruses, with regard to the women's voices, par nobis sororum. Nor did the men of the Cecilia fall behind their sisters in art, when the great technical difficulties in the Mystery are considered. It is needless to say that Dr. Koussevitzky had rehearsed the orchestra with sympathetic care; that the orchestral performance was, after all, the one that was most enjoyed.

Admirers of the work, who speak of it as Debussy's crowning achievement, insist that it should not be performed on the stage of a theatre. What is the result when it is heard in a concert hall? The work then appears to be a series of episodes, loosely strung together. Unless the hearer has thoroughly acquainted himself with d'Annunzio's drama for which the music was composed, he wonders what is happening; what Sebastian is doing or suffering; what is going on in the "Magic Chamber"; why in a Mystery with a Christian Saint, the chorus should now hurrah for Apollo, now mourn the beautiful Adonis. Is the death of the latter symbolical of Sebastian's tortured passing? And who, pray, the hearer might ask, is the Virgin Erigone and what has she to do with it all? Nor is the hearer, unable to read any printed synopsis of the drama on account of the dimly lighted hall, a Philistine, because he rubs his eyes, wonders, and questions.

He is unable, under those conditions, to find dramatic, pictorial, or strikingly impressive music in these choral episodes thrown together as if at random. Here and there are passages of genuine beauty, especially for the female voices; but these passages are to him merely agreeable sounds; he is unable, hearing them, "to dilate with the proper emotion." Having read of the "majestic," also "exultant" final chorus when Sebastian takes the seat of St. John and drinks out of his cup, with the combined chorus of Martyrs, Virgins, Apostles, Angels,—the whole company of the heavenly host praising the Lord Omnipotent, he is grievously disappointed and is not to be blamed if he remembers choruses by Handel. Nor, again, does he find emotion of any sort in the music written for the solo soprano voice.

Mme. Ritter-Ciampi sang in Boston for the first time. Her voice is light and flexible, pleasing in the lower register. In many measures where the tones should have been well sustained, they lacked body and were not firmly held.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program for next week is as follows: Haydn, Symphony D major, "The Horn Call" (B. & H. No. 31, first time at those concerts). Lazar, Concerto Grosso No. 1 for orchestra (first performance). De Falla, "Nights in the Gardens of Spain" (Mr. Sanroma, pianist). Gruenberg, Jazz Suite, op. 28.

DEBUSSY'S DAY WITH SYMPHONY

Radcliffe Choral and Cecilia Society Assist

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Although there is no evidence of conspiracy, the Chicago Opera Company and the Boston Symphony Orchestra between them contrived, for the last days of this week, a sort of Debussy festival. At the Opera House, Thursday evening, the bill was "Pelleas and Melisande," while the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon, as will that of this evening, fell wholly to the French composer's music.

BUT TWO PIECES ON LIST

Two pieces only make this current symphony program; the one, the setting for women's chorus, soprano and contralto soloists and orchestra of Rossini's "The Blessed Damsel," as rendered into French by Gabriel Sarrazin; the other, the incidental vocal and orchestral music to d'Annunzio's mystery play, "The Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian." In the first-named, the orchestra was assisted by the Radcliffe Choral Society and Mme. Ritter-Clampi and Miss Jean Macdonald, and in the second by the Cecilia Society and Mme. Ritter-Clampi.

In concert hall as in opera house, Debussy was fortunate in his interpreters. As did Mr. Polacco and the Chicagoan orchestra on Thursday, so did Dr. Koussevitzky and his band yesterday afternoon cause Debussy's endlessly beautiful instrumental sonorities to fall arrestingly or stimulatingly upon the ear. The conductors vied with each other in their sensitiveness to Debussy's melodic line, in their ability to keep his music, as it should be kept, ceaselessly plastic, undulant and flowing; phrase melting into phrase.

Superb Choruses

And, to speak of the symphony concert, both the Radcliffe chorus and the Cecilia surpassed themselves in the production of a sonorous or luminous tone, for which Mr. Woodworth and Mr. Fiedler, who respectively trained them, deserve their share of the credit. Regarded objectively, Mme. Ritter-Clampi's voice might be found lacking in warmth and fullness, but it proved yesterday, nevertheless, a most suitable medium for the music of Debussy, and it was to be noted that while by no means a powerful voice it seemed always to hold its own, without apparent strain, against the orchestra. Less edgeless, less inclined to blend with the orchestra were Miss Macdonald's tones.

The former, dating from 1887, the latter from 1911, "The Blessed Damsel" and the "Saint Sebastian" music represent almost the two extremes of Debussy's career as composer; nor would it be extravagant to speak of the one as his first significant work and of the other as his last. The pieces before "The Blessed Damsel" were relatively tentative and immature; those that followed "Saint Sebastian" more or less artificial, mannered and sterile, as though the creative vein was drying up, leaving only the faultless technique, the fastidious workmanship.

Of Ecstatic Beauty

Yet to the extent that it did not break completely with existing harmonic and melodic idioms, "The Blessed Damsel" is still to be reckoned as "early" Debussy, but not for that reason to be despised. There is in this score a grace and charm, an ecstatic beauty, not to mention the perfect musical transliteration of the poem, that make it one of the most to be prized of modern choral pieces. Yesterday's performance was not the first that "The Blessed Damsel" had received in Boston, or at the Symphony concerts, yet it is hardly too much to speak of it as the most eloquent and revealing.

It has been said of the music to "Saint Sebastian" that it falls short of full effectiveness both in the theatre and in the concert hall; due in one instance to the distracting limitations of paint and canvas and of actors who must materialize spiritual states, and in the other to the clear need, at times, of visual aid to give point to the tonal commentary. Studied, furthermore, in the version for voices and piano Debussy's music seems here and there to be but dryly invented, lacking in impulse, though in actual performance the composer's necromantic skill in the manipulation of timbres makes many of these measures engrossing to hear.

But leaving out not a little that in the last analysis must be set down as deficient in the quality commonly known as inspiration, there remains in the "Saint Sebastian" music much that is of a searching and elevated beauty, an expression of the mystical, of spiritual ecstasy, to be matched but seldom in the entire course of the tonal art.

Yesterday's performance by the way, was the first in Boston to make use of the very important parts for chorus and soloist, Mr. Monteux having previously made known to us only the orchestral numbers.

DEBUSSY PROGRAM AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Two Local Choruses Assist
Orchestra

"Martyrdom of St Sebastian" and
"Blessed Damsel" Performed

Dr Koussevitzky devoted yesterday's Symphony concert to the performance of two works by Debussy for chorus and orchestra, "The Blessed Damsel," and "The Martyrdom of St Sebastian." The Radcliffe Choral Society, trained by its own conductor, G. Wallace Woodworth, sang in "The Blessed Damsel." The contralto soloist in this number was Jean Macdonald. The Cecilia Society, trained by Arthur Fiedler, now its conductor, sang in the "St Sebastian." The soprano soloist in both works was Mme Ritter-Clampi, of the Paris Opera, who sang for the first time in America.

Those who heard the Chicago Civic Opera's performance of Debussy's "Pelleas" Thursday night as well as yesterday's Symphony concert enjoyed an unusual opportunity to survey his whole musical career. "The Blessed Damsel," written in 1887, is a work of his youth, already familiar to Boston audiences. "Pelleas," first performed in 1902, is the masterpiece of his middle years. The music for d'Annunzio's mystery play, first performed in 1911, seemed yesterday the crowning glory of his last years.

When Debussy's music was new, reviewers spoke as with one voice of its "impressionism." What struck them was the then novel harmonic scheme, based on a scale of whole tones. They denied that Debussy wrote melody. They denied that his music had any strictly formal or architectural qualities. Performers even today frequently interpret Debussy's works from this angle, as though they were vague, evanescent improvisations, full of strange harmonies, but otherwise meaningless. With a confused feeling for the delicacy and restraint of Debussy, who never wrote a superfluous note or a measure of mere padding repetition, performers subdued his music to a dreamy chaos of bitter-sweet sound.

When, as was inevitable, makers of newer and stranger music arrived, those who had accepted this view of Debussy as the only true one allowed their newborn fervor for Stravinsky and Honegger and the rest of the present generation to cool their once ardently expressed admiration for Debussy. Marcel Proust, sensitive to music as to the life around him, noted just before the war the decline of Debussy's reputation with the musical intelligentsia of Paris, and recorded it with so much else of the history of that era in "Remembrance of Things Past."

Had these restless thinkers in the Paris salons so dear to Proust been correct in their estimate, Debussy's music would now be as certainly doomed to ultimate oblivion as is that of Charpentier. But they were wrong. Debussy is already a classic. His work will endure, though by other qualities than those they heard in it.

Debussy is a great melodist, though his melodies are often brief, and almost never diatonic. Debussy's music has a form of its own always, though not one to be found in such text books as the once celebrated works of Ebenezer Prout. Debussy had an intense dramatic sense. Consider the crucial scenes in "Pelleas." Have they not, when rightly conducted, as Mr Polacco has shown us at the Opera House, a thrill in them almost as powerful if rather less crude than the thrills in Verdi and Wagner?

Turn to the music for d'Annunzio's ecstatic play, a piece full of the "voluptuous religiosity" some have found in Wagner's "Parsifal," a quality repugnant to others as well to as the Archbishop who tried to ban the original performance at Paris. Note that Debussy can use stern, jagged rhythms, sonorous outbursts from the brass, a soaring final chorus of apothecosis, culminating in "Alleluia" that echo long afterwards in the listening ear. The music has a purity, a serenity absent from the play. There is a frenzy of the senses in the laments for Adonis, but in the choruses of mourning a solemn sadness soon overpowers the merely sensuous excitement.

This music is a strangely neglected masterpiece, which should be more often heard in years to come. Remember that it is to one woman, Mary Garden, that America owes its relative familiarity with "Pelleas." "The Martyrdom" may yet find a celebrity to insist that audiences hear it until they cease to be baffled by it, as has happened in Boston with "Pelleas."

Dr Koussevitzky conducted yesterday with remarkable eloquence. The two choruses performed their allotted tasks well. Miss MacDonald sang her solos with a fine quality of tone, and a command of style rare in young singers hereabouts. Mme Ritter-Ciampi, obviously very nervous over her American debut, has a lyric soprano voice of fine quality, if small volume. When she regained her self-possession, as she did by the later parts of the "St Sebastian," she sang eloquently and beautifully.

P. R.

"Saint Sebastian," Second Hearing

OF the Symphony Concert of Saturday evening, or rather of so much of it as contained Debussy's music to d'Annunzio's play, "The Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian," it were belated and impertinent to record more than a personal impression. Already in these columns an able hand has set forth the play and discussed both music and performance. First, then, to regret that, though opportunity opened, Debussy failed to re-cast and expand the music into a self-contained piece for the operatic stage. Elsewhere, it is fated. In the theater of the spoken word, it is cloaked and dulled by the thick folds of text and staging. In the concert-hall it is difficult to follow and feel without the visible action and the continuing frame of the play.

"The Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian" is an exceedingly costly and an exceedingly difficult piece of the theater. The chances are that it may never be revived. Were it once more produced, it would "date" unescapably. Its decadent-dolorous mood, dwelling upon physical pain, mental suffering and the endurance of both; its half-pagan, half-Christian substance, setting and atmosphere; its of mingled eroticism and all of a vanished time matters and the arts. Preparing adjective that now shoppers from that cataclysm—as Thrifty and still knows it—d'Annunzio. Debussy's byad. The Cardinal-Arch in 1911 might think what joint work; but to this where, there are many at. "The" an communion who find who was like to the pagan tions bycher voluptuous of pain, their cherished legend of market gret because here is music's full maturity. He characteristic invention and as both widely and varied in the choruses of Parsifal joined with an orchestra is idiom when it is most poignant. To this sensibility he adds force and brilliance of the Emperor and and elsewhere are choral intensity to be found Debussy's pages. Only "St Sebastian," outside of young years, does itself as choral composer. writes a music of the sonorities and progresses in veil or pierce. He music for miming. In the out the eye to aid, with ed notion of the emotional lacks neither rhythmic aphic coloring. In the forecast have been searching, stirring.

play d'Annunzio perof bodily and spiritual dingly Debussy reiteration of suffering; of himself aid of the poet, penetrates them with the accompaniment of Wagner's romantic idiom of "Parsifal." No doubt the music "falls short of faith" in bliss. Whether imagination and in could compass them tting music to d'Annunzio's accompaniment of necessity to convey a mystical vein, to the World of Christian mysteries under is that within the beauty that dance suffused many r. Koussevitzky has ny Concerts.

H. T. P.

Party.

An Informal Debussy Festival

By L. A. SLOPER

IT IS a privilege of genius to cause controversy. Claude Debussy did not fail to use his prerogative. His position today seems secure; yet not all the musical world has accepted him without important reservations. Frenchmen will assure you that his art is in the great tradition of Lully, the antithesis of everything German. Englishmen are inclined to find in it a generous Wagnerian influence, and to point out that Debussy's efforts to suppress this influence were not entirely successful. Ernest Newman, dismissing "Pelleas" as a tour de force, insists that Debussy paid a high compliment to Wagner, precisely by trying so pointedly to be unlike him.

Debussy, like Nietzsche, always confessed openly an early devotion to Wagner. Indeed, neither could have denied it; and both made it a springboard for later sorties. Is there something typical in their experience? Do not many persons in middle age find themselves wondering why they are no longer so deeply stirred by "Tristan"?

Debussy, however, did not venture to deny the musical genius of Wagner. His attacks were directed largely against his dramatic pretensions. And to an observer who is neither French nor German, it must be apparent that the Wagnerian influence exists in many a progression and many a melodic line of "Pelleas"—quickly abandoned though these are.

The End of a Line?

Should this be held against Debussy? Surely he would have had to be insensitive as well as hostile, to resist such a force. The French insistence is of course on classic restraint in art. Is it not a sufficient tribute to the art of this Frenchman that he was able to utilize what he learned of Wagner, without losing his self-control?

Debussy tried in "Pelleas," he tells us, to "trace a path that others may follow, broadening it with individual discoveries which will, perhaps, free dramatic music from the heavy yoke under which it has existed for so long." His followers have not been numerous, and "Pelleas" remains unique. The man who described Wagner as a sunset which had been mistaken for a dawn has himself come to be considered the climax of a harmonic epoch, and the author of a lyric drama which can have no successors.

Nevertheless, Debussy has had his influence on the form of lyric drama, as well as on harmony. This influence is perhaps not very apparent at the moment. Neither was Moussorgsky's once. Yet Debussy, with his emphasis on lyric declamation, or dramatic song, surely belongs in the line which started with the beginning of drama, was revived in the Florence of the end of the sixteenth century and found one of its finest products in "Boris Godounoff."

"Fra Gherardo"

But there are no heirs, is it said? There is plenty of time. In the meanwhile, what of Pizzetti's "Fra Gherardo"? The present writer, so far as he is aware, is to date the only commentator in the world who has found good words to say about "Fra Gherardo," which has already been dismissed as a failure. Nevertheless, he stubbornly remains of the opinion that, however alien to the theater this opera may be considered now, it will eventually emerge as the latest representative of the authentic tradition.

These reflections have been brought upon the reader by a happy contingency which has just enabled Bostonians to enjoy the unusual opportunity of surveying within a few hours two of the major works of Debussy. On the evening of Feb. 13, "Pelleas" had its annual Boston performance by the Chicago Civic Opera Company, which, with a cast containing Mary Garden, Vanni-Marcoux and José Mojica, offers an unparalleled realization. The following afternoon, the music for d'Annunzio's "Le Martyre de Saint Sébastien" was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the chorus of the Cecilia Society. For prelude of this concert, the fifteenth of the Friday series, the Radcliffe Choral Society joined the orchestra in presenting "La Dame à la Tourterelle."

ear. The music has a purity, a serenity absent from the play. There is frenzy of the senses in the lament for Adonis, but in the choruses mourning a solemn sadness soon overpowers the merely sensuous excitement.

This music is a strangely neglected masterpiece, which should be more often heard in years to come. Remember that it is to one woman, Mary Garden, that America owes its relative familiarity with "Pelleas." "The Martyrdom" may yet find a celebrity to insist that audiences hear it until they cease to be baffled by it, as happened in Boston with "Pelleas."

Dr Koussevitzky conducted yesterday with remarkable eloquence. The two choruses performed their allotted tasks well. Miss MacDonald sang her solos with a fine quality of tone, and a command of style rare in young singers hereabouts. Mme Ritter-Campi, obviously very nervous over her American debut, has a lyric soprano voice of fine quality, if small volume. When she regained her self-possession as she did by the later parts of the "St Sebastian," she sang eloquently and beautifully.

"Saint Sebastian," Second Hearing

OF the Symphony Concert of Saturday evening, or rather of so much of it as contained Debussy's music to d'Annunzio's play, "The Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian," it were belated impertinent to record more than a personal impression. Already in these columns an able hand has set forth the play and discussed both music and performance. First, then, to regret that though opportunity opened, Debussy failed to re-cast and expand the music into a self-contained piece for the opera stage. Elsewhere, it is fated. In the theater of the spoken word, it is closed and dulled by the thick folds of text staging. In the concert-hall it is difficult to follow and feel without the visual action and the continuing frame of play.

"The Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian" is an exceedingly costly and an exceedingly difficult piece of the theater. The chances are that it may never be revived. Were it once more produced, it would "date" unescapably. Its decadent mood, dwelling upon physical pain, mental suffering and the endurance of both; its half-pagan, half-Christian substance, setting and atmosphere;

sensuous note of mingled eroticism and mysticism, are all of a vanished time and manner in letters and the arts. Pre-war is the damning adjective that now lies in wait. From that cataclysm—as Europe knew and still knows it—d'Annunzio emerged another man. Debussy was already dead. The Cardinal-Archbishop of Paris in 1911 might think what he liked of their joint work; but to this day and everywhere, there are many outside the Roman communion who find this Sebastian, who was like to the pagan Adonais, this archer voluptuous of pain, at odds with their cherished legend of the Saint.

Double the regret because here is music of Debussy's full maturity. He abounds in characteristic invention and imagination; piles both widely and variously. Except in the choruses of Paradise, upon a choir joined with an orchestra he imposes his idiom when it is most sensitive and poignant. To this sensibility and subtlety, he adds force and brilliance—in the music of the Emperor and his court. There and elsewhere are choruses of a scope and intensity to be found on none other of Debussy's pages. Only in "Saint Sebastian," outside "The Blessed Damsel" of young years, does he disclose himself as choral composer. There also he writes a music of the supernatural—in sonorities and progressions that at will veil or pierce. He writes, as well, a music for miming. In the concert-hall, without the eye to aid, with only a generalized notion of the emotional content, it lacks neither rhythmic movement nor graphic coloring. In the theater it must have been searching, stirring, meaningful.

Throughout the play d'Annunzio persists in his poetry of bodily and spiritual dolor. Correspondingly Debussy reiterates the accents of suffering; of himself rather than by any aid of the poet, penetrates and infuses them with the accents of pity. What Wagner accomplished in the romantic idiom of "Parsifal," he gains in another time and in his own musical speech. No doubt the music to "Saint Sebastian" falls short of faith illumined, of beatified bliss. Whether the peculiar temper, imagination and invention of Debussy could compass them none may say. Setting music to d'Annunzio's play, he had of necessity to conform to its sensual-mystical vein, to write often of Christian mysteries paganized. The wonder is that within those bonds he gained the beauty that in Saturday's performance suffused many a measure. Again Dr. Koussevitzky has enlarged the Symphony Concerts.

H. T. P.

An Informal Debussy Festival

By L. A. SLOPER

IT IS a privilege of genius to cause controversy. Claude Debussy did not fail to use his prerogative. His position today seems secure; yet not all the musical world has accepted him without important reservations. Frenchmen will assure you that his art is in the great tradition of Lully, the antithesis of everything German. Englishmen are inclined to find in it a generous Wagnerian influence, and to point out that Debussy's efforts to suppress this influence were not entirely successful. Ernest Newman, dismissing "Pelleas" as a tour de force, insists that Debussy paid a high compliment to Wagner, precisely by trying so pointedly to be unlike him.

Debussy, like Nietzsche, always confessed openly an early devotion to Wagner. Indeed, neither could have denied it; and both made it a springboard for later sorties. Is there something typical in their experience? Do not many persons in middle age find themselves wondering why they are no longer so deeply stirred by "Tristan"?

Debussy, however, did not venture to deny the musical genius of Wagner. His attacks were directed largely against his dramatic pretensions. And to an observer who is neither French nor German, it must be apparent that the Wagnerian influence exists in many a progression and many a melodic line of "Pelleas"—quickly abandoned though these are.

The End of a Line?

Should this be held against Debussy? Surely he would have had to be insensitive as well as hostile, to resist such a force. The French insistence is of course on classic restraint in art. Is it not a sufficient tribute to the art of this Frenchman that he was able to utilize what he learned of Wagner, without losing his self-control?

Debussy tried in "Pelleas," he tells us, to "trace a path that others may follow, broadening it with individual discoveries which will, perhaps, free dramatic music from the heavy yoke under which it has existed for so long." His followers have not been numerous, and "Pelleas" remains,

unique. The man who described Wagner as a sunset which had been mistaken for a dawn has himself come to be considered the climax of a harmonic epoch, and the author of a lyric drama which can have no successors.

Nevertheless, Debussy has had his influence on the form of lyric drama, as well as on harmony. This influence is perhaps not very apparent at the moment. Neither was Moussorgsky's once. Yet Debussy, with his emphasis on lyric declamation, or dramatic song, surely belongs in the line which started with the beginning of drama, was revived in the Florence of the end of the sixteenth century and found one of its finest products in "Boris Godounoff."

"Fra Gherardo"

But there are no heirs, is it said? There is plenty of time. In the meanwhile, what of Pizzetti's "Fra Gherardo"? The present writer, so far as he is aware, is to date the only commentator in the world who has found good words to say about "Fra Gherardo," which has already been dismissed as a failure. Nevertheless, he stubbornly remains of the opinion that, however alien to the theater this opera may be considered now, it will eventually emerge as the latest representative of the authentic tradition.

These reflections have been brought upon the reader by a happy contingency which has just enabled Bostonians to enjoy the unusual opportunity of surveying within a few hours two of the major works of Debussy. On the evening of Feb. 13, "Pelleas" had its annual Boston performance by the Chicago Civic Opera Company, which, with a cast containing Mary Garden, Vanni-Marcoux and José Mojica, offers an unparalleled realization. The following afternoon, the music for d'Annunzio's "Le Martyre de Saint Sébastien" was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the chorus of the Cecilia Society. For prelude of this concert, the fifteenth of the Friday series, the Radcliffe Choral Society joined the orchestra in presenting "La Damselle Élue."

"Le Martyre"

"Pelléas" is unique. Can as much be said of "Le Martyre de Saint Sébastien"? Can the piece be properly judged, separated from the action which it was designed to accompany? This much may be said: Hearing this music in the concert hall, you do not feel that nothing like it exists in the history of the art. These celestial harps, these harmonics from the violins, these ethereal woodwind chords, these ecstatic cries, these ominous trumpetings—where have we heard all this before? There is charming atmosphere in the Court of Lilies, but it is an ante-chamber to what a naïve Paradise.

Really, "Le Martyre" is to "Pelléas" something as "Parsifal" is to "Tristan." If you like D'Annunzio's play, quite possibly you will find Debussy's music an admirable accompaniment. If you care for the medieval ingenuousness of the conception, very well; but can you seriously contend that, purely musically, this score is strikingly individual? When we have heard it as often as we have heard "Pelléas," shall we feel differently? Possibly. But shall we hear it as often?

After a somewhat tentative beginning, the Cecilia chorus, trained by Arthur Fiedler, did well with the intricacies of the score. The young women from Radcliffe, coached by G. Wallace Woodworth, did excellently well, with their fresh voices, by the pale beauties of "La Damselle Édue." Mme. Ritter-Ciampi was soprano soloist in both numbers. Jean MacDonald, contralto, assisted in the "Damselle."

"The New York Manner"

REVISITING Manhattan last week, the Symphony Orchestra shifted its evening concert from the usual Thursday to an exceptional Friday. Custom permitted only meager reviews in the newspapers of a Saturday. At the matinee Dr. Koussevitzky filled his program with pieces recently played in New York by the orchestra. Hence paragraphs instead of articles. Mr. Prokofiev was the pianist on both occasions playing, as in Boston, his Second Concerto. On Friday his "Scythian Suite" was also on the list. The reviews traverse these numbers in familiar comment whenever the music of Mr. Prokofiev is in debate. Two paragraphs, however, deserve quotation. The first, from The Sun, is amusing:

ling both was various, indefinite, nevertheless prevailingly not expatriate. There were if these by Serge Prokofiev, suit. But Paris, and there also the woulitzky lingers in the lap's Ten in when he is not enrapled from or amazing New York. win thintermission Mr. Prokofiev "Spadeian Suite" was per-Jack an'r it the composer ap-e entire person as the solo-execu-mid wown Second Concerto for orchestra. Mr. Prokofiev and, Dens have descended upon the Diatom time to time since ds in hie persuaded us that bated thav how to make noises Streets at once and to disturb es and bre violently to no speard suit does not impress itself es woultroncler as imperative did not write another essay on est han Suite." Let it speak East lea does so very loudly and King Gys at once. The piano he Deucig new to these aven-d, Wesre calls for pause and een, an led thiragraph, from The Times, he Fivosphere of the evening layed th

Mr. Shelev, who is scant of hair, had wode, with an appearance had lost, figured on the proposition loser and also as pianist st woulmance of his Second ree Cluld for the first time in rt he ha Koussevitzky gave an was subllant performance of s, were a's "Scythian Suite."

certo evoked storms of of Club, composer, after both the Te was repeatedly called om the platform. Mr. who greatly admires talents, signaled the ie in his honor, while himself applauded. ed on unconditional e who had reservat and outnumbered.

ject

sevitzky for the con-ony Orchestra in San-bridge on Thursday when the University ut "Bolero":

(K. 525).....Mozart
"Khovantchina,".....Musorgsky
.....Ravel
minor, "From the.....Dvorak

AT SYMPHONY HALL

While Boston has been enjoying the singing of the visiting Chicagoans, its own great musical organization, the Symphony Orchestra, has been playing in New York. In enthusiasm for the brief series of spectacular productions at the Opera House we are likely to underestimate the value of Mr. Koussevitzky and his band, whom it is our privilege to hear for six months every year. As a reminder, part of the comment of Olin Downes, the music critic of the New York Times, on the orchestra's concert Saturday is in Carnegie hall is worth reproducing.

It may be said, for it is true, that Boston has now an orchestra which is without a superior, if it has an equal in this country, a band that Mr. Koussevitzky has brought to a unique flexibility, sensitiveness and virtuosity.

Chicago, of course, has a very fine symphony orchestra of its own. But it seems only fair that we let it hear the best in return for our opportunity of hearing its opera company. Chicago might well try to engage the Boston orchestra as one feature of the 1933 celebration.

MUSIC BODY NAMED FOR TERCENTENARY

State Committee Includes Koussevitsky—Headed by Leo R. Lewis

Appointment of a state tercentenary music committee headed by Leo Rich Lewis and including Serge Koussevitsky and others prominently identified with music was announced yesterday by the Massachusetts Bay Colony tercentenary commission.

The committee comprises: Chairman, Leo Rich Lewis, Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, George W. Chadwick, Bainbridge Crist, Mrs. Frederick S. Coolidge, Archibald T. Davison, Mrs. Anita Davis-Chase, William Arms Fisher, Arthur Foote, Mrs.

Alvan T. Fuller, Wallace Goodrich, Courtenay Guild, Herbert J. Gurney, Edward B. Hill, N. Penrose Hollowell, James R. Houghton, Serge Koussevitsky, Malcolm Lang, John P. Marshall, Mrs. William Lowell Putnam, John A. O'Shea, Walter R. Spalding, Mrs. Alexander Steinert, Thompson Stone, Frederick W. Benker, secretary.

Members of the executive committee are: Leo Rich Lewis, Archibald T. Davison, Wallace Goodrich, N. Penrose Hollowell, Mrs. Alvan T. Fuller, Mrs. Anita Davis-Chase.

The committee was appointed to take charge of the musical features of two celebrations, one historical and the other literary in character, which are projected by the commission. It is probable also that the committee will seek the approval of the commission for two purely musical celebrations embodying New England's history and achievements.

"Le Martyre"

"Pelléas" is unique. Can as much be said of "Le Martyre de Saint Sébastien"? Can the piece be properly judged, separated from the action which it was designed to accompany? This much may be said: Hearing this music in the concert hall, you do not feel that nothing like it exists in the history of the art. These celestial harps, these harmonies from the violins, the ethereal woodwind chords, the ecstatic cries, these ominous trumpetings—where have we heard this before? There is charming atmosphere in the Court of Lilies, but it is an ante-chamber to what naïve Paradise.

Really, "Le Martyre" is to "Pelléas" something as "Parsifal" is to "Tristan." If you like D'Annunzio's play quite possibly you will find Debussy's music an admirable accompaniment. If you care for the medieval ingeniousness of the conception, very well, but can you seriously contend that purely musically, this score is strikingly individual? When we have heard it as often as we have heard "Pelléas," shall we feel differently? Possibly. But shall we hear it often?

After a somewhat tentative beginning, the Cecilia chorus, trained by Arthur Fiedler, did well with the intricacies of the score. The young women from Radcliffe, coached by Wallace Woodworth, did excellent well, with their fresh voices, by the pale beauties of "La Dame à la Liliée." Mme. Ritter-Ciampi was a piano soloist in both numbers. Jean MacDonald, contralto, assisted in the "Dame à la Liliée."

"The New York Manner"

REVISITING Manhattan last week the Symphony Orchestra shifted its evening concert from the usual Thursday to an exceptional Friday. Custom permitted only meager reviews in the newspapers of a Saturday. At the matinee Dr. Koussevitzky filled his program with pieces recently played in New York by the orchestra. Hence paragraphs instead of articles. Mr. Prokofiev was pianist on both occasions playing, as in Boston, his Second Concerto. On Friday his "Scythian Suite" was also on the program. The reviews traverse these numbers with a familiar comment whenever the music of Mr. Prokofiev is in debate. Two paragraphs, however, deserve quotation. The first, from The Sun, is amusing:

The program was various, indefinite and nevertheless prevailingly Muscovitish expatriate. There were two compositions by Serge Prokofiev, whose abode is Paris, and there also Mr. Koussevitzky lingers in the lap of approbation when he is not enrapturing Boston or amazing New York. Before the intermission Mr. Prokofiev's "Scythian Suite" was performed; after it the composer appeared in person as the solo-executant in his own Second Concerto for piano and orchestra. Mr. Prokofiev's Scythians have descended upon our coasts from time to time since 1924 and have persuaded us that barbarians knew how to make noises in several keys at once and to disturb the atmosphere violently to no special end. It does not impress itself upon this chronicler as imperative that he should write another essay on the "Scythian Suite." Let it speak for itself. It does so very loudly and in several keys at once. The piano concerto being new to these avenues of culture calls for pause and pondering.

The second paragraph, from The Times, notes the atmosphere of the evening concert:

Mr. Prokofiev, who is scant of hair, but tall, blonde, with an appearance of boyishness, figured on the program as composer and also as pianist in the performance of his Second Concerto, heard for the first time in this city. Mr. Koussevitzky gave an amazingly brilliant performance of Mr. Prokofiev's "Scythian Suite." Suite and Concerto evoked storms of applause. The composer, after both performances, was repeatedly called out, bowing from the platform. Mr. Koussevitzky, who greatly admires Mr. Prokofiev's talents, signaled the orchestra to rise in his honor, while the conductor himself applauded. All this bordered on unconditional triumph. Those who had reservations were silent and outnumbered.

Programs in Prospect

From Dr. Koussevitzky for the concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Sanders Theater at Cambridge on Thursday evening, Feb. 20, when the University will have its turn at "Bolero":

Elne kleine Nachtmusik (K. 525).....Mozart
Prelude to The Opera, "Khovantchina,".....Musorgsky
Bolero.....Ravel
Symphony, No. 5, in E minor, "From the New World".....Dvorak

AT SYMPHONY HALL

While Boston has been enjoying the singing of the visiting Chicagoans, its own great musical organization, the Symphony Orchestra, has been playing in New York. In enthusiasm for the brief series of spectacular productions at the Opera House we are likely to underestimate the value of Mr. Koussevitzky and his band, whom it is our privilege to hear for six months every year. As a reminder, part of the comment of Olin Downes, the music critic of the New York Times, on the orchestra's concert Saturday in Carnegie hall is worth reproducing.

It may be said, for it is true, that Boston has now an orchestra which is without a superior, if it has an equal in this country, a band that Mr. Koussevitzky has brought to a unique flexibility, sensitiveness and virtuosity.

Chicago, of course, has a very fine symphony orchestra of its own. But it seems only fair that we let it hear the best in return for our opportunity of hearing its opera company. Chicago might well try to engage the Boston orchestra as one feature of the 1933 celebration.

MUSIC BODY NAMED FOR TERCENTENARY

State Committee Includes Koussevitsky—Headed by Leo R. Lewis

Appointment of a state tercentenary music committee headed by Leo Rich Lewis and including Serge Koussevitsky and others prominently identified with music was announced yesterday by the Massachusetts Bay Colony tercentenary commission.

The committee comprises: Chairman, Leo Rich Lewis, Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, George W. Chadwick, Bainbridge Crist, Mrs. Frederick S. Coolidge, Archibald T. Davison, Mrs. Anita Davis-Chase, William Arms Fisher, Arthur Foote, Mrs.

Alvan T. Fuller, Wallace Goodrich, Courtenay Guild, Herbert J. Gurney, Edward B. Hill, N. Penrose Hallowell, James R. Houghton, Serge Koussevitsky, Malcolm Lang, John P. Marshall, Mrs. William Lowell Putnam, John A. O'Shea, Walter R. Spalding, Mrs. Alexander Steinert, Thompson Stone, Frederick W. Benker, secretary.

Members of the executive committee are: Leo Rich Lewis, Archibald T. Davison, Wallace Goodrich, N. Penrose Hallowell, Mrs. Alvan T. Fuller, Mrs. Anita Davis-Chase.

The committee was appointed to take charge of the musical features of two celebrations, one historical and the other literary in character, which are projected by the commission. It is probable also that the committee will seek the approval of the commission for two purely musical celebrations embodying New England's history and achievements.

Sixteenth Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, FEBRUARY 21, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, FEBRUARY 22, at 8.15 o'clock

Haydn Symphony in D major (with the Horn Call)
(B. & H. No. 31)

- I. Allegro.
 - II. Adagio.
 - III. Menuet.
 - IV. Finale (Theme with Variations).
- (First time at these Concerts)

Lazar Concerto Grosso No. 1 for Orchestra, in the Old Style

- I. Largo; Allegro.
 - II. Largo.
 - III. Allegretto.
 - IV. Allegro.
- (First performance)

De Falla "Nights in the Gardens of Spain," for Piano and Orchestra

- I. At Generalife.
- II. Far-off Dance.
- III. In the Gardens of the Sierra of Cordova.

Gruenberg Jazz Suite, Op. 28

- Fox-trot Tempo.
 - Boston Waltz Tempo.
 - Blues Tempo, Slow Drag.
 - One-step Tempo.
- (First time in Boston)

SOLOIST
JESÚS MARÍA SANROMÁ

There will be an intermission after Lazar's Concerto Grosso

The works to be played at these concerts may be seen in the Allen A. Brown Music Collection of the Boston Public Library one week before the concert

JESÚS MARÍA
SANROMÁ
The Brilliant Spanish-American Pianist

Symphony Concert

By PHILIP HALE

The program of the 16th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conductor, which took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall, was as follows: Haydn, Symphony, D major (with the Horn Call—B. & H. No. 31). Lazar, Concerto Grosso No. 1 for orchestra, in the Old Style. De Falla, "Nights in the Gardens of Spain" for piano (Mr. Sanroma) and orchestra. Gruenberg, Jazz Suite op. 28. The symphony was played for the first time at a concert of this orchestra. Lazar's Concerto was performed for the first time anywhere. The Jazz Suite, having been played at Cincinnati and Los Angeles, was heard in Boston for the first time.

Mr. Koussevitzky is to be heartily praised for acquainting the audience with Haydn's delightful symphony. When a symphony by this composer is chosen, it is usually one with which we are all thrice familiar. Arthur Nikisch had the courage to put the "Bear" symphony on a program, but in spite of the fact that the list is a long one, few conductors here have felt it their duty to let the audience know that Haydn wrote more than a half-dozen. These, by constant repetition, have become stale, so it is not surprising that the younger generation in the audience is inclined to regard Haydn's music as hopelessly out of date and boring. This "Hunting Call" symphony is interesting not only because written in 1765 when Haydn was in the service of an Esterhazy prince, the score calls for four horns; not only because the finale, instead of a rollicking movement, is in the form of a theme with variations, but because the music itself is surprisingly fresh and charming. Solo instruments have so much to do—the first violin in the adagio; first violin, violoncello, flute, horns in the set of variations that the symphony may well be described as Concertante. There is no attempt at program music although the horns suggest the chase; and there is another title bestowed by some unknown commentator—"On the stand, or hiding place" from which the hunted may be slain as they pass by or approach. The richly ornamented adagio has nothing to do with the chase. In the lusty minuet one hears the stamping of the country folk—music that is far removed from the grace and elegance of the French dance. But in the finale, after the variations, the horn call brings the end. The whole symphony was admirably performed. The variations, melodious, not painfully complex, yet calling for tonal beauty and technical proficiency, served for the display of virtuoso qualities.

Philip Lazar, the Roumanian cor poser, living in Paris, is not an unfamiliar name. His "Gypsies" and a Scherzo have been performed under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction. They left only a fleeting, if not pleasing impression. This concerto has solid substance without dryness. "In the Old Style"—in that of Handel rather than of Bach or Vivaldi. The first movement full of life and showing a technical authority that one missed in the preceding works is followed by a singularly impressive slow movement—and here was a not unwelcome touch of modernity through an emotional quality, somewhat sombre in its gravity; yet the modernity was in the musical thought, not in the harmonies, not in the instrumentation. The two following movements, interesting enough, even when there was purely scholastic treatment, have less individuality, and the theme of the final allegro is of a trivial lightness. The concerto well deserves a repetition.

De Falla's "Nights in Spanish Gardens," was performed here in 1924 when Mr. Monteux conducted and Mr. Gebhard was the pianist. The composer says that this music is not descriptive; it is merely expressive. Some no doubt found it full of "local color." A good many years ago Johannes Weber, the Alsatian, who was the first music critic of Le Temps in Paris, and held that position for a long time to the distress of musicians and those only "fond of music," wrote an article to prove that local color is chimera. For example, a Westerner, not knowing native Oriental music, but told by a program that a certain piece has eastern character, at once finds in that piece peculiar melodic characteristics, rhythms, gorgeous coloring that he fondly believes are Oriental, though a Hindu, a Persian, an Arabian, a Chinaman would hear only unmeaning, perhaps disagreeable noises, and wonder what it was all about. There is some truth in this article of the crotchety Johannes. But De Falla is a Spaniard, who sojourning in Paris for some years, was not unduly influenced so that he wished to be more French than the French composers. There are charming pages in the work played yesterday; there are also pages that are simply music without especial suggestiveness of Spain or any other country; pages indeed that suggest labor rather than racial spontaneity. Though the performance by the orchestra and the pianist was brilliant, a mere foreigner prefers to gain his impressions of Spain from Chabrier's "Espana," Debussy's "Evening in Grenada" and "Iberia"; Ravel's orchestral suite, and the compositions by Albainez and Granados.

There is no denying the fact that jazz has mightily influenced contemporary composers. There is no reason why works that show this influence

JESÚS MARÍA
SANROMÁ
The Brilliant Spanish-American Pianist

Symphony Concert

By PHILIP HALE

The program of the 16th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conductor, which took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall, was as follows: Haydn, Symphony, D major (with the Horn Call—B. & H. No. 31). Lazar, Concerto Grosso No. 1 for orchestra, in the Old Style. De Falla, "Nights in the Gardens of Spain" for piano (Mr. Sanroma) and orchestra. Gruenberg, Jazz Suite op. 28. The symphony was played for the first time at a concert of this orchestra. Lazar's Concerto was performed for the first time anywhere. The Jazz Suite, having been played at Cincinnati and Los Angeles, was heard in Boston for the first time.

Mr. Koussevitzky is to be heartily praised for acquainting the audience with Haydn's delightful symphony. When a symphony by this composer is chosen, it is usually one with which we are all thrice familiar. Arthur Nikisch had the courage to put the "Bear" symphony on a program, but in spite of the fact that the list is a long one, few conductors here have felt it their duty to let the audience know that Haydn wrote more than a half-dozen. These, by constant repetition, have become stale, so it is not surprising that the younger generation in the audience is inclined to regard Haydn's music as hopelessly out of date and boring. This "Hunting Call" symphony is interesting not only because written in 1765 when Haydn was in the service of an Esterhazy prince, the score calls for four horns; not only because the finale, instead of a rollicking movement, is in the form of a theme with variations, but because the music itself is surprisingly fresh and charming. Solo instruments have so much to do—the first violin in the adagio; first violin, violoncello, flute, horns in the set of variations that the symphony may well be described as Concertante. There is no attempt at program music although the horns suggest the chase; and there is another title bestowed by some unknown commentator—"On the stand, or hiding place" from which the hunted may be slain as they pass by or approach. The richly ornamented adagio has nothing to do with the chase. In the lusty minuet one hears the stamping of the country folk—music that is far removed from the grace and elegance of the French dance. But in the finale, after the variations, the horn call brings the end. The whole symphony was admirably performed. The variations, melodious, not painfully complex, yet calling for tonal beauty and technical proficiency, served for the display of virtuoso qualities.

Filip Lazar, the Roumanian cor poser, living in Paris, is not an unfamiliar name. His "Gypsies" and a Scherzo have been performed under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction. They left only a fleeting, if not pleasing impression. This concerto has solid substance without dryness. "In the Old Style"—in that of Handel rather than of Bach or Vivaldi. The first movement full of life and showing a technical authority that one missed in the preceding works is followed by a singularly impressive slow movement—and here was a not unwelcome touch of modernity through an emotional quality, somewhat sombre in its gravity; yet the modernity was in the musical thought, not in the harmonies, not in the instrumentation. The two following movements, interesting enough, even when there was purely scholastic treatment, have less individuality, and the theme of the final allegro is of a trivial lightness. The concerto well deserves a repetition.

De Falla's "Nights in Spanish Gardens," was performed here in 1924 when Mr. Monteux conducted and Mr. Gebhard was the pianist. The composer says that this music is not descriptive; it is merely expressive. Some no doubt found it full of "local color." A good many years ago Johannes Weber, the Alsatian, who was the first music critic of Le Temps in Paris, and held that position for a long time to the distress of musicians and those only "fond of music," wrote an article to prove that local color is chimera. For example, a Westerner, not knowing native Oriental music, but told by a program that a certain piece has eastern character, at once finds in that piece peculiar melodic characteristics, rhythms, gorgeous coloring that he fondly believes are Oriental, though a Hindu, a Persian, an Arabian, a Chinaman would hear only unmeaning, perhaps disagreeable noises, and wonder what it was all about. There is some truth in this article of the crotchety Johannes. But De Falla is a Spaniard, who sojourning in Paris for some years, was not unduly influenced so that he wished to be more French than the French composers. There are charming pages in the work played yesterday; there are also pages that are simply music without especial suggestiveness of Spain or any other country; pages indeed that suggest labor rather than racial spontaneity. Though the performance by the orchestra and the pianist was brilliant, a mere foreigner prefers to gain his impressions of Spain from Chabrier's "Espana," Debussy's "Evening in Grenada" and "Iberia"; Ravel's orchestral suite, and the compositions by Albainez and Granados.

There is no denying the fact that jazz has mightily influenced contemporary composers. There is no reason why works that show this influence should not be performed at symphony concerts. Whether jazz gains by symphonic and sophisticated treatment is a subject for those who write learnedly or chatter jauntily about music. We prefer our jazz to be naked and unashamed. Mr. Gruenberg is an accomplished musician. That is recognized by those who heard the symphonic poem played earlier in the season and know other works by him. In the "Jazz Suite" one misses the frank melodic lines that should be on the brink of vulgarity; one misses delirious rhythms; the crooning or compelling sensuality that should permeate and give a vitality that is not gained merely by daring instrumentation; the spirit of Harlem, or of the Congo as it appeared to Andre Gide and Paul Morand. The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week will comprise Florent Schmitt's Symphonic Study for Poe's "Haunted Palace"; the violin concerto and the symphony No. 6 by Sibelius. Mr. Burgin will be the soloist.

NEW "JAZZ SUITE" SYMPHONY CONCERT

Louis Gruenberg's Music
Wins Applause

Unfamiliar Haydn Symphony and Lazar Concerto Grosso Played

Dr. Koussevitzky chose for yesterday's symphony concert a program of unfamiliar music. Although only one of its four numbers, de Falla's "Noches" had previously been played at these concerts, and that but once, the audience applauded everything and everybody concerned with unusual cordiality. Even a "Jazz Suite" by Louis Gruenberg, containing a "fox trot," "Blues" and a "one-step," failed to mar the pleasure of the supposedly conservative Friday subscribers.

Mr. Gruenberg, last represented on a Boston Symphony program by a conventional tone poem, "The Enchanted Isle," has also experimented with the timbers and rhythms of present day American popular music in his "Daniel Jazz," heard here two years ago at a concert of the Chamber Music Club. The "Jazz Suite" heard yesterday is one of the few successful attempts to write "symphonic jazz," in which a serious composer has succeeded in the difficult task of elaborating the dances of our day into relatively intricate musical patterns without becoming dull or pedantic.

Dr. Koussevitzky, whose interpretations of all music, old and new, seldom stick very closely to the printed text, gave a curiously personal and original version of Mr. Gruenberg's music. He does not, it would appear, the obstreperous insistent fundamental rhythms of jazz. So in Mr. Gruenberg's fox trot and one-step he employed a "tempo rubato" which quite obscured the popular dance rhythms.

Young Americans hearing his version could not feel that this "Koussevitzkyized" music was jazz at all.

Lazar's Concerto Grosso No. 1, "in the old style," was played yesterday for the first time anywhere. The composer, a young Rumanian living in Paris, has had two previous works introduced to the world here by Dr. Koussevitzky. This concerto grosso is more appealing than the "Tziganes," and "Music for Orchestra" of Lazar.

He has written music almost devoid of polyphony, and with simple harmonies for the most part, into which he introduces, like so many plums in a pudding, the effects that please him in 18th century polyphonic music. This concerto is not to be compared with the works in which Stravinsky has been inspired by Bach and Handel, because Lazar's musical texture is so childishly simple, where Stravinsky is complex and profound.

The Haydn Symphony, "with the horn call" with which the concert began, was written almost 25 years earlier than the symphonies by which Haydn is commonly judged, those in the "Oxford" and "London" sets. It dates from 1765.

One hopes that the very hearty applause for this unknown Haydn work will encourage Dr. Koussevitzky to dig up for us other unfamiliar works of Haydn and Mozart.

De Falla's "Nights in the Gardens of Spain" seemed less interesting than his other orchestral works, despite Mr. Sanroma's brilliant and musicianly playing of the piano solo part.

The program announced for next week includes Sibelius' violin concerto to be played by Richard Burgin, Sibelius' Sixth Symphony, and a new piece by Florent Schmitt.

P. R.

VARIOUS PIECES BY SYMPHONY

De Fallas "Noches," With Sanroma at the Piano, Outstanding

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

If the all-Debussy program of last week's pair of Symphony concerts taxed to an unusual degree the listeners' attention and was open to the charge of monotony, that of this week, which had its initial hearing yesterday, is both untaxing and varied. It might, indeed, but for the presence of some fine and some chic music, be described as a bag of orchestral tricks.

TICKLISH PART FOR HORN

To take things in the order in which they come there was by way of beginning a Symphony of Haydn in D major composed in 1765, in other words, when Haydn was 33 and had his most significant years still far ahead of him, and previously unheard at these concerts, if ever in Boston. The score bears the sub-title "With the horn call."

Haydn has written parts for four horns, a thing which many well informed musicians believe to have been first done in symphonic writing in Beethoven's Ninth, and the part for the first horn is not only prominent, it is at times decidedly ticklish. Of this player Haydn in the last movement expects the high F-sharp, and Mr. Boettcher, who distinguished himself as musician and virtuoso throughout the symphony, delivered it with fine quality of tone.

Audience Likes It

Moreover, Haydn writes in the second and fourth movements for solo violin and solo violoncello, so Mr. Burgin and Mr. Badetti had also their innings. Curiously, the symphony sounds more Mozartean than Haydnish, proving perhaps, that the younger composer was after all truer to the 19th century norm. The homely sentiment and peasant-gaiety that we associate with the Haydn symphonies are in this rather formal yet on the whole decidedly pleasing music not in evidence. The performance bespoke much care in rehearsal and the audience obviously took pleasure in a work that Dr. Koussevitzky has done well to add to the repertory.

Of the next piece, a Concerto Grosso "in the old style," by the Roumanian Felip Lazar, a composer with whom Dr. Koussevitzky has already twice acquainted us, there is less to say.

If Lazar had, as the expression goes, put new wine into old bottles there might have been at least a stimulating result. But he has chosen rather to imitate the old win, and while his music has agreeable moments it left the auditor convinced that the "old style" was handled much better by those to whom it was the "new style" and hence a natural medium of expression. Yesterday's performance was, by the way, the first that the work has received.

Sanroma at Piano

Followed the musical climax of the concert in the shape of De Falla's "Nights in the Gardens of Spain," for piano and orchestra, with Jesus Sanroma, the best possible choice among available pianists, to play the solo part. This was the second performance of the "Noches" at the Symphony concerts and it far out-classed its predecessor, thanks partly to Dr. Koussevitzky's ardor, his clear sympathy with this warmly-colored, romantic, pulsing music. For all concerned there were again deserved plaudits.

Once upon a time the presence on a Symphony programme of a piece bearing the title, "Jazz Suite" would have been a "front-page" sensation. But symphonic jazz has become an old and rather trite story, and the "Jazz Suite" of Eugene Gruenberg that brought yesterday's generally entertaining concert to a close in no way disturbed the peace of Symphony Hall. The audience clearly liked much of this music, and much of it is likeable. But it suffers from the limitations that must ever beset the attempt to endow jazz with company manners. When Mr. Gruenberg would make his jazz sophisticated, it lacked the proper "punch," and when he permitted himself to write the genuine article, or something closely approaching it, he achieved that which, while wholly appropriate to the "Egyptian Room," counted at a Symphony concert for nothing more or less than musical vulgarity.

Back to Haydn, Forth to Jazz, Halts Between

A Symphony Concert That Everywhere Escaped Routine

AS foe of routine, Dr. Koussevitzky is recurring stimulus to the Symphony Concerts and to the whole community. He declines to do the regular thing in the regular way, which resolution is the only course to spirited living and decent dying. . . . A Symphony of Haydn is annual custom at Symphony Hall. One or another, already repertory piece and semi-standardized, awaits the conductor's hand. A little rehearsal and it is ready for performance. Familiar ears hear it. Polite hands clap it. Blessed be routine, the heaven-sent order of the universe! But Dr. Koussevitzky will not have it so. He turns over the catalogue of Messrs. Breitkopf and Härtel; pulls down this and that score; finally pitches upon the Symphony "with the horn-call"—early Haydn of 1765, not long after he entered the service of the Esterhazys, unknown to these concerts, hardly anywhere counted in the standard repertory. He prepares and plays it. Were it a "new work" from Stravinsky or Prokofiev, he could not be more solicitous of matter and manner, of an orchestra balanced and attuned.

Here, there and almost everywhere the Symphony justifies resurrection and gratifies curiosity. Haydn employs four horns—innovation in the seventeen-sixties; throughout keeps them in adept, enjoyable play. They call, echo, give and take with the other instruments. An eighteenth-century Symphony, a Symphony from Haydn, fresh-flavored. Ten years on he would be turning a Minuet suavely, in a courtly rhythm. Now he stamps out a sturdy tune. Of course, there is a finale. Presto—but not until total, by single instru-s run through ful as they are measure to last, ounding with a s nearly impossi-Haydn. And for ng audience, at plause.

oussevitzky hap-to Grosso by Filip
y birth, making
th year, at Paris.
; there, the Stra-itably infects him.
n the olden style," iling—not necessa-iano in the style of rio in the manner
l ballet with quata-
y. Rather, let it be which Dr. Kousse-after this Symphony
l doubting, Lazar es a relatively small nsitively, discreetly,
f answering choirs.
rkmanship is firm,
iding commonplace
ient style," yet not g it. With one ex-ideas are significant ener than need be m with modernism,
s Stravinsky sound

ssable barrier separe style he would render nervous tension, nsively. His slow inmost rigid with such does it quite relax its light-handed Allegretto of the Finale. How wrought, this non-

The return an easy set my cras-he ball an-beyond th-ame and wrant's bris-style" can be recapmost Lazar regale

three timéronment, and the ce also wite Massachuursted wo-1917, and hup with Mr.
Wright onc-nship at Neat Norfolk

o more moderns,
out of routine.
In the Gardens
once before at
Mr. Sanromá.
composer, conductor and

audience, to play the piano-part. It is futile to renew the controversy over the Spanish quality of de Falla's music. His fellow-Spaniards readily discover it, are moved by it. Foreigners who know Spain testify to it. Noting his sources, he himself bears modest witness. True enough, being of another temperament, he does not sound Spanish after the manner of Albéniz, who was also native to the soil; or of Chabrier, Debussy or Ravel on tour across the Pyrenees. Likely as not with these Frenchmen, the fault is theirs and ours, not de Falla's. For they are customary; whereas he is still strange.

Moreover, whether they be Spanish or not, these Nocturnes contain much music to lay hold upon the hearer. There is no driving of the orchestra, yet deep-voiced, clear-curved, pervasive sonorities; rhythms that neither languish nor swirl, but gradually intensify; shadings of color, gradations of pace and volume, now into light, again into shadow; cadences that fall new and strange upon the ear; above all and over all an atmosphere greatly weaving an illusion of night and sand in a rare and romantic beauty. Through it all the piano to sharpen a rhythm, to enforce a motif, to throw up a new turn, to toss in a perverse dissonance. Needless to say, the young but the practised, modernist in Mr. Sanromá makes such a piano-part bite and clang. A more evocative music than these night-pieces were hard to imagine. Their strangeness is their spell. Often, from conductor, pianist and orchestra, it partook of beauty.

Mr. Gruenberg's "Jazz Suite" evaded no listener, "Fox-trot tempo; Boston Waltz tempo; Blues tempo; One-step tempo"—which is to say "symphonic jazz," frank and unashamed. "Symphonic jazz," moreover, brought into orchestral being with uncanny skill and abounding resource. At the given moment, in his two pieces heard at Symphony Hall this season, Mr. Gruenberg may have less or more to say, but the pitch and point of the saying is above question. Not only does he know his orchestra; collectively and severally, he feels it. He says to it not only a practised and considering, but an instinctive, divining, hand. If there must be some repository for jazz as symphonic speech, then is his "Jazz Suite" the container.

The purists—not of symphonic music but of jazz—will make reservations. Mr. Gruenberg (they will say) misses the helter-skelter of its native exuberance; dodges the treacly tunes that often feed many amateurs, even students, it; maybe finds them symphonically unrepresentable; tends to refine upon the jazz of even the Whitemanic heyday. None the less, he catches the frenzied note; of us to qualify with a knowledge of five reiteration until it ceases to be ; cloaks harmonic dishabille;

but little the acrid sensuality;
at neither break nor blare. It that jazz has known its best the concert-hall; that already it minishing influence upon symmusic. Mr. Carpenter and Mr.
may have recovered from its other directions Mr. Gershwin turning. Mr. Gruenberg himself first movement 1925. The more that jazz of the concert-hall, as years we have known it, should ere be left incarnate. It cries Gruenberg's pages, accents, timbund, fury, rhythm inexorable.
when the Boston Orchestra goes opean tour, this "Jazz Suite" be indispensable. No other sym-orchestra plays jazz with half its For his part, Dr. Koussevitzky eves and practices. H. T. P.

W-Old Haydn d-New Lazar, ymphonic Jazz

Strange Pieces at the ymphony Concerts, Other Prospects

Feb. 20, 1930
O LESS than three novelties stand upon this week's program at Symphony Hall. Probably novices in the field of musical and many an older hand as well, astonished eyes when told that those novelties was to be drawn the works of "Papa Haydn." Has ydn been "old hat" for several ions? Is there anything about at the all-wise new generation t know? Yes, one would reply, much about him that this latest ion does not know—probably an one hundred and twenty sym- Historians credit him with one and twenty-five symphonies. that they know more than five— many as five? One ventures that could be much scratching of heads king of brains on the part of most of us to qualify with a knowledge of five

Back to Haydn Forth to Jazz Halts Between

A Symphony Concert Everywhere Escaped Routine

AS foe of routine, Dr. Koussevitzky is recurring stimulus to the Symphony Concerts and the whole community. He does not do the regular thing in the usual way, which resolution is the only way to spirited living and decent dying. A Symphony of Haydn is annual at Symphony Hall. One or another ready repertoire piece and semi-stalwarted, awaits the conductor's hand. The rehearsal and it is ready for performance. Familiar ears hear it. Polite applause. Blessed be routine, the present order of the universe! But Dr. Koussevitzky will not have it so. He turns over the catalogue of Messrs. Breitkopf and Härtel; pulls down this and that; finally pitches upon the Symphony "with the horn-call"—early Haydn, 1765, not long after he entered the service of the Esterhazys, unknown to the world, hardly anywhere counted standard repertoire. He prepares it. Were it a "new work" by Stravinsky or Prokofiev, he could be more solicitous of matter and manner, an orchestra balanced and attuned. Here, there and almost everywhere the Symphony justifies resurrection; gratifies curiosity. Haydn employs horns—innovation in the seventeenth century; throughout keeps them in enjoyable play. They call, echo and take with the other instruments. An eighteenth-century Symphony, fresh from Haydn, fresh-flavored years on he would be turning a new leaf, in a courtly rhythm. Now it stamps out a sturdy tune. Of course there is a finale. Presto—but not the orchestra, in toto, by single instruments, or in groups, has run through seven variations as fanciful as they are dextrous. From first measure to last, the whole Symphony sounding with a freshness and a liveliness nearly impossible with the hackneyed Haydn. And for proof of a reciprocating audience, at least twice the usual applause.

On his table Dr. Koussevitzky happened to have a Concerto Grosso by Philip Lazar, Roumanian by birth, making music, in his thirty-sixth year, at Paris. Dwelling and working there, the Stravinskian example inevitably infects him. He, too, will write "in the olden style," with modernistic detailing—not necessarily a Concerto for Piano in the style of Bach, an opera-oratorio in the manner of Handel, or even a ballet with quotations from Chaikovsky. Rather, let it be the Concerto Grosso which Dr. Koussevitzky set advisedly after this Symphony of Haydn. Beyond doubting, Lazar writes it well. He uses a relatively small orchestra skillfully, sensitively, discreetly, with no pretensions of answering choirs. Throughout the workmanship is firm, fluent, flexible, avoiding commonplace, suggesting "the ancient style," yet not laboriously shamming it. With one exception, the musical ideas are significant and fertile. No oftener than need be does Lazar spice them with modernisms; while only once does Stravinsky sound flagrantly.

Even so, an impassable barrier separates Lazar from the style he would represent. He writes under nervous tension. His introduction is almost rigid with such stiffness. Nowhere does it quite relax its grip, even in the light-handed Allegretto, the "imitations" of the Finale. However they may have wrought, this nervous mood is alien to the composers of Concerti Grossi from Handel downward. They wrote with minds and hands less audibly strained to the task. They were tranquil; they were spacious; a certain elegance was their natural speech. In degree, the "ancient style" can be recaptured. Better than most Lazar regains it. But the environment and the manners, the mental and the spiritual state from which it was natural impulse, are beyond recall. Every twentieth-century exercise in it remains more or less successful artifice. . . . Again an intelligent audience was quick to appreciate and applaud.

After intermission, two more moderns, each with a piece well out of routine. First de Falla's "Nights in the Gardens of Spain," heard only once before at these concerts, now with Mr. Sanromá, sympathetic to composer, conductor and audience, to play the piano-part. It is futile to renew the controversy over the Spanish quality of de Falla's music. His fellow-Spaniards readily discover it, are moved by it. Foreigners who know Spain testify to it. Noting his sources, he himself bears modest witness. True enough, being of another temperament, he does not sound Spanish after the manner of Albeniz, who was also native to the soil; or of Chabrier, Debussy or Ravel on tour across the Pyrenees. Likely as not with these Frenchmen, the fault is theirs and ours, not de Falla's. For they are customary; whereas he is still strange.

Moreover, whether they be Spanish or not, these Nocturnes contain much music to lay hold upon the hearer. There is no driving of the orchestra, yet deep-voiced, clear-curved, pervasive sonorities; rhythms that neither languish nor swirl, but gradually intensify; shadings of color, gradations of pace and volume, now into light, again into shadow; cadences that fall new and strange upon the ear; above all and over all an atmosphere greatly weaving an illusion of night and sound in a rare and romantic beauty. Through it all the piano to sharpen a rhythm, to enforce a motif, to throw up a new turn, to toss in a perverse dissonance. Needless to say, the young but the practised, modernist in Mr. Sanromá makes such a piano-part bite and clang. A more evocative music than these night-pieces were hard to imagine. Their strangeness is their spell. Often, from conductor, pianist and orchestra, it partook of beauty.

Mr. Gruenberg's "Jazz Suite" evaded no listener. "Fox-trot tempo; Boston Waltz tempo; Blues tempo; One-step tempo"—which is to say "symphonic jazz," frank and unashamed. "Symphonic jazz," moreover, brought into orchestral being with uncanny skill and abounding resource. At the given moment, in his two pieces heard at Symphony Hall this season, Mr. Gruenberg may have less or more to say, but the pith and point of the saying is above question. Not only does he know his orchestra; collectively and severally, he feels it. He lays to it not only a practised and considering, but an instinctive, divining hand. If there must be some repository for jazz as symphonic speech, then is his "Jazz Suite" the container.

The purists—not of symphonic music but of jazz—will make reservations. Mr. Gruenberg (they will say) misses the helter-skelter of its native exuberance; dodges the treacly tunes that often feed many amateurs, even students; it, maybe finds them symphonically unrepresentable; tends to refine upon the jazz of even the Whiteman heyday. None the less, he catches the frenzied note; of us to qualify with a knowledge of five reiteration until it ceases to be; cloaks harmonic dishabille; but little the acrid sensuality; at neither break nor blare. It is that jazz has known its best the concert-hall; that already it is finishing influence upon symphonic music. Mr. Carpenter and Mr. Gruenberg may have recovered from its other directions Mr. Gershwin turning. Mr. Gruenberg himself first movement 1925. The more that jazz of the concert-hall, as years we have known it, should be left incarnate. It cries Gruenberg's pages, accents, timbre, fury, rhythm inexorable. When the Boston Orchestra goes on European tour, this "Jazz Suite" be indispensable. No other symphony orchestra plays jazz with half its For his part, Dr. Koussevitzky leaves and practices. H. T. P.

W-Old Haydn d-New Lazar, ymphonic Jazz

Strange Pieces at the Symphony Concerts, Other Prospects

Feb. 20, 1930
NO LESS than three novelties stand upon this week's program at Symphony Hall. Probably novices in the field of musical and many an older hand as well, astonished eyes when told that those novelties was to be drawn from the works of "Papa Haydn." Has Haydn been "old hat" for several generations? Is there anything about the all-wise new generation that they know? Yes, one would reply, much about him that this latest generation does not know—probably not one hundred and twenty symphonies. Historians credit him with one and twenty-five symphonies. That they know more than five—many as five? One ventures that could be much scratching of heads king of brains on the part of most of us to qualify with a knowledge of five

Back to Haydn Forth to Jazz Halts Between

A Symphony Concert Everywhere Escaped Routine

AS foe of routine, Dr. Koussevitzky is recurring stimulus to the Symphony Concerts and the whole community. He does to do the regular thing in the way, which resolution is the only to spirited living and decent dying. A Symphony of Haydn is annual at Symphony Hall. One or another ready repertory piece and semi-stalwarted, awaits the conductor's hand. The rehearsal and it is ready for performance. Familiar ears hear it. Polite clap it. Blessed be routine, the honest order of the universe! But Dr. Koussevitzky will not have it so. He turns over the catalogue of Messrs. Breitkopf and Härtel; pulls down this and that score; finally pitches upon the Symphony "with the horn-call"—early Haydn, 1765, not long after he entered the service of the Esterhazys, unknown to the world, hardly anywhere counted standard repertory. He prepares to play it. Were it a "new work" by Stravinsky or Prokofiev, he could be more solicitous of matter and manner, an orchestra balanced and attuned to the work. Here, there and almost everywhere, the Symphony justifies resurrection. Haydn employs horns—innovation in the seventeenth century; throughout keeps them in enjoyable play. They call, echo and take with the other instruments. An eighteenth-century Symphony, fresh from Haydn, fresh-flavored years on he would be turning a page, suavely, in a courtly rhythm. No stamps out a sturdy tune. Of course there is a finale. Presto—but not the orchestra, in toto, by single instruments, or in groups, has run through seven variations as fanciful as they are dextrous. From first measure to last, the whole Symphony sounding with a freshness and a liveliness nearly impossible with the hackneyed Haydn. And for proof of a reciprocating audience, at least twice the usual applause.

On his table Dr. Koussevitzky happened to have a Concerto Grosso by Philip Lazar, Roumanian by birth, making music, in his thirty-sixth year, at Paris. Dwelling and working there, the Stravinskian example inevitably infects him. He, too, will write "in the olden style," with modernistic detailing—not necessarily a Concerto for Piano in the style of Bach, an opera-oratorio in the manner of Handel, or even a ballet with quotations from Chaikovsky. Rather, let it be the Concerto Grosso which Dr. Koussevitzky set advisedly after this Symphony of Haydn. Beyond doubting, Lazar writes it well. He uses a relatively small orchestra skillfully, sensitively, discreetly, with no pretensions of answering choirs. Throughout the workmanship is firm, fluent, flexible, avoiding commonplace, suggesting "the ancient style," yet not laboriously shamming it. With one exception, the musical ideas are significant and fertile. No oftener than need be does Lazar spice them with modernism, while only once does Stravinsky sound flagrantly.

Even so, an impassable barrier separates Lazar from the style he would represent. He writes under nervous tension, intensively, intensively. His slow introduction is almost rigid with suchness. Nowhere does it quite relax its grip, even in the light-handed Allegretto of the "imitations" of the Finale. However they may have wrought, this nervous mood is alien to the composers of Concerti Grossi from Handel downward. They wrote with minds and hands less audibly strained to the task. They were tranquil; they were spacious; a certain elegance was their natural speech. In degree, the "ancient style" can be recaptured. Better than most Lazar regains it. But the environment and the manners, the mental and the spiritual state from which it was natural impulse, are beyond recall. Every twentieth-century exercise in it remains more or less successful artifice. . . . Again an intelligent audience was quick to appreciate and applaud.

After intermission, two more moderns, each with a piece well out of routine. First de Falla's "Nights in the Gardens of Spain," heard only once before at these concerts, now with Mr. Santona sympathetic to composer, conductor and audience, to play the futility to renew the con Spanish quality of de Falla moved by it. Foreign Spain testify to it. Not he himself bears model enough, being of ment, he does not so the manner of Albeniz tive to the soil; or of or Ravel on tour ac likely as not with the fault is theirs and o For they are custom still strange.

Moreover, whether not, these Nocturnes to lay hold upon the driving of the orches clear-curved, pervasiv that neither languish ually intensify; shad tions of pace and vo again into shadow; e and strange upon th over all an atmospher an illusion of night and romantical bea the piano to sharp force a motif, to t to toss in a pervers less to say, the yo modernist in Mr. S piano-part bite and cative music than h hard to imagine. their spell. Often, and orchestra, it r

Mr. Gruenberg, no listener, "For Waltz tempo: B tempo"—which i jazz." Frank an phonic jazz." mo ches tral being w abounding resourc ment, in his tw phony Hall this may have less o pith and point question. Not o ches tral; collectiv it. He lays to it considering, but hand. If there for jazz as sym "Jazz Suite" the The purists— but of jazz—w Gruenberg (the ter-skelter of dodges the tre it; maybe find presentable; te of even the V the less, he

gains scenc TIFI

t. The la vicious r caught, escape . . gars with the ends! half of all are still e subject

ects you ag every toh

whips up reiteration until it ceases to be monotony; cloaks harmonic dishabille; softens but little the acrid sensuality; blushes at neither break nor blare. It may be that jazz has known its best days in the concert-hall; that already it is a diminishing influence upon symphonic music. Mr. Carpenter and Mr. Copland may have recovered from its spell; in other directions Mr. Gershwin may be turning. Mr. Gruenberg himself dates his first movement 1925. The more reason that jazz of the concert-hall, as in recent years we have known it, should somewhere be left incarnate. It cries off Mr. Gruenberg's pages, accents, timbres, sound, fury, rhythm inexorable. If and when the Boston Orchestra goes on European tour, this "Jazz Suite" should be indispensable. No other symphony orchestra plays jazz with half its gusto. For his part, Dr. Koussevitzky still believes and practices. H. T. P.

New-Old Haydn Old-New Lazar, Symphonic Jazz

Three Strange Pieces at the Symphony Concerts, Other Prospects

Jan. 21. — Feb. 21, 1930

NO LESS than three novelties stand upon this week's program at Symphony Hall. Probably novices in the field of musical history, and many an older hand as well, opened astonished eyes when told that one of those novelties was to be drawn from the works of "Papa Haydn." Has not Haydn been "old hat" for several generations? Is there anything about him that the all-wise new generation does not know? Yes, one would reply, there is much about him that this latest generation does not know—probably more than one hundred and twenty symphonies. Historians credit him with one hundred and twenty-five symphonies. How many amateurs, even students, can say that they know more than five—or as many as five? One ventures that there would be much scratching of heads and racking of brains on the part of most of us to qualify with a knowledge of five of Haydn's symphony played belong to the written by Haydn in London, near the end of the phony of this earliest years of with Count Esterházy score remains in at Eisenstadt. Up words: "Sinfonia. Giuseppe Haydn. of D major, scored for oboes, and, except four horns, in strings. And the poser gives place a "Cambloux (Haute-) an 12 Sept. 1929." There are four in E minor, 4-4. T with a figure which more like Handel t in the orchestra. Allegro, with an in up of repeated note chiefly characteriz alternates measure of 2-8. There are terludes. The move gestion of the Larg II. Largo. A mi

The opening All is exceedingly sim-busy, naive rhyth pace, short. An repeated notes, or tive, expressive other passages. A trast in which tw music. The succe trumpet repeats t pressive violin-solo oboe. There is f as only Haydn, of movement closes.
could embroder.
come obligato
Minuet is again fo cal Haydn esque for the finale, Hay variations. The t square-cut sentenc ures each. And tions adhere stric
the seventh a sho Presto, a busily-n orchestra, contain and many gay rh of charm and s means surprising combining the mu seventeenth and forgotten works one among the Haydn.

If anyone is identity of the musical fashions no farther than say as much is no number on the firms a rather Filip Lazar has a Symphony Concerto he was unfinch "these concerts" Concerto Grosso olden style," the The "master" "we Handel, or to some there are who fo Lazar writes a co "modern" conson est demands up oboes, two bassoon pet, kettle-drums his score. It is a manuscript and where. At the en poser gives place a "Cambloux (Haute-an 12 Sept. 1929."

There are four n
E minor, 4-4. T with a figure whic more like Handel t in the orchestra.
Allegro, with an i up of repeated not chiefly characteriz alternates measure of 2-8. There are terludes. The move gestion of the Larg

II. Largo, A mi is exceedingly sim pace, short. An tive, expressive n
A trast in which tw trumpet repeats t oboe. There is fu movement closes.

III. Allegretto, free, gay, light-h rhythms are active scored for strings. Contrast-section runs for strings. The "Capo," to the be

IV. Allegro, E
ment is made up the device known are two principal developing them times. The first, oboe, then at once with a large leap trills, rapid no given out, by a of a Bach fugue and sensitively are mostly conso
there overlaid sonance and mo
the dissonance sonance. There the style of any

After a trans-
"Nights in the piano and orchas pianist, the American, Lou-Jazz Suite for bered Opus 28
Paris Dec. 15,
York in 1929; fi-cinnati Sympho-Reiner, March played at Chic-
It was the sec-the competitiowon first pri-Rhapsody, "An-
"symphonic ja-composition.

The very names of the movements indicate varieties of jazz. Thus over the first movement Mr. Gruenberg writes, "Fox-trot tempo—Allegretto ben ritmico." The second is in "Boston-Waltz tempo—Valse lente e molto languido." The third proceeds to "Blues-tempo, slow drag—Moderato, ma non troppo, sempre molto ritmico." And the Suite ends with a movement in "One-Step tempo—Allegro assai." The orchestra is the usual full orchestra of the present day. There is no excessive use of percussion; but celesta and glockenspiel are frequently and significantly employed, giving many effects of charming delicacy. The orchestration is masterly. There is no over-scoring; the texture is varied from fullness to the play of a few strands; "breathing places" are not lacking.

The motifs and themes are such as one would expect to find. An ascending theme in the bassoons begins the first movement, accompanied by descending flutes, with slides and grace-notes characteristic of the jazz idiom. Other instruments continue it. A trumpet soars languidly above this activity. A new note is introduced (technically perhaps the "second theme") when first violins enter lyrically with a melody suggestive of "blues." There are further figures of crisp rhythm, a humorous theme in English horn and double-bassoon. After considerable development the conclusion is a lightly tripping measures.

Horns introduce the slow waltz of the second movement over a weird accompaniment in strings. The dance is punctuated by playful woodwind figures. The slow waltz is interrupted by an old-fashioned "Tempo di Valse—Presto." Several times the "Boston" and the older fast waltz alternate. Then in very slow tempo the "Boston" ends the movement.

Horns also give out the main theme of the "Blues" section which has a smart rhythmic accompaniment of woodwinds and brass, and a pianissimo descending figure in high muted strings. There are elaborate secondary figures sharply rhythmized, before the theme appears again, this time in the violoncellos. (Theme and secondary figures pass in alternation many times.

The "One-Step" is the longest of the four movements. It is bright and gay throughout. The chief feature is its persistently strong, snappy, rhythm. Trumpet-themes and motifs are frequently prominent. There are interludes more restrained in character. Through an Allegretto Giocoso and a Vivace it comes to a tumultuous end.

A. H. M.

A. H. M.

Mr. JESÚS MARÍA SANROMÁ, pianist, was born in 1903, in Porto Rico, of Catalonian parents. He studied there under Dolores de la Plaza y Bird. In 1917 he was sent to this country by the Porto Rican Government to complete his musical education, and in that year he entered the New England Conservatory of Music, studying with David Sequeira. He was graduated in 1920 with honors and was the winner of the pianoforte prize of that year. For seven years following, he studied with Mme. Antoinette Szumowska. He has played in concerts, as soloist with the MacDowell Club Orchestra, the People's Symphony Orchestra, the Boston Musical Association, the Flute Players' Club, and more recently with the Boston Symphony Orchestra; he has also given several recitals here. He made a tour of the country as accompanist for Jacques Thibaud. In the season of 1926-27, he was the official pianist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In 1926 he appeared in New York as soloist at the League of Composers concert, at which Dr. Koussevitzky introduced Honegger's "Concertino." Mr. Sanromá in 1927 studied with Cortot in Paris, and in Berlin with Schnabel. He gave recitals in Berlin, Paris, Madrid, and Barcelona, and in 1929 he again played in European cities.

He was the soloist at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston, December, 28, 29, 1928, playing Ernest Toch's Concerto, Op. 38—the first performance of the work in Boston.

Mr. Gruenberg came to the United States in 1885 and was educated in the public schools of New York. He took piano lessons of Adele Margulies. He later studied at the master school of the Vienna Conservatory; still later, with Busoni, piano-playing and composition. He also studied composition at Berlin with Fr. E. Koch. Having toured in European countries as a pianist, he returned to the United States with Busoni. In 1919 he played at a recital in New York some of his own compositions, among them "Five Impressions based on Oriental Themes." He is one of the founders of the American Composers' Guild; a director of the International Composers' Guild; president of the United States section of the International Society for Contemporary Music.

of Haydn's symphonies. Those oftenest played belong to the two sets of six each written by Haydn for Salomon of London, near the end of his life. The symphony of this week dates from the earliest years of Haydn's employment with Count Esterhazy. The autograph score remains in the Esterhazy archives at Eisenstadt. Upon it are inscribed the words: "Sinfonia. In Nomine Domini. Giuseppe Haydn. 765." It is in the key of D major, scored for one flute, two oboes, and, exceptionally for the time, four horns, in addition to the usual strings. And the horns have no small place.

The opening Allegro consists largely of busy, naive rhythms, for the most part in repeated notes, or in bustling scale and other passages. A pleasant, if child-like, music. The succeeding Adagio is an expressive violin-solo, ornately embroidered as only Haydn, of these older composers, could embroider. From the horn-quartet come obbligato counter-melodies. The Minuet is again for full orchestra, of typical Haydnesque flavor. As beginning for the finale, Haydn writes a theme with variations. The theme consists of two-square-cut sentences of exactly eight measures each. And all of the seven variations adhere strictly to this form. After the seventh a short interlude leads to a Presto, a busily-moving division for full orchestra, containing much passage-work and many gay rhythms. The whole, full of charm and sunshine. It is by no means surprising that Dr. Koussevitzky, combing the musical literature of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries for forgotten works of interest, should find one among the earlier symphonies of Haydn.

If anyone is inclined to doubt the identity of the composer who sets the musical fashions of the day, he need look no farther than Igor Stravinsky. To say as much is no discovery; but the second number on this week's program confirms a rather widespread impression. Philip Lazar has already been heard at a Symphony Concert. At such hearing he was unflinchingly modernist. For "these concerts" he has now written a Concerto Grosso No. 1, Op. 17—"in the olden style," the announcement added. The "master" "went back" to Bach, or to Handel, or to some other ancient. Others there are who follow. And the faithful Lazar writes a concerto in the good old "modern" consonances. He makes modest demands upon his orchestra. Two oboes, two bassoons, two horns, one trumpet, kettle-drums and strings can play his score. It is a new score, played from manuscript and for the first times anywhere. At the end of the score the com-

Glass for Windshields One to require that motor vehicles by all carrying passengers for hire be equipped with nonscatterable windshields was supported to several speakers before the legis- committee on Highways and Moof the Civil ssachusetts entative Fred L. Butler of Leom of "Strange ne petitioner, exhibited a wind many per- gen from a car in which two per particularly e instantly killed and which, alause Mayor racked, remained intact. Fornd, the play or Bernard Doyle of Leominster, here should ing the Du Pont Viscoloid Com persons in Leominster, told the committee their views cent investigation conducted by when plays are involved, Senator asked those (International Newsreel)

er at St. Louis, Mo., Will World Record

the world distance record in 26,900 Feet
which he made on July 17, America a flying from Brownsville, Tex., to Canada, a distance of 1650

by the Na
ly other United States record
in the first category, for two weighing less than 881 pounds
This American record of 18,543 The latest held by Willfred G. Moore. The American air category in the light plane class gle seaters weighing less than
ds. No American records are latest flight Zimmerley, flying cockpit Barling NB-3 encoun peratures down to 32 degrees

co. One barograph registered t, and the other 26,900. These calibrated before his exact alti be determined.

uld Curtail nsorship by icense Board

Barney

the world distance record in 26,900 Feet
which he made on July 17, America a flying from Brownsville, Tex., to Canada, a distance of 1650

by the Na
ly other United States record
in the first category, for two weighing less than 881 pounds
This American record of 18,543 The latest
held by Willfred G. Moore. The American air category in the light plane class
gle seaters weighing less than
ds. No American records are was apie hidden of vell for a ether he

MARÍA SANROMÁ, pianist, was born in 1903, in Porto alonian parents. He studied there under Dolores de la
d. In 1917 he was sent to this country by the Porto ment to complete his musical education, and in that red the New England Conservatory of Music, studying Sequeira. He was graduated in 1920 with honors and ner of the pianoforte prize of that year. For seven years e studied with Mme. Antoinette Szumowska. He has ncerts, as soloist with the MacDowell Club Orchestra, Symphony Orchestra, the Boston Musical Association, layers' Club, and more recently with the Boston Symstra; he has also given several recitals here. He made e country as accompanist for Jacques Thibaud. In the 26-27, he was the official pianist of the Boston Symestra. In 1926 he appeared in New York as soloist at of Composers concert, at which Dr. Koussevitzky in-megger's "Concertino." Mr. Sanromá in 1927 studied in Paris, and in Berlin with Schnabel. He gave re-rlin, Paris, Madrid, and Barcelona, and in 1929 he in European cities.

he soloist at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Boston, December, 28, 29, 1928, playing Ernest Toch's
. 38—the first performance of the work in Boston.

berg came to the United States in 1885 and was edu-public schools of New York. He took piano lessons of lies. He later studied at the master school of the ervatory; still later, with Busoni, piano-playing and He also studied composition at Berlin with Fr. E. ng toured in European countries as a pianist, he re-United States with Busoni. In 1919 he played at a ew York some of his own compositions, among them ssions based on Oriental Themes." He is one of the the American Composers' Guild; a director of the Composers' Guild; president of the United States International Society for Contemporary Music.

of Haydn's symposer gives place and date of composition: played belong to "Cambloux (Haute-Saovie). In 20 Juillet written by Haydn an 12 Sept. 1929." don, near the end There are four movements. I. Largo, phony of this E minor, 4-4. The wood-winds begin earliest years of with a figure which on paper looks much with Count Ester more like Handel than it actually sounds score remains in in the orchestra. There follows a fugue, at Eisenstadt. U Allegro, with an interesting theme made words: "Sinfonia. up of repeated notes and strong leaps, but Giuseppe Haydn. chiefly characterized by the fact that it of D major, scor alternates measures of 3-8 with measures in- oboes, and, excep of 2-8. There are actively rhythm ed four horns, in terludes. The movement closes with a sug- strings. And the gestion of the Largo with which it began. place. II. Largo, A minor, 4-8. The movement

The opening All is exceedingly simple and, except for slow busy, naive rhyth pace, short. An oboe-solo sings a plain- repeated notes, or tive, expressive melody. There is con- other passages. A trast in which two solo-violins figure. A music. The succe trumpet repeats the initial solo of the pressive violin-solo oboe. There is further contrast, and the as only Haydn, of movement closes. could embroider. III. Allegretto, E major, 4-4. A care- come obbligato free, gay, light-hearted movement. The Minuet is again fo rhythms are active and sprightly. It is cal Haydnesque scored for strings alone. The main con- for the finale, Hay trast-section runs in rapid triplets, also variations. The t for strings. Then there is return, "Da square-cut sentenc Capo," to the beginning. ures each. And IV. Allegro, E minor, 3-4. This move- tions adhere stric ment is made up of counterpoint full of the seventh a sho the device known as "imitation." There Presto, a busily-n are two principal themes. The divisions orchestra, contain developing them are alternated several and many gay rh times. The first, heard initially from an of charm and s oboe, then at once from a bassoon, begins means surprising with a large leap—a descending octave— trills, rapid notes. The second, first combing the mu given out, by a trumpet, recalls a theme seventeenth and e of a Bach fugue. The whole is deftly forgotten works and sensitively scored. The harmonies one among the are mostly consonant. They are here and Haydn. there overlaid with just enough dis- sonance and modernistic device to point the dissonance and sweeten the con- sonance. There is no attempt to write in the style of any particular old master.

If anyone is After a transition through de Falla's identity of the c "Nights in the Gardens of Spain," for musical fashions piano and orchestra, with Mr. Sanromá no farther than as pianist, the program turns to the say as much is ne the American, Louis Gruenberg, with his ond number on th Jazz Suite for Orchestra. It is num- firms a rather bered Opus 28. It was completed at Filip Lazar has a Paris Dec. 15, 1925; published by the Cin- Symphony Conce York in 1929; first performed by the Fritz he was unfincl cinnati Symphony Orchestra under Fritz "these concerts" bered Opus 28. It was completed by the Cin- Concerto Grosso Paris Dec. 15, 1925; published by the Cin- olden style," the York in 1929; first performed by the Fritz The "master" we cinnati Symphony Orchestra under Fritz Handel, or to some played at Chicago, Nov. 8 and 9, 1929. there are who fo It was the second choice of the judges in Lazar writes a co the competition in which Ernest Bloch "modern" consor won first prize with his Symphonic est demands upo Rhapsody, "America." If ever the term oboes, two bassor "symphonic jazz" is justified, it is in this pet, kettle-drums his score. It is a composition. manuscript and where. At the en

ued from Page One

in such decisions by al the board.

itude

Lurie of Boston, a member tive committee of the Civil ommittee of Massachusetts, er the banning of "Strange ere, there were many per- ought the play a particularly at that just because Mayor of a different mind, the play ved to Quincy. There should ty, he said, for persons in- plays to present their views earing, especially when plays ange Interlude" are involved. Lurie had finished, Senator

MARÍA SANROMÁ, pianist, was born in 1903, in Porto Galonian parents. He studied there under Dolores de la d. In 1917 he was sent to this country by the Porto ment to complete his musical education, and in that red the New England Conservatory of Music, studying Sequeira. He was graduated in 1920 with honors and ner of the pianoforte prize of that year. For seven years studied with Mme. Antoinette Szumowska. He has ncerts, as soloist with the MacDowell Club Orchestra, Symphony Orchestra, the Boston Musical Association, layers' Club, and more recently with the Boston Sym- tra; he has also given several recitals here. He made e country as accompanist for Jacques Thibaud. In the 26-27, he was the official pianist of the Boston Sym- stra. In 1926 he appeared in New York as soloist at of Composers concert, at which Dr. Koussevitzky in- negger's "Concertino." Mr. Sanromá in 1927 studied in Paris, and in Berlin with Schnabel. He gave re- lin, Paris, Madrid, and Barcelona, and in 1929 he in European cities.

Barney

Feat in Reaching 26,900 Feet
Bring to America a

L recognition by the Na Aeronautic Association and deration Aeronautique Inter Paris of altitude marks is thin two weeks. The latest of world and American air- shed by the contest commit- National Association gives y three places in the light s, and two of these will soon- ords, both held by Pilot Zim- apparently sufficient interes- aroused in this country in even to prompt qualifica- American records.

herley's recent achievemen s bring him the world alti in the third category of the e class, which means tha- as a single seater weighing and 771 pounds empty. He soloist at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Boston, December, 28, 29, 1928, playing Ernest Toch's 38—the first performance of the work in Boston.

rg came to the United States in 1885 and was edu- public schools of New York. He took piano lessons of ries. He later studied at the master school of the vatory; still later, with Busoni, piano-playing and He also studied composition at Berlin with Fr. E. g toured in European countries as a pianist, he re- United States with Busoni. In 1919 he played at a York some of his own compositions, among them ons based on Oriental Themes." He is one of the he American Composers' Guild; a director of the Composers' Guild; president of the United States International Society for Contemporary Music.

odwin's estimate was ap correct.

Question

ive Renton Whidden of assed Mr. Coggeswell for a ment as to whether he of Haydn's symphonies played belong to the first movement written by Haydn in 1791, near the end of his earliest years of phony of this with Count Esterházy. The score remains in the original at Eisenstadt. The words: "Sinfonia" Giuseppe Haydn. of D major, score of oboes, and, except four horns, in strings. And the place.

The opening All is busy, naive rhythmic repeated notes, or other passages. A music. The success as only Haydn, of could embroder. come obligato Minuet is again for the finale, Hay variations. The square-cut sentences each. And tions adhere strictly the seventh a Presto, a busily orchestra, contain and many gay rh of charm and s means surprising combining the mu seventeenth and forgotten works one among the Haydn.

If anyone is identity of the musical fashions no farther than say as much is no number on the firms a rather Philip Lazar has a Symphony Concerto he was unflinching "these concerts" Concerto Grosso olden style," the The "master" "we Handel, or to some there are who for Lazar writes a "modern" consonant est demands upon oboes, two bassoon, kettle-drums his score. It is a manuscript and where. At the end poser gives place a "Cambloux (Haute- an 12 Sept. 1929."

There are four minor, 4-4. T with a figure which more like Handel in the orchestra. Allegro, with an up of repeated note chiefly characterizes alternates measures of 2-8. There are in the strings. The move is exceedingly simple, short. An expressive movement closes.

II. Largo, A mi

III. Allegretto,

free, gay, light rhythms are active scored for strings. The first section runs for strings. The "Capo," to the beginning.

IV. Allegro, E

ment is made up the device known are two principal developing them times. The first, oboe, then at once with a large leap trills, rapid notes given out, by a of a Bach fugue and sensitively are mostly consonant there overlaid sonance and mod the dissonance sonance. There is the style of any

After a transition "Nights in the piano and orchestra as pianist, the American, Louis Jazz Suite for 28. Paris Dec. 15, 1929; first cinnati Symphony Reiner, March 22, played at Chicago. It was the second the competition won first prize Rhapsody, "American symphonic jazz" composition.

The very names of the movements indicate varieties of jazz. Thus over the first movement Mr. Gruenberg writes, "Fox-trot tempo—Allegretto bien ritmico." The second is in "Boston-Waltz tempo—Valse lente e molto languida." The third proceeds to "Blues-tempo, slow drag—Moderato, ma non troppo, sempre molto ritmico." And the Suite ends with a movement in "One-Step tempo—Allegro assai." The orchestra is the usual full orchestra of the present day. There is no excessive use of percussion; but celesta and glockenspiel are frequently and significantly employed, giving many effects of charming delicacy. The orchestrator is masterly. There is no over-scoring; the texture is varied from fullness to the play of a few strands; "breathing places" are not lacking.

The motifs and themes are such as one would expect to find. An ascending theme in the bassoons begins the first movement, accompanied by descending flutes, with slides and grace notes characteristic of the jazz idiom. Other instruments continue it. A trumpet soars languidly above this activity. A new note is introduced (technically perhaps the "second theme") when first violins enter lyrically with a melody suggestive of "blues." There are further figures of crisp rhythm, a humorous theme in English horn and double-bassoon. After considerable development the conclusion comes in lightly tripping measures.

Horns introduce the slow waltz of the second movement over a weird accompaniment in strings. The dance is punctuated by playful woodwind figures. The slow waltz is interrupted by an old-fashioned "Tempo di Valse—Presto." Several times the "Boston" and the older fast waltz alternate. Then in very slow tempo the "Boston" ends the movement.

Horns also give out the main theme of the "Blues" section which has a smart rhythmic accompaniment of woodwinds and brass, and a pianissimo descending figure in high muted strings. There are elaborate secondary figures sharply rhythmed, before the theme appears again, this time in the violoncellos. Theme and secondary figures pass in alternation many times. The "One-Step" is the longest of the four movements. It is bright and gay throughout. The chief feature is its persistently strong, snappy, rhythm. Trumpet themes and motifs are frequently prominent. There are interludes more restrained in character. Through an Allegretto Giocoso and a Vivace it comes to a tumultuous end.

Mr. JESÚS MARÍA SANROMÁ, pianist, was born in 1903, in Porto Rico, of Catalan parents. He studied there under Dolores de la Plaza y Bird. In 1917 he was sent to this country by the Porto Rican Government to complete his musical education, and in that year he entered the New England Conservatory of Music, studying with David Sequeira. He was graduated in 1920 with honors and was the winner of the pianoforte prize of that year. For seven years following, he studied with Mme. Antoinette Szumowska. He has played in concerts, as soloist with the MacDowell Club Orchestra, the People's Symphony Orchestra, the Boston Musical Association, the Flute Players' Club, and more recently with the Boston Symphony Orchestra; he has also given several recitals here. He made a tour of the country as accompanist for Jacques Thibaud. In the season of 1926-27, he was the official pianist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In 1926 he appeared in New York as soloist at the League of Composers concert, at which Dr. Koussevitzky introduced Honegger's "Concertino." Mr. Sanromá in 1927 studied with Cortot in Paris, and in Berlin with Schnabel. He gave recitals in Berlin, Paris, Madrid, and Barcelona, and in 1929 he again played in European cities.

He was the soloist at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston, December, 28, 29, 1928, playing Ernest Toch's Concerto, Op. 38—the first performance of the work in Boston.

Mr. Gruenberg came to the United States in 1885 and was educated in the public schools of New York. He took piano lessons of Adele Margulies. He later studied at the master school of the Vienna Conservatory; still later, with Busoni, piano-playing and composition. He also studied composition at Berlin with Fr. E. Koch. Having toured in European countries as a pianist, he returned to the United States with Busoni. In 1919 he played at a recital in New York some of his own compositions, among them "Five Impressions based on Oriental Themes." He is one of the founders of the American Composers' Guild; a director of the International Composers' Guild; president of the United States section of the International Society for Contemporary Music.

Seventeenth Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, FEBRUARY 28, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, MARCH 1, at 8.15 o'clock

Bach Prelude and Fugue in E-flat (for Organ)
(Arranged for Orchestra by Schönberg)
(First time in Boston)

Sibelius Concerto for Violin and Orchestra in D minor, Op. 47

- I. Allegro moderato.
- II. Adagio di molto.
- III. Allegro ma non tanto.

Sibelius Symphony No. 6, Op. 104

- I. Allegro molto moderato.
- II. Allegro moderato.
- III. Poco vivace.
- IV. Allegro molto.

(First time in Boston)

Wagner Prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan und Isolde"

SOLOIST

RICHARD BURGIN

There will be an intermission after the concerto

The works to be played at these concerts may be seen in the Allen A. Brown Music Collection of the Boston Public Library one week before the concert

RICHARD BURGIN

Symphony Concert

By PHILIP HALE

It was announced a week ago that the program of the Boston Symphony concert of yesterday would comprise Florent Schmitt's "Study of Poe's 'Haunted Palace'"; Sibelius's Violin Concerto and Symphony, No. 6.

Schmitt's "Study" was reserved for a later occasion. The program then read: Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 2; the Violin Concerto and symphony by Sibelius; Prelude and Love Death from "Tristan and Isolde."

Late in the week the score and parts of Schoenberg's transcription for orchestra of Bach's Organ Prelude and Fugue in E flat major were received. Bach's Brandenburg Concerto was thrown overboard, but the last change was made too late for the Program Book, which necessarily contained no note about the transcription and retained the pages about Bach's Concerto.

The program finally presented was as follows: Bach-Schoenberg, Organ Prelude and Fugue in E flat major transcribed for orchestra. Sibelius, Violin Concerto (Richard Burgin, violinist). Sibelius, Symphony No. 6. Wagner, Prelude and Love Death from "Tristan and Isolde." Dr. Koussevitzky conducted.

These moderns will not let Bach alone. What do they not do to him? The organ Prelude and Fugue transcribed by Schoenberg were originally separate compositions, that is not compositions of one jet. The fugue is the one known in England and this country as the "Saint Anne" fugue because there is a similarity between the first notes of the fugue's subject and those of the familiar, stately psalm or hymn tune. The authorship of this tune is ascribed to Dr. Croft, but it is said that the first strain of it is from a French chanson of the 16th century. There are some who will resent the transcription for full orchestra, seeing in it only Schoenberg's desire to show ingenuity in orchestration without regard to the characteristics of the original; to turn a noble prelude and a masterly fugue into a bedecked and bedizened showy, virtuoso piece. On the other hand transcribers may reply, if organists persist in playing the "Ride of the Valkyrie" and Dvorak's "From the New World" symphony on the organ, why should we not be allowed to make Bach's organ music more popular by employing strings, wood-wind, brass and percussion instruments? If Schoenberg had only written in a parenthesis following the title "Prelude and Fugue in

E major (after Bach and longways after)!" Impressive and sonorous continuity in the prelude was thus turned into mosaic patterns and kaleidoscopic effects. It was all very clever in its irreverential modernism, and as it was brilliantly performed, great was the joy of the audience.

Two Sibeliuses entered into Symphony hall yesterday: The composer who wrote the violin concerto 25 years ago; the Sibelius who wrote the Symphony, hitherto not performed here, of 1923. Only here and there in the Symphony was the earlier Sibelius revealed.

The rhapsodic Concerto is the work of the man still obsessed by Finland's epic; the man on whose musical horizon a tempest was ever looming; the composer whose most characteristic music often suggested the "Spasms of the Sky and the Shatter of the Sea"; music of passionate emotion; wild, heaven-assailing defiance; the darkness of black melancholy. Music peculiarly individual, not recognizing influence or school. Music robust, dramatic, often tragic; yet at times tender without sensuousness; lighter moments turning to demoniacal fury.

The sixth Symphony might be considered by his many warm admirers as in the nature of an experiment. An experiment in structure, in harmonic schemes, even in orchestration. Or as a sketch in black and white to be afterwards enlarged as a painting. The work seems to us in thematic invention, in expositions and developments, in emotional appeals, in the employment of instruments the weakest of his symphonies. Later works have shown that his creative powers have not failed; but here is thinness, a passion for the repetition of insignificant, almost childish figures, an absence even of sentiment—these seem inexplicable. In spite of Dr. Koussevitzky's care in preparation, and in performance the symphony to which one had looked forward disappointed those eager to praise.

Mr. Burgin's performance of the concerto was more than technically brilliant. There are other qualities necessary for an impressive, even an adequate rendering of the work. These qualities were fully displayed. An excellent musician-virtuoso might easily content himself with an exterior view; the inner, the emotional contents and the prevailing rhapsodic, bardic spirit might as easily escape him. They did not escape Mr. Burgin.

The familiar Wagnerian excerpt was strongly in contrast with what had preceded. Here sensuousness in highly dramatic guise made its customary appeal to nerves and to other organs than the ears. The concert will be repeated tonight. The next concerts will be on March 14-15. The program, as announced, will be: Galliard-Steinberg, Sonata in G major. Martelli, Assyrian Bas Reliefs (first performance). Strauss, An Alpine Symphony.

RICHARD BURGIN

Symphony Concert

By PHILIP HALE

It was announced a week ago that the program of the Boston Symphony concert of yesterday would comprise Florent Schmitt's "Study of Poe's Haunted Palace"; Sibelius's Violin Concerto and Symphony, No. 6.

Schmitt's "Study" was reserved for a later occasion. The program then read: Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 2; the Violin Concerto and symphony by Sibelius; Prelude and Love Death from "Tristan and Isolde."

Late in the week the score and parts of Schoenberg's transcription for orchestra of Bach's Organ Prelude and Fugue in E flat major were received. Bach's Brandenburg Concerto was thrown overboard, but the last change was made too late for the Program Book, which necessarily contained no note about the transcription and retained the pages about Bach's Concerto.

The program finally presented was as follows: Bach-Schoenberg, Organ Prelude and Fugue in E flat major transcribed for orchestra; Sibelius, Violin Concerto (Richard Burgin, violinist); Sibelius, Symphony No. 6; Wagner, Prelude and Love Death from "Tristan and Isolde." Dr. Koussevitzky conducted.

These moderns will not let Bach alone. What do they not do to him? The organ Prelude and Fugue transcribed by Schoenberg were originally separate compositions, that is not compositions of one jet. The fugue is the one known in England and this country as the "Saint Anne" fugue because there is a similarity between the first notes of the fugue's subject and those of the familiar, stately psalm or hymn tune. The authorship of this tune is ascribed to Dr. Craft, but it is said that the first strain of it is from a French chanson of the 16th century. There are some who will resent the transcription for full orchestra, seeing in it only Schoenberg's desire to show ingenuity in orchestration without regard to the characteristics of the original; to turn a noble prelude and a masterly fugue into a bedecked and bedizened showy, virtuoso piece. On the other hand transcribers may reply, if organists persist in playing the "Ride of the Valkyrie" and Dvorak's "From the New World" symphony on the organ, why should we not be allowed to make Bach's organ music more popular by employing strings, wood-wind, brass and percussion instruments? If Schoenberg had only written in a parenthesis following the title "Prelude and Fugue in

E major (after Bach and longways after)!" Impressive and sonorous continuity in the prelude was thus turned into mosaic patterns and kaleidoscopic effects. It was all very clever in its irreverential modernism, and as it was brilliantly performed, great was the joy of the audience.

Two Sibeliuses entered into Symphony hall yesterday: The composer who wrote the violin concerto 25 years ago; the Sibelius who wrote the Symphony, hitherto not performed here, of 1923. Only here and there in the Symphony was the earlier Sibelius revealed.

The rhapsodic Concerto is the work of the man still obsessed by Finland's epic; the man on whose musical horizon a tempest was ever looming; the composer whose most characteristic music often suggested the "Spasms of the Sky and the Shatter of the Sea"; music of passionate emotion; wild, heaven-assailing defiance; the darkness of black melancholy. Music peculiarly individual, not recognizing influence or school. Music robust, dramatic, often tragic; yet at times tender without sensuousness; lighter moments turning to demoniacal fury.

The sixth Symphony might be considered by his many warm admirers as in the nature of an experiment. An experiment in structure, in harmonic schemes, even in orchestration. Or as a sketch in black and white to be afterwards enlarged as a painting. The work seems to us in thematic invention, in expositions and developments, in emotional appeals, in the employment of instruments the weakest of his symphonies. Later works have shown that his creative powers have not failed; but here is thinness, a passion for the repetition of insignificant, almost childish figures, an absence even of sentiment—these seem inexplicable. In spite of Dr. Koussevitzky's care in preparation, and in performance the symphony to which one had looked forward disappointed those eager to praise.

Mr. Burgin's performance of the concerto was more than technically brilliant. There are other qualities necessary for an impressive, even an adequate rendering of the work. These qualities were fully displayed. An excellent musician-virtuoso might easily content himself with an exterior view; the inner, the emotional contents and the prevailing rhapsodic, bardic spirit might as easily escape him. They did not escape Mr. Burgin.

The familiar Wagnerian excerpt was strongly in contrast with what had preceded. Here sensuousness in highly dramatic guise made its customary appeal to nerves and to other organs than the ears. The concert will be repeated tonight. The next concerts will be on March 14-15. The program, as announced, will be: Galliard-Steinberg, Sonata in G major; Martelli, Assyrian Bas Reliefs (first performance); Strauss, An Alpine Symphony.

SYMPHONY FEATURES A BACH FUGUE

Sibelius' Sixth Given for First Time in Boston

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

For the conductor of the Symphony concerts to hold the programmes open only to composers of undisputed eminence would be unduly to narrow their range. And that Dr. Koussevitzky has no intention of doing. Yet it was good yesterday afternoon, in a concert devoted to the music of Bach, Wagner and Sibelius, to listen only to composers who have spoken with authority.

OUTDOES ORGAN IN SPLENDOR

In general, transcriptions for orchestra are not to be regarded too highly, but Arnold Schoenberg's arrangement of Bach's organ Prelude and Fugue in E-flat, with which yesterday's concert began, is another matter. Bach could not, in the nature of things, express his greatest ideas orchestrally: the instrument of his day would not have borne their weight. Yet some of his music for the organ is orchestral in its scope and not unnaturally tempts the transcriber. And when that transcriber is a master of Schoenberg's caliber something significant is likely to emerge.

At times in this Prelude and Fugue, heard yesterday for the first time in Boston, Schoenberg has consciously, and with rare cunning, made the orchestra sound organ-like. At other times he has used the full resources of the modern orchestra "for all they are worth." But whatever his method, the result is impressive. As heard yesterday Bach's music had a majestic and a splendor that no organ could have lent it. The performance was an eloquent one and warmly applauded. It behooves Dr. Koussevitzky to keep this transcription in the active repertory.

Burgin Plays Concerto

Twice yesterday was Sibelius represented. The first time by his Violin Concerto with Richard Burgin as soloist, the second, by his Sixth Symphony, hitherto unheard in Boston. The concerto, which Mr. Burgin resurrected last season after it had slumbered in the orchestra's library since 1912, is a work which deserved no such neglect. The marked impression that it made a year ago yesterday heightened and intensified. And Mr. Burgin, it was possible to feel, played with more freedom than before, with even greater feeling for the music's individual qualities: the wild rhapsodizing of the first movement, the fervent lyricism of the Adagio, the excitements of the Finale.

Granting a certain prolixity in this music a diffuseness that the later Sibelius, of intense concentration, would not have permitted himself, it still must be set down as of genuine importance, and the finest violin concerto since that of Brahms.

Mr. Burgin was received yesterday with a warmth that must have repaid him amply for the years of service that he has rendered in the less rewarding role of concert master.

Except in the final one of its four movements, which is comparatively plain sailing, Sibelius' No. 6, the only one of his seven symphonies that Boston had not heard, must be set down as music somewhat baffling and elusive upon a first hearing. Here is Sibelius, as in the Seventh Symphony, or perhaps even more than in the later work, confining himself to the simplest musical materials, cutting away all excess, resisting all temptation to unusual sensuousness, unquestionably earning the attributes that, as it now seems, were missapplied to his earlier works: spare, trenchant, forthright, uncompromising, grim and sombre. Yet for all its occasional crabbedness, a bareness that comes almost to vacuity, an austerity that here and there came near to repelling, this symphony remains a work of singular fascination and power, one that cries out for another hearing. Let it be hoped that Dr. Koussevitzky speedily grants it.

A glowing performance of the "Tristan" Prelude and Liebestod brought the end, and the audience lingered to recall Dr. Koussevitzky and to applaud until he had summoned the players to their feet.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Presumably to make Boston Sibelius-conscious, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky placed two of the Finnish master's works on the seventeenth program of the symphony orchestra, for the concert pair scheduled for Feb. 28 and March 1, in Symphony Hall, Boston. These works were the Violin Concerto, with Richard Burgin, concertmaster, as soloist, and the Sixth Symphony, which, at the Friday afternoon concert, had its first Boston hearing.

Not that Sibelius was unheard of in Boston, apart from "Finlandia," the "Valse Triste" and "The Swan of Tuonela." The First, Third, Fifth and Seventh Symphonies were familiar and the Violin Concerto was played twice with the orchestra by Maurice Powell, and had been revived only a year ago by Mr. Burgin. Why was it chosen again so soon? Dr. Koussevitzky, it is said, likes to compel audiences to accept music that he admires. Thus it is reported that he purposes to repeat Debussy's "St. Sebastian" annually until it becomes popular. But this concerto was well received last year, and not only because Mr. Burgin was the player. On the present occasion, he was recalled several times after negotiating in masterly fashion the enormous difficulties of his part.

The symphony, which followed, appeared to us to be a worthy companion-piece to the composer's other works in this form. Like its fellow it is characterized by a controlled turbulence, an austerity under which violent emotions are ever surging. Distinctly outdoor music, music of manhoods, built by sternly restrained means. Now it is swept by icy wind now made rhythmic by dance-like song, now near to exploding with repressed passion, now peaceful with ecclesiastical calm. This, we believe, is music that will be listened to with respect and affection when much of the more resounding music of our day rests in the warehouse.

Perhaps because he found his program a little ascetic, Dr. Koussevitzky closed it with the Prelude and Liebestod from "Tristan." But, what was more important, he had opened it with Arnold Schoenberg's arrangement of Bach's Organ Prelude and Fugue in E flat, another novelty in Boston. Here was a masterpiece of different order; a coat of many colors made by a master craftsman to dress out a piece that already had claim to greatness in its more modest churchly garb. Yet if we are to allow transcriptions, there is reason to demand that they be made by Schoenberg. He does not attempt here to atonalize Bach. Rather, with his mastery of orchestral resources, he installs a modern lighting system in Bach's magnificent edifice. L. A. S.

Bach via Schoenberg

Another New Piece for the Symphony Concerts This Week

ONCE more Schmitt's "Study" (in tones) for Poe's tale of "The Haunted Palace" has been dropped from a program at the Symphony Concerts. Instead, Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra will play on Friday and Saturday for the first times in Boston, Schoenberg's transcription of Bach's Prelude and Fugue in E-flat for Organ. The piece was heard in Berlin last autumn and warmly received; likened even to his masterly transcriptions of two of Bach's Choral-Preludes, already known to the Symphony Concerts. Said the correspondent of The Musical Courier:

A novelty in the form of Bach's Organ Prelude in E-flat, arranged for orchestra by Arnold Schoenberg, opened Furtwängler's second symphony concert of the season. For once Schoenberg had created something in which his masterly workmanship could be appreciated and admired by the general public. Even coupled with Bach's simple themes and clear construction, Schoenberg's harmonies were entirely inoffensive and, probably for the first time within memory, there was not a single hiss from the audience, nothing but hearty applause.

Consequent revision of the program adds to it the Prelude to Wagner's opera, "Tristan and Isolde." The numbers from Sibelius are unchanged.

SYMPHONY FEATURES A BACH FUGUE

Sibelius' Sixth Given for First Time in Boston

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

For the conductor of the Symphony concerts to hold the programmes open only to composers of undisputed eminence would be unduly to narrow their range. And that Dr. Koussevitzky has no intention of doing. Yet it was good yesterday afternoon, in a concert devoted to the music of Bach, Wagner and Sibelius, to listen only to composers who have spoken with authority.

OUTDOES ORGAN IN SPLENDOR

In general, transcriptions for orchestra are not to be regarded too highly, but Arnold Schoenberg's arrangement of Bach's organ Prelude and Fugue in E-flat, with which yesterday's concert began, is another matter. Bach could not, in the nature of things, express his greatest ideas orchestrally; the instrument of his day would not have borne their weight. Yet some of his music for the organ is orchestral in its scope and not unnaturally tempts the transcriber. And when that transcriber is a master of Schoenberg's caliber something significant is likely to emerge.

At times in this Prelude and Fugue, heard yesterday for the first time in Boston, Schoenberg has consciously, and with rare cunning, made the orchestra sound organ-like. At other times he has used the full resources of the modern orchestra "for all they are worth." But whatever his method, the result is impressive. As heard yesterday Bach's music had a majestic and a splendor that no organ could have lent it. The performance was an eloquent one and warmly applauded. It behooves Dr. Koussevitzky to keep this transcription in the active repertory.

Burgin Plays Concerto

Twice yesterday was Sibelius represented. The first time by his Violin Concerto with Richard Burgin as soloist, the second, by his Sixth Symphony, hitherto unheard in Boston. The concerto, which Mr. Burgin resurrected last season after it had slumbered in the orchestra's library since 1912, is a work which deserved no such neglect. The marked impression that it made a year ago yesterday heightened and intensified. And Mr. Burgin, it was possible to feel, played with more freedom than before, with even greater feeling for the music's individual qualities: the wild rhapsodizing of the first movement, the fervent lyricism of the Adagio, the excitements of the Finale.

Granting a certain prolixity in this music a diffuseness that the later Sibelius, of intense concentration, would not have permitted himself, it still must be set down as of genuine importance, and the finest violin concerto since that of Brahms.

Mr. Burgin was received yesterday with a warmth that must have repaid him amply for the years of service that he has rendered in the less rewarding role of concert master.

Except in the final one of its four movements, which is comparatively plain sailing, Sibelius' No. 6, the only one of his seven symphonies that Boston had not heard, must be set down as music somewhat baffling and elusive upon a first hearing. Here is Sibelius, as in the Seventh Symphony, or perhaps even more than in the later work, confining himself to the simplest musical materials, cutting away all excess, resisting all temptation to musical sensuousness, unquestionably earning the attributes that, as it now seems, were missapplied to his earlier works: spare, trenchant, forthright, economical, grim and sombre. Yet for all its occasional crabbedness, a hardness that comes almost to vacuity, an austerity that here and there came near to repelling, this symphony remains a work of singular fascination and power, one that cries out for another hearing. Let it be hoped that Dr. Koussevitzky speedily grants it.

A glowing performance of the "Tristan" Prelude and Liebestod brought the end, and the audience lingered to recall Dr. Koussevitzky and to applaud until he had summoned the players to their feet.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Presumably to make Boston Sibelius-conscious, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky placed two of the Finnish master's works on the seventeenth program of the symphony orchestra, for the concert pair scheduled for Feb. 28 and March 1, in Symphony Hall, Boston. These works were the Violin Concerto, with Richard Burgin, concertmaster, as soloist, and the Sixth Symphony, which, at the Friday afternoon concert, had its first Boston hearing.

Not that Sibelius was unheard of in Boston, apart from "Finlandia," the "Valse Triste" and "The Swan of Tuonela." The First, Third, Fifth and Seventh Symphonies were familiar, and the Violin Concerto was played twice with the orchestra by Maud Powell, and had been revived only a year ago by Mr. Burgin. Why was it chosen again so soon? Dr. Koussevitzky, it is said, likes to compel audiences to accept music that he admires. Thus it is reported that he purposes to repeat Debussy's "St. Sebastian" annually until it becomes popular. But this concerto was well received last year, and not only because Mr. Burgin was the player. On the present occasion, he was recalled several times after negotiating in masterly fashion the enormous difficulties of his part.

The symphony, which followed, appeared to us to be a worthy companion-piece to the composer's other works in this form. Like its fellows, it is characterized by a controlled turbulence, an austerity under which violent emotions are ever surging. Distinctly outdoor music, music of many moods, built by sternly restrained means. Now it is swept by icy winds, now made rhythmic by dance-like song, now near to exploding with repressed passion, now peaceful with ecclesiastical calm. This, we believe is music that will be listened to with respect and affection when much of the more resounding music of our day rests in the warehouse.

Perhaps because he found his program a little ascetic, Dr. Koussevitzky closed it with the Prelude and Liebestod from "Tristan." But, what was more important, he had opened it with Arnold Schoenberg's arrangement of Bach's Organ Prelude and Fugue in E flat, another novelty to Boston. Here was a masterpiece of a different order; a coat of many colors made by a master craftsman to dress out a piece that already had claim to greatness in its more modest churchly garb. Yet if we are to allow transcriptions, there is reason to demand that they be made by Schoenberg. He does not attempt here to atonalize Bach. Rather, with his mastery of orchestral resources, he installs a modern lighting system in Bach's magnificent edifice.

L. A. S.

Arch via Schoenberg

er New Piece for the Symony Concerts This Week

leone more Schmitt's "Study"

ek tones) for Poe's tale of Haunted Palace" has been ed from a program at the ony Concerts. Instead, Dr.
patrevitzky and the orchestra era day on Friday and Satur-in for the f.s. times in Bosof Schönberg's transcription of essed, Prelude and Fugue in Eat for Organ. The piece was s aft in Berlin last autumn and Bosty received; likened even d fr masterly transcriptions of by t Bach's Choral-Preludes, al a known to the Symphony rdint. Said the correspondent
ston Musical Courier:

g ti pubnovelty in the form of gs ti's Organ Prelude in , arranged for orchestra
rnold Schönberg, opened vängler's second sym-concert of the season.
once Schönberg had cre-something in which his rly workmanship could preclated and admired by general public. Even d with Bach's simple
s and clear construction, berg's harmonies were y inoffensive and, probor the first time within y, there was not a hiss from the audience,
g but hearty applause.

quent revision of the prods to it the Prelude to s opera, "Tristan and The numbers from Sibelnchanged.

No Lesser Names Upon The Program

Sibelius, Wagner, Bach, Stock
The Symphony Concert,
Schoenberg Aiding

HALF the Symphony Concert of yesterday—the undisturbed half through the permutations of the week—fell to the music of Jan Sibelius. Again, after only a twelfth-month, Mr. Burgin played the solo-part in the Violin-Concerto of 1905. (Needless to say, a public that the longer it knows him, the more admires him, welcomed the concert-master warmly; applauded him heartily; renewed its mood when, for the Prelude to "Tristan," he returned to his customary seat.) For the first time in Boston, Dr. Koussevitzky also produced Sibelius's Sixth Symphony of 1921—the only one in the series of seven hitherto unheard at Symphony Hall. (Some, noting the opening and the closing measures assign it to the key of D minor. The program-book preferred to leave it keyless).

To both Concerto and Symphony the audience gave close attention and generous appreciation—so far as clapping may go. How much each one in it enjoyed the pieces may be left to his, or her, musical conscience and perception. Certainly Sibelius is established composer at Symphony Hall. Mr. Gericke, in his second incarnation as conductor, introduced him. Dr. Muck fostered him. Mr. Monteux returned to him. Dr. Koussevitzky cultivates him. In Boston, in degree also in New York and Philadelphia, no living composer sits more securely in the standard repertory. Yet whenever a new, or an old piece, by Sibelius is played in London, in Paris, in the German capitals of music, there are apologies. He is not a popular composer (they run) but consider his unique quality and consequent deserts. In American concert-halls we may lack traditions. Where they prevail, they sometimes make for closed perceptions.

After all these years and schooling, the presumption is that most of us encounter Sibelius with prepared minds.

the authorities pre-eminently a music, whether "dia" or as ex-nphony, we are temperament, re- (The truth is if us know noth- es he translates s in "The Swan," both the fable illude us. We es his music out over it play the s and forests; to the long winter, (But how few of ice with the Fin- ae betraueled mu- act us thither.) asumed to be in- isical idiosyncrasy s. We expect him it marshals four phony of yester- h only thirty-five ncerto, earlier by long and expansive y, we should know much to the string e under modernist mple it has gone at he is wary of the at he shuns deco- on and pomps of out of tonal mists ; pierce and vanish; ds theory and prac- ovating—and usual- le procedures are ar to those that hear tivs; the play of rhythmic dialogue; ound idea from an owy thematic defini- of symmetries and preference in each evailing color; con- cing; spare frame, et endless inventive cal thought or feel- ament to instrument roup. So onward, columns desirable l exposition. uth that in the con- al presence of two ncerto and the Sym- the listener sloughs ledge; tests next to ctations; hears en- narrative; cares not temperament or the Which is only to say music is self-con- municative; interest- ressive by what it is it runs. Sibelius s a musical idea;

amplifies or diversifies it; out of it or its ramifications breeds others; ceases, often abruptly, before he has exhausted them; again recalls them; finally, as in this Sixth Symphony, magnifies them into mounting unity and significance. Or he insinuates an atmosphere; spins it out of figures; weaves it into measure after measure; thickens or thins it with harmonic or instrumental color. After twenty years, the Violin Concerto still expands with mental, musical, emotional energy. Beginning lazily, the Sixth Symphony clears, brightens, gathers into the vitalized but measured fullness of the close. We listeners are caught into the tonal progress; listen to a musical tale that is told; hear not of Finland, think hardly at all of procedures; are absorbed in the thought, the speech, the revelation of a mind and spirit whose means of expression is symphonic music, written so close-knit that the idea and the instrument, the sound and the suggestion, are as one. The interest, the impression, of Sibelius's pages is not "literary" or pictorial. To little purpose do the musical geographers unroll their wordy panoramas. No more is that residue theoretical or formal. The dry-as-dusts may analyze Sibelius's "innovations" and technical "idiosyncrasies" until they choke. For us others enough that he writes a subjective music, therein and thereby disclosing a strange, solitary, self-immersed man. For such ears, Sibelius's tonal narrative tells the tale of his mental and spiritual experiences in a speech of his own and in the atmosphere in which he underwent or recalls them. By such quality is his music a wholly individual expression, akin to Blake's poems or Thoreau's prose. It is by no means certain that Sibelius's symphonies are a poetry of music as we use the word with Mozart or Schubert, Wagner or Debussy. But they are of its most penetrating and significant prose.

Disappointed by Florent Schmitt's tonal "Study" for a tale of Poe—after all Schmitt is not modern-classic but only pre-war—Dr. Koussevitzky harked back to Bach's Brandenburg Concerto for Violin, Flute, Oboe and Trumpet, in which Messrs. Burgin, Laurent, Gilet and Mager might once more find virtuosos opportunity. Before he had quite decided, into his hands came a desired but delayed score—of Schönberg's version for orchestra of an Organ Prelude and Organ-Fugue of Bach by the transcriber joined. On the instant he substituted it, as was evident yesterday in a performance occasionally more eager than measured. The substitution cost the diligent program-editor a dozen learned pages; otherwise all concerned were gainers. Schönberg made his first transcriptions on commission—of two hardly necessary to renew the too much like the controversies of Khayyam's quatrain—over arguments from Bach in other media that for which he wrote a given The demand for orchestral Bach the supply. Conductors and audiences both crave it; while the Brandenburg Concertos and the occasional Suites are inexhaustible. Twentieth-century ears easily hear Bach's organ-pieces as of a modern orchestra. Conductors, like Mahler, Wood, Stokowski, made transcriptions for personal enjoyment, like Elgar, to the general consumption. Once more the purists will loftily. The pleased will far outnumber them.

Choral Preludes, heard impressively at symphony Concerts two or three ago. Now seemingly his own prompted him to as admirable

A moment to moment this orchestration of Prelude and Fugue in sounds uncannily organ-like. Out of the orchestra come the very strands, movement, voices of an organ. A master-organist rather than a scribing composer and an impartial conductor might be playing upon a keyboard, pedals, stops. Much of Schönberg's version has a quasi-independent existence. He uses Bach's matter, follows Bach's courses; lives to the material and defers to a new accent and quality. become not only orchestral, but fully orchestral. They sound not as if sounded to burghers, or musicians in the Thomas-Church at Leipzig as he sounds, under other conditions, across a twentieth-century forum. The richness of the sonorous variety and interplay of tonal the intensive harmonies, warm the incisiveness of outline and energy lent quicken the mind. Often the proceeds in a new vitality and y. Occasionally, Schönberg's infatigable fondness for minutiae stays the unfolding of the Prelude. Everywhere a Bach come into a new age impered to it: a Schönberg not too theorizing or pedantic; both, there-tirring to hear.

the Prelude and the Closing Scene of Wagner's opera, "Tristan and Isolde." Dr. Koussevitzky, courting large audiences to Schönberg and Sibelius, the concert. There have been occasions to demur to his Wagner, even to a version of these excerpts, deeply as stir him. Now he has clarified, and enlarged performance. The noble Wagner, at the acme of passing splendor he now sets free. An orchestra, as sensuous as it was sonorous, both voice.

H. T. P.

No Lesser Names Upon The Program

Sibelius, Wagner, Bach,
The Symphony Concerto
Schoenberg Aiding

HALF the Symphony Concerto yesterday—the undisturbed through the permutation week—fell to the music of Sibelius. Again, after only a month, Mr. Burgin played the in the Violin-Concerto of 1905. (To say, a public that the longer him, the more admires him, welcome concert-master warmly; applaud heartily; renewed its mood when Prelude to "Tristan," he returned customary seat.) For the first Boston, Dr. Koussevitzky also Sibelius's Sixth Symphony of only one in the series of seven unheard at Symphony Hall, noting the opening and the closing, assigns it to the key of D minor (program-book preferred to leave less).

To both Concerto and Symphony audience gave close attention, generous appreciation—so far as may go. How much each one in the pieces may be left to his musical conscience and perceptibly Sibelius is established at Symphony Hall. Mr. Gerick's second incarnation as conductor produced him. Dr. Muck fostered Monteux returned to him. Dr. Koussevitzky cultivates him. In Boston, Greece also in New York and Philadelphia no living composer sits more securely the standard repertory. Yet when new, or an old piece, by Sibelius in London, in Paris, in the German halls of music, there are apologies of music, there are apologies is not a popular composer (they consider his unique quality a frequent deserts. In American halls we may lack traditions, they prevail, they sometimes closed perceptions.

After all these years and the presumption is that most counter Sibelius with prepared or suggests a musical idea;

With nearly one voice the authorities have told us that he is pre-eminently a racial composer. In his music, whether it is as banal as "Finlandia" or as exalted as the Seventh Symphony, we are to discover the Finnish temperament, react to the Finnish spirit. (The truth is that at first hand, most of us know nothing of either.) Into tones he translates Finnish legend; often, as in "The Swan of Tuonela" or "Tapiola," both the fable and the musical venture illude us. We are told that he conjures his music out of Finnish landscape; over it play the lights and airs of lakes and forests; to the swift summer, to the long winter, it moves and tingles. (But how few of us have any acquaintance with the Finnish scene, except as the betrailed musical geographers conduct us thither.)

Similarly we are presumed to be instructed in many a musical idiosyncrasy of the matured Sibelius. We expect him to be terse. Though it marshals four movements, the Symphony of yesterday continued through only thirty-five minutes; while the Concerto, earlier by sixteen years, seemed long and expansive beside it. Orchestrally, we should know that Sibelius confides much to the string choir, though of late under modernist preachment and example it has gone out of the fashion; that he is wary of the percussion-corner; that he shuns decorative instrumentation and pomps of sound; that in and out of tonal mists his melodies or motifs pierce and vanish; that to his will he bends theory and practice—orthodox or innovating—and usually gains his end.

Other characteristic procedures are counted equally familiar to those that hear—the use of short motifs; the play of rhythmic figures and rhythmic dialogue; the birth of a new-found idea from an expiring phrase; shadowy thematic definition; the avoidance of symmetries and other formalisms; the preference in each piece for a single prevailing color; conclusion yet large spacing; spare frame, stripped harmonies, yet endless inventive resource as the musical thought or feeling passes from instrument to instrument or from group to group. So onward, were newspaper columns desirable avenues of technical exposition.

Yet is it not the truth that in the concert-hall, in the actual presence of two such pieces as the Concerto and the Symphony of yesterday, the listener sloughs away this foreknowledge; tests next to none of these expectations; hears engrossed by a musical narrative; cares not a jot for the Finnish temperament or the Finnish landscape? Which is only to say that Sibelius's ripper music is self-contained and self-communicative; interest-amplifies or diversifies it; out of it or its ramifications breeds others; ceases, often abruptly, before he has exhausted them; again recalls them; finally, as in this Sixth Symphony, magnifies them into mounting unity and significance. Or he insinuates an atmosphere; spins it out of figures; weaves it into measure after measure; thickens or thins it with harmonic or instrumental color. After twenty years, the Violin Concerto still expands with mental, musical, emotional energy. Beginning lazily, the Sixth Symphony clears, brightens, gathers into the vitalized but measured fullness of the close.

We listeners are caught into the tonal progress; listen to a musical tale that is told; hear not of Finland, think hardly at all of procedures; are absorbed in the thought, the speech, the revelation of a mind and spirit whose means of expression is symphonic music, written so close-knit that the idea and the instrument, the sound and the suggestion, are as one. The interest, the impression, of Sibelius's pages is not "literary" or pictorial. To little purpose do the musical geographers unroll their wordy panoramas. No more is that residue theoretical or formal. The dry-as-dusts may analyze Sibelius's "innovations" and technical "idiosyncrasies" until they choke. For us others enough that he writes a subjective music, therein and thereby disclosing a strange, solitary, self-immersed man. For such ears, Sibelius's tonal narrative tells the tale of his mental and spiritual experiences in a speech of his own and in the atmosphere in which he underwent or recalls them. By such quality is his music a wholly individual expression, akin to Blake's poems or Thoreau's prose. It is by no means certain that Sibelius's symphonies are a poetry of music as we use the word with Mozart or Schubert, Wagner or Debussy. But they are of its most penetrating and significant prose.

Disappointed by Florent Schmitt's tonal "Study" for a tale of Poe—after all Schmitt is not modern-classic but only pre-war—Dr. Koussevitzky harked back to Bach's Brandenburg Concerto for Violin, Flute, Oboe and Trumpet, in which Messrs. Burgin, Laurent, Gilet and Mager might once more find virtuoso opportunity. Before he had quite decided, into his hands came a desired but delayed score—of Schönberg's version for orchestra of an Organ Prelude and Organ-Fugue of Bach by the transcriber joined. On the instant he substituted it, as was evident yesterday in a performance occasionally more eager than measured. The substitution cost the diligent program-editor a dozen learned pages; otherwise all concerned were gainers. Schönberg made his first transcriptions on commission—of two hardly necessary to renew the too much like the controversies of Khayyam's quatrain—over arguments from Bach in other media that for which he wrote a given The demand for orchestral Bach the supply. Conductors and audiences both crave it; while the Brandenburg concertos and the occasional Suites it inexhaustible. Twentieth-century ears easily hear Bach's organ-pieces as of a modern orchestra. Conductors, like Mahler, Wood, Stokowski, made transcriptions for personal use; Schönberg, arranging as composer, his, like Elgar, to the general consumption. Once more the purists will loftily. The pleased will far outnumber them.

Choral Preludes, heard impressively at Symphony Concerts two or three ago. Now seemingly his own prompted him to as admirable

In a moment to moment this orchestration of Prelude and Fugue in sounds uncannily organ-like. Out of the orchestra come the very strands, movement, voices of an organ. A master-organist rather than scribing composer and an impartial conductor might be playing upon a keyboard, pedals, stops. Much of Schönberg's version has a quasi-independent existence. He uses Bach's matter, follows Bach's courses; gives to the material and de-vent a new accent and quality. become not only orchestral, but fully orchestral. They sound not as sounded to burghers, or musicians in the Thomas-Church at Leipzig as he sounds, under other pre-conditions, across a twentieth-century podium. The richness of the sonorous variety and interplay of tonal the intensive harmonies, warm the incisiveness of outline and energy quicken the mind. Often the proceeds in a new vitality and y. Occasionally, Schönberg's in-fondness for minutiae stays the unfolding of the Prelude. Everywhere a Bach come into a new age imperiled to it: a Schönberg not too theorizing or pedantic; both, therefore, stirring to hear.

In the Prelude and the Closing Scene of Wagner's opera, "Tristan and Isolde" Dr. Koussevitzky, courting large audiences to Schönberg and Sibelius, the concert. There have been occasions to demur to his Wagner, even to stir him. Now he has clarified, and enlarged performance. The noble Wagner, at the acme of passion and splendor he now sets free. An orchestra, as sensuous as it was sonorous, both voice. H. T. P.

No Lesser Names Upon The Program

Sibelius, Wagner, Bach,
The Symphony Concert
Schoenberg Aiding

HALF the Symphony Concert yesterday—the undisturbed through the permutation week—fell to the music of Sibelius. Again, after only a month, Mr. Burgin played the in the Violin-Concerto of 1905. (To say, a public that the longer him, the more admires him, welcome concert-master warmly; applaud heartily; renewed its mood when Prelude to "Tristan," he returned customary seat.) For the first Boston, Dr. Koussevitzky also Sibelius's Sixth Symphony of only one in the series of seven unheard at Symphony Hall. noting the opening and the closing assign it to the Key of D minor program-book preferred to leave less).

To both Concerto and Symphony audience gave close attention. erous appreciation—so far as may go. How much each one in the pieces may be left to his, musical conscience and percept tainly Sibelius is established at Symphony Hall. Mr. Gerick second incarnation as conductor duced him. Dr. Muck fostered Monteux returned to him. Dr. vitzky cultivates him. In Boston gree also in New York and Philadelphia no living composer sits more se the standard repertory. Yet when new, or an old piece, by Sibelius in London, in Paris, in the German tals of music, there are apologies is not a popular composer (they consider his unique quality a frequent deserts. In American halls we may lack traditions, they prevail, they sometimes closed perceptions.

After all these years and the presumption is that most counter Sibelius with prepared

With nearly one voice the authorities have told us that he is pre-eminently a racial composer. In his music, whether it is as banal as "Finlandia" or as exalted as the Seventh Symphony, we are to discover the Finnish temperament, react to the Finnish spirit. (The truth is that at first hand, most of us know nothing of either.) Into tones he translates Finnish legend; often, as in "The Swan of Tuonela" or "Tapiola," both the fable and the musical venture illude us. We are told that he conjures his music out of Finnish landscape; over it play the lights and airs of lakes and forests; to the swift summer, to the long winter, it moves and tingles. (But how few of us have any acquaintance with the Finnish scene, except as the betraveled musical geographers conduct us thither.)

Similarly we are presumed to be instructed in many a musical idiosyncrasy of the matured Sibelius. We expect him to be terse. Though it marshals four movements, the Symphony of yesterday continued through only thirty-five minutes; while the Concerto, earlier by sixteen years, seemed long and expansive beside it. Orchestrally, we should know that Sibelius confides much to the string choir, though of late under modernist preachment and example it has gone out of the fashion; that he is wary of the percussion-corner; that he shuns decorative instrumentation and pomps of sound; that in and out of tonal mists his melodies or motifs pierce and vanish; that to his will he bends theory and practice—orthodox or innovating—and usually gains his end.

Other characteristic procedures are counted equally familiar to those that hear—the use of short motifs; the play of rhythmic figures and rhythmic dialogue; the birth of a new-found idea from an expiring phrase; shadowy thematic definition; the avoidance of symmetries and other formalisms; the preference in each piece for a single prevailing color; concision yet large spacing; spare frame, stripped harmonies, yet endless inventive resource as the musical thought or feeling passes from instrument to instrument or from group to group. So onward, were newspaper columns desirable avenues of technical exposition.

Yet is it not the truth that in the concert-hall, in the actual presence of two such pieces as the Concerto and the Symphony of yesterday, the listener sloughs away this foreknowledge; tests next to none of these expectations; hears engrossed by a musical narrative; cares not a jot for the Finnish temperament or the Finnish landscape? Which is only to say that Sibelius's riper music is self-contained and self-communicative; interest- ing, illuding and impressive by what it is and by the course it runs. Sibelius unfolds or suggests a musical idea;

amplifies or diversifies ramifications breeds abruptly, before he again recalls them; Symphony, magnifying unity and signifies an atmosphere; weaves it into ure; thickens or thins instrumental color. the Violin Concerto mental, musical, beginning lazily, t clears, brightens, ized but measured f

We listeners are progress; listen to told; hear not of at all of procedure the thought, the of a mind and s expression is sym so close-knit that strument, the sou are as one. The of Sibelius's page pictorial. To lit musical geograph panoramas. No due theoretical o dusts may analyze and technical "idi choke. For us writes a subject thereby disclosin self-immersed mabelius's tonal nar his mental and s speech of his o sphere in which them. By such wholly individua Blake's poems o by no means cer phonies are a use the word w Wagner or Del its most pene prose.

Disappointed tonal "Study" f all Schmitt is only pre-war—back to Bach for Violin, Flut which Messrs. I Mager might opportunity. elided, into his delayed score for orchestra Organ-Fugue scriber joined. tuted it, as w performance than measured the diligent learned pages; were gainers. transcriptions

Lewis
Salt Lake
Dern, Salt La
"Strangler" weight wrest

Current Bank R and For

Current q
In New Yo
Call loans—do—Range
Time Loan
60 to 90 d
3 to 6 mon
Commercial

Bankers' 30 days
60 days
90 days
4 months
6 months

In Boston—
Call money
Commercial
Mill paper
Customers' 1
Collateral lo

In London—
Call money
Short bills
Three months

Bar silver in Bar silver in Mexican doll Bar gold in Canadian ex

LEA Discount banks and in foreign c

Boston
Atlanta
Chicago
Cleveland
Dallas
Kansas City
Minneapolis
New York
Philadelphia
Richmond
San Francisco
St. Louis

CLEAR
Boston—19
Day $92,000
Week 529,000
New York—
Day $1,760,000
Week 7,703,000

Balances—
Boston
New York
Federal Reserve

Washington,
ceipts for Feb.
$5,903,563, bal

Choral-Preludes, heard impressively at the Symphony Concerts two or three seasons ago. Now seemingly his own impulse prompted him to as admirable work.

It is hardly necessary to renew the debate—too much like the controversies of Omar Khayyam's quatrain—over arrangements from Bach in other media than that for which he wrote a given piece. The demand for orchestral Bach exceeds the supply. Conductors and audiences both crave it; while the Brandenburg Concertos and the occasional Suites are not inexhaustible. Twentieth-century ears easily hear Bach's organ-pieces in terms of a modern orchestra. Conductors, like Mahler, Wood, Stokowski, have made transcriptions for personal use. Schönberg, arranging as composer, hands his, like Elgar, to the general concert-room. Once more the purists will demur loftily. The pleased will far outnumber them.

From moment to moment this orchestral version of Prelude and Fugue in E-flat sounds uncannily organ-like. Out of the orchestra come the very strands, texture, movement, voices of an organ-piece. A master-organist rather than a transcribing composer and an imparting conductor might be playing upon a human keyboard, pedals, stops. Much else in Schönberg's version has a quasi-independent existence. He uses Bach's subject-matter, follows Bach's courses; yet gives to the material and development a new accent and quality. They become not only orchestral, but modernly orchestral. They sound not as Bach sounded to burghers, or musicians, in the Thomas-Church at Leipzig, but as he sounds, under other prepossessions, across a twentieth-century auditorium. The richness of the sonorities, the variety and interplay of tonal color, the intensive harmonies, warm the ear. Incisiveness of outline and energy of accent quicken the mind. Often the Fugue proceeds in a new vitality and urgency. Occasionally, Schönberg's ingrained fondness for minutiae stays the large unfolding of the Prelude. Everywhere else a Bach come into a new age and tempered to it: a Schönberg not too often theorizing or pedantic; both, therefore, stirring to hear.

With the Prelude and the Closing Scene from Wagner's opera, "Tristan and Isolde," Dr. Koussevitzky, courting large contrasts to Schönberg and Sibelius, ended the concert. There have been occasions to demur to his Wagner, even to his version of these excerpts, deeply as they stir him. Now he has clarified, ripened and enlarged performance. The veritable Wagner, at the acme of passion and splendor he now sets free. An orchestra, as sensuous as it was sonorous, gave both voice.
H. T. P.

Rounding Out Sibelius Upon Boston Ears

Dr. Koussevitzky Presents the Sixth Symphony of the Finnish Master

Trans. — Feb. 27, 1930

FOR the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday Dr. Koussevitzky turns to Sibelius, with the familiar Violin-Concerto and the unfamiliar Sixth Symphony (in D minor) filling half of the program. To the conductor the habitués of Symphony Hall owed the first performances in America of Sibelius's Seventh Symphony—as some have it “without equal in the whole range of works cast in the symphonic form.” In turn, his revelation of the unexpected delights of Sibelius's Third Symphony surprised even those most “in the know.” Now he would do as much for this Sixth Symphony, hitherto heard in America at two concerts of the Philadelphia Orchestra, under Mr. Stokowski, on April 23-24, 1926. By that time the “new” Symphony was at least three years old. One of the admirable “miniature essays,” published by the English house of Chester gives the date of composition as 1921. Mr. Gilman, unwilling to commit himself in the program-book of the Philadelphia Orchestra, notes that the “Dictionary of Modern Music and Musicians” prefers 1923. Grove's Dictionary also affirms that year. Then one discovers an illuminating article on “The Nationalism of Sibelius,” by Mr. Watson Lyle in the Musical Quarterly, which gives plausible solution. The symphony “is dated 1921,” but was published in 1923. The printed score itself no indication whatsoever, not even a date of copyright. The symphony was published in Stockholm by A. Hirsch, and is dedicated to Dr. Wilhelm Stenhammar. The scoring is relatively modest in these days of huge orchestras.

The little essay above cited speaks of the Sixth Symphony as one “which again seems to have sprung from the primeval soil of Finland.” Says Mr. Lyle, whose principal purpose is to question many of the accepted notions concerning Si-dent of the institution he will the position a breadth of bank, or at Hot... ence which is expected to have ant influence in shaping the the new bank.

Members Announced

formally inviting the two to serve on the board, the sue chiefs—with a single ex- Hjalmar Schacht, president of the bank—announced the name of members which they are to appoint as provided in the statutes. The members of the announced were: Great Britain—Montagu Norman, Governor of the Bank of England; Sir Charles Addis, director of the Bank of England and a member of the Young committee of ex-

France—Emile Moreau, Governor of the Bank of France; Baron L. president of the Credit Lyonnais, and Comte de Vogue, president of the Compagnie Universelle de Maritime de Suez. Italy—G. C. Bonaldo Stringher, Governor of the Bank of Italy, and Beneduce, professor of political economy.

Belgium—Louis Franck, Governor of the Bank of Belgium, and Francqui, Minister of State member of the Young committee. Japan—Tetsusaburo Tanaka, representative of the Bank of Japan and Daisuke Nohara, London representative of the Yokohama Specie to Name Representatives

schacht is expected to announce Boule- nees shortly. When he acts, the board of sixteen members with fitting. It should be noted that the Bank should except that of the Bank of issue the head of the bank of issue a popular ex officio.

the skeleton board of sixteen members meets at Basle, it will elect not it rep- an nine additional members, ally the in the bank's statutes, that if the the total number to a maximum of thirty-five.

attaining the project for the Bank International Settlements, the Young committee of experts followed the principle of leaving complete power in the hands of the chiefs of the banks of issue. It is to be noted that all thirteen

IRGIN SOLOIST AT HONY CONCERT

Concert Master Heard in Sibelius Concerto

Sibelius Sixth Symphony and Bach
Prelude and Fugue Played

Richard Burgin, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was loudly applauded at yesterday's concert for his musicianly playing of the exacting solo part in Sibelius' concerto for violin. The orchestral novelties on the program, had been twice changed, were an organ prelude and fugue in E major, orchestrated by Arnold Schoenberg and Sibelius' Sixth Symphony. The concert concluded with the “Prelude and Death” from Wagner's “Tristan and Isolde.”

wondered, as one has too often asked, why Dr Koussevitzky cannot make his programs without these minute changes, which are irritating to many subscribers who endeavor to familiarize themselves with the Symphony concert with the announced for performance.

Mr Burgin played the Sibelius concerto last season it so pleased the audience as to receive several hundred votes in the balloting for the program given at the last pair of concerts. Yesterday the vitality of the music and the brilliant performance again won great and prolonged applause. Mr Burgin's more advantage.

the only one not previously heard at these concerts. was published in 1923, and played for the first time in America by the Philadelphia Orchestra on April 23, 1926. Writers remembering that Sibelius more than once expressed a desire to have his works generally described in terms of the landscape of his native Finland, might as well describe the music of Beethoven, whose devotion to the rural landscapes near Vienna, is even better known, in terms of the rural landscapes near Vienna.

among which he found inspiration not merely for the “Pastoral Symphony,” but for many another masterpiece.

All this talk of bleak wind-swept forests, and steel blue lakes, waiting to be ice-bound through the dark rigors of the sub-arctic Winter, has little relevance to the music of Sibelius. His originality lies not in being a native and resident of Finland, but in the mysterious human quality one can only call imagination, or genius.

Every work by Sibelius has its own distinctive flavor, so that one is not likely to confuse in memory his fourth symphony with his second, or his sixth with his seventh. This circumstance, plainly illustrated yesterday by the difference between the violin concerto and the sixth symphony, links the composer with the great names of Beethoven and Wagner rather than with the lesser men like Franck.

This sixth symphony is so original that those who dislike it will speak more or less civilly of its eccentricity. Its themes are nearly all scale-like passages. They are woven into an intricate musical pattern, yet the work sounds with the apparent childlike simplicity one rashly ascribes at a first hearing to mediaeval pieces in the old modes. Yesterday's performance had the curiously personal style, the Koussevitzky flavor, imparted these days to everything the Boston Symphony performs.

Schoenberg, despite the baffling modernism of his own compositions, is an unusually discreet and skilful transcriber of Bach. Without trying to make the orchestra sound just like an organ, he succeeds in making one believe that if Bach had written this prelude and fugue for a modern orchestra he would have scored it exactly as Schoenberg has.

The performance yesterday betrayed the effect of scanty rehearsal in a number of badly smeared passages. Nor did one agree with Dr Koussevitzky's conception of the subject and working out of the fugue. Yet the music made its emotional effect, so great was Bach's genius.

The reading of the prelude and “Liebestod” from “Tristan” was the finest Dr Koussevitzky has given in Boston, because it brought out the magnificent lines of the musical pattern as well as the intensity of feeling Wagner imparted to what many regard as his masterpiece.

The orchestra will be away on tour next week. The program now announced (subject, one assumes, to change) for the next Boston concerts, March 14 and 15, includes a sonata by Galliard, transcribed by Steinberg; Martelli's “Assyrian Bas Reliefs”; and Richard Strauss' “Alpine Symphony.”

P. R.

at 262 Washington Street, Boston

Roun Sib

Dr. Kous
Sixth
Fi

Trans

FOR the day, vitzky, famill unfamiliar S! filling half of ductor the f owed the fir of Sibelius's have it "wit range of wo form." In unexpected Symphony su the know." for this Sixth in America Philadelphia kowski, on time the "ne three years "miniature English hous of compositio willing to con book of the I that the "D cending scale in unfolding and expanding and Musica: Dictionary al which step by step lead onward to larger one discovers "The Nation is reached, may be added this Sixth Sym- Watson Lyle phony of Sibelius. which gives I. phony "is d lished in 192 no indicatio date of copy published in is dedicated t The scoring days of huge

The little of flutes, which singles itself out, arrests for the Sixth Sym a moment the attention. There is, again, soil of Finlan sufficiently definite. But it would be a rash analyst who would designate these of the accep as "first and second theme." The tonality belius: "The nationalism in it takes shape as an expression of the atmosphere of the countryside rather than of the humanity of the composer's native land. The form does not adhere strictly to classical tradition. Sibelius goes further in his enomomy of material [Mr. Lyle had just pointed out an increase in these matters in the Fifth Symphony], and there is again the closely knit constructive manner to which attention has been directed." We have to do then, with a terse symphony, which is also pleasant symphony in every sense.

There are four movements: I, Allegro molto moderato; II, Allegretto moderato; III, Poco vivace; IV, Allegro molto. Thus, it was pointed out straightway, a symphony without a slow movement. But a parallel comes quickly to mind. Beethoven's Seventh Symphony is also without a slow division. His second movement is also an Allegretto; and this Allegretto is followed by a Presto even as Sibelius's is followed by a Vivace. But this very Allegretto of Beethoven is frequently taken as a dirge-like movement—whether rightly or wrongly, is not here in question. For even when it is taken thoroughly in the allegretto-mood, it still fills perfectly the place and the function of a slow movement. Similarly, this second movement of Sibelius has its theme marked carefully "espressivo," giving it a serenely lyrical character.

Scholars are apt to discuss learnedly the relation (oftener the lack of relation) between the movements of a symphony; to bewail the fact that often the last movement is not a cumulative climax to the whole; is, to the contrary, in many cases no more than a superficially exciting conclusion. They are wont also to point to Bruckner and to Mahler, fathered by Schubert, as most successful in planning a symphony on a gradually ascending scale in unfolding and expanding and larger things, until final consummation. To the list of symphonies which step by step lead onward to larger one discovers "The Nation is reached, may be added this Sixth Sym- Watson Lyle phony of Sibelius.

The first movement is in many portions misty, which adjective does not mean gloomy. It is only with difficulty that one seizes upon measures which may be dignified by the term, "themes." Here and there certain phrases, more definitely formed than others, emerge from the general texture. There is for example a songful passage in thirds, heard first in a moment the attention. There is, again, a lyric line for 'cellos and bass-clarinets, sufficiently definite. But it would be a rash analyst who would designate these as "first and second theme." The tonality

Liberty 2615), or at Hot

Backward

bert's operetta, "The Ser in rehearsal at the Maje next week in New Yor appearing here in "Robi second act of the origi monastery and a convent of her, then made good-nature monks and nuns. Nobod he nineties; but in this de come fears and scruples Harry B. Smith, who wrot has taken pen in hand an w second act. It "play a cavalry barracks.

in of "The New Moon" i ckness. That able and re tor, Jose Ruben, succeed ave spy from Paris. ore, sooner or later to bely applauded at yesterday's phony concert for his musicianly ing of the exacting solo part in us' concerto for violin. The or- The play to follow is not

rn Artery as a New Name

ected from the strong sup red, why Dr Koussevitzky can- pose his programs without these minute changes, which are irritat- the many subscribers who en- to familiarize themselves be- ch Symphony concert with the announced for performance. Mr Burgin played the Sibelius provided at once. When last season it so pleased the will be placed with fitting bers as to receive several hun- enough several persons havotes in the balloting for the argued that Boston shoul program given at the last pair an name a mere traffizerts. Yesterday the vitality in honor of the populace of the music and the bril- congressman, sponsors of the performance again won t were satisfied that it repa prolonged applause. Mr sentiment of practically the great abilities have never t, and declared that if the more advantage. were changed it would no sixth of Sibelius' seven sym- and the only one not previous- t at these concerts. was pub- 1923, and played for the first America by the Philadelphia t, April 23, 1926. Writers uais, remembering that Sibe- more than once expressed a to nature, have generally describe his works in terms decape of his native Finland. might as well describe the Beethoven, whose devotion to nature is even better known, in terms of the rural landscapes near Vienna, ip Dolls

BURGIN SOLOIST AT PHONY CONCERT

noert Master Heard in Sibelius Concerto

ollus' Sixth Symphony and Bach
Prelude and Fugue Played

Richard Burgin, concert master of Boston Symphony Orchestra, was fully applauded at yesterday's phony concert for his musicianly ing of the exacting solo part in us' concerto for violin. The or- The play to follow is not wondered, as one has too often red, why Dr Koussevitzky can- pose his programs without these minute changes, which are irritat- the many subscribers who en- to familiarize themselves be- ch Symphony concert with the announced for performance. Mr Burgin played the Sibelius provided at once. When last season it so pleased the will be placed with fitting bers as to receive several hun- enough several persons havotes in the balloting for the argued that Boston shoul program given at the last pair an name a mere traffizerts. Yesterday the vitality in honor of the populace of the music and the bril- congressman, sponsors of the performance again won t were satisfied that it repa prolonged applause. Mr sentiment of practically the great abilities have never t, and declared that if the more advantage. were changed it would no sixth of Sibelius' seven sym- and the only one not previous- t at these concerts. was pub- 1923, and played for the first America by the Philadelphia t, April 23, 1926. Writers uais, remembering that Sibe- more than once expressed a to nature, have generally describe his works in terms decape of his native Finland. might as well describe the Beethoven, whose devotion to nature is even better known, in terms of the rural landscapes near Vienna, among which he found inspiration not merely for the "Pastoral Symphony," but for many another masterpiece.

All this talk of bleak wind-swept forests, and steel blue lakes, waiting to be ice-bound through the dark rigors of the sub-arctic Winter, has little relevance to the music of Sibelius. His originality lies not in being a native and resident of Finland, but in the mysterious human quality one can only call imagination, or genius.

Every work by Sibelius has its own distinctive flavor, so that one is not likely to confuse in memory his fourth symphony with his second, or his sixth with his seventh. This circumstance, plainly illustrated yesterday by the difference between the violin concerto and the sixth symphony, links the composer with the great names of Beethoven and Wagner rather than with the lesser men like Franck.

This sixth symphony is so original that those who dislike it will speak more or less civilly of its eccentricity. Its themes are nearly all scale-like passages. They are woven into an intricate musical pattern, yet the work sounds with the apparent childlike simplicity one rashly ascribes at a first hearing to mediaeval pieces in the old modes. Yesterday's performance had the curiously personal style, the Koussevitzky flavor, imparted these days to everything the Boston Symphony performs.

Schoenberg, despite the baffling modernism of his own compositions, is an unusually discreet and skilful transcriber of Bach. Without trying to make the orchestra sound just like an organ, he succeeds in making one believe that if Bach had written this prelude and fugue for a modern orchestra he would have scored it exactly as Schoenberg has.

The performance yesterday betrayed the effect of scanty rehearsal in a number of badly smeared passages. Nor did one agree with Dr Koussevitzky's conception of the subject and working out of the fugue. Yet the music made its emotional effect, so great was Bach's genius.

The reading of the prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan" was the finest Dr Koussevitzky has given in Boston, because it brought out the magnificent lines of the musical pattern as well as the intensity of feeling Wagner imparted to what many regard as his masterpiece.

The orchestra will be away on tour next week. The program now announced (subject, one assumes, to change) for the next Boston concerts, March 14 and 15, includes a sonata by Calliard, transcribed by Steinberg; Martelli's "Assyrian Bas Reliefs"; and Richard Strauss' "Alpine Symphony."

P. R.

Roun Sib

Dr. Kous
Sixth
Fi

Trans

FOR the day
vitzky famili unfamiliar Si filling half of ductor the h owed the first of Sibelius's have it "wit range of wo form." In unexpected Symphony su

the know."

for this Sixth in America Philadelphia
kowski, on time the "ne three years
"miniature English hous
of compositio willing to con book of the I that the "D and Musica Dictionary al one discovers
"The Nation
Watson Lyle
phony of Sibelius, which gives I phony "is d lished in 192
no indicator date of copy published in is dedicated The scoring days of huge

The little
the Sixth Sym seems to have soil of Finlan principal pur of the accep

belius: "The n shape as an ex
phere of the cou
the humanity of land. The form to classical tradi ther in his enor
Lyle had just po these matters in and there is aga structive manner been directed."

There are four molto moderato;
III, Poco vivac
Thus, it was pol symphony witho
But a parallel c Beethoven's Seve
without a slow movement is also Allegretto is fol
as Sibelius's is
But this very Al frequently taken ment—whether ri
here in question taken thoroughly it still fills perfe function of a slo
this second move theme marked giving it a serene Scholars are a the relation (offe between the move to bewail the fa movement is not the whole; is, to cases no more th ing conclusion.
point to Bruckne
ered by Schubert
plannig a symph cending scale in u scheme. To the which step by ste
and larger things,
ward all which that has gone before is striving. No display of unnecessary brill iance here. Rather an unflagging in crease of vitality. It is the longest and most highly organized movement of the four. A theme is at once heard energetic in the first part; songful (cellos above
violas in sixths) in the second portion.
There is also an actively rhythmized theme first heard in the massed violins and violas, G-string for violins. These furn ish the material of the movement.
There are also, near the end, some refer ences to the first movement. The close is one of spacious breadths and largeness,
but never showy or brilliant. A. H. M.

but it would be a rash analyst who would designate these
as "first and second theme." The tonality is as vague as the "thematic" (?) writing.

There is no key-signature. But one must look very closely to discover wheth er one is in C major, or A minor, or one of the old church-modes—and not always does one discover indisputably the an swer. In fact the first eight measures and the last are definitely in the Dorian mode. There is much exceedingly close writing in the middle and moderately high registers. There are thus long stretches without double bass. As the 'cello often sings the song of the first violins an oc tave lower, the viola is in many portions the real bass of the orchestra. The or chestral texture may be found nowhere else than in Sibelius. Blocks of one com pactly woven web of tonal strands in a single tonal color take turn about with similar blocks in another color. Here is, in truth a misty Finland. Here is also,
one would like to hazard, the most origi nal musician of the age, Jan Sibelius.

Out of this partially formed beginning one comes into the second movement.
Cheerfulness here prevails. One can rec ognize the themes easily; sing them light ly along with the composer. Chords in drab colors from wood-winds make be ginning. Then the gentle, ingratiating theme from violins. Through several de velopments it is carried, to several cli maxes it mounts. Then another enig matical portion, in steadily flowing six teenth notes, brings the movement to an end. By no formal dogma may this clos ing section be justified. As a poetical reference back to the uncertainties of the first movement it has its place.

The scherzo, for such in reality is the Poco Vivace, brings further increase of life. A typical scherzo-rhythm alternates with another theme in thirds, also in the flutes, but much more fully developed, more perfectly formed than that of the first movement. There is also a chorale like theme, gently played, in even notes, once more first heard in flutes. . . . The last movement is plainly the goal to ward all which that has gone before is striving. No display of unnecessary brill iance here. Rather an unflagging in crease of vitality. It is the longest and most highly organized movement of the four. A theme is at once heard energetic
in the first part; songful (cellos above
violas in sixths) in the second portion.
There is also an actively rhythmized theme
first heard in the massed violins and violas, G-string for violins. These furn ish the material of the movement.
There are also, near the end, some refer ences to the first movement. The close
is one of spacious breadths and largeness,
but never showy or brilliant. A. H. M.

The first move
tions misty, whi mean gloomy. It that one seizes up be dignified by the
and there certain formed than other eral texture. Th songful passage i flutes, which sing
a moment the atte
a lyric line for 'c sufficiently definite.
rash analyst who would designate these
as "first and second theme." The tonality

Richard Burgin, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was heartily applauded at yesterday's Symphony concert for his musicianly playing of the exacting solo part in Sibelius' concerto for violin. The or chestral novelties on the program, which had been twice changed, were Bach's organ prelude and fugue in E
flat, orchestrated by Arnold Schoen
berg; and Sibelius' Sixth Symphony.
The concert concluded with the "Prel ude and Death" from Wagner's
"Tristan."

One wondered, as one has too often wondered, why Dr Koussevitzky can not choose his programs without these last minute changes, which are irritat
ing to the many subscribers who en deavor to familiarize themselves be fore each Symphony concert with the music announced for performance.

When Mr Burgin played the Sibelius
concerto last season it so pleased the subscribers as to receive several hun dred votes in the balloting for the request program given at the last pair
of concerts. Yesterday the vitality
and grace of the music and the bril
liance of the performance again won cordial and prolonged applause. Mr Burgin's great abilities have never shown to more advantage.

The sixth of Sibelius' seven sym phonies, and the only one not previous ly played at these concerts, was pub lished in 1923, and played for the first time in America by the Philadelphia Orchestra, April 23, 1926. Writers
about music, remembering that Sibe lius has more than once expressed a devotion to nature, have generally tried to describe his works in terms
of the landscape of his native Finland.
But one might as well describe the work of Beethoven, whose devotion to nature is even better known, in terms
of the rural landscapes near Vienna,

among which he found inspiration not merely for the "Pastoral Symphony,"
but for many another masterpiece.

All this talk of bleak wind-swept forests, and steel blue lakes, waiting to be ice-bound through the dark rig
ors of the sub-arctic Winter, has lit tle relevance to the music of Sibelius.
His originality lies not in being a na tive and resident of Finland, but in the mysterious human quality one can only call imagination, or genius.

Every work by Sibelius has its own distinctive flavor, so that one is not likely to confuse in memory his fourth symphony with his second, or his sixth
with his seventh. This circumstance, plainly illustrated yesterday by the difference between the violin concerto
and the sixth symphony, links the com poser with the great names of Beethoven and Wagner rather than
with the lesser men like Franck.

This sixth symphony is so original
that those who dislike it will speak
more or less civilly of its eccentricity.
Its themes are nearly all scale-like passages. They are woven into an intricate musical pattern, yet the work
sounds with the apparent childlike simplicity one rashly ascribes at a first hearing to mediaeval pieces in the old modes. Yesterday's performance had the curiously personal style, the Koussevitzky flavor, imparted these days to everything the Boston
Symphony performs.

Schoenberg, despite the baffling mod ernism of his own compositions, is an unusually discreet and skilful trans criber of Bach. Without trying to make the orchestra sound just like an organ, he succeeds in making one be lieve that if Bach had written this pre lude and fugue for a modern orchestra
he would have scored it exactly as Schoenberg has.

The performance yesterday betrayed
the effect of scanty rehearsal in a number of badly smeared passages.
Nor did one agree with Dr Koussevitz
ky's conception of the subject and working out of the fugue. Yet the music made its emotional effect, so great was Bach's genius.

The reading of the prelude and
"Liebestod" from "Tristan" was the finest Dr Koussevitzky has given in Boston, because it brought out the magnificent lines of the musical pat tern as well as the intensity of feel ing Wagner imparted to what many regard as his masterpiece.

The orchestra will be away on tour
next week. The program now an nounced (subject, one assumes, to change) for the next Boston concerts,
March 14 and 15, includes a sonata by
Galliard, transcribed by Steinberg;
Martelli's "Assyrian Bas Reliefs"; and Richard Strauss' "Alpine Symphony."
P. R.

BURGIN SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Concert Master Heard in
Sibelius Concerto

Sibelius' Sixth Symphony and Bach
Prelude and Fugue Played

Richard Burgin, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was heartily applauded at yesterday's Symphony concert for his musicianly
playing of the exacting solo part in Sibelius' concerto for violin. The or chestral novelties on the program,
which had been twice changed, were Bach's organ prelude and fugue in E
flat, orchestrated by Arnold Schoen
berg; and Sibelius' Sixth Symphony.
The concert concluded with the "Prel
ude and Death" from Wagner's
"Tristan."

One wondered, as one has too often wondered, why Dr Koussevitzky can not choose his programs without these
last minute changes, which are irritat
ing to the many subscribers who en deavor to familiarize themselves be fore each Symphony concert with the music announced for performance.

When Mr Burgin played the Sibelius
concerto last season it so pleased the subscribers as to receive several hun dred votes in the balloting for the request program given at the last pair
of concerts. Yesterday the vitality
and grace of the music and the bril
liance of the performance again won
cordial and prolonged applause. Mr Burgin's great abilities have never
shown to more advantage.

The sixth of Sibelius' seven sym
phonies, and the only one not previous ly played at these concerts, was pub lished in 1923, and played for the first time in America by the Philadelphia
Orchestra, April 23, 1926. Writers
about music, remembering that Sibe
lius has more than once expressed a
devotion to nature, have generally
tried to describe his works in terms
of the landscape of his native Finland.
But one might as well describe the
work of Beethoven, whose devotion to nature is even better known, in terms
of the rural landscapes near Vienna,

among which he found inspiration not merely for the "Pastoral Symphony,"
but for many another masterpiece.

All this talk of bleak wind-swept forests, and steel blue lakes, waiting
to be ice-bound through the dark rig
ors of the sub-arctic Winter, has lit
tle relevance to the music of Sibelius.
His originality lies not in being a na tive and resident of Finland, but in the mysterious human quality one can
only call imagination, or genius.

Every work by Sibelius has its own distinctive flavor, so that one is not likely to confuse in memory his fourth
symphony with his second, or his sixth
with his seventh. This circumstance, plainly illustrated yesterday by the difference between the violin concerto
and the sixth symphony, links the com
poser with the great names of Beethoven and Wagner rather than
with the lesser men like Franck.

This sixth symphony is so original
that those who dislike it will speak
more or less civilly of its eccentricity.
Its themes are nearly all scale-like passages. They are woven into an intricate musical pattern, yet the work
sounds with the apparent childlike simplicity one rashly ascribes at a
first hearing to mediaeval pieces in the old modes. Yesterday's performance
had the curiously personal style, the Koussevitzky flavor, imparted these days to everything the Boston
Symphony performs.

Schoenberg, despite the baffling mod ernism of his own compositions, is an unusually discreet and skilful trans
criber of Bach. Without trying to make the orchestra sound just like an organ, he succeeds in making one be lieve that if Bach had written this pre lude and fugue for a modern orchestra
he would have scored it exactly as Schoenberg has.

The performance yesterday betrayed
the effect of scanty rehearsal in a number of badly smeared passages.
Nor did one agree with Dr Koussevitz
ky's conception of the subject and working out of the fugue. Yet the music made its emotional effect, so
great was Bach's genius.

The reading of the prelude and
"Liebestod" from "Tristan" was the finest Dr Koussevitzky has given in Boston, because it brought out the magnificent lines of the musical pat tern as well as the intensity of feel ing Wagner imparted to what many regard as his masterpiece.

The orchestra will be away on tour
next week. The program now an nounced (subject, one assumes, to change) for the next Boston concerts,
March 14 and 15, includes a sonata by
Galliard, transcribed by Steinberg;
Martelli's "Assyrian Bas Reliefs"; and Richard Strauss' "Alpine Symphony."
P. R.

Bostonian Music In New York Ears

Audiences and Reviewers Take Kindly to Koussevitzky's

Made 12, 1930 Tra
Novel Cargo
WHAT with one novel piece after another, at the concerts of the Boston Orchestra in New York last week, Dr. Koussevitzky gave two audiences much to interest them, and the reviewers plenty for their pens. From recent concerts at home they heard, for example, Mr. Gruenberg's "Jazz Suite." Most of the scribes—not, to say Phari-sees—thought poorly of it. Mr. Gilman, however, took the opposite view in the Herald Tribune:

This symphonic jazz of Mr. Gruenberg's, regarded as jazz, may be either good or bad. We know not what the pundits of Tin-Pan-Alley might think of it. We ventured, listening to the piece, to appraise it not as jazz, but as music. Thus considered, it lives its own life as organized and pleasurable sound. The thrice familiar patterns are filled with an ingenuity and richness of fancy, are ordered by a civilized musical consciousness, which makes the issue engaging and profitable for other than merely primitive minds.

Mr. Henderson in the Sun may be spokesman for the other side: "Mr. Gruenberg's Suite is one of several attempts which have been made to demonstrate that jazz, our own most particular product, can be treated artistically just as folk music has. But there is something wrong somewhere. Either this is not real jazz or real art; or perhaps jazz and real art cannot be successfully married. Mr. Gruenberg's piece was worth hearing, but when it had been heard one was convinced that he had been made acquainted with an experiment and nothing more. One listened to music which surely belongs to the jazz family, even if it has married a foreigner. There is a rich harvest of dissonances and there are trumpets con-sordini to furnish the conventional 'breaks.' But nothing of the seductive wickedness of jazz was discovered. The finale, a grand smash of tone, evoked applause from an audience which up to that part of the suite had been singularly reticent."

And Schoenberg

At the same concert the Manhattanese also heard Schönberg's orchestral arrangement of Bach's Prelude and Fugue in E-flat originally written for organ. The audience approved; the reviewers, for the most part, agreed. To quote Mr. Gilman again: "Schönberg has transferred to the orchestra with astonishing skill the brilliancy and power of Bach's superb music. If the 'purists' are inclined, in their gentle way, to leave breaks in his impious head, conductors and orchestral program-makers will supply them."

In the concert of Saturday afternoon Dr. Koussevitzky included the Sixth Symphony of Sibelius. Again the reviewers sat up and took notice. To Mr. Gilman the Symphony "had beauty, strength and fascination." To Mr. Henderson "an invigorating directness, the bold employment of thirds and of wide passages might have seemed even a little naive in a lesser man. But the composer's harmonic individuality, the strength and solidity of his structure, the clarity of his voices, his freedom from effect-for-effect's sake, the latter particularly evident in the manner with which several movements were brought to their conclusions with what seemed the scantiest of preparation, were more evident than in this work. Increased familiarity with the Symphony might lessen or increase the impression that the basic ideas were of a sturdiness that would wear well."

Even to Lazar

For his part, Mr. Henderson lent a kindly ear to Lazar's Concerto Grosso also heard at the matinée, writing in the Sun: "His style was a finely organized blend of old and new. He walked some times on the border of the modernist territory, but the fundamental substance of his harmonic scheme was that of his fathers. His melodic sentences were sharply outlined and had dignified character. They were clearly related and the progress of the musician's thought toward the goal of his music was well marked. The concerto-grosso has found favor with several composers of our time and with good reason. It gives the composer much freedom and permits varied instrumental effects without demanding a huge orchestra. Mr. Lazar's composition is a pleasing work and its aim is quite high enough for the possibilities of the form." In the playing of all these pieces, at the one concert and the other, there was only praise for conductor and orchestra. In the Concerto for Violin, heard at the matinée, Mr. Burgin fared as well.

Eighteenth Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, MARCH 14, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, MARCH 15, at 8.15 o'clock

Galliard . . . Sonata in G major (Freely Transcribed for Small Orchestra, by Maximilian Steinberg)

Martelli Assyrian Bas-Reliefs
I. A Winged Jinnee with the Head of an Eagle before the Sacred Tree.
II. Dance.
III. Lion and Lioness in their Lair.
IV. The Army and Musicians of Ashurbanipal.
(First time in the United States)

Strauss An Alpine Symphony, Op. 64
"Night—Sunrise—The Ascent—Entering the Woods—Wandering by the Brook—At the Waterfall—Scenery—On Flowering Paths—The Mountain Pasture—Off the Path through Thicket and Underbrush—On the Glacier—Vision—The Fog Rises—The Sun is Gradually Obscured—Elegy—Stillness before the Storm—The Thunderstorm—Descent—Sunset—Sounds—Night."

There will be an intermission before the symphony

The works to be played at these concerts may be seen in the Allen A. Brown Music Collection of the Boston Public Library one week before the concert

Richard Strauss, Aged 64
From a New Portrait by Orlik

(Vossische Zeitung)

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

Dr. Koussevitzky conducted the 18th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Galliard-Steinberg, Sonata in G Major; Martelli, Assyrian Bas-Reliefs; Strauss, An Alpine Symphony.

Martelli's Suite was performed for the first time in this country. It was said that the performance yesterday was the first anywhere but in the note furnished by the composer, this Suite is included in the list of compositions that have been performed "many times in Paris and in the French provinces." Now the Suite was composed in 1928; it has certainly not been performed as yet by any one of the leading orchestras of Paris.

Martelli, a Corsican by birth, studied at the Paris Conservatory and now lives in Paris. He is 35 years old; he must have passed the yeasty period as a composer. Although educated musically in Paris, he apparently has not been influenced by the French school that insists on clarity even in impressionistic works and on a certain finesse in harmonic schemes and in orchestration. Perhaps these desirable characteristics are revealed in his other compositions; no doubt he thought that an Assyrian subject demanded a more or less barbaric treatment; but the Assyrians though they delighted in noisy music were far from being barbarians; on the contrary their culture was noteworthy. There may be a Corsican school of music unknown to us, which influenced Martelli in his youth. It would have been an impossible task for him to reproduce veritable musical effects as the Assyrians produced them and enjoyed them. He simply endeavored to translate into tones four bas-reliefs that had impressed him as Liszt and others attempted to do the same with pictures.

The four movements of his Suite, all of them short, were suggested by a winged Jinnee, or spirit good or evil, eagle-headed before the Sacred Tree; a Dance before a personage seated, crowned by a tiara and robed in an embroidered tunic; a Lion and a Lioness in their Lair; and for a finale, the Army and Musicians of Ashurbanipal, a mighty man in his day and generation.

It is a pity that before each movement a photograph of the suggesting bas relief could not have been thrown upon a screen. Then some in the audience after each orchestral transcription could have said "Marvellous! Marvellous!"; others exclaiming "Not a bit like it." It would be easy to say that Martelli had set himself an impossible task; it is only just to reply that the music showed imagination, which, after all, is indispensable to a composition purposing to be pictorial; if the different movements were to some musically crude from a technical standpoint, or, while showing a certain skill, only affectedly eccentric, should they be hastily dismissed as vain and impotent? The question is not whether this music is truly Assyrian—for who knows the precise nature of the music, except that the tonal scheme was founded on mathematical relations of planets as formulated by astrologers and astronomers? The question is this; putting aside any thought of race or nation, did the music by itself, without any association, impress the senses or the mind?

Personally we answer "yes," but no two hearers are affected in exactly the same manner except by an exciting rhythm. The tavern music that made one man merry, another mad, aroused in Sir Thomas Browne a deep spirit of devotion. Martelli's Dance, with its hypnotic rhythmic monotony, its wild snatches of melody haunts the memory. As for the Lion, one might say as Demetrius at the play of "Pyramus and Thisby," performed by the hardhanded man of Athens, "Well roar'd, lion." And there were passages in the Finale—but not in the conventional March section—that were much more than ingenious.

The music by Galliard—tinkered adroitly and enlarged in its proportions by Steinberg—is delightful in its gaiety, also in the suavity of the third movement. The lively pace taken by Dr. Koussevitzky in the first Allegro, although the indication reads Allegro non troppo, displayed the remarkable technical proficiency of the orchestra. Although Galliard was of French parentage and educated musically by Italians living in Germany before he made London his home, how English this music is in the jollity of the fast movements. Simple, direct as this Sonata is, is it not more truly music than the bombastic Symphony by Strauss, superbly performed as this Alpine adventure was? An Alpine symphony. It and its composer remind one of Reuben Pettingill of Waterbury, Me., as described by Artemus Ward:

"He was an extraordinarily skilful young man in the use of a common clasp-knife.

"With that simple weapon he could make from soft wood, horses, dogs, cats, etc. He carved excellent soldiers also.

"I remember his masterpiece.

"It was 'Napoleon Crossing the Alps.'

"Looking at it critically, I should say it was rather short of Alps."

The concert will be repeated tonight.

The Brahms Festival will begin with the concerts of Friday afternoon, March 21, and Saturday evening, March 22. Academic Festival Overture, Symphony No. 3, F major. Symphony No. 2, D major.

Richard Strauss, Aged 64
From a New Portrait by Orlik

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

Dr. Koussevitzky conducted the 18th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Galliard-Steinberg, Sonata in G Major; Martelli, Assyrian Bas-Reliefs; Strauss, An Alpine Symphony.

Martelli's Suite was performed for the first time in this country. It was said that the performance yesterday was the first anywhere but in the note furnished by the composer, this Suite is included in the list of compositions that have been performed "many times in Paris and in the French provinces." Now the Suite was composed in 1928; it has certainly not been performed as yet by any one of the leading orchestras of Paris.

Martelli, a Corsican by birth, studied at the Paris Conservatory and now lives in Paris. He is 35 years old; he must have passed the yeasty period as a composer. Although educated musically in Paris, he apparently has not been influenced by the French school that insists on clarity even in impressionistic works and on a certain finesse in harmonic schemes and in orchestration. Perhaps these desirable characteristics are revealed in his other compositions; no doubt he thought that an Assyrian subject demanded a more or less barbaric treatment; but the Assyrians though they delighted in noisy music were far from being barbarians; on the contrary their culture was noteworthy. There may be a Corsican school of music unknown to us, which influenced Martelli in his youth. It would have been an impossible task for him to reproduce veritable musical effects as the Assyrians produced them and enjoyed them. He simply endeavored to translate into tones four bas-reliefs that had impressed him as Liszt and others attempted to do the same with pictures.

The four movements of his Suite, all of them short, were suggested by a winged Jinn, or spirit good or evil, eagle-headed before the Sacred Tree; a Dance before a personage seated, crowned by a tiara and robed in an embroidered tunic; a Lion and a Lioness in their Lair; and for a finale, the Army and Musicians of Ashurbanipal, a mighty man in his day and generation.

It is a pity that before each movement a photograph of the suggesting bas relief could not have been thrown upon a screen. Then some in the audience after each orchestral transcription could have said "Marvellous! Marvellous!" others exclaiming "Not a bit like it." It would be easy to say that Martelli had set himself an impossible task; it is only just to reply that the music showed imagination, which, after all, is indispensable to a composition purposing to be pictorial; if the different movements were to some musically crude from a technical standpoint, or, while showing a certain skill, only affectedly eccentric, should they be hastily dismissed as vain and impotent? The question is not whether this music is truly Assyrian—for who knows the precise nature of the music, except that the tonal scheme was founded on mathematical relations of planets as formulated by astrologers and astronomers? The question is this; putting aside any thought of race or nation, did the music by itself, without any association, impress the senses or the mind?

Personally we answer "yes," but no two hearers are affected in exactly the same manner except by an exciting rhythm. The tavern music that made one man merry, another mad, aroused in Sir Thomas Browne a deep spirit of devotion. Martelli's Dance, with its hypnotic rhythmic monotony, its wild snatches of melody haunts the memory. As for the lion, one might say as Demetrius at the play of "Pyramus and Thisby," performed by the hardhanded man of Athens, "Well roar'd, lion." And there were passages in the Finale—but not in the conventional March section—that were much more than ingenious.

The music by Galliard—tinkered adroitly and enlarged in its proportions by Steinberg—is delightful in its gaiety, also in the suavity of the third movement. The lively pace taken by Dr. Koussevitzky in the first Allegro, although the indication reads Allegro non troppo, displayed the remarkable technical proficiency of the orchestra. Although Galliard was of French parentage and educated musically by Italians living in Germany before he made London his home, how English this music is in the jollity of the fast movements. Simple, direct as this Sonata is, is it not more truly music than the bombastic Symphony by Strauss, superbly performed as this Alpine adventure was? An Alpine symphony. It and its composer remind one of Reuben Pettingill of Waterbury, Me., as described by Artemus Ward:

"He was an extraordinarily skilful young man in the use of a common clasp-knife.

"With that simple weapon he could make from soft wood, horses, dogs, cats, etc. He carved excellent soldiers also.

"I remember his masterpiece.

"It was 'Napoleon Crossing the Alps.'"

"Looking at it critically, I should say it was rather short of Alps."

The concert will be repeated tonight.

The Brahms Festival will begin with the concerts of Friday afternoon, March 21, and Saturday evening, March 22. Academic Festival Overture. Symphony No. 3, F major. Symphony No. 2, D major.

SYMPHONY CONCERT A DELIGHT

Three Contrasting Pieces Make Up the List

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Although Dr. Koussevitzky labors over his programmes, often subjecting them to a double or triple revision, the result not infrequently suggests expediency rather than design. But the list that he prepared for the Symphony Concerts of this week, though it seemed on paper a haphazard grouping of incongruous elements, proved in performance to have been shrewdly contrived.

BUT THREE NUMBERS

There was first the delightful violoncello Sonata of Galliard, as arranged for small orchestra by Maximilian Steinberg, that Dr. Koussevitzky introduced to us in 1925. To it succeeded a set of four "Assyrian Bas-Reliefs," by the Corsican-born Henri Martelli, otherwise unknown to the United States; and Strauss' huge "Alpine Symphony" made the rest, and also the bulk, of the concert.

Galliard's Sonata was beautifully played yesterday, and once more caused the listener to reflect upon the high level to which the art of musical composition attained in the 18th century, when even one of the lesser of the lesser lights could write music such as this: so freshly and charmingly invented, so perfect in form.

An Engrossing Novelty

Not too convincing, on the whole, have been Dr. Koussevitzky's novel pieces, whether native or foreign, in the season now entering upon its fourth quarter; but these "Bas-Reliefs" of Martelli, proved a pleasing exception to this rule. Here is a composer possessed of ideas and imagination and of the requisite technical skill, who can establish a mood with his opening measures and maintain it to the end. There is Oriental color in these tone pictures, but the note is not forced. It is more by purely musical than by obviously descriptive means that Martelli conjures up his vision of a vanished civilization.

The performance evidenced the care that Dr. Koussevitzky always bestows upon any music that he undertakes to conduct; and the suite was warmly applauded. Mr. Sidow, who had so successfully handled the important part for tuba in the third movement, "Lion and Lioness In Their Lair," was obliged to take a "soloist's bow."

Strauss' "Alpine"

Three times now has Dr. Koussevitzky played "An Alpine Symphony" at a pair of subscription concerts, and with each repetition there has been a gain in the unity of impression made by a long and complex work and in the eloquence with which each episode has been set forth. Of the piece itself there is little now to say, though since Dr. Koussevitzky was the one who made it known to Boston, it is far less familiar to us than any of the Straussian tone-poems, save only the youthful "Macbeth," unheard here for many years.

The most objective and pictorial, the most continuously descriptive of them all, "An Alpine Symphony" stands, perhaps, on a lower plane than the rest. And yet, who but Strauss could have filled so large a canvas with such a grasp of the fundamental principles of musical architecture or with such a flow and fund of invention—granting that the themes have not quite the sallency of those in the earlier tone-poems? And if there are episodes, like those of the hunting-horns and the cowbells, that savor of a realism over-naïve and ingenuous, there are passages in this colossal work of a genuine nobility and exaltation. There are the measures that celebrate the completion of the ascent; there is the poetic peroration.

Nor should the scoring, that includes every dynamic degree from the faintest whisper to an earth-shaking fortissimo, go without its usual need of praise. In "An Alpine Symphony" Strauss is seen at the height of his extraordinary powers as an orchestrator.

Koussevitzky, Strauss and Alpine Ascent

With the "Bas Reliefs" of Martelli for Novelty
On the Way

DR. KOUSSEVITZKY is nothing if not loyal to the children of his brain. Few of the new works which he introduces do not come in for repetition at some time or other; but the most insignificant are kept in the permanent repertory of the orchestra. Thus yesterday the program was made up entirely of works which had their first hearing under the present conductor. Chief of them was that product of Richard Strauss's old age, the "Alpine Symphony." With it came Steinberg's arrangement of Galliard's Sonata in G major. Both were introduced to the symphony concerts originally in December, 1925. To them for novelty of the week was added Henri Martelli's suite, "Assyrian Bas-Reliefs." When Strauss wrote his Alpine Symphony in 1915 it was the first time he attempted orchestral music since the "Domestica" of 1904, the first time he attempted orchestral nature music since the early "From Italy" of 1886. Many there were who had assumed that after the writing of the operatic works intervening in the years after "Domestica," Strauss would not again turn to purely symphonic music.

In the Alpine Symphony he is as detailedly programmatic as never before. Where previously in most of his symphonic works Strauss has been content to throw out hints as to the program, in this work he outlines in detail the course which he expects the listener to follow with him. It is to be less a description of the mountains than an ascent to a high peak unnamed. His symphony might well be called "The Day of a Mountain Climber." Early this party arises. It is yet night. We are in the brooding atmosphere just before dawn. A glorious sunrise bursts upon us. The ascent begins. At the beginning one thinks or sees little of mountains. One enters a forest not so different from any other forest, a forest which one might enter down on the plain.

any forest one wanders beside a waterfall is conveniently handy things; one sees—and hears—of which details remain und (was there ever a traveller able to name all the "scen-saw on a given trip?); this scenes way to more usual flowering and the flowering paths lead into pasture, presumably on a somewhere on the side of the in. But pastoral and pastoral need not detain one forever. At ghts gained there is no longer a path to lead the wanderer farther. st continue through thicket and rush. He is rewarded; he emerges lacler. A great view spreads out him once he is beyond the line station. But it is short-lived. A es and obscures the vision. Our gives way to elegiac feelings. An s stillness surrounds him. He be-suspicious of these mountains. Yes, ue, he is caught in a mountain Thunderings and reverberations, nd rain he must somehow endure. scends again. In the valley he eace. No storms here. He is per-to view a sunset. He sinks into nds of night.—One thing Strauss ot tell us, perhaps with wise dis- how high up the mountain is his from which his traveller sees a beyond which the storm prevents om climbing? There is no hint is a mountain-top. Perhaps then fair for critics to fail to find moun-ps in the music! The miserable revents the climber—and the com-from reaching those much desired uss paints from a huge orchestral e. To the large orchestra in com-se he must add a heckelphone, enor tubas, wind machine, thunder ne, and cowbells. And not content all this, he recommends that nes be used for sustaining the tones e of the wind instruments beyond ngth of breath of the players. Nor Strauss assemble all these forces at cause. No one is better able he to paint huge panoramic can- His powers with his orchestra which he expects the listener to follow by no means diminished in this The thunderstorm is a master- of realism. As such it may hold wn with many another scene in on Quixote" and the battle music eldenleben," to cite only two. And usical value is approximately the in all these cases. Further, there oments of true grandeur when the bursts upon the traveller on the of his Alp. Much of the music of rest and the country side is poetic ery finely wrought. Many of the

Three Contrasting Pieces Make Up the List

Although Dr. Koussevitzky labors over his programmes, often subjecting them to a double or triple revision, the result not infrequently suggests expediency rather than design. But the list that he prepared for the Symphony Concerts of this week, though it seemed on paper a haphazard grouping of incongruous elements, proved in performance to have been shrewdly contrived.

There was first the delightful violoncello Sonata of Galliard, as arranged for small orchestra by Maximilian Steinberg, that Dr. Koussevitzky introduced to us in 1925. To it succeeded a set of four "Assyrian Bas-Reliefs," by the Corsican-born Henri Martelli, otherwise unknown to the United States; and Strauss' huge "Alpine Symphony" made the rest, and also the bulk, of the concert.

Galliard's Sonata was beautifully played yesterday, and once more caused the listener to reflect upon the high level to which the art of musical composition attained in the 18th century, when even one of the lesser of the lesser lights could write music such as this: so freshly and charmingly invented, so perfect in form.

Not too convincing, on the whole, have been Dr. Koussevitzky's novel pieces, whether native or foreign, in the season now entering upon its fourth quarter; but these "Bas-Reliefs" of Martelli, proved a pleasing exception to this rule. Here is a composer possessed of ideas and imagination and of the requisite technical skill, who can establish a mood with his opening measures and maintain it to the end. There is Oriental color in these tone pictures but the note is not forced. It is more by purely musical than by obviously descriptive means that Martelli conjures up his vision of a vanished civilization.

The performance evidenced the care that Dr. Koussevitzky always bestows upon any music that he undertakes to conduct; and the suite was warmly applauded. Mr. Sidow, who had so successfully handled the important part for tuba in the third movement, "Lion and Lioness In Their Lair," was obliged to take a "soloist's bow."

Three times now has Dr. Koussevitzky played "An Alpine Symphony" at a pair of subscription concerts, and with each repetition there has been a gain in the unity of impression made by a long and complex work and in the eloquence with which each episode has been set forth. Of the piece itself there is little now to say, though since Dr. Koussevitzky was the one who made it known to Boston, it is far less familiar to us than any of the Straussian tone-poems, save only the youthful "Macbeth," unheard here for many years.

The most objective, and pictorial, the most continuously descriptive of them all, "An Alpine Symphony" stands, perhaps, on a lower plane than the rest. And yet, who but Strauss could have filled so large a canvas with such a grasp of the fundamental principles of musical architecture or with such a flow and fund of invention—granting that the themes have not quite the saliency of those in the earlier tone-poems? And if there are episodes, like those of the hunting-horns and the cowbells, that savor of a realism over-naïve and ingenuous, there are pages in this colossal work of a genuine nobility and exaltation. There are the measures that celebrate the completion of the ascent; there is the poetic peroration.

Nor should the scoring, that includes every dynamic degree from the faintest whisper to an earth-shaking fortissimo, go without its usual need of praise. In "An Alpine Symphony" Strauss is seen at the height of his extraordinary powers as an orchestrator.

With the "F
Martelli
On t

D not loyal to brain. Few which he in for repetition at all but the most ins the permanent repe tra. Thus yesterday made up entirely of their first hearing u ductor. Chief of the of Richard Strauss's Symphony." With arrangement of Gal major. Both were symphony concerts ber, 1925. To them week was added He "Assyrian Bas-Relief wrote his Alpine Sy was the first time h tral music since the first time he atten the first time since the ea 1886. Many there wer that after the writi works intervening in "Domestica," Strauss turn to purely symph In the Alpine Sym tailoredly programmatic Where previously in phonic works Strauss to throw out hints as this work he outlines which he expects the with him. It is to be of the mountains the high peak unnamed might well be called Mountain Climber." arises. It is yet nig brooding atmosphere A glorious sunrise bu ascent begins. At thinks or sees little enters a forest not so other forest, a forest enter down on the pl was rep pessimism Republican elected to Second C publican elected a country

the temp

AS IN any forest one wanders beside a brook; a waterfall is conveniently handy to enliven things; one sees—and hears—"scenery" of which details remain unspecified (was there ever a traveller able to describe or even name all the "scenery" he saw on a given trip?); this scenery gives way to more usual flowering paths; and the flowering paths lead into a mountain pasture, presumably on a plateau somewhere on the side of the mountain. But pastoral and pastoral scenes need not detain one forever. At the heights gained there is no longer a definite path to lead the wanderer farther. He must continue through thicket and underbrush. He is rewarded; he emerges on a glacier. A great view spreads out before him once he is beyond the line of vegetation. But it is short-lived. A fog rises and obscures the vision. Our climber gives way to elegiac feelings. An ominous stillness surrounds him. He becomes suspicious of these mountains. Yes, it is true, he is caught in a mountain storm. Thunderings and reverberations, wind and rain he must somehow endure. He descends again. In the valley he finds peace. No storms here. He is permitted to view a sunset. He sinks into the sounds of night.—One thing Strauss does not tell us, perhaps with wise discretion: how high up the mountain is his glacier from which his traveller sees a vision, beyond which the storm prevents him from climbing? There is no hint that it is a mountain-top. Perhaps then it is unfair for critics to fail to find mountain-tops in the music! The miserable rain prevents the climber—and the composer—from reaching those much desired peaks.

Strauss paints from a huge orchestral palette. To the large orchestra in common use he must add a heckelphone, four tenor tubas, wind machine, thunder machine, and cowbells. And not content with all this, he recommends that machines be used for sustaining the tones of some of the wind instruments beyond the length of breath of the players. Nor does Strauss assemble all these forces without cause. No one is better able than he to paint huge panoramic canvasses. His powers with his orchestra have by no means diminished in this score. The thunderstorm is a masterpiece of realism. As such it may hold its own with many another scene in Straussian works—the bleating of sheep in "Don Quixote" and the battle music in "Heldenleben," to cite only two. And the musical value is approximately the same in all these cases. Further, there are moments of true grandeur when the vision bursts upon the traveller on the side of his Alp. Much of the music of the forest and the country side is poetic and very finely wrought. Many of the themes which seem insignificant on paper or in the study, fit admirably into the scheme of things when heard in their proper place in the orchestra.

All this to the credit side of the ledger. To look upon this page need not be to ignore also the existence of a debit page. For with all its good points the Alpine Symphony may not quite hold its own with the finest of the earlier tone poems—"Till Eulenspiegel," to give only a single example. For one thing, Strauss falls into that chief sign of approaching age, he becomes reminiscent in the Alpine Symphony. One seems to hear references to certain of the composer's own earlier works here and there. Memories of Wagner are not entirely absent. Other composers are in evidence. The references are slight. In the Strauss in the days of his undimmed maturity one never encountered them. As a second entry on this debit page one must write the fact that there are long stretches in which very little seems to be happening. The significant portions of the work are by them needlessly interrupted. Performance yesterday afternoon left nothing to be desired. In the nobler portions of the work it was eloquent. In the weaker portions it favored the ageing Strauss.

Beginning the program Dr. Koussevitzky and his men played the delightful sonata of Galliard. Through a Lento, an Allegro non troppo, an Andante teneramente, an Allegro spiritoso it runs. Much sustained beauty lies in the melodies of the slow movements. And one admired the spirit and the verve of the fast movements, particularly the last. Once again came the reflection that a forgotten past must hold much music, awaiting a re-awakening, which would give pleasure to a receptive present. Once again one feels grateful to the conductor for his share in uncovering so much worth-while music of this past.

For now piece Dr. Koussevitzky played from manuscript the suite of four "Assyrian Bas-Reliefs" of Henri Martelli. They represent a "genius" with the body of a man and head of an eagle; a dance before a personage of some importance; a lion and his mate; the army and musicians of King Ashur-bani-pal. The first is little more than prelude to the rest. The incongruity of the respective parts of the body of the monster represented M. Martelli seems to conjure up by successions of chords equally incongruous. The dance repeats a well rhythmized accompaniment figure, over which winds play pale and tenuous melodies. The snarlings of the wild beasts Dr. Koussevitzky wisely softened and "idealized." This third movement yielded also a solo for bass tuba of no little interest and effectiveness. The fourth is the only move-

Stirring move-ve that the erial contest
n conviction
e more cerd.
to us to be tion in the the weight deficiencies widely disng that he ct that the dable can-alsh. Mr. lef.

President i Alvan T. ype said that nost and that his nomic cons-he Repubchance of new utler has arhout wilt- All says—

William M.
tion as to ue in the Wise be-and comed in the ause the a strad-ause the an more
-Bostes, w Unfo and t have char

BAS RELIEFS' AT PHONY CONCERT

at lli's Work Heard
Time in America

"Alpine Symphony,"
s Sonata Complete Program

ovelly on yesterday's Sym-ncert program was "Assyrian nd hefs," a suite by Henri Martelliote dve of Corsica now living in amoniteinberg's free transcription e Colstra of a sonata by John ut Galliard, and Strauss' "Alpine er." completed a miscellaneous which took some 20 minutes the "al time to perform-his off- on of a familiar and popular mine- arture would no doubt have Service many listeners to whom the only good music is familiar music. Martelli, now in his 30s, is French by citizenship and by training, despite his Italian name. He found inspiration for his "Bas Reliefs" in four fragments of Assyrian sculpture, depicting (1) "A winged Jinnee with the head of an eagle before the sacred tree"; (2) "A dance before a seated personage"; (3) "Lion and Lioness in their lair," and (4) "The army and musicians of Ashurbanipal." The work was written in 1928, and played yesterday for the first time in America.

Martelli's music has an unforced originality of style, and considerable imaginative power. The scoring for orchestra is unusual, with ingenious percussion effects, and no attempt to deafen the audience with perpetual sonorities. The lion, represented by a solo tuba, roars at moments with a hint of the naive naturalism of Haydn's "Creation." The dissonances, unrelieved by consonant harmonies, have the monotony and something of the crudity one associates with primitive and barbaric art. Martelli is obviously a composer of greater significance than most of the new names which so frequently figure on Dr. Koussevitzky's programs. More of his music should be heard here.

Strauss' "Alpine Symphony" has commonly been regarded, even in Germany, as a relative failure, likely to be forgotten in a few years, though "Till Eulenspiegel," "Don Juan" and "Der Rosenkavalier" will insure the composer lasting fame. Yesterday's performance, on which Dr. Koussevitzky lavished his most painstaking eloquence, did not reverse the unfavorable opinion one formed of this grandiose and chaotic work when it was first heard here in 1925.

It goes without saying that Strauss is a master of every device a composer can employ to manufacture something the unwary listener may take for a great work. The themes, insignificant in themselves, are worked out with amazing skill. The scoring for a huge orchestra, which includes every conceivable instrument from organ to cowbells, is superb. But only in certain passages that echo the earlier and greater Strauss is this symphony emotionally impressive. At the rest the listener's intellect may marvel, but his heart remains untouched.

Yesterday's concert made one more certain than ever that "progress music," music that attempts to tell a story or paint a picture or evoke a definite mood in the listener, is based on a misconception of the true limits of the art. Music, like mathematics, does not and cannot copy or represent the world in which we live, and in which the painters, the sculptors and the poets find their materials. It is a world in itself, a new universe to which men turn for a consolation and a hope too often denied them elsewhere.

The power of such pieces of "program music" as Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel" and "Don Juan," or, to speak of lesser things, of Martelli's "Bas Reliefs," lies in the music, not in the artificial and labored attempts to direct the current of the listener's imagination toward particular objects. To admit these truth about music is not to deny, but rather to enhance its emotional and imaginative appeal. Is there any poem or any painting which could be used to add to the effect of the allegretto of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony? The meaning of such music as that cannot be put into words or onto painted canvas.

Even such an inferior piece of music as yesterday's pretty but inconsequential sonata by Galliard, exhumed at Dr. Koussevitzky's request by Steinberg, and freely arranged for orchestra, gains rather than loses by the absence of a "program" telling one what to see and what to feel while listening. This sonata, played with a somber intensity, a broadening and swelling of its phrases not in keeping with the 18th century, was appealing and effective.

Next week's program, all from Brahms, belongs to the Brahms Festival. It includes his second and third symphonies, and the "Academic Festival" overture. This time the Friday and Saturday subscribers will hear the same program, something not hitherto Dr. Koussevitzky's practice at festivals. P. R.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The eighteenth program of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, presented in Symphony Hall, Boston, on the afternoon of March 14, follows:

Galliard, Sonata in G major (Freely transcribed for small orchestra by Maximilian Steinberg).

Martelli, Assyrian Bas-Reliefs.
Strauss, An Alpine Symphony, op. 64.

Martelli's music received at this concert its first performance in the United States. It is a symphonic suite in four parts, each inspired, the composer said in a program note, by a bas-relief with a particular subject. The pictures here musically translated represent "A Winged Jinnee with the Head of an Eagle before the Sacred Tree," "A Dance before a Personage Seated," "Lion and Lioness in Their Lair" and "The Army and Musicians of Ashurbanipal."

themes which seem insignificant or in the study, fit admirably in scheme of things when heard in proper place in the orchestra.

All this to the credit side of the To look upon this page need no ignore also the existence of a debt. For with all its good points the Symphony may not quite hold its own with the finest of the earlier tone—"Till Eulenspiegel," to give a single example. For one thing, falls into that chief sign of appreciation, he becomes reminiscent in the Symphony. One seems to hear references to certain of the composer's earlier works here and there. Many of Wagner are not entirely absent. Composers are in evidence. The ences are slight. In the Strauss days of his undimmed maturity one encountered them. As a second example this debit page one must write that there are long stretches in very little seems to be happening significant portions of the work them needlessly interrupted. Performance yesterday afternoon left not to be desired. In the nobler portions the work it was eloquent. In the portions it favored the ageing Strauss.

Beginning the program Dr. Koussevitzky and his men played the de sonata of Galliard. Through a Le Allegro non troppo, an Andante tendente, an Allegro spiritoso it runs. Much sustained beauty lies in the middle of the slow movements. And one admired the spirit and the verve of fast movements, particularly the last. Once again came the reflection that forgotten past must hold much music awaiting a re-awakening, which would give pleasure to a receptive presence. Once again one feels grateful to conductor for his share in uncovering much worth-while music of this past.

For now piece Dr. Koussevitzky played from manuscript the suite of four "Assyrian Bas-Reliefs" of Henri Martelli. They represent a "genius" with the body of a man and head of an eagle; a dance before a personage of some importance a lion and his mate; the army and musicians of King Ashur-bani-pal. The first is little more than prelude to the rest. The incongruity of the respective parts of the body of the monster represented. M. Martelli seems to conjure up by sessions of chords equally incongruous. The dance repeats a well rhythmed companion figure, over which will play pale and tenuous melodies. The snarlings of the wild beasts Dr. Koussevitzky wisely softened and "idealized." This third movement yielded also a for bass tuba of no little interest and effectiveness. The fourth is the only movement of "long breath." Stirring move the warriors through the musical picture. Subtly the musicians play their tunes. Climactic ending could hardly have been better planned.

Modern harmonic resource is capable of accomplishing almost anything if only it is in clever enough hands. The task which M. Martelli had set himself, over and above the obvious realistic effects already mentioned, was to furnish a background which should be in music an equivalent of the feeling one gets from looking upon the peculiar sculptural form known as the bas-relief. Probably the effect which remains in the mind of those who look upon this type of art is the effect which remains most in the mind of those who look upon this type of art is the roundly. Add to this the fact that the Assyrians had not progressed far in the science of drawing, knew little or nothing of perspective, made arbitrary disposition of feet and hands. All this a composer on such a subject would put into his music. The marvel of it is that he succeeded. The very drabness of the music of which many complained, and perhaps justly—was true and faithful rendering of the subject in hand, was the chief success of the music. One cannot possibly quarrel with the composer's handling of his subject. Of the choice of that subject—but that is another matter.

A. H. M.

NEW 'BAS RELIEFS' AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Martelli's Work Heard First Time in America

Strauss' "Alpine Symphony," Galliard's Sonata Complete Program

The novelty on yesterday's symphony concert program was "Assyrian Bas Reliefs," a suite by Henri Martelli, a native of Corsica now living in Paris. Steinberg's free transcription for orchestra of a sonata by John Ernest Galliard, and Strauss' "Alpine Symphony," completed a miscellaneous program which took some 20 minutes less than the usual time to perform. The addition of a familiar and popular classic overture would no doubt have pleased the many listeners to whom the only good music is familiar music.

Martelli, now in his 30s, is French by citizenship and by training, despite his Italian name. He found inspiration for his "Bas Reliefs" in four fragments of Assyrian sculpture, depicting (1) "A winged Jinnee with the head of an eagle before the sacred tree"; (2) "A dance before a seated personage"; (3) "Lion and Lioness in their lair," and (4) "The army and musicians of Ashurbanipal." The work was written in 1928, and played yesterday for the first time in America.

Martelli's music has an unforced originality of style, and considerable imaginative power. The scoring for orchestra is unusual, with ingenious percussion effects, and no attempt to deafen the audience with perpetual sonorities. The lion, represented by a solo tuba, roars at moments with a hint of the naive naturalism of Haydn's "Creation." The dissonances, unrelieved by consonant harmonies, have the monotony and something of the crudity one associates with primitive and barbaric art. Martelli is obviously a composer of greater significance than most of the new names which so frequently figure on Dr. Koussevitzky's programs. More of his music should be heard here.

Strauss' "Alpine Symphony" has commonly been regarded, even in Germany, as a relative failure, likely to be forgotten in a few years, though "Till Eulenspiegel," "Don Juan" and "Der Rosenkavalier" will insure the composer lasting fame. Yesterday's performance, on which Dr. Koussevitzky lavished his most painstaking eloquence, did not reverse the unfavorable opinion one formed of this grandiose and chaotic work when it was first heard here in 1925.

It goes without saying that Strauss is a master of every device a composer can employ to manufacture something the unwary listener may take for a great work. The themes, insignificant in themselves, are worked out with amazing skill. The scoring for a huge orchestra, which includes every conceivable instrument from organ to cowbells, is superb. But only in certain passages that echo the earlier and greater Strauss is this symphony emotionally impressive. At the rest the listener's intellect may marvel, but his heart remains untouched.

Yesterday's concert made one more certain than ever that "progress music," music that attempts to tell a story or paint a picture or evoke a definite mood in the listener, is based on a misconception of the true limits of the art. Music, like mathematics, does not and cannot copy or represent the world in which we live, and in which the painters, the sculptors and the poets find their materials. It is a world in itself, a new universe to which men turn for a consolation and a hope too often denied them elsewhere.

The power of such pieces of "program music" as Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel" and "Don Juan," or, to speak of lesser things, of Martelli's "Bas Reliefs," lies in the music, not in the artificial and labored attempts to direct the current of the listener's imagination toward particular objects. To admit these truths about music is not to deny, but rather to enhance its emotional and imaginative appeal. Is there any poem or any painting which could be used to add to the effect of the allegretto of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony? The meaning of such music as that cannot be put into words or onto painted canvas.

Even such an inferior piece of music as yesterday's pretty but inconsequential sonata by Galliard, exhumed at Dr. Koussevitzky's request by Steinberg, and freely arranged for orchestra, gains rather than loses by the absence of a "program" telling one what to see and what to feel while listening. This sonata, played with a somber intensity, a broadening and swelling of its phrases not in keeping with the 18th century, was appealing and effective.

Next week's program, all from Brahms, belongs to the Brahms Festival. It includes his second and third symphonies, and the "Academic Festival" overture. This time the Friday and Saturday subscribers will hear the same program, something not hitherto Dr. Koussevitzky's practice at festivals.

P. R.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The eighteenth program of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, presented in Symphony Hall, Boston, on the afternoon of March 14, follows:

Galliard, Sonata in G major (Freely transcribed for small orchestra by Maximilian Steinberg).

Martelli, Assyrian Bas-Reliefs.

Strauss, An Alpine Symphony, op. 64.

Martelli's music received at this concert its first performance in the United States. It is a symphonic suite in four parts, each inspired, the composer said in a program note, by a bas-relief with a particular subject. The pictures here musically translated represent "A Winged Jinnee with the Head of an Eagle before the Sacred Tree," "A Dance before a Personage Seated," "Lion and Lioness in Their Lair" and "The Army and Musicians of Ashurbanipal."

208

Henri Martelli was born in Corsica 35 years ago and lives in Paris, where he received his musical education and where he has had other works produced. If the present suite could have been heard 20 years ago it might have made a greater impression, but in that time Stravinsky and Prokofieff have made it difficult to appreciate other composers' efforts to depict prehistoric or early historical periods. Nor does the translation of pictures into tone justify itself in this instance. It is well known that one of the characteristics of the music of the East is monotony. This quality the composer has succeeded in preserving. The third movement gives opportunity for a solo number with the bass tuba in the role of the lion. This is by no means a fearsome beast, but rather an amiable, Shavian creature. Both the army and the musicians of the Great King were equally tame. Possibly the composer intended to be ironical about these ancient times.

Nor was there much to move us to gratitude in the opening item, which had been introduced by Dr. Koussevitzky four years before. This is pleasant, harmless music, which would be even more agreeable if it were a little livelier.

The "Alpine" Symphony necessarily profited by contrast with what had preceded it. Strauss at all events knows how to say what he has to say. What a pity that he has not more to communicate. There are passages of extraordinary and characteristic beauty in these pages. But the pages are too many. There is too much repetition of banal material. The introduction of the cow-bells and the wind-machine is peculiarly offensive because so especially needless in the case of a surpassingly brilliant orchestrator. Yet it is surprisingly easy to listen for 50 minutes to Strauss's orchestra: and in this score there is plenty of opportunity to renew acquaintance with old and well loved friends, notably "Till" and "Rosenkavalier."

On March 21, the orchestra begins its six-day festival of the music of Johannes Brahms. L. A. S.

Nineteenth Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, MARCH 21, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, MARCH 22, at 8.15 o'clock

Opening Concerts of the Brahms Festival

ACADEMIC FESTIVAL OVERTURE, Op. 80

SYMPHONY NO. 3 in F major, Op. 90

- I. Allegro con brio.
- II. Andante.
- III. Poco allegretto.
- IV. Allegro.

SYMPHONY No. 2, D major, Op. 73

- I. Allegro non troppo.
- II. Adagio non troppo.
- III. Allegretto grazioso, quasi andantino.
- IV. Allegro con spirito.

There will be an intermission after the Symphony No. 3

For the remaining Programmes of the Brahms Festival see page 1561

Henri Martelli was born in Corsica 35 years ago and lives in Paris, where he received his musical education and where he has had other works produced. If the present suite could have been heard 20 years ago it might have made a greater impression, but in that time Stravinsky and Prokofieff have made it difficult to appreciate other composers' efforts to depict prehistoric or early historical periods. Nor does the translation of pictures into tone justify itself in this instance. It is well known that one of the characteristics of the music of the East is monotony. This quality the composer has succeeded in preserving. The third movement gives opportunity for a solo number with the bass tuba in the role of the lion. This is by no means a fearsome beast, but rather an amiable, Shavian creature. Both the army and the musicians of the Great King were equally tame. Possibly the composer intended to be ironical about these ancient times.

Nor was there much to move us to gratitude in the opening item, which had been introduced by Dr. Koussevitzky four years before. This is pleasant, harmless music, which would be even more agreeable if it were a little livelier.

The "Alpine" Symphony necessarily profited by contrast with what had preceded it. Strauss at all events knows how to say what he has to say. What a pity that he has not more to communicate. There are passages of extraordinary and characteristic beauty in these pages. But the pages are too many. There is too much repetition of banal material. The introduction of the cow-bells and the wind-machine is peculiarly offensive because so especially needless in the case of a surpassingly brilliant orchestrator. Yet it is surprisingly easy to listen for 50 minutes to Strauss's orchestra; and in this score there is plenty of opportunity to renew acquaintance with old and well loved friends, notably "Till" and "Rosenkavalier."

On March 21, the orchestra begins its six-day festival of the music of Johannes Brahms. L. A. S.

Nineteenth Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, MARCH 21, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, MARCH 22, at 8.15 o'clock

Opening Concerts of the Brahms Festival

ACADEMIC FESTIVAL OVERTURE, Op. 80

SYMPHONY NO. 3 in F major, Op. 90

- I. Allegro con brio.
- II. Andante.
- III. Poco allegretto.
- IV. Allegro.

SYMPHONY No. 2, D major, Op. 73

- I. Allegro non troppo.
- II. Adagio non troppo.
- III. Allegretto grazioso, quasi andantino.
- IV. Allegro con spirito.

There will be an intermission after the Symphony No. 3

For the remaining Programmes of the Brahms Festival see page 1561

JOHANNES BRAHMS
(May 7, 1833 — April 3, 1897)

BRAHMS FESTIVAL

Herald By PHILIP HALE Feb. 22, 1930

The first concert of the Brahms festival took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted. The program was as follows: Academic Festival overture; Symphony, F major, No. 3; Symphony, D major, No. 2. The audience was enthusiastic throughout the concert.

One had supposed that Brahms knew what he was about when he described his overture, the Academic Festival, as "a very jolly potpourri on students' songs" music written in the manner of Franz Suppe, of "Fatinitza" fame. Brahms was to receive a degree from the University of Breslau and it was natural that he chose student songs for themes. It was also natural that he should describe the work as a "jolly" potpourri. But we are now told that he spoke "flippantly;" that there is a vein of sadness in the music; that the lively chatter at the beginning is really gloomy comment on the fleeting joys of university life. Why should Brahms have thus been a "Dismal Jemmy"? Because he had not enjoyed what are called the advantages of a collegiate education? Because the degree would put him in a class with some no doubt estimable persons who had written respectably dull music?

No. One likes to think that Brahms meant exactly what he said; that he wrote a jolly potpourri for a joyous occasion.

Surely this light-hearted work should be played in a light-hearted manner as students would sing the tunes. The music does not admit of dramatization for the interpretation. Nor does it admit of an infinite number of nuances; of changes in tempi other than those indicated. In this music eloquence is out of place. Whatever may be said against Brahms he was never bombastic.

It is the tendency in these days to find pessimism in works of Brahms that to Philistines, enjoying them, are conspicuous for serenity, sunshine and courage. There are works of his that are charged with a sadness akin to despair; a melancholy that is black with the blackness of darkness. He was often obsessed by the thought of death. So was Tchaikovsky. If Tchaikovsky groaned lustily, shrieked, as a strong man in agony, Brahms would often whine. It is as if he had said with Brachiano in John Webster's tragedy:

"On pain of death, let no man name death to me: it is a word infinitely terrible."

But how can recent biographers find the symphony in D major a work of epic grandeur? It has hitherto been regarded as agreeable in the Mendelssohnian manner, tuneful, with a piquant Scherzo, and a reassuring Finale, music that is free from storm, stress and passion; music that almost as a quotation pays a graceful compliment to Mendelssohn in flowing measures, as there is a tribute to Wagner in the first movement of the Third Symphony, a glimpse of Venus and her voluptuous train, refreshing after the crashing, defiant opening measures.

There is also a wide-spread tendency in performing the orchestral music of Brahms to make it more dramatic than the contents suggest. This comes from the wish to avoid the academic, respectful, perfunctory, one might say obsequious readings that in times past led many to find the symphonies too sober, it not dull. If jog-trot interpreters thought to reveal "the spirit of Brahms"—meaningless phrase to apply to any composer, but one that sounds well and impresses some—contemporary interpreters are often tempted to treat Brahms as if he were possessed with a demon; as if he were a daring innovation, with fire, not celestial ichor in his veins. Or in order to make the music more intense, there is undue importance given to episodes so that there is no continuous musical flow. The latter course appeals to the great majority. The music is, then, exciting; the dynamic contrasts hold the attention; the composer in the minds of the hearers is glorified; they might exclaim: "Is this Brahms? Who would have thought the old man to have so much blood in him?"

After all, whatever the purist may say, it is better to be pleasurably excited at a concert than to be lulled to sleep. In all probability the magnificent performance by the orchestra and the roaring applause of the audience would have delighted Johannes, for he was mortal, and all mortals like appreciation.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is as follows: Haydn, Symphony, D-major (with the horn call); Piston, Suite for orchestra (first performance); Sibelius, Symphony No. 6; Bach, Organ Prelude and Fugue in E-flat major, arranged for orchestra by Schoenberg.

The second concert of the Brahms festival will take place tomorrow afternoon in Symphony hall. Song of Destiny, Piano Concerto, B-flat, No. 2 (Arthur Schnabel, pianist); Symphony, E-minor, No. 4. Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor.

BRAHMS PROGRAM AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Festival Performances of
His Music Begun

Second and Third Symphonies and
"Academic Festival" Overture

9:30 ————— Meh. 22. 1930

The program of this week's Symphony concerts in the regular Friday and Saturday subscription series marks the beginning of the Brahms Festival, the outstanding event of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 49th season. Four extra concerts, beginning tomorrow, will complete this festival. Yesterday afternoon the Friday subscribers applauded the "Academic Festival" overture, the Third Symphony, and the Second Symphony, which the Saturday audience will hear this evening.

The Beethoven Festival in 1927 marked the centenary of the composer's death. The Brahms Festival does not commemorate any anniversary. It signals Dr. Koussevitzky's enthusiasm for the composer's music. The fact that the Beethoven Festival three years ago reduced the season's deficit by more than $20,000 supplies a practical justification for the present enterprise. Its receipts will be so much clear gain for the orchestra's finances.

But the artistic worth of such a series of performances as we are to enjoy during the Brahms Festival is so great that there is no need to dwell upon these money matters. If the audiences are as numerous and as enthusiastic as seems probable, one hopes the success of the present venture will encourage Dr. Koussevitzky and the trustees to offer Boston some such unusual treat every year henceforth.

Detractors of Brahms, of whom there still many among musicians the world over, like to emphasize the ponderous and priggish quality of his music. They would have it that he was a pedantic and clumsy composer, ultra serious, with no gaiety of heart, no sprightliness of mood. The "Academic Festival" overture, written, to be sure, in gratitude for the degree of Doctor of Philosophy awarded him "honoris causa" by the University of Breslau, is indisputably free from priggishness and pedantry. The composer himself called it "a very jolly potpourri on student songs, a la Suppe." This description is perfectly accurate.

German student songs have, as a rule, better tunes than American college songs, but the words are no more sedate or sober than those sung by undergraduates at Harvard or Yale. If Brahms had really been a pedant, he would have sent the Breslau University a double fugue, or an interminable set of variations, on themes of the utmost musical propriety and dullness, free from ribald connotations.

Yesterday's spirited performance, in which Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra were at their best, won delighted applause from the audience. This overture, though slighter in substance than the great "Tragic Overture," published with it, and unfortunately omitted from the programs of the present festival, is of its kind an indubitable masterpiece.

Of the two symphonies heard yesterday, one greatly prefers the Second to the Third. This D major Symphony is almost as full of graceful and freely flowing melody as are those of Mozart. For once Brahms escapes the shadow of Beethoven, reflections of whose tremendous figure obscure and constrict so much of his work. For once the thing one notices first in a symphony by Brahms is the originality and beauty of its melody and rhythm rather than the solidity of its musical structure.

The Third Symphony, in F major, is, on the other hand, the least satisfying of the four Brahms wrote. It is a piece of musical architecture carefully built on a grand scale of materials too often poor and barren. The scoring for orchestra is thick and muddy. The characteristic mannerisms of the composer obtrude themselves in almost every measure.

Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra did well in the Second Symphony. His romantic and intense interpretation, stressing the dramatic element in the piece at the expense of its lyricism, does not, however, efface from memory the marvelous interpretation Dr. Muck used to give, or the beautifully wrought version Mr. Toscanini offered a Boston audience in 1921.

The Third Symphony was, relatively speaking, badly played yesterday. Attacks lacked precision, other details were muddled, but one might have overlooked these defects had Dr. Koussevitzky not so utterly misconceived the style of the music. It is no use trying to make a Tchaikovsky out of Brahms.

Next week's Symphony concerts will bring repetitions of Haydn's "Horn Call" Symphony, Sibelius' Sixth Symphony, and Schoenberg's arrangement of a Bach prelude and fugue, also the first performance of a new suite by Walter Piston, now instructor in music at Harvard.

A First Day For Brahms Thrice Over

Dr. Koussevitzky Assembles
The Middle Symphonies
And an Overture

Trans. ————— Meh. 22. 1930

IN the largest type upon the page, the program-book labelled the occasion "Opening Concert of the Brahms Festival"; but to the practised eye it resembled a Friday matinee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, upon which an "All-Brahms" program had descended. A glance around, before the concert began, noted the usual audience; others, while the concert was proceeding, its customary tranquil listening. Politely it hailed and farewelled Dr. Koussevitzky whenever he came to the stage or departed from it. Politely it clapped Brahms's kettle-drums, bass-drum and cymbals at the end of the "Academic Overture." His Symphony in F major passed without excitement; but at the close of the Second, which ended the concert, a gust of applause came quick and warm. Seemingly, few demurred to two Symphonies of Brahms in a single afternoon; while hardly more were impressed.

Plainly enough, an "All-Brahms" program does not alter the habitual detachment—in the auditorium—at these Friday matinées. No more, probably, would a whole Brahms Festival, were that same audience exposed to it. Perhaps the company this evening will warm more to a special occasion; but it will be just as well to date the festival from the concert of Sunday afternoon. Then begin the four days of Brahms, the Brahmsians, and his prophets at Symphony Hall assembled. And "we are all Brahmsians now"—except possibly that audience of Friday afternoon which prefers, with the best grace in the world, to remain its normal self.

The "Academic Festival Overture," as the full title runs, was obviously the proper opening piece. Brahms wrote but two concert-overtures, and neither by mood, matter, nor good report would the "Tragic Overture" have suited the occasion. Except the Double Concerto for Violin and Violoncello, no symphonic piece by the mature Brahms is less often played in America. Reasonably, the present ignores it. Since two Symphonies to follow, the sticklers for what have preferred, as natural in the Variations upon a Theme in. They are altogether Brahmsian. They have not dimmed them; the say they are the source of all four Symphonies. From a recent program Dr. Koussevitzky banished them. The more the but there was only to listen to the future in which Brahms, after his returns thanks for the doctor's Breslau.

pages made plain that the composer was sparing no pains. For a festival at justly stirs his ambition, he studied the "Academic Overture" two subsequent Symphonies, re-them until the orchestra knew by wish and was itself "on edge." Brahms might have lately handed the three manuscripts for first place. Dr. Koussevitzky plays music as though for the time he believed it and there were nothing else in the world. Give him a composer that him nearly as does Brahms, and is in the joining of heat to light. ely and faithfully he kept out the afternoon to the true an orchestra with its subdued tonal color, its open and running than massed voices, choir upon As sensitively he caught the mood with the student-songs from he generates this Academic Over-ceased the composer, self-depre- and jocular, to call the piece a rri" of such tunes, his jolly in return for the doctorate. Ac- it is only such in the sonorous of the close—and there with state- er than sportive accent. Else- Brahms turns over these student- rather wistfully. At middle age d look back at them as to symbols shed youth. As he looked, he both and sighed—the melancholy that ussevitzky draws from at least s Overture. More than is native he also polishes it. For the most German conductors will have it homely, even heavy; make out case for such a "reading." outs these are the days of olitan Brahms. Dr. Koussevitzky Russia and Paris plays him; so s Mr. Toscanini of Milan and New What connoisseurs ask is a pervi- nation. Therefore an "Academ- ture" melancholy and with arti-

o haste when he sat at his writ- le, Brahms put to paper compact ones. Two of them in an after- o not imply two hours of listening. hird and the Second—to name in the order in which they were

BRAHMS PROGRAM AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Festival Performances of
His Music Begun

Second and Third Symphonies and
"Academic Festival" Overture

9:30 p.m. — Feb. 22, 1922

The program of this week's Symphony concert in the regular Friday and Saturday subscription series marks the beginning of the Brahms Festival, the outstanding event of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 49th season. Four extra concerts, beginning tomorrow, will complete this festival. Yesterday afternoon the Friday subscribers applauded the "Academic Festival" overture, the Third Symphony, and the Second Symphony, which the Saturday audience will hear this evening.

The Beethoven Festival in 1927 marked the centenary of the composer's death. The Brahms Festival does not commemorate any anniversary. It signals Dr. Koussevitzky's enthusiasm for the composer's music. The fact that the Beethoven Festival three years ago reduced the season's deficit by more than $20,000 supplies a practical justification for the present enterprise. Its receipts will be so much clear gain for the orchestra's finances.

But the artistic worth of such a series of performances as we are to enjoy during the Brahms Festival is so great that there is no need to dwell upon these money matters. If the audiences are as numerous and as enthusiastic as seems probable, one hopes the success of the present venture will encourage Dr. Koussevitzky and the trustees to offer Boston some such unusual treat every year henceforth.

Detractors of Brahms, of whom there still many among musicians the world over, like to emphasize the ponderous and priggish quality of his music. They would have it that he was a pedantic and clumsy composer, ultra serious, with no gaiety of heart, no sprightliness of mood. The "Academic Festival" overture, written, to be sure, in gratitude for the degree of Doctor of Philosophy awarded him "honoris causa" by the University of Breslau, is indisputably free from priggishness and pedantry. The composer himself called it "a very jolly potpourri on student songs, a la Suppe." This description is perfectly accurate.

German student songs have, as a rule, better tunes than American college songs, but the words are no more sedate or sober than those sung by undergraduates at Harvard or Yale. If Brahms had really been a pedant, he would have sent the Breslau University a double fugue, or an interminable set of variations, on themes of the utmost musical propriety and dullness, free from ribald connotations.

Yesterday's spirited performance, in which Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra were at their best, won delighted applause from the audience. This overture, though slighter in substance than the great "Tragic Overture," published with it, and unfortunately omitted from the programs of the present festival, is of its kind an indubitable masterpiece.

Of the two symphonies heard yesterday, one greatly prefers the Second to the Third. This D major Symphony is almost as full of graceful and freely flowing melody as are those of Mozart. For once Brahms escapes the shadow of Beethoven, reflections of whose tremendous figure obscure and constrict so much of his work. For once the thing one notices first in a symphony by Brahms is the originality and beauty of its melody and rhythm rather than the solidity of its musical structure.

The Third Symphony, in F major, is, on the other hand, the least satisfying of the four Brahms wrote. It is a piece of musical architecture carefully built on a grand scale of materials too often poor and barren. The scoring for orchestra is thick and muddy. The characteristic mannerisms of the composer obtrude themselves in almost every measure.

Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra did well in the Second Symphony. His romantic and intense interpretation, stressing the dramatic element in the piece at the expense of its lyricism, does not, however, efface from memory the marvelous interpretation Dr. Muck used to give, or the beautifully wrought version Mr. Toscanini offered a Boston audience in 1921.

The Third Symphony was, relatively speaking, badly played yesterday. Attacks lacked precision, other details were muddled, but one might have overlooked these defects had Dr. Koussevitzky not so utterly misconceived the style of the music. It is no use trying to make a Tchaikovsky out of Brahms.

Next week's Symphony concert will bring repetitions of Haydn's "Horn Call" Symphony, Sibelius' Sixth Symphony, and Schoenberg's arrangement of a Bach prelude and fugue, also the first performance of a new suite by Walter Piston, now instructor in music at Harvard.

A First For The

Dr. Koussevitzky
The Middle Modern
And an n't hurt
Trans.

IN the largest the program-bers of Kin
sion "Opening l the soi Festival"; but left. Of resembled a Friday Symphony Orchest
"All-Brahms" prog glance around, bef the time noted the usual at the concert was p ary tranquil listeni and farewelled Dr.
ever he came to t from it. Politely kettle-drums, bass the end of the "
His Symphony in rmers di out excitement; bu
Second, which ende of applause came Seemingly, few de phonies of Brahms while hardly more like those

Plainly enough, a gram does not alt tachment—in the Friday matinees. opportu would a whole Br that same audience that are haps the company t more to a special be just as well to the concert of Sun
begin the four da Brahmsians, and h phony Hall assemb Brahmsians now"— audience of Friday fers, with the best to remain its norma

The "Academic in who is the full title runs proper opening piec
two concert-overtu mood, matter, nor g
"Tragic Overture"
sion. Except the Dr lin and Violoncello by the mature Brahm
in America. Real

Festival ignores it. Since two Symphonies were to follow, the sticklers for logic might have preferred, as natural introduction, the Variations upon a Theme by Haydn. They are altogether Brahmsian; time has not dimmed them; the learned say they are the source book of all four Symphonies. From a subsequent program Dr. Koussevitzky had also banished them. The more the regret, but there was only to listen to the Overture in which Brahms, after his manner, returns thanks for the doctorate from Breslau.

A few pages made plain that the conductor was sparing no pains. For a festival that justly stirs his ambition, he had restudied the "Academic Overture" and the two subsequent Symphonies, rehearsed them until the orchestra knew his every wish and was itself "on edge." A living Brahms might have lately handed him the three manuscripts for first performance. Dr. Koussevitzky plays every music as though for the time he believed in it and there were nothing else in the world. Give him a composer that touches him nearly as does Brahms, and he excels in the joining of heat to light. Sensitively and faithfully he kept throughout the afternoon to the true Brahmsian orchestra with its subdued scale of tonal color, its open and running rather than massed voices, choir upon choir. As sensitively he caught the mood of Brahms with the student-songs from which he generates this Academic Overture.

It pleased the composer, self-deprecating and jocular, to call the piece a "potpourri" of such tunes, his jolly "thesis" in return for the doctorate. Actually it is only such in the sonorous tumult of the close—and there with stately rather than sportive accent. Elsewhere Brahms turns over these student-songs rather wistfully. At middle age he could look back at them as to symbols of vanished youth. As he looked, he both smiled and sighed—the melancholy that Dr. Koussevitzky draws from at least half the Overture. More than is native custom he also polishes it. For the most part, German conductors will have it hearty, homely, even heavy; make out a good case for such a "reading." Hereabouts these are the days of cosmopolitan Brahms. Dr. Koussevitzky out of Russia and Paris plays him; so also does Mr. Toscanini of Milan and New York. What connoisseurs ask is a personal divination. Therefore an "Academic Overture" melancholy and with artifice.

At no haste when he sat at his writing table, Brahms put to paper compact symphonies. Two of them in an afternoon do not imply two hours of listening. The Third and the Second—to name them in the order in which they were played—make effective contrast; out of them sounds the symphonic Brahms when he is nearest to common humanity. The labellers, ever busy with a word and a paste-pot, will have this Third Symphony in F major Brahms's "Eroica." The first movement and, in degree, the finale, give them reason. The first lacks neither spaciousness nor strength nor Brahmsian passion. There are outflung phrases; motives in clamorous and striving ascent and descent. The mental and the musical energy of the whole is irresistible. As nearly as it was in him to be dramatic, Brahms writes a music of strenuous conflict; but always in that measure which is thought tempering emotion. Even the motto-motiv shall not shout too loud. It is token of inward and spiritual resistance.

After the first movement, these heroic accents are stilled. The slow movement strikes unmistakably the note of Brahms's autumnal song. The phrases soften; the rhythms are gentle; the progress musing; the coloring clear and pale. Out of strength is born sweetness; but into sentimentality, thanks to Brahms's mind, it never lapses. Continuing, the lyrical Brahms writes the succeeding Allegretto. Those that disliked man and music reproached him with a North-German, not to say Prussian, hardness. Now, he reminds them, he can write as tenderly and poignantly as Schumann. If the hearer wishes, find again in the finale the strenuous, striving, quasi-dramatic Brahms, calling back that heroic motto-motiv. Before the end, however, the autumnal mood again prevails. Restlessness stills into calm; the sombre coloring warms into golden glow. These are the days of a songful Brahms. Through the second and the third movements Dr. Koussevitzky intensified the lyrical mood; through the first and the finale released the latent passion. But, true Brahmsian, he kept the song clear of sensuous note; preferred, with Mr. Schnabel, the present illustrious guest at Symphony Hall, has a witty tongue. Without a thought of the underlying irony, a London newspaper quotes him as saying: "How different from the warmth of English audiences! What generosity they show! Bad, good, phony in D major is Brahms's and indifferent performers are equally total." For the conductor, it was acclaimed—so, as I tell my pupils, there a music that should charm by freis a place for everybody." And again: and animation, yet not quite esca "Some accuse me of being too serious. Brahmsian contemplation, the BralIt is not I that am serious, but Mozart, melancholy. Quick-coming in Beethoven, Schubert."

Th t. None of Brahms's so free from the m-alculatation rather than the notes. None ex-
turns of expression,
iner, inseparable from much and in a char-
The first movement is
ns, fertile in melody,
ready with expedient.
The spacing is open.
it, the movement flex-cheerful ease. The slow
d melancholy creeps in melancholy of the Rus-
is a intensive temperaments;
mood, proper to an
now wo. It is like the misty ine out of cloud, over lain.
for Brahms—touches
farmer he must have the
; for before and be-oboe is still piping a hey said thms was at his middle
f them wrote this Second le autumnal mood was
n. The finale outpaces
vay. The idyll shines
ahms knew and loved
irs. There are Mediter-
in this Second Sym-
long may melancholy overcloud them. The loubtless have it that tries to "dramatize" a
here is no tonal drama.
could set clear and keep ere peke, each songful mood;
c flow; make each fine
suggest. The orchesmorous; as in the Third ssed the measures that darken progress. . . .
amatist in Brahms; but ad Symphony speaks a
H. T. P.

Th t. None of Brahms's so free from the m-alculatation rather than the notes. None ex-
turns of expression,
iner, inseparable from
much and in a char-
The first movement is
ns, fertile in melody,
ready with expedient.
The spacing is open.
it, the movement flex-
cheerful ease. The slow
d melancholy creeps in melancholy of the Rus-
is a intensive temperaments;
mood, proper to an
now wo. It is like the misty ine out of cloud, over
lain.
for Brahms—touches
farmer he must have the
; for before and be-oboe is still piping a
hey said thms was at his middle
f them wrote this Second
le autumnal mood was
n. The finale outpaces
vay. The idyll shines
ahms knew and loved
irs. There are Mediter-
in this Second Sym-
long may melancholy
overcloud them. The loubtless have it that tries to "dramatize" a
here is no tonal drama.
could set clear and keep
ere peke, each songful mood;
c flow; make each fine
suggest. The orchesmorous; as in the Third
ssed the measures that darken progress. . . .
amatist in Brahms; but ad Symphony speaks a
H. T. P.

SYMPHONY IN BRAHMS FESTIVAL

Opens Series With His Second and Third

Post Mel. 22, 1930
BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The Brahms Festival at Symphony Hall has begun. At the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon, as he will again this evening, Dr. Koussevitzky offered that composer's Second and Third Symphonies, with the Academic Festival Overture for cheerful and sonorous preface. On Sunday afternoon and the evenings of the three succeeding days will follow four more concerts, presenting music for chorus, for orchestra, for piano with orchestra, and music in the smaller forms.

THE FESTIVAL IDEA

In this country, although not in those of Europe, one-composer festivals are generally of a commemorative nature. But since Brahms was born 97 years ago and has been dead but 33, there is no hundredth or other convenient anniversary to be celebrated at this time. Rather the current festival represents an intention on the part of Dr. Koussevitzky to carry to our shores a European custom, for festivals devoted to various and sundry composers are of common occurrence on the continent, and also to indulge to the full his own fondness for the music of Brahms.

The history of Brahms in Boston is one of gradual change from indifference and hostility to genuine popularity, and from the standpoint of the box-office the Brahms Festival bids fair to be a complete success. Granted that in the natural course of events the music of Brahms was due to become popular here, as it has become popular elsewhere, it cannot be gainsaid that Dr. Koussevitzky, by his ardently romantic interpretations of the symphonies, the concertos, the shorter orchestral pieces and the "German Requiem," has won many converts to the music of Brahms.

Audience Responsive

To the one-composer festival there is commonly one of two reactions on the part of the listener. In one hearer there will be inspired an attitude of reverence; another will put himself upon the defensive, become hyper-critical and even antagonistic. A is blind to any defects in the music; B begins to search for them and to decide that the popular idol has, after all, feet of clay. But the temper of yesterday's audience as a whole was one of steadily waxing enthusiasm.

There was abundant applause for the overture, to which Dr. Koussevitzky gives a highly individual reading, more for the Third Symphony, and most of all for the Second, wisely placed at the conclusion of the concert, since it finishes in a blaze of glory while its successor ends in calm and quiet.

Stresses Lyrical Side

Festival or no festival, an entire programme devoted to the music of one composer is seldom of flattering effect. And Brahms' range was not unlimited; his well-marked mannerisms and tricks of style become more than ever noticeable when, as was the case yesterday, his music is heard continuously for close on two hours. Moreover, Dr. Koussevitzky, by his very ardor with this music, his inclination to stress its lyrical side, to sing all of its melodies con passione, emphasized yesterday the similarities of the two symphonies rather than their differences.

The First and Fourth Symphonies, both greater, more robust works than the Second and Third, are happily separated in the concert to come.

A telegram from Prague to the New York Sun quotes Stravinsky as saying of the new piece that he is writing for the jubilee of the Boston Orchestra: "It will be precise, short, concentrated. One doesn't write long, exhaustive orchestral works today. One writes curtly, pointedly, as one speaks."

played—make effective contrast; of them sounds the symphonic B when he is nearest to common hum. The labellers, ever busy with a word a paste-pot, will have this Third phony in F major Brahms's "E". The first movement and, in degree finale, give them reason. The first neither spaciousness nor strength Brahmsian passion. There are out phrases; motives in clamorous and ing ascent and descent. The ment the musical energy of the wh irresistable. As nearly as it was to be dramatic, Brahms writes a of strenuous conflict; but always a measure which is thought temperin tion. Even the motto-motiv sha shout too loud. It is token of and spiritual resistance.

After the first movement, these accents are stilled. The slow mot strikes unmistakably the no Brahms's autumnal song. The r soften; the rhythms are gentle; th res musing; the coloring clear an Out of strength is born sweetnes into sentimentality, thanks to Br mind, it never lapses. Continuir lyrical Brahms writes the succeed legretto. Those that disliked m music reproached him with a Nor man, not to say Prussian, ha Now, he reminds them, he can w tenderly and poignantly as Sch If the hearer wishes, find again finale the strenuous, striving, qu matic Brahms, calling back that motto-motiv. Before the end, he the autumnal mood again prevails lessness stills into calm; the som oring warms into golden glow. are the days of a songful F Through the second and the third ments Dr. Koussevitzky intensif lyrical mood; through the first a finale released the latent passion true Brahmsian, he kept the son of sensuous note; preferred, wit passion, an inner energy; for c deepened the shadows beneath th lights. For him Brahms writes trospective symphony.

For the labellers, the Second phony in D major is Brahms's and indifferent performers are equally total." For the conductor, it was acclaimed—so, as I tell my pupils, there a music that should charm by frels a place for everybody." And again: and animation, yet not quite esca "Some accuse me of being too serious. Brahmsian contemplation, the Bra It is not I that am serious, but Mozart, melancholy. Quick-coming in Beethoven, Schubert."

must have sped it. None of Brahms's larger works is so free from the moments in which calculation rather than impulse chooses the notes. None exhibits so seldom the turns of expression, the tricks of manner, inseparable from those who write much and in a characteristic idiom. The first movement is the lyrical Brahms, fertile in melody, lively in rhythm, ready with expedient, warm of mood. The spacing is open, the coloring bright, the movement flexible—a music of cheerful ease. The slow division begins and melancholy creeps in—not the carking melancholy of the Russian and other intensive temperaments; but the pensive mood proper to an idyllic Symphony. It is like the misty lights, the sunshine out of cloud, over Brahms's native plain.

The scherzo—for Brahms—touches gayety. Twice over he must have the quicker measures; for before and between them the oboe is still piping a pensive note. Brahms was at his middle forties when he wrote this Second Symphony and the autumnal mood was already upon him. The finale outpaces it; brushes it away. The idyll shines clear again. Brahms knew and loved Italian skies and airs. There are Mediterranean warmths in this Second Symphony. Not for long may melancholy Northern mists overcloud them. The detractors will doubtless have it that Dr. Koussevitzky tries to "dramatize" a music in which there is no tonal drama. More truly, he would set clear and keep bright, or pensive, each songful mood; open out the lyric flow; make each fine sonority sound or suggest. The orchestral tone was glamorous; as in the Third Symphony, it glossed the measures that say nothing and darken progress. There was no dramatist in Brahms; but out of this Second Symphony speaks a tone-poet.

H. T. P.

Mr. Schnabel, the present illustrious guest at Symphony Hall, has a witty tongue. Without a thought of the underlying irony, a London newspaper quotes him as saying: "How different from the warmth of English audiences! What generosity they show! Bad, good, indifferent performers are equally

SYMPHONY IN BRAHMS FESTIVAL

Opens Series With His Second and Third

Post
BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The Brahms Festival at Symphony Hall has begun. At the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon, as he will again this evening, Dr. Koussevitzky offered that composer's Second and Third Symphonies, with the Academic Festival Overture for cheerful and sonorous preface. On Sunday afternoon and the evenings of the three succeeding days will follow four more concerts, presenting music for chorus, for orchestra, for piano with orchestra, and music in the smaller forms.

THE FESTIVAL IDEA

In this country, although not in those of Europe, one-composer festivals are generally of a commemorative nature. But since Brahms was born 97 years ago and has been dead but 33, there is no hundredth or other convenient anniversary to be celebrated at this time. Rather the current festival represents an intention on the part of Dr. Koussevitzky to carry to our shores a European custom, for festivals devoted to various and sundry composers are of common occurrence on the continent, and also to indulge to the full his own fondness for the music of Brahms.

The history of Brahms in Boston is one of gradual change from indifference and hostility to genuine popularity, and from the standpoint of the box-office the Brahms Festival bids fair to be a complete success. Granted that in the natural course of events the music of Brahms was due to become popular here, as it has become popular elsewhere, it cannot be gainsaid that Dr. Koussevitzky, by his ardently romantic interpretations of the symphonies, the concertos, the shorter orchestral pieces and the "German Requiem," has won many converts to the music of Brahms.

Audience Responsive

To the one-composer festival there is commonly one of two reactions on the part of the listener. In one hearer there will be inspired an attitude of reverence; another will put himself upon the defensive, become hyper-critical and even antagonistic. A is blind to any defects in the music; B begins to search for them and to decide that the popular idol has, after all, feet of clay. But the temper of yesterday's audience as a whole was one of steadily waxing enthusiasm.

There was abundant applause for the overture, to which Dr. Koussevitzky gives a highly individual reading, more for the Third Symphony, and most of all for the Second, wisely placed at the conclusion of the concert, since it finishes in a blaze of glory while its successor ends in calm and quiet.

Stresses Lyrical Side

Festival or no festival, an entire programme devoted to the music of one composer is seldom of flattering effect. And Brahms' range was not unlimited; his well-marked mannerisms and tricks of style become more than ever noticeable when, as was the case yesterday, his music is heard continuously for close on two hours. Moreover, Dr. Koussevitzky, by his very ardor with this music, his inclination to stress its lyrical side, to sing all of its melodies con passione, emphasized yesterday the similarities of the two symphonies rather than their differences.

The First and Fourth Symphonies, both greater, more robust works than the Second and Third, are happily separated in the concert to come.

A telegram from Prague to the New York Sun quotes Stravinsky as saying of the new piece that he is writing for the jubilee of the Boston Orchestra: "It will be precise, short, concentrated. One doesn't write long, exhaustive orchestral works today. One writes curtly, pointedly, as one speaks."

Twentieth Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, MARCH 28, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, MARCH 29, at 8.15 o'clock

Haydn Symphony in D major (with the Horn Call)
B. & H. No. 31

- I. Allegro.
- II. Adagio.
- III. Menuet.
- IV. Finale. (Theme with variations.)

Piston Suite for Orchestra

- I. Allegro.
- II. Andante.
- III. Allegro.

(Conducted by the composer)
(First performance)

Sibelius Symphony No. 6, Op. 104

- I. Allegro molto moderato.
- II. Allegro moderato.
- III. Poco vivace.
- IV. Allegro molto.

Bach Prelude and Fugue in E-flat (for Organ)
(Arranged for Orchestra by Schönberg)

STEINWAY PIANO USED

There will be an intermission before the symphony

HAYDN
Brown's Pictures—Miniature—88

BACH
Brown's Pictures—Miniature—94

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra arranged this program for the 20th concert in Symphony hall, yesterday afternoon: Haydn, Symphony, D major, with the horn call piston. Suite for Orchestra (first performance). Sibelius, Symphony, No. 6. Bach, Organ Prelude and Fugue in E flat major orchestrated by Arnold Schoenberg.

Mr. Piston conducted his Suite. The symphonies by Haydn and Sibelius and Schoenberg's arrangement of Bach's music had all been recently performed.

It was pleasant to find Haydn and Piston, the old and the new, as neighbors; and it was pleasant to hear again the charming music of the 18th century and interesting to learn the tendency of a contemporary, one who has had advantages here and in France and now occupies an honorable position in the music department of Harvard University.

Again the freshness and charm of the symphony, the performance by virtuosi of the orchestra in the Finale, delighted the audience. There is a curious resemblance between the theme of the Minuet and the song once lustily roared when good men got together: "The Dutch Company." The tune for those words is supposed to be of German origin. Is it not possible that it was Croatian, familiar to Haydn's ears? It should not be forgotten that Haydn made a free use of Croatian folksongs, so much so that books and articles have been written treating of Haydn as "a Croatian composer."

Mr. Piston's Suite was written last summer. In his modest account of it he says that the first movement of light character contains some "Americanisms" but he in no way attempted to write jazz; the second movement is calm; a development of two motives. (It has a Nocturne's character). The third movement is a fugue.

It would be foolish for an American composer in these years to write in the manner of Haydn and endeavor at the same time to express his own individuality. His musical ideas would hardly adapt themselves to the old forms; or he would only be a sedulous ape; that is if he had any ideas at all. Prokofieff wrote a "classical" symphony, and it is delightful; but he is a man of uncommon talent. Stravinsky tried to go back to Bach, and wrote music of Saharan barrenness—not one oasis for refreshment. No, a composer should be a man of his own generation, also country, but not possessed by a Chauvinistic demon so that his compositions would only have parochial interest. Just what Mr. Piston means by "Americanisms" in his first movement is not easy to understand. Mr. Chadwick has shown more than once that a composition, not containing a national air, not having a set program, can yet be charged with the spirit that is accepted here as in Europe as distinctively American, a certain reckless, devil-me-care, snapping -of-fingers-at -the-eternal-verities spirit. One fails to find this spirit, this flavor in Mr. Piston's first movement. There is occasional fury, a use of devices also employed by ingenious makers of jazz, but these can hardly be called Americanisms. In the slow movement there are some truly musical ideas that suggest a poetic feeling and a personal note, yet here one wishes a surer authoritative—not aggressive—carrying out of the musical sentiments and a still more pronounced mood. Then there is the fugue.

Composers having made daring or loose experiments, caring little for euphony, disdaining, as is the fashion today, "obvious" tunes, harmonic progressions, enchanting combinations of instruments, suddenly thinking that the Philistines may be disconcerted by what they have done, write a fugue for a sonorous ending. They think that a fugue sanctifies what has gone before. There is safety in a fugue. The very word "fugue" impresses an audience; assures it that the composer knows his trade. And yesterday Mr. Piston's fugue was apparently the one movement honestly enjoyed. It was lively, it kept the attention, it even excited, and without any pedantic discussion as to its technical merit. It provoked hearty applause: that was the answer.

It is easy to see why the sixth symphony of Sibelius has never gained wide-spread popularity—the music is singularly self-restrained for him; an intimate brooding music, as if Sibelius, like Buddha, were lost in omphalic contemplation. No defiant outbursts, no bitter melancholy, no warring against Fate—as in the symphonies that made him famous; in pictorial or dramatic pages, as in the tone-poems inspired by the legends of Finland. The symphony is by no means negligible; but it has only a faint emotional appeal. The quiet ending is of an autumnal sunset beauty. We prefer Sibelius the man of storm and stress, raging or gloomy in his own peculiar manner of preceding years.

The transcription of Bach's prelude and fugue, vexing to the respecters of Bach and the lovers of his organ music, again aroused vigorous applause.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week consists of Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony; piano concerto, G major, No. 4 (Mr. Schnabel, pianist), and the "Lenore" overture, No. 3.

PISTON'S SUITE AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Boston Composer's Work in
First Performance

Dr Koussevitzky Repeats Music by Haydn and Schoenberg

Week — March 27, 1930
A suite for orchestra by Walter Piston, a Boston-born composer, now teaching music in Harvard University, was performed for the first time at yesterday's Symphony concert. Dr Koussevitzky filled the rest of the program with repetitions of music already heard in this series of concerts during the current season. Haydn's Symphony "With the Horn Call," Sibelius' Sixth Symphony and Schoenberg's arrangement of an organ prelude and fugue by Bach, in E flat, were the chosen numbers.

Mr Piston's new suite, written last Summer, has three movements, allegro, andante, allegro. His brief and modest description of it in the program book follows the admirable current musical fashion of avoiding any attempt at ascribing to music a pictorial or dramatic function it does not possess. He has written "absolute music," and not "program music," to use the cant terms.

It is with the younger and not the elder generation of American composers that Mr Piston must be ranked, not merely by his years, but by the style of his music. A pupil of Nadia Boulanger, he has undergone in Paris the same musical influences that have helped shape the creative imagination of Aaron Copland. He has assimilated the work of such modern French writers as Ravel and Honegger, and of such modern Russians as Stravinsky and Prokofieff. Like Mr Copland, he has listened to American popular pieces of the "jazz" type with a respectful curiosity, though probably with less hope than Copland once displayed of finding in them the inspiration for genuinely "American" music.

Musical Background

This musical background, and a high degree of skill in writing and scoring music for orchestra, have enabled Mr Piston to produce in the suite heard yesterday a work deserving more than the single hearing too often allotted by the musical powers—that be to the compositions of American writers.

He has something of his own to say in music, and he has said it in the language of the present musical day with considerable point and power. There is far more imaginative power in this suite than in earlier works of Mr Piston heard here. Its ingenious rhythms and individual tone color adorn without blurring a firmly knit musical texture.

If one thought, hearing an ejaculatory outburst in the first allegro of Ravel's "La Valse," and if listening to an episode in Mr Piston's fugue finale, one recalled a well known sonorous passage for brass in Debussy's "Fetes," these reminiscences were unimportant in view of the originality and effectiveness of the suite as a whole. What composer old or new, great or minor, has ever succeeded in avoiding in his work all hints of the music of other writers?

Mr Piston, it should be added, conducted his suite with a skill not given to most composers. One felt that he was securing from the orchestra just about what he wanted. The players applauded him more heartily at the close than did the majority of an audience notoriously cool to modern pieces. This suite should be heard again in Boston. It is on the program of the next Cambridge concert.

Neglected Work

There is no need to speak at length of the other numbers, all commented upon in these columns within a few weeks. A rehearing confirmed one's notion that the Haydn symphony is a charming and unjustly neglected work.

The purists object to transcriptions of Bach, but if a great prelude and fugue were to be arranged for orchestra it could hardly be more skillfully done than it has been by Schoenberg.

Sibelius' Sixth Symphony again seemed an utterly original work, with a finely imaginative and powerful musical content which the composer has not wholly disengaged from some awkwardness of his medium of expression.

Next week we are to have a Beethoven program, with Schnabel as soloist in the G-minor concerto, the "Pastoral Symphony," and "Leonore No. 3" overture.

P. R.

Boston's Week of Brahms

Monitor, March 29, 1930 By L. A. SLOPER

JOHANNES BRAHMS wrote no music for the theater. Perhaps the fact requires no elaborate explanation. It is difficult to imagine the irreproachable Brahms enriching the lyric stage with the charm of a Mozart, the fervor of a Wagner or the dramatic genius of a Verdi. Mr. Fuller Maitland surmises that Brahms realized at once the sterility of conservative stage music and his own incapacity to write in the style of Wagner. But need we be sad because Brahms paused before the frivolous portals of the theater? There is ample dramatic content in the music he did write. All he needs is a Koussevitzky, a Schnabel or a Matzenauer for interpreter. All these, and more, he had for the six-day festival of his music given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Of course Dr. Koussevitzky, who never can be persuaded that things are well enough as they are, was primarily responsible. Having already directed celebrations for the centenaries of Beethoven and Schubert, he cast about for another composer to honor. There was no centenary of a master in 1930, but that did not deter the conductor. He admires Brahms, and excels as an interpreter of his music, just as Nikisch—as we are told—did. Sufficient reasons for a Brahms Festival. Thus large numbers of Bostonians have listened to a series which included the four symphonies, the two piano concertos, the "German Requiem," the "Song of Destiny," some of the Liebeslieder Waltzes, the "Academic Festival" Overture, the Piano Quintet, some songs and the piano pieces of op. 119.

Extraordinary Enthusiasm

As John N. Burk reminded us, in an admirably balanced pamphlet issued by the orchestra in preparation for the festival, Boston has been as slow as other capitals of music to embrace Brahms. His conclusion that "the composer's genius, lifted free and clear of routine, was never so keenly and generally alive in this town" as at present, was justified by the response to these concerts. As one young person from the middle West remarked: "And they call Boston a cold town!" The enthusiasm at all the concerts was quite extraordinary, and on the final evening (March 26) there was an ovation for Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra which has hardly been duplicated during the six years of his Boston seneschalship, unless at the close of the Beethoven Festival. No one, surely, will begrudge the tribute to leader or men. The conductor, who never does anything halfheartedly, labored devotedly in preparation and performance, and the orchestra's work was quite up to its standard.

It was not to be expected that all the results would be equal in value. You can hardly give a Brahms Festival without including some of the chamber pieces. But Symphony Hall holds more than 2500 persons; scarcely the place for intimate music. No one should have been surprised, then, that the Piano Quintet, with Arthur Schnabel and the Burgin String Quartet, was not the most successful item in the cycle. Heard in a small hall, this music has the power to stir admiration and emotion; in these vast reaches, the piano overwhelmed the strings and the finest effects were lost.

On the program with the quintet, however, the three Intermezzi and the Rhapsody of op. 119 came to entrancing utterance at the hands of Mr. Schnabel; who then, with a fine gesture of unselfed artistic devotion, became the unobtrusive accompanist for Margaret Matzenauer in four songs. His superb fellow-artist was heard to better advantage in "Von Ewige Liebe" and "Meine Liebe ist Grüne" than in the "Sapphische Ode" or the "Immer Leiser." Opening this program there was a charming performance of some of the Liebeslieder Waltzes by a small chorus from the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, with their respective conductors, Dr. Archibald T. Davison and G. Wallace Woodworth, at the piano.

The Collegiate Chorus

These young collegians, by the way, although their personnel changes annually, remain one of the most satisfying choral bodies of our experience. Trained to uncompromising ideals, they place their fresh voices and their inspiring fervor at the service of art. And when their part in the program is finished, they add immeasurably to the volume of applause for the more famous artists, constituting themselves, without in the least being aware of it, a volunteer claque in thrall to music.

Mme. Matzenauer joined a group of the singers in a moving interpretation of the "Harzreise" Rhapsody. In the Requiem the choruses were augmented by Jeanette Vreeland, soprano, and Fraser Gange, baritone. They had the choral field to themselves in the "Song of Destiny."

Another acclaimed hero of the series was of course Mr. Schnabel, whose playing of the concertos for piano not only was authoritative but brought these works to pulsing life. Where, by the way, originated the tradition that the first of these concertos is finer than the second. Hearing them in close proximity, from the hands of an exponent whose readings can hardly be challenged, we feel the superiority of the B flat major, pianistically and musically, to be evident.

The Symphonies

Finally the symphonies, played in this order: Nos. 3, 2, 4 and 1. Under this test the F major seemed clearly entitled to less and the D major to more consideration than is usually accorded. We shall not presume to sit as judge upon the merits of the other two. Nor shall we seize upon the occasion to pronounce a conclusive estimate of the music of Johannes Brahms, nor to forecast the effect of the six-day examination upon his reputation. Attention no doubt has been drawn by it to his learning. His romantic characteristics have been set forth in the most persuasive manner. In retrospect of the six days he seems more a romanticist than a classicist, closer to Beethoven and to Schumann than to Bach or Mozart. Further, from this fresh review, we are impressed less by his material than by his handling of it, and we find even in the handling more cerebration than inspiration. It seems to us, too, that there is wisdom in those who say that the Brahms of the songs, the piano pieces and the chamber ensembles is greater than he of the symphonies and of the bigger choral compositions. After so protracted a bout, we see Brahms as a big fellow who, not realizing his own strength, should not be allowed too heavy implements to play with.

Is it possible that Brahms, like Wagner, is doomed, after a struggle of long years for recognition, to fall back at last to a plane below that of the greatest masters? At all events, we render thanks to Dr. Koussevitzky and his associates for the opportunity to survey his work.

A Novelty From Harvard

After so busy a week, it was natural that the orchestra's program on March 28 should consist for the most part of pieces recently introduced—Haydn's Symphony in D (with the Horn Call), Sibelius's Sixth and the Bach-Schoenberg Prelude and the Fugue in E flat.

Yet there was a novelty, too; a Suite by Walter Piston, of the Harvard musical faculty, which received its first performance under the composer's baton. It consists of an Allegro, an Andante and a fugal Finale. The first movement, the composer had confided to the editor of the program notes, "contains some 'Americanisms' but is in no sense an attempt to write jazz." It is, however, jazzier than this statement would lead you to believe. In fact, it is one of the most successful experiments we recall in applying the jazz idiom to classical forms. A nostalgic Andante and a lively fugue complete the suite.

If this music does not open "new paths," it is well made, contains good writing for the instruments and is pleasant to listen to. It marks an advance upon Mr. Piston's "Symphonic Piece," heard two years ago. It is less obviously derivative, possesses a more individual flavor. Its composer obtained an excellent performance.

Dr. Koussevitzky conducted, and the orchestra played, the remainder of the program as if they had never heard of Brahms. All the items were well worth an early second hearing. The Sibelius in particular impressed us afresh with its vitality, its richness and its characteristic emotional quality. After hearing this concert, if we do not love Brahms less, we certainly love Haydn, Sibelius and Bach more.

Novelties of A Season for Hearing Again

With Mr. Piston Conducting His Own Suite in First Performance

Trans.

March 29, 1930

THE last notes of the Brahms festival had sounded. After it was all over, there remained to a tired orchestra and a tired conductor a single day in which to prepare the concert for the week-end. Under the circumstances it was a happy thought of Dr. Koussevitzky to assemble a program made chiefly of repetitions of recent novelties. The single day sufficed. One would scarcely have suspected, yesterday afternoon, when conductor and men played through Haydn's Symphony in D major, Sibelius's sixth symphony, Bach's Prelude and Fugue in E-flat, Piston's new Suite for Orchestra, that this orchestra had just completed a strenuous week of exacting concerts.

Haydn's symphony "with the horn call" gave pleasure when it was first heard, exactly a month ago. It is pleasant music, from start to finish. The prominence given to the horns furnishes a point of interest over and above that of most of Haydn's symphonies. But it was characteristic of Haydn to provide such additional "points of interest." One need not go farther than the "surprise" chord in the G major symphony to find example; or to the symphony in which each musician in turn blows out his candle and leaves the stage. And the programmist has listed a small paragraph of titles which Haydn gave to symphonies, each one of which ties up with some such "point of interest." Nevertheless, though Haydn is inclined to matters of this kind, his simple symphonies are a wine that needs no such bush. In their very simplicity they are fresh and alive through their entire course. Their vitality is not lessened whether the movement be a well-thought-out opening Allegro; whether it be a soulful Adagio—its goal toward which the whole and few can be more soulful than Haydn's. One can find, however, also position in an Adagio; whether it be a peasant-like or almost peasant-like symphony. It has a spiritual unity, a rounded completeness of effect entirely in shoes; whether it be a sparkling to round out the whole. In the symphony the high level of anesque routine is enlivened by the al number and unusual use of horns; e unexpected but charming variation of the finale. Performance was ext and entirely in the Haydn spirit.

Walter Piston conducted his own Suite for Orchestra. Mr. Piston has sufficient experience in orchestral acting to acquire a sense of the ne of such work. Before his orchestra yesterday he was by no means more or less helpless composer trying to put across his own work. In a straightforward way he indicated his demand and the orchestra, in turn, were to give him what he wanted. The Suite runs in three movements—Allegro, nte, Allegro; this last movement is a production and fugue. Mr. Piston is in the modern dissonant idiom, did slightly with rhythms borrowed from jazz. The fugue was particularly live, with its incisive theme, its swift movement, its cumulative effect. The movement began by evoking a definite atmosphere. At first hearing it seemed a trifle longer than its content. The jazz-like rhythms and the formed melodies of the first movement were happily conceived, made a sure well-proportioned. Possibly the stration was a trifle heavy to allow to make their full effect. Those who heard Mr. Piston's first orchestral a year or two ago, unhesitatingly that he has made considerable advance in this his second work.

Sibelius's sixth symphony is a work to be judged by its own standards. Those who approach it analytically, expecting to conform to the scheme they have known through listening to another symphony, are almost certain to be baffled by it. Those who come to expect it somewhere to deal in heroism somewhere to approach grandeur, probably find it wanting. Those rare who can come to it with a mind open to beauty, whatever its kind, be without preconceptions, ready for venture into the relatively unknown, probably find the experience of this symphony well worth while. One can most easily speak in chief in negatives. Definite, fully themes are conspicuous largely in their absence. Sonorities are slender. There is little up-swelling into expansive- though the last movement is a goal toward which the whole is directed. One can find, however, also position with which to characterize the symphony. It has a spiritual unity, a rounded completeness of effect entirely inspiring fervor at the service of art. And when their part in the program is finished, they add immeasurably to the volume of applause for the more famous artists, constituting themselves, without in the least being aware of it, a volunteer claue in thralldom to music.

Mme. Matzenauer joined a group of the singers in a moving interpretation of the "Harzreise" Rhapsody. In the Requiem the choruses were augmented by Jeanette Vreeland, soprano, and Fraser Gange, baritone. They had the choral field to themselves in the "Song of Destiny."

Another acclaimed hero of the series was of course Mr. Schnabel, whose playing of the concertos for piano not only was authoritative but brought these works to pulsing life. Where, by the way, originated the tradition that the first of these concertos is finer than the second. Hearing them in close proximity, from the hands of an exponent whose readings can hardly be challenged, we feel the superiority of the B flat major, pianistically and musically, to be evident.

The Symphonies

Finally the symphonies, played in this order: Nos. 3, 2, 4 and 1. Under this test the F major seemed clearly entitled to less and the D major to more consideration than is usually accorded. We shall not presume to sit as judge upon the merits of the other two. Nor shall we seize upon the occasion to pronounce a conclusive estimate of the music of Johannes Brahms, nor to forecast the effect of the six-day examination upon his reputation. Attention no doubt has been drawn by it to his learning. His romantic characteristics have been set forth in the most persuasive manner. In retrospect of the six days he seems more a romanticist than a classicist, closer to Beethoven and to Schumann than to Bach or Mozart. Further, from this fresh review, we are impressed less by his material than by his handling of it, and we find even in the handling more cerebration than inspiration. It seems to us, too, that there is wisdom in those who say that the Brahms of the songs, the piano pieces and the chamber ensembles is greater than he of the symphonies and of the bigger choral compositions. After so protracted a bout, we see Brahms as a big fellow who, not realizing his own strength, should not be allowed too heavy implements to play with.

Is it possible that Brahms, like Wagner, is doomed, after a struggle of long years for recognition, to fall back at last to a plane below that of the greatest masters? At all events, we render thanks to Dr. Koussevitzky and his associates for the opportunity to survey his work.

A Novelty From Harvard

After so busy a week, it was natural that the orchestra's program on March 28 should consist for the most part of pieces recently introduced—Haydn's Symphony in D (with the Horn Call), Sibelius's Sixth and the Bach-Schoenberg Prelude and the Fugue in E flat.

Yet there was a novelty, too; a Suite by Walter Piston, of the Harvard musical faculty, which received its first performance under the composer's baton. It consists of an Allegro, an Andante and a fugal Finale. The first movement, the composer had confided to the editor of the program notes, "contains some 'Americanisms' but is in no sense an attempt to write jazz." It is, however, jazzier than this statement would lead you to believe. In fact, it is one of the most successful experiments we recall in applying the jazz idiom to classical forms. A nostalgic Andante and a lively fugue complete the suite.

If this music does not open "new paths," it is well made, contains good writing for the instruments and is pleasant to listen to. It marks an advance upon Mr. Piston's "Symphonic Piece," heard two years ago. It is less obviously derivative, possesses a more individual flavor. Its composer obtained an excellent performance.

Dr. Koussevitzky conducted, and the orchestra played, the remainder of the program as if they had never heard of Brahms. All the items were well worth an early second hearing. The Sibelius in particular impressed us afresh with its vitality, its richness and its characteristic emotional quality. After hearing this concert, if we do not love Brahms less, we certainly love Haydn, Sibelius and Bach more.

Novelties A Season Hearing

With Mr. Piston
His Own Suite
Performa

Trans.

THE last notes of tival had sound all over, there tired orchestra ducator a single day in the concert for the week circumstances it was a Dr. Koussevitzky to ass made chiefly of repetitio elties. The single da would scarcely have su afternoon, when cond played through Haydn' major, Sibelius's sixth Prelude and Fugue 1 new Suite for Orchestra tra had just completed of exacting concerts.

Haydn's symphony call" gave pleasure v heard, exactly a month ant music, from star Com prominence given to th a point of interest over Con most of Haydn's symph Con characteristic of Hay Con additional "points of ir Con not go farther than th Con in the G major sym Con ample; or to the sy Con each musician in turn Con die and leaves the st Cord grammist has listed Corroon of titles which Hay Cor & phonies, each one of Cosden (some such "point of Coty Soc theless, though Hayd Creole P ters of this kind, his Crocker are a wine that need Cross & their very simplicity Crowley alive through their e Cuba Cor vitality is not lessene Curtiss V ment be a well-thou Cusi Mex legro; whether it be and few can be more in an Adagio: whet so peasant-like tha Darby Pe Day Air & wooden shoes; whether it be a sparkling rondo to round out the whole. In the present symphony the high level of Haydenesque routine is enlivened by the unusual number and unusual use of horns; by the unexpected but charming variations of the finale. Performance was excellent and entirely in the Haydn spirit.

Mr. Walter Piston conducted his own new Suite for Orchestra. Mr. Piston has had sufficient experience in orchestral conducting to acquire a sense of the routine of such work. Before his orchestra yesterday he was by no means the more or less helpless composer trying to put across his own work. In a straightforward way he indicated his desires and the orchestra, in turn, were quick to give him what he wanted. The suite runs in three movements—Allegro, Andante, Allegro; this last movement is an introduction and fugue. Mr. Piston writes in the modern dissonant idiom, overlaid slightly with rhythms borrowed from jazz. The fugue was particularly effective, with its incisive theme, its swift movement, its cumulative effect. The slow movement began by evoking a definite atmosphere. At first hearing it seemed a trifle longer than its content justified. The jazz-like rhythms and the well-formed melodies of the first movement were happily conceived, made a structure well-proportioned. Possibly the orchestration was a trifle heavy to allow them to make their full effect. Those who heard Mr. Piston's first orchestral piece a year or two ago, unhesitatingly state that he has made considerable advance in this his second work.

Sibelius's sixth symphony is a work to be judged by its own standards. Those who approach it analytically, expecting it to conform to the scheme they have learned to know through listening to many another symphony, are almost certain to be baffled by it. Those who come to it, expecting it somewhere to deal in heroisms, somewhere to approach grandeur, will probably find it wanting. Those rare ones who can come to it with a mind entirely open to beauty, whatever its kind may be without preconceptions, ready for an adventure into the relatively unknown, will probably find the experience of listening to this symphony well worth their while. One can most easily speak of it chiefly in negatives. Definite, fully formed themes are conspicuous largely for their absence. Sonorities are slender. There is little up-swelling into expansiveness, though the last movement is a definite goal toward which the whole strives. One can find, however, also positives with which to characterize the symphony. It has a spiritual unity, a rounded completeness of effect entire-lacking in many another symphony. Through vague and tentative beginnings it marches on with magnificent directness, though very, very subtly, to its ultimate summation in the last movement. Its vaguenesses do not leave one with wandering attention. At one with Sibelius one finds oneself to the very end. If acceptance is at first difficult, one need only to think of Debussy's "Pelléas and Melisande" as analogy. There, too, because of vagueness, acceptance was at first difficult. But familiarity brought beauty in supreme degree. So also from more frequent hearing of this symphony beauty, taking on its own form, will arise abundantly. One could hardly imagine a more sympathetic reading than that which Dr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra gave to it.

Came last Schoenberg's orchestral version of Bach's Prelude and Fugue in E-flat for organ. The fugue is the one generally known as Saint Ann's. Bach's prelude and fugue are among the noblest of his organ works. Not often does he attain a higher state of elevation than he attains in this prelude; or than he attains again in the opening and closing portions of the fugue. After such characterization listen to the Schoenbergian orchestration. If there is one thing to be admired about it all it is the transcriber's audacity. Broadly sustained elevation—listen for it in the screeching, tubby, circus-like sonorities of Schoenberg's prelude, in the annoying flitting about from tonal color to tonal color; elevation or sustained effect is precisely what one does not hear. To the rapid portions of the fugue one can give cheerful assent. The brass at the end brings noble conclusion. But that same nobility also is present in the beginning. Needless to say, simpering clarinets scarcely suggest it. That Dr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra gave Schoenberg his full due, and Bach as much due as Schoenberg would allow, is beyond question.

A. H. M.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Artur Schnabel will be the solo pianist at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky announces a Beethoven program for this pair of concerts, to consist of the Pastoral Symphony No. 6, the fourth piano concerto in G major, and the "Leonore" Overture No. 3. These will be the pianist's last appearances in Boston. After playing with the orchestra in New York and Brooklyn, on the week following, he will return to Europe.

SYMPHONY PLAYS WORK BY PISTON

Cambridge Composer
Conducts Own
Suite

Post ———— Mar. 29, 1930
BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

With the Brahms Festival and the daily rehearsals for it occupying the attention of Dr. Koussevitzky and the Symphony Orchestra through last Wednesday evening, scant time was left for the preparation of a regular Symphony programme.

Accordingly Dr. Koussevitzky placed upon his list for yesterday and this evening three pieces already heard within the past few weeks and added to them a new suite by the resident composer, Walter Piston, which Mr. Piston himself conducted.

THREE REPEATS

The three repeated pieces were Haydn's early Symphony of the Horn Club with the difficult first horn part again admirably played by Mr. Boettcher; Sibelius' Symphony Number Six and Schoenberg's brilliantly sonorous orchestration of Bach's E-Flat Major Organ Prelude and Fugue. All three were new to Boston this season, all three were excellently played yesterday, conductor and orchestra as much on their mettle as though there had been no festival to tax and tire them.

In the case of music so baffling and rarified as is much of this Symphony of Sibelius, a speedy repetition was almost imperative if the composer's message were to be fully comprehended, while in Bach's Prelude and Fugue there is so much of musical substance and complexity that the average listener could make little complaint at hearing it so soon again. Only Haydn's Symphony, music of surface charm, interesting chiefly for its orchestral effects and its frequent solo passages for horn, flute, violin and 'cello, seemed superfluously repeated after so short an interval.

Piston's Suite

At the outset Mr. Piston's Suite proved none too inviting. The first movement, leaning heavily upon Honegger and Stravinsky, seemed barren of salient ideas, although the orchestral treatment was on occasion ingenious. For a time too, the succeeding Andante moved in dreary, monotonous fashion, although at the end a not unpleasing mood of calm and resignation was established. The final Fugue is, however, a capital piece of contrapuntal writing in the modern style with a well-marked rhythm to hold the attention and override the frequent dissonance. But the music itself suggested a spaciousness that its too speedy termination contradicted. Mr. Piston conducted with authority and was much applauded.

Sibelius' Symphony grows on one, but even on a rehearing the barren first movement suggests an almost perverse avoidance of musical charm. The two succeeding movements have in them more that can be readily grasped, and the familiar Sibelius returns in the Finale. As to the relative merits of Sibelius' earlier and later symphonies, we are still too close to the composer to decide with any finality.

Twenty-first Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, APRIL 4, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, APRIL 5, at 8.15 o'clock

Beethoven . . . Symphony No. 6 in F major, Op. 68,
"Pastorale"

- I. Awakening of serene impressions on arriving in the country;
Allegro, ma non troppo.
- II. Scene by the brookside: Andante molto moto.
- III. Jolly gathering of country folk: Allegro; in tempo d'allegro Thunderstorm; Tempest: Allegro.
- IV. Shepherd's Song; Gladsome and thankful feelings after the storm: Allegretto.

Beethoven . . . Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 4, in G major, Op. 58

- I. Allegro moderato.
- { II. Andante con moto.
- { III. Rondo vivace.

Beethoven . . . Overture to "Leonore," No. 3, Op. 72

SOLOIST
ARTUR SCHNABEL

BECHSTEIN PIANO

There will be an intermission after the Symphony

Arthur Schnabel, Pianist

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

These works of Beethoven's were performed yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall at the 21st concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor: the "Pastoral" Symphony; the Piano Concerto in G major, No. 4 (Artur Schnabel, pianist), and the Leonora Overture No. 3.

The performance of the symphony was one of remarkable beauty; remarkable also for technical excellence. There have been performances in the past under other conductors when, by reason of sluggish tempi, sentimentalism, and a lack of spirit in the third movement (even in the thunderstorm), the symphony seemed even to the fanatical worshippers of Beethoven, a bore; so that one was tempted to say of the composer what George Moore years ago wrote of a famous novel by Thomas Hardy: "We are invited to assist at a sheep-shearing scene or at a harvest supper . . . because Mr. Hardy is anxious to show how jolly country he is."

Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation was conspicuous not only for the fortunate choice of tempi: There was continuity of the musical thought in not a succession of detached episodes. There was no attempt to "megaphonize" flowing measure, simple in their beauty—there was always exquisite proportion, incomparable euphony.

So much for the first movement. We have heard the "Scene by the Brookside" played in so lazy, so perfunctory a manner by conductors more anxious for rigid precision than for poetic expression that it seemed as if the audience would join the composer in sleeping, lulled by the monotonous stream. The "Jolly Gathering of Country Folk" was for once really jolly in an appropriately boisterous manner; the thunder storm was no tuppenny sheet-iron affair; the Shepherd's Song of Gratitude was not so majestic as to be out of character. There have been conductors here who fearing that the audience was somnolent if not fast asleep, and not wishing to be reproached for undue realism in the approach and fury of the storm, have treated the finale in a bombastic manner; but, Beethoven's shepherds are simple folk.

Dr. Koussevitzky has given many eloquent interpretations of music by Beethoven. No conductor of past seasons here has rivaled him in this field, much less surpassed him. Never has he been more musically poetic than in the performance yesterday of the "Pastoral." Nor has the superb orchestra, which is his creation, played this symphony with finer sentiment, tonal beauty, and poetic feeling.

On the other hand there was the gloriously dramatic performance of the familiar overture, in itself a condensation of what is dramatic in an opera that has commonplace, yes bourgeois pages. Hearing this overture as it was played yesterday, one was spared the sight of a Bulbous and shrieking prima donna; of a tenor whose throat had been seriously affected by long confinement in a "demed, moist" dungeon; of the operetta young man and woman chatting with a flat-iron among the stage properties; of four persons, each with an individual sentiment, singing the same tune in an approved scholastic form.

Mr. Schnabel was loudly applauded for his performance of the concerto; a polished performance thoughtfully and musically planned, finely phrased, technically superior as in the brilliant treatment of runs and trills. It is to be regretted that he introduced any cadenza, no matter by whom it was composed. The performance was an excellent, compelling example of his own school of piano playing.

It was not an emotional reading; not even deeply emotional in the marvelous slow movement, though near the end of it there were memorable measures. An absence of legato contributed to many effects that were metallic. An absence of nuances gave too often the impression of uniform sonority in spite of the necessary alternations of forte and piano.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week the orchestra will give concerts in Hartford, New York and Brooklyn. The program of the concerts in Symphony hall on April 18 and 19th will be as follows: Stravinsky, "Apollo, Leader of the Muses," Samuel Gardner, "Broadway" (first performance); Saint-Saens, symphony in C minor (with organ) No. 3.

SCHNABEL HEARD AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Noted Pianist Again Is Warmly Applauded

All-Bethoven Program Pleases

Lovers of the Classics

Globe — April 5, 1930

Artur Schnabel, the noted pianist, whose conspicuous share in the recent Brahms Festival here contributed

The other numbers on an all-Beethoven program were the Sixth Symphony, and the "Leonore No. 3" overture. This concert delighted the lovers of the classics. It must have consoled some of them for the many occasions when moderns have predominated on Dr Koussevitzky's programs.

One might feel that he and Dr Koussevitzky chose too slow a pace for the andante con moto, one might deplore a slight tendency to hardness of tone in several bold fortissimo passages, but in general one could only admire and delight in a remarkably fine performance of a concerto which by common consent is a masterpiece.

Beethoven, let for once to speak with his own eloquence, his own fervors, in the Sixth Symphony, could not fail to prove once more his title to rank among the two or three greatest masters of music, by touching a listener's heart as well as stirring his imagination. It is easy enough now to note that there are weak spots in this symphony, too many repetitions of the same musical ideas in every movement, a failure to maintain in the third movement the standard of creative power attained in the other three, and so on.

The great familiar overture, too, is still superb, still triumphant, even in a noisy and ill-coordinated performance such as yesterday's. Beethoven may have failed to make Leonore's story enthralling in the opera "Fidelio," but nobody has yet written music more truly dramatic than this third "Leonore" overture.

Beethoven is popular, and when at his best invariably essentially simple. His style, once audaciously original, has been imitated by a century of lesser men until its procedures are all thrice familiar. But who has written

Is not the real proof of Beethoven's genius the fact that even lifelong familiarity and endless repetitions cannot weary most people of his work?

Next week the orchestra goes to New York. The program now announced for April 18 and 19 includes the suite from Stravinsky's "Apollo," Samuel Gardner's new tone poem "Broadway," and Saint-Saens' organ symphony. P. R.

Festival in Miniature with Mr. Schnabel Again Compelling Figure

TO a Brahms Festival in extenso succeeded, yesterday at Symphony Hall, a Beethoven Festival in brief. It consisted of three

The gentle, musing, Beethoven of that place; the improvising, romantic Beethoven of the Concerto; the dramatizing, puissant Beethoven of the Overture. For all three an audience that listened as to the regular thing in the regular way, to be stirred only when a keen musical mind and a fine-strung musical imagination pervaded the performance of the Concerto. Time was when many were agog to discover what way Dr. Koussevitzky would take with this or that Symphony of Beethoven. Now most know that he will lead this "Pastoral" with light and flowing hands, taking no account of the name of the piece, and that he will find little more than a dancing peasants and the realistic thunder within the orchestral limitations of his day; than final and tedious that the graces of neither horn or clarinet may much lighten. In these are cynics who remember Rossini was a Viennese vogue in his day; that the great Ludwig wrote his operas; then hint that the great moralizings are prettily Rossetti without, of course, the composition in cheek.

and sympathetically; illuminate it with a tranquil clarity; pace it animatedly; shade it with pastel-colors from a virtuoso-orchestra. Likewise, most are aware that he will dramatize to his utmost the Third "Leonora" Overture, loosing upon it and measuring with it the plasticity, poignancy and power of his responsive instrument.

is no moral—unless it is that en should be played seldom in days, and always with the re-vitality with which Dr. Kousse-impregnates the more stirring nies. Or unless it is pardon for restless spirits whose thoughts wander from pastoral peasants ties to those bedevilled and berated ons of Schönberg, which the con-announced but is not likely to athis season. Or in the third place, it is to extenuate those surly souls with Dvorák behind them, "The ul" before them, and Saint-Saëns of them—have heard enough "nice" onies for one year and crave leave-in music of sharper tang.

as it seemed once more yesterday "Pastoral Symphony" parts in middle, leaving the last three divisions and outmoded Beethoven. If a illustrious name were signed to any might find little more than a ballet-scene in the scherzo of dancing peasants and the band; than a realistic thunder-within the orchestral limitations of Beethoven's day; than final and tediums that the graces of neither a clarinet may much lighten. In here are cynics who remember Rossini was a Viennese vogue in Beethoven's day; that the great Ludwig hated his operas; then hint that these moralizings are prettily Rossini without, of course, the composition in cheek.

The first two movements are another The brookside song is a lengthened chain of limpid and fragrant music for Koussevitzky neither slack nor hurried nor dulled, letting it with those ingenuous imitations and sounds as naive and fresh as though good Papa Haydn were putting them into his oratorio of "Moses." Far as is the eighteenth-greatly to its success, was heard as soloist at yesterday's Symphony concert in Beethoven's Fourth Concerto. Again Mr Schnabel won exceptionally cordial applause.

The other numbers on an all-Beethoven program were the Sixth Symphony, and the "Leonore No. 3" overture. This concert delighted the lovers of the classics. It must have consoled some of them for the many occasions when moderns have predominated on Dr Koussevitzky's programs.

Mr Schnabel's unusually sensitive feeling for the line of Beethoven's melody, his ability to make even the least pianistic measures sound felicitously written for his instrument, his way of revealing the broad outlines of a musical composition without slighting any individual detail again distinguished his playing of this concerto.

One might feel that he and Dr Koussevitzky chose too slow a pace for the andante con moto, one might deplore a slight tendency to hardness of tone in several bold fortissimo passages, but in general one could only admire and delight in a remarkably fine performance of a concerto which by common consent is a masterpiece.

Dr Koussevitzky's reading of the "Pastoral Symphony" struck one as the finest he has yet given here of any Beethoven symphony. He avoided the excessive loudness, the violent contrasts of tempi and of tonal masses which have disfigured some of his previous interpretations of Beethoven. There were still a few pianissimi that verged on the inaudible, but otherwise the performance had a balance, a sense of proportion, a clarity and fluency of style that were thoroughly in keeping with the music. Seldom has the present Boston Symphony regained as much of the tonal beauty of the vanished pre-war orchestra, still so bitterly regretted by many musicians, as it did yesterday in this symphony.

Beethoven, let for once to speak with his own eloquence, his own fervors, in the Sixth Symphony, could not fail to prove once more his title to rank among the two or three greatest masters of music, by touching a listener's heart as well as stirring his imagination. It is easy enough now to note that there are weak spots in this symphony, too many repetitions of the same musical ideas in every movement, a failure to maintain in the third movement the standard of creative power attained in the other three, and so on.

One may admit that the bird calls at the end of the slow movement and the thunder storm err by excess of imitation of actual sounds. And yet there is in this symphony a creative power, an imaginative splendor to which Brahms, for example, never attained.

The great familiar overture, too, is still superb, still triumphant, even in a noisy and ill-coordinated performance such as yesterday's. Beethoven may have failed to make Leonore's story enthralling in the opera "Fidelio," but nobody has yet written music more truly dramatic than this third "Leonore" overture.

Some musicians these days make a boast of their weariness with Beethoven. It is true that he belongs heart and soul to the 19th century, of which the 20th century has grown tired. He is intense, idealistic, eloquent, profound. He has none of the cleverness, the irony, the skepticism, the sophistication of the moderns. He ventures to wear his great heart on his sleeve. It is their boast that they are heartless, disillusioned, world weary.

Beethoven is popular, and when at his best invariably essentially simple. His style, once audaciously original, has been imitated by a century of lesser men until its procedures are all thrice familiar. But who has written music more genuinely noble, more profoundly heart-searching than his? Consider how many defects of his century he avoided. He is never in his greater works sentimental, never bombastic, never shallow, never over-ornamented.

Is not the real proof of Beethoven's genius the fact that even lifelong familiarity and endless repetitions cannot weary most people of his work?

Next week the orchestra goes to New York. The program now announced for April 18 and 19 includes the suite from Stravinsky's "Apollo," Samuel Gardner's new tone poem "Broadway," and Saint-Saens' organ symphony. P. R.

After BK An A¹ 4, 1930 Of I

Festival in
Mr. Sch Compel

TO a Brahms succeeded, phony Hall
in brief.

numbers—a Sympl Overture—as thou had returned to th scriptions of mid-ni gram-making. The Pastoral," to which placidly, upon whic dutiful than eager certo was the Four Piano and Orchestra playing the solo-part him in a silence tha expectation and exc tense with rapturous pause and close into The Overture was th which most seemed cently as they had phony."

The gentle, musing piece; the improvising ven of the Concerto puissant Beethoven of all three an audience the regular thing in t be stirred only when mind and a fine-strun tion pervaded the p Concerto. Time was agog to discover wha vitzky would take wit
phony of Beethoven.
that he will lead thi light and flowing ha and sympathetically; i tranquil clarity; pa shade it with pastel-c oso-orchestra. Likewi that he will dramatize Third "Leonora" Over it and measuring wit poignancy and power o
strument.

Sales Stock
700 Rossia
9000 Ross
2000 Ruber
800 Russel
18000 Rep S
3500 Rep S
2000 Ryan
200 Ry L

275 Safe
1500 St A
100 St 1
987000St R
300 Salt
6800 Salt
100 Savo
300 Schil
600 Schil
1800 Schu
400 Scvl
1800 Seer
8600 Seg
4900 Selb
23000 Sele
2200 Sele
800 Sele
800 Sel
10000 Sen
1000 Set
3000 Sha
12800 Sea
300 Sha
100 She 22300 She 13500 She 100 She 400 Sier
10 Sier
11500 Sil
100 Sil
50 Sil
600 Sin
800 Sier
930 Sm
100 Sol
75 Son
200 So
6800 So
2900 So
100 So
3000 So
1200 So
100 So
3500 Sou
100 So
400 So
3000*So

All of which circumstance is no reproach to the conductor's prowess and devotion. He played the Symphony and the Overture, yesterday, as at all times he plays every other piece—as though for the while there is nothing else in the world, as though he would penetrate the audience with his own mood. The obstacle is Beethoven, the accustomed and too familiar classic. Only the youngest and the newest in that habituated audience of Friday afternoons, "sitting in" year after year at twenty-four symphonic matinées, may hear him with fresh and opening ears. To many an elder, if we really search ourselves, he is "just Beethoven." Being lazy-minded, we let him go at that—until some new-found personality, like Mr. Schnabel, comes along to set us every one alert.

There is no moral—unless it is that Beethoven should be played seldom in these days, and always with the renewed vitality with which Dr. Koussevitzky impregnates the more stirring symphonies. Or unless it is pardon for those restless spirits whose thoughts would wander from pastoral peasants and pieties to those bedevilled and berated Variations of Schönberg, which the conductor announced but is not likely to attempt this season. Or in the third place, unless it is to extenuate those surly souls who—with Dvorák behind them, "The Pastoral" before them, and Saint-Saëns ahead of them—have heard enough "nice" symphonies for one year and crave leave-taking in music of sharper tang.

For, as it seemed once more yesterday, the "Pastoral Symphony" parts in the middle, leaving the last three divisions minor and outmoded Beethoven. If a less illustrious name were signed to it, many might find little more than a jocund ballet-scene in the scherzo of the dancing peasants and the rustic band; than a realistic thunder-shower within the orchestral limitations of Beethoven's day; than final and tedious pieties that the graces of neither flute nor clarinet may much lighten. Indeed, there are cynics who remember that Rossini was a Viennese vogue in Beethoven's day; that the great Ludwig frequented his operas; then hint that these final moralizings are prettily Rossinian—without, of course, the composer's tongue in cheek.

The first two movements are another thing. The brookside song is a lengthening chain of limpid and fragrant music which Dr. Koussevitzky neither slackened nor hurried nor dulled, letting it charm with those ingenuous imitations of woodland sounds as naive and fresh to this day as though good Papa Haydn were setting them into his oratorio of "Creation." Far as is the eighteenth-

The one place and time in which to hear the Third "Leonora" Overture is the opera house, in a performance of "Fidelio," at the pause before the final scene. Then and there the course of the drama is fresh in every mind; in visible and audible presence the personages have come and gone. We have known them, however, in such semblance and speech as tangible and also imperfect men and women of the singing theater may give them. We have also shared in an action more or less confined within the conventions and exigencies of the stage.

Forthwith the orchestra passes to the Third "Leonora" Overture. The drama is enacted in sound; the stage is limitless; the passions, the situations, the stress and the suspense, emerge at the heights and depths, in the epic voice, that Beethoven could gain in symphonic music, but that in theater-music struggles constrained. Then this Overture seems music-drama concentrated, clarified, intensified as nowhere else. The concert-hall is not its seat; the summarizing program-book but poor substitute for an action heard and seen. Therefore the conductors outdo themselves to dramatize, and the "Third Leonora" becomes a music of pointed paragraphs, sharpened contrasts, well-wrought transition and climax. Dr. Koussevitzky succeeds as well as do most. But away from the opera house and "Fidelio," the epic splendor lessens; the drama, passionated into music, inevitably wanes.

The Fourth Piano-Concerto escapes nearly every handicap upon Symphony or Overture. Like all Beethoven's Concertos, it is a virtuoso-music, designed in degree to display the performer, submitting readily to Mr. Schnabel's inserted cadenza. Therefore to this day pianists seek it out and profit by it. Like its fellow, the Fifth Concerto in B-flat, it is also a quasi-symphonic music, according to Beethoven's contentious habit. In the slow movement of the Fourth, piano and orchestra are at persistent odds. In the first movement, they are prone to snatch subject and development one from the other. Only in the finale do they march hand in hand—not too contentedly.

Boy	9	-	1	certo is also romantic
In				t movement, the piano-
d				ressive, as we should vast Net				zen rhapsodic as with ile Change				ng energy. The slow
65%	+ ¼			is the celebrated con-
22%				leading, single-voiced
28%	- 1%			he united, relentless
31%	- ¾			the gravity of mood
8%	- 1%			light-paced finale. At-
20%				xactly characteristic of
9%	+ ½			nent or modern. Yet
10%	+ ¾			rovising air, now mus-
25%	+ 2%			ed, pervades and pre-
25%	+ ½			rth Concerto of Beet-
66%	+ ½			sphere Schumann's is
25	+ 5
18	- 2%			's playing of the piano-
22½ + ¼				write temperately, yet
02% + 2%				wrought upon his hear-
3% - ½				movement, he attained
½				and beauty of musical
95	- 1%			o interceded for itself
92½ - ½				lucable orchestra, but
56½ + 3%				awkish sentiment. It
10%				, dreamful; it whispered
20½ -				addden and submitted.
88	- 1%			d its just musical value;
5%	-			od shapen and poised;
12½ + ¼				e rounded. Here was
7%	- ¼			its full and living self,
27½ + ¾				oesy.
10%				ght hand, alert rhythm,
01 + ½				bright and fluid tone.
10% - ½				folding of the whole de-
15½ + ¾				tegrity. The first move-
00				interwoven motives, as
44	- 1			ing Beethoven might
36 + 1½				's quick-coming fancies;
38 - 3%				d orchestra distribute
21 + 3%				bel was as clear as the
5%	+ 1%			terns; kept the impro-
12% + 2%				ded from sonority into
21% + 5%				uphony into euphony
41% - 2%				urface-smoothness went
1%	+ ½			pulsive energy. There
15% - ½				f all that he has done
40 - ½				in Boston. He takes
12 + 1%				rms into emotion. He
3½ + ½				vitality and complete;
70 - 1				ranted the composer
10				d poetry, gravity o
9%	+ ¾			wer, and strangeness
08%	- ¼			H. T. P.

st is /ston Symphony

even still lives, even after the Festival, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky assured us by his program of June 4 and 5, which was made up of "Pastorale" Symphony, the Grieg Piano Concerto and the Overture to "Leonore" No. 3. Since Artur Schnabel had been transported from Berlin to Boston for the specific pur-

There is some curious Boston history connected with Mr. Schnabel and this concerto. He played it seven years ago with this orchestra, under Bruno Walter as guest conductor. It was the first appearance in Boston of both pianist and conductor. Possibly the player was overshadowed by the leader—there was much excitement over the possibility that Walter was to be invited to succeed Monteux. In any event, Mr. Schnabel made very little stir. But at the concert now under notice, he was acclaimed as he had lately been in the Brahms celebration. Recollection of the earlier performance of the G major is dim, but the applause on the present occasion was deserved by soloist and orchestra. It was a poetic performance, which in the mysterious duologue of the slow movement perhaps tended a little toward sweetness.

Of course, by their recent violent exercises, the men of the orchestra had earned a little relaxation. But of all the symphonies of Beethoven, why the Sixth? We should have preferred any other, from the First to (if necessary) three movements of the Ninth. But the answer to this rhetorical question was given by the audience, which clapped until the players were called to their feet. The concert closed with a highly dramatized reading of the dramatic overture.

L. A. S.

Signale, the Leipzig journal of music, reports the new piece that Stravinsky is composing for the jubilee of the Boston Orchestra as a Symphony with Choruses. . . . If that be true, the anniversary will hardly be celebrated at the beginning of next season, since neither the Harvard-Radcliffe choir nor The Cecilia could be rehearsed before autumn. As this sign goes, the middle or the end of the fiftieth year of the orchestra will bring the commemorative concerts—or, rather, festival.

Artur Schnabel Plays
Fourth Concerto
for Piano

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The one-composer programme suggests an occasion, and Dr. Koussevitzky loves occasions. With the musical air still vibrating with the last echoes of the recent Brahms Festival, Dr. Koussevitzky prepared for the concerts of yesterday afternoon and this evening a Beethoven programme with Artur Schnabel, co-star of the Festival, for piano soloist.

PLAYS FOURTH CONCERTO

For his piece Mr. Schnabel chose the Fourth Concerto with which, by the way, he had made his debut here seven years ago. Since this Concerto is a slender piece, Dr. Koussevitzky wisely prefaced it with one of the lesser symphonies, to wit, the "Pastoral," and supplied the otherwise missing heroics with the Overture to Leonora, No. 3, which served as concluding number.

It is, indeed, with the lesser Beethoven symphonies, the even-numbered ones, that Dr. Koussevitzky has been most triumphantly successful. Or, to put it differently, when he has conducted them there has been no dissenting voice. In them no captious critic has accused him of straining after effect, of forcing century notion of nature from our simple-hearted, upswelling joy in the lights of wood and field, sun, sky, air fills the first movement. It possesses Beethoven and he writes a music as less, with its smiling phrases, as happy, lovely and enduring. But, noted, we are always justifying "Pastoral Symphony" in the terms Beethoven who lived according to a particular habit in a particular time; whereas who thinks of his better part as thing but universal and timeless?

The one place and time in which hear the Third "Leonora" Overture, the opera house, in a performance of "Fidelio," at the pause before the scene. Then and there the course the drama is fresh in every mind; in the ble and audible presence the pages have come and gone. We know them, however, in such semblance and speech as tangible and also in effect men and women of the theater may give them. We have shared in an action more or less common within the conventions and exigencies of the stage.

Forthwith the orchestra passes to the Third "Leonora" Overture. The drama is enacted in sound; the stage is less; the passions, the situations, stress and the suspense, emerge at heights and depths, in the epic vein that Beethoven could gain in symphonic music, but that in theater-music seems music-drama concentrated, defied, intensified as nowhere else. The concert-hall is not its seat; the summing program-book but poor substitute for an action heard and seen. Then, before the conductors outdo themselves, dramatize, and the "Third Leonora" comes a music of pointed paragraphs, sharpened contrasts, well-wrought transitions and climax. Dr. Koussevitzky succeeds as well as do most. But away the opera house and "Fidelio," the splendor lessens; the drama, passing into music, inevitably wanes.

The Fourth Piano-Concerto possesses nearly every handicap upon Symphonic Overture. Like all Beethoven's Concertos, it is a virtuoso-music, designed to display the performer, submitting readily to Mr. Schnabel's insertion of a cadenza. Therefore to this day pianists seek it out and profit by it. Like its low, the Fifth Concerto in B-flat, it also a quasi-symphonic music, according to Beethoven's contentious habit. In the slow movement of the Fourth, piano and orchestra are at persistent odds. In the first movement, they are prone to snarl at each other. Only in the finale do they march hand in hand—not too contentedly.

The Fourth Concerto is also romantic music. In the first movement, the piano part is often expressive, as we should say nowadays, even rhapsodic as with sudden upspringing energy. The slow movement contains the celebrated contrast of the pleading, single-voiced piano against the united, relentless strings. A gentle gravity of mood haunts even the light-paced finale. Atmosphere is not exactly characteristic of piano-concertos ancient or modern. Yet a distinctive improvising air, now musing, now animated, pervades and preserves this Fourth Concerto of Beethoven. For atmosphere Schumann's is its only compeer.

Of Mr. Schnabel's playing of the piano part it is hard to write temperately, yet convey all that he wrought upon his hearers. In the slow movement, he attained the very poetry and beauty of musical sound. The piano interceded for itself against the implacable orchestra, but without hint of mawkish sentiment. It was tender; it was dreamful; it whispered and sighed and saddened and submitted. Yet every note had its just musical value; every phrase stood shapen and poised; every period came rounded. Here was music imparted in its full and living self, thereby gaining poesy.

In the finale, light hand, alert rhythm, quick transition, bright and fluid tone. Yet always the unfolding of the whole design in musical integrity. The first movement is a web of interwoven motives, as though the musing Beethoven might hardly sort out his quick-coming fancies; between piano and orchestra distribute them. Mr. Schnabel was as clear as the sun, with the patterns, kept the improvising vein; shaded from sonority into euphony; from euphony into euphony; while under the surface-smoothness went the measured propulsive energy. There is the secret of all that he has done during his stay in Boston. He takes thought, and it warms into emotion. He makes music so vitally and completely, that out of it, granted the composer, spring pathos and poetry, gravity or gayety, beauty, power, and strangeness, and illusion.

Boston Symphony

Beethoven still lives, even after the Brahms Festival, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky assured us by his program of April 4 and 5, which was made up of the "Pastorale" Symphony, the G-major Piano Concerto and the Overture to "Leonore" No. 3. Since Artur Schnabel had been transported from Berlin to Boston for the specific purpose of assisting in the veneration of Brahms, what more natural than to make use of his services in the Fourth Beethoven Concerto? It was done.

There is some curious Boston history connected with Mr. Schnabel and this concerto. He played it seven years ago with this orchestra, under Bruno Walter as guest conductor. It was the first appearance in Boston of both pianist and conductor. Possibly the player was overshadowed by the leader—there was much excitement over the possibility that Walter was to be invited to succeed Monteux. In any event, Mr. Schnabel made very little stir. But at the concert now under notice, he was acclaimed as he had lately been in the Brahms celebration. Recollection of the earlier performance of the G major is dim, but the applause on the present occasion was deserved by soloist and orchestra. It was a poetic performance, which in the mysterious duologue of the slow movement perhaps tended a little toward sweetness.

Of course, by their recent violent exercises, the men of the orchestra had earned a little relaxation. But of all the symphonies of Beethoven, why the Sixth? We should have preferred any other, from the First to (if necessary) three movements of the Ninth. But the answer to this rhetorical question was given by the audience, which clapped until the players were called to their feet. The concert closed with a highly dramatized reading of the dramatic overture.

L. A. S.

Signale, the Leipzig journal of music, reports the new piece that Stravinsky is composing for the jubilee of the Boston Orchestra as a Symphony with Choruses. . . . If that be true, the anniversary will hardly be celebrated at the beginning of next season, since neither the Harvard-Radcliffe choir nor The Cecilia could be rehearsed before autumn. As this sign goes, the middle or the end of the fiftieth year of the orchestra will bring the commemorative concerts—or, rather, festival.

BEETHOVEN CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Artur Schnabel Plays
Fourth Concerto
for Piano

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The one-composer programme suggests an occasion, and Dr. Koussevitzky loves occasions. With the musical air still vibrating with the last echoes of the recent Brahms Festival, Dr. Koussevitzky prepared for the concerts of yesterday afternoon and this evening a Beethoven programme with Artur Schnabel, co-star of the Festival, for piano soloist.

PLAYS FOURTH CONCERTO

For his piece Mr. Schnabel chose the Fourth Concerto with which, by the way, he had made his debut here seven years ago. Since this Concerto is a slender piece, Dr. Koussevitzky wisely prefaced it with one of the lesser symphonies, to wit, the "Pastoral," and supplied the otherwise missing heroics with the Overture to Leonora, No. 3, which served as concluding number.

It is, indeed, with the lesser Beethoven symphonies, the even-numbered ones, that Dr. Koussevitzky has been most triumphantly successful. Or, to put it differently, when he has conducted them there has been no dissenting voice. In them no captious critic has accused him of straining after effect, of forcing the issue. In the "Pastoral" yesterday, as in the Fourth Symphony a few weeks ago, there was first of all a release of the true Beethoven spirit. The music in an indefinable way sounded Beethovenish.

Close to Perfection

And this performance of yesterday was remarkable also for its euphony, its balance of tone, for the ingratiating manner in which all the melodies were sung. From first bar to last the music flowed. There was unceasing plasticity. One enthusiast would have it, indeed, that Dr. Koussevitzky had never before achieved a performance that came so close to absolute perfection.

If those who heard Mr. Schnabel yesterday were expecting a petition of the excitements, the electrically charged atmosphere, the general air of exaltation, that marked his and the orchestra's recent performances of the two Brahms concertos they were doomed to disappointment. A festival is one thing; a Friday afternoon Symphony Concert another. And the concertos of Beethoven are not the concertos of Brahms. There are those—call them heretics, if you will—who find this G major Concerto at the most possessed of a certain fragile charm and who, while admitting the effectiveness of the slow movement with its romantic dialogue between the pianoforte and the strings, are disposed to regard the piece, as a whole, as unsympathetically written for the solo instrument and as an example of how not to combine the sonorities of piano and orchestra, inherently so difficult to reconcile.

Mr. Schnabel's Playing

Mr. Schnabel played, of course, with his wonted musicianship and technical mastery, his notable command of dynamics, his sensitive phrasing. He was warmly applauded.

The Leonora Overture was played dramatically but with not quite the feeling for tonal balance and proportion that distinguished the performance of the Symphony.

Schnabel's Way With Beethoven

AFTER all, it takes a classicist to play the classics. The proof of it was given at Sanders Theater in Cambridge last evening, when Mr. Artur Schnabel, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, played Beethoven's fourth piano concerto, in G major. Mr. Schnabel believes in the classics as the greatest achievement that musical art has pro-sure music, unmixed by or programmatic, perfectly as the man can obeying only its own pinnacle around which. Thus he idealizes an unto the gods on Mount him no figure probably in this pinnacle than the oven. Thus he was ideal last evening in Cambridge skill as an executant sely the purity of his become evident to Boston the concerts of the festival; had been suspected through the report of who in ever increasing to him, subsequently gospel of his insight and hicle chosen for further hearers with that insight thoven's concerto in G some with a loftiness and ch made them question had ever really heard it Olympian calm one felt in gree. Subordinate to it all e effects, however charmism, however telling or exself. This is not the place all. The concerto is part ogram at Symphony Hall, which is occasion for more ment. Suffice it to say that as a whole rather than any c features made last eve- nance what it was. And e the work of Dr. Kousse- is men is not to be forst of the program, the orl Schubert's two movements finished Symphony Mr. n's Suite for Orchestra, ademic Festival" Overture, eard or well established in

Mr. Piston conducted his The impressions of last enewed. His conducting is many a composer-conducic shows the growing comas made a long step for-

Boys Opening movement indicates Six Binding of his material; and is pleasing to the receptive

An Andante brings a genatisfies. The positive char-eme of the final fugue andling gives this move- t W. Jax to what has gone before.

st and ashes is this fugue. Hefler, he suite could hardly be opedald. One looks forward with anticipation to the future iers, Ma Piston.

With Schubert's symphony Dr. Koussevitzky revealed beauties in his wonted manner. Dr. Koussevitzky, when opportunity offers, is with his orchestra a singer of songs even as is Schubert with his symphony. Once again the melodies sang themselves out to their heart's content. Once again they combined to build larger structures of symphonic proportions. Once again they gave pleasure.

The Germanic humors of the "Academic" overture are almost as well known as the melodies of Schubert. With them, too, Dr. Koussevitzky gave revealing performance. It, too, is a work of tunes, but tunes of far different import than the lyric melodies of Schubert. Each was sharpened, aptly characterized. Brahms and his "academic" tunes made splendid final number for a pleasurable evening.

A. H. M.

A Balanced Mind Plays Over Music

As He Takes Leave of Boston, Artur Schnabel Speaks Warmly and Wisely

Trans. April 5, 1930

ARTUR SCHNABEL. No name has been more in the mind of the musical public during the last few weeks. Much Brahms and a little Beethoven have been enthusiastically received from him. In his Brahms and in his Beethoven the master mind has been apparent. Further, his students praise him as a musician of great resource, as a musical thinker of comprehensive scope. To this man, then, went the interviewer, to see what he might have to say for an American newspaper.

There are interviews and interviews. There is the question-and-answer interview, in which the questioner seems to catechize the subject, almost as an attorney questions a witness. There is the interview in which the famous subject is modest, or shy, or devoid of ideas, in which the interviewer finds it necessary to tell him what to say and then to convince him that he has said it. And there is the ideal interview in which the interviewer simply listens, from the richness of the mind of the interviewed there flows a full stream of reactions of that mind upon the experiences that have come to it. A paragraph could never have been had the interview with Artur Schnabel not fallen into the last of those classes. The interviewer was most fully received; conversation began, as magic, almost out of nothing, conversation, interestingly for more than an hour, which seemed far less than half an hour, when the exigencies of a schedule a break necessary—with many not touched upon that the interviewer would gladly have discussed.

□ □ □

Mr. Schnabel the pianist of the concert hall is also the human being of more intimate contact. When the who is Schnabel strides with firm, steps the considerable distance to the platform at Symphony Hall he reads determined purpose into every move. This masterfulness of ability one feels also in the intimacy of personal converse. It is not of the concert hall; it is the man. After conversation with him, one can imagine that this man would assume upon any occasion or for any purpose. He is what he is, just so. This purposiveness of character does not make the man in the least formal. His seriousness upon the platform might arouse such fears for one who had not met him. The granite in his character is overlaid with a geniality that puts the visitor at his ease the moment. The eyes twinkle; the face is wreathed with the smiles of good humor, one suspects a fund of humor, whether one can bring it out. He finds soon that he does not need to try to bring anything out, that to listen is better.

One discovers that Mr. Schnabel is a philosopher who happens to express himself through the medium of an art. A typical man, he thinks deeply and concretely upon the things which interest him. Being a musician, he reasons concerning esthetics, and history, and values which may be reflected by his art. Those who have been fortunate as to hear him in the last few weeks know that this philosopher does not result in dryness or in formalized interpretation. From conversation as from his playing, one can see that with him head does not stifle heart nor does heart run away with head. A quality which makes the visitor at once so much at home is witness of the issue. In the "Pastoral" yesterday as in the Fourth Symphony a few weeks ago, there was first of all a release of the true Beethoven spirit. The music was an indefinable way sounded Beethovenish.

Close to Perfection

And this performance of yesterday was remarkable also for its euphony, its balance of tone, for the ingrained manner in which all the melodies were sung. From first bar to last music flowed. There was unceasing plasticity. One enthusiast would say, indeed, that Dr. Koussevitzky never before achieved a performance that came so close to absolute perfection.

If those who heard Mr. Schnabel yesterday were expecting a performance of excitement, the electrically charged atmosphere, the general air of exaltation that marked his and the orchestra's recent performances of the two Brahms concertos they were doomed to disappointment. A festival is one thing, a Friday afternoon Symphony Concert is another. And the concertos of Beethoven are not the concertos of Brahms. There are those—call them heretics if you will—who find this G major Concerto at the most possessed of a certain fragile charm and who, while admitting the effectiveness of the movement with its romantic dialogue between the pianoforte and the strings, are disposed to regard the piece, as a whole, as unsympathetically written for the solo instrument and as an example of how not to combine the sonorities of piano and orchestra, inherently difficult to reconcile.

Mr. Schnabel's Playing

Mr. Schnabel played, of course, with his wonted musicianship and technical mastery, his notable command of dynamics, his sensitive phrasing. He was warmly applauded.

The Leonora Overture was played dramatically but with not quite the feeling for tonal balance and proportion that distinguished the performance of the Symphony.

Schnabel's Way With Beethoven

AFTER all, it takes a classicist to play the classics. The proof of this was given at Sanders Theater in Cambridge last evening, when Mr. Schnabel, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, played Beethoven's piano concerto, in G major. Mr. Schnabel believes in the classics as the greatest achievement that musical art has produced. Music, pure music, unmixed by the extraneous or programmatic, proportioned as perfectly as the man can proportion it and obeying only its own laws, this is the pinnacle around which he centers all else. Thus he idealizes an art which is like unto the gods on Mount Olympus. For him no figure probably stands higher on this pinnacle than the figure of Beethoven. Thus he was interpreting an ideal last evening in Cambridge. That his skill as an executant approaches closely the purity of his idealism has become evident to Bostonians through the concerts of the recent Brahms festival; had been suspected for some years through the report of artist pupils, who in ever increasing numbers flock to him, subsequently spreading the gospel of his insight and skill. The vehicle chosen for further acquainting his hearers with that insight and skill, Beethoven's concerto in G minor, came to some with a loftiness and authority which made them question whether they had ever really heard it before. The Olympian calm one felt in superlative degree. Subordinate to it all were decorative effects, however charming; all lyricism, however telling or expressive in itself. This is not the place for more detail. The concerto is part of today's program at Symphony Hall, the review of which is occasion for more extended comment. Suffice it to say that the concerto as a whole rather than any of its specific features made last evening's performance what it was. And in that whole the work of Dr. Koussevitzky and his men is not to be forgotten.

For the rest of the program, the orchestra played Schubert's two movements called the Unfinished Symphony. Mr. Walter Piston's Suite for Orchestra, Brahms's "Academic Festival" Overture, all recently heard or well established in the repertory. Mr. Piston conducted his own suite. The impressions of last Friday were renewed. His conducting is above that of many a composer-conductor. His music shows the growing composer who has made a long step forward. An opening movement indicates skill in the handling of his material; and material that is pleasing to the receptive ear and mind. An Andante brings a gentle mood that satisfies. The positive character of the theme of the final fugue and its powerful handling gives this movement a feeling of great vitality, makes it a worthy climax to what has gone before. Not as dry dust and ashes is this fugue. A finale for the suite could hardly be better conceived. One looks forward with interest and anticipation to the future work of Walter Piston.

With Schubert's symphony Dr. Koussevitzky revealed beauties in his wonted manner. Dr. Koussevitzky, when opportunity offers, is with his orchestra a singer of songs even as is Schubert with his symphony. Once again the melodies sang themselves out to their heart's content. Once again they combined to build larger structures of symphonic proportions. Once again they gave pleasure.

The Germanic humors of the "Academic" overture are almost as well known as the melodies of Schubert. With them, too, Dr. Koussevitzky gave revealing performance. It, too, is a work of tunes, but tunes of far different import than the lyric melodies of Schubert. Each was sharpened, aptly characterized. Brahms and his "academic" tunes made splendid final number for a pleasurable evening.

A. H. M.

A Balanced Mind Plays Over Music

As He Takes Leave of Boston, Artur Schnabel Speaks Warmly and Wisely

Trans.

April 5, 1930

ARTUR SCHNABEL. No name has been more in the mind of the musical public during the last few weeks. Much Brahms and a little Beethoven have been enthusiastically received from him. In his Brahms and in his Beethoven the master mind has been apparent. Further, his students praise him as a musician of great resource, as a musical thinker of comprehensive scope. To this man, then, went the interviewer, to see what he might have to say for an American newspaper.

There are interviews and interviews. There is the question-and-answer interview, in which the questioner seems to catechize the subject, almost as an attorney questions a witness. There is the interview in which the famous subject is modest, or shy, or devoid of ideas, in which the interviewer finds it necessary to tell him what to say and then to convince him that he has said it. And there is the ideal interview in which the interviewer simply listens, from the richness of the mind of the interviewed there flows a full stream of reactions of that mind upon the experiences that have come to it. A paragraph could never have been had the interview with Artur Schnabel not fallen into the last of those classes. The interviewer was most graciously received; conversation began, as if by magic, almost out of nothing, continuing interestingly for more than an hour, which seemed far less than half an hour, when the exigencies of a schedule made a break necessary—with many subjects not touched upon that the interviewer would gladly have discussed.

□ □ □ □ □

Artur Schnabel the pianist of the concert hall is also the human being of more intimate contact. When the interviewer who is Schnabel strides with firm, sure steps the considerable distance to the platform at Symphony Hall, he reads determined purpose into every move. This masterfulness of personality one feels also in the intimacy of personal converse. It is not of the concert hall; it is the man. After conversation with him, one can imagine that this man would assume any pose upon any occasion or for any purpose. He is what he is, just so. This purposiveness of character does not make the man in the least formal. His seriousness upon the platform does not arouse such fears for one who has not met him. The granite in his character is overlaid with a geniality that puts the visitor at his ease the moment he enters the room. The eyes twinkle; the face is wreathed with the smiles of good humor. One suspects a fund of humor, whether one can bring it out. He finds soon that he does not try to bring anything out, that to listen is better.

One discovers that Mr. Schnabel is a philosopher who happens to express himself through the medium of an art. A typical man, he thinks deeply and concretely upon the things which interest him. Being a musician, he reasons concerning esthetics, and historical facts, and values which may be influenced by his art. Those who have been fortunate as to hear him in the last few weeks know that this philosopher does not result in dryness or in idealized interpretation. From conversation as from his playing, one gets a sense of his head does not stiffen or does heart run away with head. The quality which makes the visitor at once so much at home is witness of the issue. In the "Pastoral" yesterday as in the Fourth Symphony a few weeks ago, there was first of all a release of the true Beethoven spirit. The music in an indefinable way sounded Beethovenish.

Close to Perfection

And this performance of yesterday was remarkable also for its euphony, its balance of tone, for the ingraining manner in which all the melodies were sung. From first bar to last music flowed. There was unceasing plasticity. One enthusiast would say, indeed, that Dr. Koussevitzky never before achieved a performance that came so close to absolute perfection.

If those who heard Mr. Schnabel yesterday were expecting a performance of excitement, the electrically charged atmosphere, the general air of exaltation that marked his and the orchestra's recent performances of the two Brahms concertos they were doomed to disappointment. A festival is one thing, a Friday afternoon Symphony Concert is another. And the concertos of Beethoven are not the concertos of Brahms. There are those—call them heretics if you will—who find this G major Concerto at the most possessed of a certain fragile charm and who, while admitting the effectiveness of the movement with its romantic dialogue between the pianoforte and the strings, are disposed to regard the piece, as a whole, as unsympathetically written for the solo instrument and as an example of how not to combine the sonorities of piano and orchestra, inherently difficult to reconcile.

Mr. Schnabel's Playing

Mr. Schnabel played, of course, with his wonted musicianship and technical mastery, his notable command of dynamics, his sensitive phrasing. He was warmly applauded.

The Leonora Overture was played dramatically but with not quite the feeling for tonal balance and proportion that distinguished the performance of the Symphony.

Schnabel's Way With Beethoven

AFTER all, it takes a classicist to play the classics. The proof of this was given at Sanders Theater in Cambridge last evening, when Mr. Schnabel, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, played Beethoven's piano concerto, in G major. Mr. Schnabel believes in the classics as the greatest achievement that musical art has produced. Music, pure music, unmixed by the extraneous or programmatic, proportioned as perfectly as the man can proportion it and obeying only its own laws, this is the pinnacle around which he centers all else. Thus he idealizes an art which is like unto the gods on Mount Olympus. For him no figure probably stands higher on this pinnacle than the figure of Beethoven. Thus he was interpreting an ideal last evening in Cambridge. That his skill as an executant approaches closely the purity of his idealism has become evident to Bostonians through the concerts of the recent Brahms festival; had been suspected for some years through the report of artist pupils, who in ever increasing numbers flock to him, subsequently spreading the gospel of his insight and skill. The vehicle chosen for further acquainting his hearers with that insight and skill, Beethoven's concerto in G minor, came to some with a loftiness and authority which made them question whether they had ever really heard it before. The Olympian calm one felt in superlative degree. Subordinate to it all were decorative effects, however charming; all lyricism, however telling or expressive in itself. This is not the place for more detail. The concerto is part of today's program at Symphony Hall, the review of which is occasion for more extended comment. Suffice it to say that the concerto as a whole rather than any of its specific features made last evening's performance what it was. And in that whole the work of Dr. Koussevitzky and his men is not to be forgotten.

For the rest of the program, the orchestra played Schubert's two movements called the Unfinished Symphony. Mr. Walter Piston's Suite for Orchestra, Brahms's "Academic Festival" Overture, all recently heard or well established in the repertory. Mr. Piston conducted his own suite. The impressions of last Friday were renewed. His conducting is above that of many a composer-conductor. His music shows the growing composer who has made a long step forward. An opening movement indicates skill in the handling of his material; and material that is pleasing to the receptive ear and mind. An Andante brings a gentle mood that satisfies. The positive character of the theme of the final fugue and its powerful handling gives this movement a feeling of great vitality, makes it a worthy climax to what has gone before. Not as dry dust and ashes is this fugue. A finale for the suite could hardly be better conceived. One looks forward with interest and anticipation to the future work of Walter Piston.

With Schubert's symphony revealed in a manner. Dr. Koussevitzky offers, is with a series of songs even as a symphony. Once again they themselves out to the structures of symphony. Once again they gave

The Germanic "academic" overture are as the melodies of Schumann, too, Dr. Koussevitzky's performance. It, too, but tunes of far different the lyric melodies of sharpened, aptly and his "academic" final number for a

Har
to
To Five

A Balance Mind

Over
As He Takes Lead
Artur Schnabel
Warmly and

Trans.
ARTUR SCHNABEL
A been more in musical public a little Beethoven have been received from him and in his Beethoven has been apparent. dents praise him as a resource, as a music: prehensive scope. T went the interview—50c—75c might have to say 75c. $1. newspaper. L SEPTE

There are interview
There is the question view, in which the catechize the subject torney questions a wi interview in which is modest, or shy, or which the interviewee to tell him what to vince him that he finally there is the ideal interview in which the interviewer simply listens, while from the richness of the mind of the interviewed there flows a full stream of the reactions of that mind upon the many experiences that have come to it. This paragraph could never have been written had the interview with Artur Schnabel not fallen into the last of those three classes. The interviewer was most cordially received; conversation began, as if by magic, almost out of nothing, continued interestingly for more than an hour, which seemed far less than half that time, when the exigencies of a schedule made a break necessary—with many matters not touched upon that the interviewer would gladly have discussed.

Artur Schnabel the pianist of the concert hall is also the human being of closer, more intimate contact. When the pianist who is Schnabel strides with firm, swift steps the considerable distance to the front of the platform at Symphony Hall, one reads determined purpose into his every move. This masterfulness of personality one feels also in the intimacies of personal converse. It is not a pose of the concert hall; it is the man. In fact, after conversation with him, one cannot imagine that this man would assume a pose upon any occasion or for any purpose. He is what he is, just so.

But this purposiveness of character does not make the man in the least forbidding. His seriousness upon the platform might arouse such fears for one who had not met him. The granite in the character is overlaid with a geniality that puts the visitor at his ease the first moment. The eyes twinkle; the face is wreathed with the smiles of good nature; one suspects a fund of humor, wonders whether one can bring it out. And one finds soon that he does not want to try to bring anything out, that merely to listen is better.

He discovers that Mr. Schnabel is a philosopher who happens to express himself through the medium of an art. A typical German, he thinks deeply and conclusively upon the things which interest him most. Being a musician, he reasons closely concerning esthetics, and historical currents, and values which may be expressed by his art. Those who have been so fortunate as to hear him in the past few weeks know that this philosophizing does not result in dryness or in unemotionalized interpretation. From his conversation as from his playing, one feels that with him head does not stifle heart, nor does heart run away with head. The geniality which makes the visitor at once so much at home is witness of a love of mankind, a warmth and a richness of emotional personality which, in playing, results in those marvellously well-rounded readings of the great masters. Mr. Schnabel is man and musician in whom a large, warm heart and a deep, active, penetrating mind are at work in a condition of almost perfect equilibrium.

THO
REC

To return to the interview. The interviewer began with a compliment upon the artist's great playing; the artist returned with a compliment upon the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and upon the idea of giving such a series of concerts as the recent Brahms Festival. The flow of ideas had begun. "You have the most aristocratic orchestra in the world," said Mr. Schnabel with a burst of feeling, affirming and re-affirming the statement with some emphasis. He continued more or less in this wise, "After all, art is an aristocratic matter. In its very nature it can never be levelled down to a 'democratic' plane. It can serve a democracy only by the attempt to level up to its own plane. A festival like this that you have just lived through, seems to me a wonderfully fine thing. For the time you are lifted completely out of everything that seems accidental or trivial or secondary in this life. Consider, as one phase of it, the musicians in the orchestra. They are of many nationalities. But as they give themselves to such a task as this, they are of no nationality whatsoever. They are united in a bond which goes much higher than any nationality ever can go, the bond of pure humanity. When you listened to those concerts did you think of being in Boston, or in America? Would you have thought of being in Paris or Berlin if you had happened to hear such a thing there? Would you not have felt much the same, would you not have been much the same, wherever you might have been? And so I think all fine and great art draws us away from the things that separate us and brings us into the things that unite us."

Talking of Dr. Koussevitzky, Mr. Schnabel said, "He has given you a marvellous picture of Brahms in these few days. He has grown tremendously since I last saw him. That was in Moscow in 1914, just before the war. He was playing with his own orchestra then. It was very fine. But he has grown much. Yes, I have been in Russia since that time, four times for concerts since the war."

Here was a subject upon which to get information if possible. Mr. Schnabel disclaimed ability to give an opinion upon the social and political experiment of Soviet Russia. "It is evident that something colossal is going on. Whether it

Mason Carmody

BASS
TICKETS $1.50, $1.00, 75c

URS. EVE. Jordan Hall
Long Recital—DOROTHY
GEORGE
HENRICH GEBHARD, Composer-Pianist
in Richmond (Mason & Hamlin)

N HALL, MON. EVE., APR. 7
ARMSTRONG KIMBALL
SOPRANO
S LANGENDOEN, 'cellist
The Boston Symphony Orch.
Mgr. (Mason & Hamlin)

TERCENTENARY CELEBRATION
10th Century Church

sing, and sing he did,
—CH

WILLIAM FOX
presents

CORR O'CORR
ART ected by K BORZAGE

MAJES

2.30—TWICE DAI
PRICES Every Night on a point
Mats.—50c, it is no good
NGLAND PRESENTATION UNTI

SYMPHO
TOMORRO

DEI A HAYDN

five views, Mr. Schnabel began an equally startling statement. He a particle of difference piece by Mozart and aethoven. What differences covered are differences in the the composers used, and y] means don't count. Take example. The means which the making of his music are hat with him means don't as a part of his music. And a freshness and a vitality makes us feel that it is today, let alone of the past, it is always the music of to- means don't count. It is behind that counts.

great piece of music, every work of art, is a balance between tion and revolt. Earth, heaven all, each must find its place in equilibrium of a great synthesis. art work must transcend every- that is incidental or specialized. as the incidental or the specialized find something with which to bal- For the equilibrium of forces maintained. Thus a great tran- cal calm will result. This calm exact opposite of everything that ward nervousness. Bach, Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert wrote such idual music, music in which entage of equilibrium of the va- ces is unusually high. Handel, other hand, seems to me merely es, will it In the nineteenth century, composer of introduction of specialization, shortly to reduction of things essentially d, perhaps, to music, the percentage of as lived in within a given work is much gton, Chel- materialistic advances of the the sort of century were not favorable to e, and the art. Nervousness, tension, r. elemental power too often The work in itself does release from the tension es. Wagner, for example, ways be considered roughly the baroque period in art with the great period which composers in the nineteenth o counter to the downward re is no nervousness, no re Verdi. His music is in- is epoch, not materialistic, balanced synthesis of ap- The percentage of equilib- r high in Berlioz, whose too often from unreason- ity. It is high in Brahms, re traces of specialization ere one might expect more ties. Debussy presents a little synthesis of opposites.

itself. It is striving for the pupils? They are the gifted from ons. They know the seriousness. They know that they can their pleasures with their work y give work its just preference. ? America sends me some of of my pupils. Their talent is arable. They are as well prepared others; but sometimes their out- a bit more naive than that of the others. They themselves excellent poise, an excellent per- quilibrium, in that they have a sense of seriousness which carries nothing that is depressing. It eat combination of qualities, this tion of the young Americans." e five minutes must have elapsed. uctantly but gratefully the inter- surrendered the musician-philoso- his next engagement.

A. H. M.

ert J. Butler, Long a Boston Musician

ert J. Butler, who up to several go had been a member of the Bos- omphony Orchestra for twenty-six having played contra-bass with ganization, died this morning fol- an illness of several years. He was

Apr. 14, 1930
and, Georges L. Longy

Vord was received yesterday of the th of Gustav Georges Leopold Longy. er know as George Longy, who for years played first oboe in the Boston nphony orchestra, at his farm near eville, Normandy. He was in his 62d is professional musical life began in 6, when he joined the famous noureaux orchestra, and from then his rise was rapid. One after an- er, the Chatelet, the Folies Bergere the Opera Comique claimed his ent. In 1888, he went to the Colonne soloist, while still a member of the era Comique.

was as a player in both of these an accident found him and brought to Boston. In a shipwreck, the Bos- Symphony orchestra lost its first st. Maj. Henry L. Higginson, spon- of the orchestra, wired Paris for the oboist available to fill the gap. y was admittedly the best in Paris he was induced to come to Boston. is daughter, Mme. Renee Longy helle of Philadelphia is a pianist teacher. Mr. Longy had attained reputation of being the supreme ter of the oboe in America.

a love of mankind, the richness of emotion, the playing, result well-rounded results. Mr. Schnabel, in whom a large active, penetrating condition of a viewer began the artist's great turned with a ton Symphony idea of giving as the recent B of ideas had been aristocratic or Mr. Schnabel was firming and re with some emp or less in this aristocratic ma it can never be cratic' plane. only by the at own plane. A have just lived wonderfully fir you are lifted thing that seen secondary in t phase of it, the tra. They are as they give t as this, they a soever. They goes much hie ver can go, t When you list you think of bica? Would y in Paris or B to hear such not have felt not have been you might hav fine and great the things th us into the th

Talking of Schnabel said, velous picture days. He has I last saw h in 1914, just playing with was very fine Yes, I have time, four tir war."

Here was a information I disclaimed ab the social at Soviet Russia thing colossal will be fruitful or not, who can say? The so-called proletariat is probably living on a higher level than before. But every one else is being dragged down. The present Russia is no place for a tourist. He will discover nothing. Moreover, there is nothing in Russia for me. Political Communism is not the least concerned with the art-life or with the artistic side of life. It deals with art chiefly as a part of its propaganda. And art itself has no relation to Communism or to any other political theory. Art and propaganda do not have anything to do with one another. There is nothing in common between them.

"I am reminded of a tour into Italy since the beginning of Fascist times. There also one finds an attempt to use art as a part of political propaganda. I had given a few concerts when I was notified by my manager that the Italians were glad to have me play, that they liked my playing, but that if I wanted to play in Italy I would be obliged to make up my programs so that they contained no less than 50 per cent of Italian works. Imagine a pianist making programs 50 per cent Italian. A singer could, and perhaps a violinist—but a pianist!

"Similarly, the Soviet Russians wish to use art. Unquestionably there is much strong talent among them. The students which this new Russia sends me are possessed of an intense and burning seriousness. They seem aflame with eagerness and intensity. As they come in contact with the civilization of western Europe, they look scornfully upon its lack of something 'advanced.' We are far, far behind for them. We are doing many things which seem to them utterly dead and lacking in worth."

Knowing the many and various, loose and incorrect uses of the word "modern," and hoping to get a reaction upon it; knowing further Mr. Schnabel's love for the "classics," one asked him a question about his attitude toward "modern" music. The reaction came swiftly in the demand for a definition of "modern."

"What does it mean? A quality or a quantity? A time or a type?" And without waiting for an answer Mr. Schnabel launched into a philosophic discussion of musical history and esthetics. "If you mean contemporary music, I will say that the problem of the twentieth century is to get rid of the nervousness which the nineteenth century created." Upon that somewhat startling statement followed another broadside. "Music grew and developed from about 1650 until about 1830. Since then there has been decline. The twentieth century must concern itself with arresting the decline. The situation at present is hopeful." And in explanation of those

T and LOCKWOOD
FIR NEW REVIEW
BITS OF 1929" Dancers-Comedians-21
BOB RIPA European
 R.K.O. Vaudeville
 Wm. Fox Presents
"MONEY AT HOME"
 ER, SR., and Star Cast
 25c Until 12.30

RN-BEACON
GYPTIAN
 RICHMOND

D OVER!
L 3 THEATRES)
S M

practical politics, will it now about the composer of concerto we are shortly to let would be good, perhaps, of ideas he has lived in to say, Kensington, Chelsea; his age, the sort of written before, and the he makes at home, and sings or plays, and if so, wise, "young Englishman" deal; we know, then, the asiasms and reticences we granted. The main thing is old be able to hear it well to or three times, before we thing more about him, and best if we could hear it in rely as "a piece of music." est is to know a composer to have seen him take a word or act, upon a point n issue. What is no good or and second hand knowl—tittle-tattle, in fact.

A. H. FOX-STRANGWAYS

from the London Observer

diverse views, Mr. Schnabel began an equally startling statement. He sees a particle of difference piece by Mozart and a Beethoven. What differences covered are differences in the the composers used, and [y] means don't count. Take example. The means which the making of his music are hat with him means don't as a part of his music. And a freshness and a vitality makes us feel that it is today, let alone of the past, is always the music of to-day, means don't count. It is behind that counts.

A great piece of music, every work of art, is a balance between and revolt. Earth, heaven, each must find its place in of a great synthesis. work must transcend every- at is incidental or specialized. the incidental or the specialized and something with which to bal- For the equilibrium of forces maintained. Thus a great tran- film will result. This calm feel opposite of everything that nervousness. Bach, Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert wrote such music, music in which of equilibrium of the va- is unusually high. Handel, hand, seems to me merely in the nineteenth century, of specialization, of things essentially to music, the percentage of within a given work is much materialistic advances of the century were not favorable to art. Nervousness, tension, r.

composers in the nineteenth counter to the downward is no nervousness, no Verdi. His music is in epoch, not materialistic, balanced synthesis of op- The percentage of equilib- high in Berlioz, whose go often from unreason- y. It is high in Brahms, traces of specialization re one might expect more es. Debussy presents a little synthesis of opposites.

itself. It is striving for the pupils? They are the gifted from ons. They know the seriousness. They know that they can their pleasures with their work y give work its just preference. America sends me some of of my pupils. Their talent is arable. They are as well prepared others; but sometimes their out- a bit more naive than that of the others. They themselves excellent poise, an excellent per- quilibrium, in that they have a sense of seriousness which carries nothing that is depressing. It eat combination of qualities, this ation of the young Americans." he five minutes must have elapsed. uctantly but gratefully the inter- surrendered the musician-philoso- his next engagement.

A. H. M.

ert J. Butler, Long a Boston Musician

ert J. Butler, who up to several go had been a member of the Bos- mphony Orchestra for twenty-six having played contra-bass with ganization, died this morning fol- an illness of several years. He was

ans. Georges L. Longy

ord was received yesterday of the th of Gustav Georges Leopold Longy, er know as George Longy, who for years played first oboe in the Boston nphony orchestra, at his farm near erville, Normandy. He was in his 62d his professional musical life began in 6, when he joined the famous noureaux orchestra, and from then his rise was rapid. One after an- er, the Chatelet, the Folies Bergere l the Opera Comique claimed his nt. In 1888, he went to the Colonne soloist, while still a member of the ra Comique.

was as a player in both of these an accident found him and brought to Boston. In a shipwreck, the Bos- Symphony orchestra lost its first st. Maj. Henry L. Higginson, spon- of the orchestra, wired Paris for the oboist available to fill the gap. y was admittedly the best in Paris he was induced to come to Boston. is daughter, Mme. Renee Longy uelle of Philadelphia is a pianist teacher. Mr. Longy had attained reputation of being the supreme ter of the oboe in America.

a love of mankind will be fruitful or not, who can say? The ness of emotion so-called proletarian playing, result a higher level than one else is being well-rounded re- present Russia is ters. Mr. Schn He will discover in whom a large active, penetra there is nothing a condition of a cal Communism.

To return to the viewer began the artist's gre chiefly as a part turned with a art itself has no ton Symphony or to any other idea of giving and propaganda do as the recent B do with one another of ideas had be in common between aristocratic ore "I am reminded Mr. Schnabel w since the begin firming and r There also one firming and r art as a part of p or less in this had given a few aristocratic ma notified by my ma it can never be were glad to hav cratic' plane. I liked my playing, only by the at play in Italy I wo own plane. A up my programs have just lived no less than 50 per wonderfully fir Imagine a pianist you are lifted per cent Italian. thing that seer perhaps a violinist- secondary in t "Similarly, the S phase of it, the use art. Unquesti tra. They are strong talent and as they give t dents which this as this, they are possessed of soever. They ing seriousness. goes much hig eagerness and inte ever can go, t in contact with the When you list ern Europe, they you think of b its lack of somet ica? Would y are far, far behind Paris or B doing many things to hear such utterl dead and la not have felt. Knowing the ma not have been and incorrect uses and hoping to get knowing further M the "classics," one in this direction. These works are not about his attitude nervous, they are not specialized, they sic. The reaction are headed in the direction of univer demand for a de sality. They show less of the personal "What does it me than his previous work. They are free quantity? A time from the impurities of the musically out waiting for an extraneous."

Talking of Schnabel said, out waiting for a velous picture days. He has launched into a I last saw h of musical history in 1914, just artist away (—really the charming host- playing with ess who had to keep Mr. Schnabel's was very fine schedule in mind; still for the purposes Yes, I have eth century is to g ness which the ni of the interview an ogre), announcing to time, four tir ated." Upon that us that we might talk just five minutes statement followe more. "I would like to say more of the war."

Here was a present if there were time," Mr. Schna- information 1650 until about 18 bel continued. The talent of the twen- disclaimed ab has been decline. tieth century is strong, sound, and clear. the social ar must concern itse It is not nervous. It does not believe Soviet Russia decline. The situ in authorities. It must find the best bal- thing colossa hopeful." And in explanation of those

"Any discussion of the means of music brings up the problem of the banal and the trivial. Certain of the airs of Verdi, were the same successions of notes used by other composers in other contexts, would strike one as hopelessly trivial. In the work of Verdi, the air in its proper place as the proper quality against some opposing force, never strikes the ear or the mind as banal. It matters not if it were played by a barrel-organ on a street corner, if the tune were played in its context, triviality could not result. Thus the great and continued popularity of these works in the face of the changes and vicissitudes of time.

"Toward the end of the nineteenth century composers began to feel that the means at their disposal had become exhausted. The same combinations had been used over and over again until originality of utterance seemed almost impossible. Hence they began deliberately to extend the bounds of the materials of the art. And the twentieth century has been so far principally a period of experimentation with the problem of the enlargement of the vocabulary of the art. Latterly, the more serious question of the equilibrium of forces within an art-work has again come to the fore. Schönberg, Hindemith, Stravinsky, Krênek are writing works of genuine power, works in which the percentage of equilibrium of the opposing forces is growing higher and higher.

"Stravinsky began by writing music as a specialist, like most of the nineteenth century composers. I personally never cared much for 'Le Sacre.' His latest works show that he is at work on the fundamental problem of the art-work, that of a well-balanced synthesis. 'Oedipus Rex' and 'Apollon Musagete' go far in this direction. These works are not nervous, they are not specialized, they are headed in the direction of universality. They show less of the personal than his previous work. They are free from the impurities of the musically extraneous."

But while these matters were under discussion an ogre appeared to carry the artist away (—really the charming host- ess who had to keep Mr. Schnabel's schedule in mind; still for the purposes of the interview an ogre), announcing to us that we might talk just five minutes more. "I would like to say more of the present if there were time," Mr. Schnabel continued. The talent of the twentieth century is strong, sound, and clear. It is not nervous. It does not believe in authorities. It must find the best balance. And in explanation of those positive views, Mr. Schnabel began with an equally startling statement. "I don't see a particle of difference between a piece by Mozart and a piece by Beethoven. What differences may be discovered are differences in the means which the composers used, and [emphatically] means don't count. Take Mozart, for example. The means which he uses in the making of his music are so simple that with him means don't count at all as a part of his music. And yet there is a freshness and a vitality there which makes us feel that it is music not of today, let alone of the past, but that it is always the music of tomorrow. No, means don't count. It is what is behind that counts.

"Every great piece of music, every great work of art, is a balance between affirmation and revolt. Earth, heaven and hell, each must find its place in the equilibrium of a great synthesis. The great art work must transcend everything that is incidental or specialized. If it uses the incidental or the specialized it must find something with which to balance it. For the equilibrium of forces must be maintained. Thus a great transcendental calm will result. This calm is the perfect opposite of everything that tends toward nervousness. Bach, Mozart, Haydn, Beethoven, Schubert wrote such transcendental music, music in which the percentage of equilibrium of the various forces is unusually high. Handel, on the other hand, seems to me merely decorative. In the nineteenth century, with its introduction of specialization, with its introduction of things essentially extraneous to music, the percentage of equilibrium within a given work is much lower. The materialistic advances of the nineteenth century were not favorable to advance in art. Nervousness, tension, rather than elemental power too often was the result. The work in itself does not offer the release from the tension which it creates. Wagner, for example, may in some ways be considered roughly analogous to the baroque period in art as compared with the great period which preceded it.

"There are composers in the nineteenth century who go counter to the downward current. There is no nervousness, no specialization in Verdi. His music is independent of his epoch, not materialistic, an excellently balanced synthesis of opposing forces. The percentage of equilibrium is rather high in Berlioz, whose music suffers too often from unreasonable unpopularity. It is high in Brahms, though there are traces of specialization in Brahms, where one might expect more universal qualities. Debussy presents a high degree of specialization and very little synthesis of opposites.

itself. It is striving for the pupils? They are the gifted from ons. They know the seriousness

They know that they can their pleasures with their work y give work its just preference.

America sends me some of of my pupils. Their talent is arable. They are as well prepared others; but sometimes their out- a bit more naive than that of the others. They themselves excellent poise, an excellent per- quilibrium, in that they have a sense of seriousness which carries nothing that is depressing. It eat combination of qualities, this ation of the young Americans." e five minutes must have elapsed. ictantly but gratefully the inter- surrendered the musician-philoso- his next engagement.

A. H. M.

ert J. Butler, Long a Boston Musician

ert J. Butler, who up to several go had been a member of the Bos- nphony Orchestra for twenty-six having played contra-bass with ganization, died this morning fol- an illness of several years. He was

and. Georges L. Longy

Vord was received yesterday of the th of Gustav Georges Leopold Longy, er know as George Longy, who for years played first oboe in the Boston nphony orchestra, at his farm near erville, Normandy. He was in his 62d

his professional musical life began in 6, when he joined the famous noureaux orchestra, and from then his rise was rapid. One after an- er, the Chatelet, the Folies Bergere l the Opera Comique claimed his ent. In 1888, he went to the Colonne soloist, while still a member of the era Comique.

was as a player in both of these an accident found him and brought to Boston. In a shipwreck, the Bos- Symphony orchestra lost its first st. Maj. Henry L. Higginson, spon- of the orchestra, wired Paris for the oboist available to fill the gap. ky was admittedly the best in Paris he was induced to come to Boston. is daughter, Mme. Renee Longy uelle of Philadelphia is a pianist teacher. Mr. Longy had attained reputation of being the supreme ter of the oboe in America.

a love of mankind, a love of emotion, a love of playing, result in well-rounded performers. Mr. Schnabel, in whom a large, active, penetrating condition of artistic Communism.

To return to the viewer began the artist's great turned with a ton Symphony idea of giving as the recent B do with one another of ideas had been aristocratic orchestra. "I am reminded Mr. Schnabel with some emphasis or less in this aristocratic manner it can never be cratic' plane. only by the at own plane. A have just lived wonderfully firm you are lifted thing that seems secondary in the phase of it, the tra. They are, as they give to as this, they are soever. They goes much higher ever can go, the When you list you think of beica? Would you a Paris or B to hear such a not have felt not have been you might have fine and great the things that us into the th Talking of Schnabel said, velous picture days. He has I last saw him in 1914, just playing with was very fine. Yes, I have time, four times war."

Here was a information I disclaimed about the social at Soviet Russia thing colossal will be fruitful or not, who can say? The so-called proletarian a higher level than one else is being present Russia is He will discover there is nothing in a Communist. artistic side of it chiefly as a part art itself has no or to any other and propaganda do with one another in common between. "I am reminded since the beginning There also one firming and re art as a part of p or less in this had given a few notified by my ma were glad to have liked my playing, play in Italy I wo up my programs: no less than 50 per Imagine a pianist per cent Italian. perhaps a violinist- Similarly, the S use art. Unquestion strong talent and dents which this are possessed of ing seriousness. Tvinsky, Kronek are writing works of genuine power, works in which the percentage of equilibrium of the opposing forces is growing higher and higher. "Stravinsky began by writing music as a specialist, like most of the nineteenth century composers. I personally never cared much for 'Le Sacre.' His latest works show that he is at work on the fundamental problem of the art-work, and incorrect uses and hoping to get knowing further Mus Rex' and 'Apollon Musagete' go far in this direction. These works are not nervous, they are not specialized, they are headed in the direction of universality. They show less of the personal demand for a de "What does it mean than his previous work. They are free quantity? A time from the impurities of the musically out waiting for an extraneous."

Knowing the ma and incorrect uses and hoping to get knowing further Mus Rex' and 'Apollon Musagete' go far in this direction. These works are not nervous, they are not specialized, they are headed in the direction of universality. They show less of the personal demand for a de "What does it mean than his previous work. They are free quantity? A time from the impurities of the musically out waiting for an extraneous."

But while these matters were under discussion an ogre appeared to carry the of musical history artist away (—really the charming host- "If you mean ess who had to keep Mr. Schnabel's schedule in mind; still for the purposes eth century is to g of the interview an ogre), announcing to ness which the ni of the interview just five minutes ated." Upon that us that we might talk just five minutes more. "I would like to say more of the statement followed present if there were time," Mr. Schna- "Music grew and 1650 until about 18 bel continued. The talent of the twen- has been decline. tieth century is strong, sound, and clear. must concern itself It is not nervous. It does not believe decline. The situ in authorities. It must find the best bal- hopeful." And in explanation of those

Any discussion of the means of music brings up the problem of the banal and the trivial. Certain of the airs of Verdi, were the same successions of notes used by other composers in other contexts, would strike one as hopelessly trivial. In the work of Verdi, the air in its proper place as the proper quality against some opposing force, never strikes the ear or the mind as banal. It matters not if it were played by a barrel-organ on a street corner, if the tune were played in its context, triviality could not result. Thus the great and continued popularity of these works in the face of the changes and vicissitudes of time.

Toward the end of the nineteenth century composers began to feel that the means at their disposal had become exhausted. The same combinations had been used over and over again until originality of utterance seemed almost impossible. Hence they began deliberately to extend the bounds of the materials of the art. And the twentieth century has been so far principally a period of experimentation with the problem of the enlargement of the vocabulary of the art. Latterly, the more serious question of the equilibrium of forces within an art-work has again come to the fore. Schönberg, Hindemith, Stravinsky, Kronek are writing works of genuine power, works in which the percentage of equilibrium of the opposing forces is growing higher and higher.

Stravinsky began by writing music as a specialist, like most of the nineteenth century composers. I personally never cared much for 'Le Sacre.' His latest works show that he is at work on the fundamental problem of the art-work, and incorrect uses and hoping to get knowing further Mus Rex' and 'Apollon Musagete' go far in this direction. These works are not nervous, they are not specialized, they are headed in the direction of universality. They show less of the personal demand for a de "What does it mean than his previous work. They are free quantity? A time from the impurities of the musically out waiting for an extraneous."

But while these matters were under discussion an ogre appeared to carry the of musical history artist away (—really the charming host- "If you mean ess who had to keep Mr. Schnabel's schedule in mind; still for the purposes eth century is to g of the interview an ogre), announcing to ness which the ni of the interview just five minutes ated." Upon that us that we might talk just five minutes more. "I would like to say more of the statement followed present if there were time," Mr. Schna- "Music grew and 1650 until about 18 bel continued. The talent of the twen- has been decline. tieth century is strong, sound, and clear. must concern itself It is not nervous. It does not believe decline. The situ in authorities. It must find the best bal- hopeful." And in explanation of those positive views, Mr with an equally "I don't see a pa between a piece piece by Beethoven. may be discovered a means which the c [emphatically] near Mozart, for example he uses in the mak so simple that wit count at all as a par yet there is a fres there which makes music not of today, but that it is alwa tomorrow. No, mean what is behind the

Every great pic great work of art, affirmation and re and hell, each mu the equilibrium of The great art work thing that is incl If it uses the incide it must find something else. For the must be maintained scendental calm w is the perfect oppos tends toward nervo: Haydn, Beethoven, transcendental mu the percentage of rious forces is un on the other hand, decorative. In the with its introduct with its introduct extraneous to mus equilibrium within lower. The materi nineteenth century advance in art. rather than elemen was the result. Th not offer the relea which it creates. may in some ways analogous to the b as compared with t preceded it.

There are comp century who go co current. There is specialization in V dependent of his el an excellently bal posing forces. The rium is rather hi music suffers too able unpopularity. though there are in Brahms, where universal qualities high degree of st little synthesis of ance for itself. It is striving for the absolute.

"My pupils? They are the gifted from all nations. They know the seriousness of work. They know that they can not mix their pleasures with their work and they give work its just preference. America? America sends me some of the best of my pupils. Their talent is incomparable. They are as well prepared as any others; but sometimes their outlook is a bit more naive than that of some of the others. They themselves have excellent poise, an excellent personal equilibrium, in that they have a strong sense of seriousness which carries with it nothing that is depressing. It is a great combination of qualities, this combination of the young Americans."

But the five minutes must have elapsed, and reluctantly but gratefully the interviewer surrendered the musician-philosopher to his next engagement.

A. H. M.

Herbert J. Butler, Long a Boston Musician

Herbert J. Butler, who up to several years ago had been a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for twenty-six years, having played contra-bass with this organization, died this morning following an illness of several years. He was in his 62d year.

Word was received yesterday of the death of Gustav Georges Leopold Longy, better known as George Longy, who for 16 years played first oboe in the Boston Symphony orchestra, at his farm near Abbeville, Normandy. He was in his 62d year.

His professional musical life began in 1886, when he joined the famous Lamoureux orchestra, and from then on his rise was rapid. One after another, the Chatelet, the Folies Bergere and the Opera Comique claimed his talent. In 1888, he went to the Colonne as soloist, while still a member of the Opera Comique.

It was as a player in both of these that an accident found him and brought him to Boston. In a shipwreck, the Boston Symphony orchestra lost its first oboist. Maj. Henry L. Higginson, sponsor of the orchestra, wired Paris for the best oboist available to fill the gap. Longy was admittedly the best in Paris and he was induced to come to Boston.

His daughter, Mme. Renee Longy Miquelle of Philadelphia is a pianist and teacher. Mr. Longy had attained the reputation of being the supreme master of the oboe in America.

a love of mankind, a love of emotion, playing, result well-rounded results. Mr. Schnabel, in whom a large, active, penetrating condition of a viewer began the artist's great turned with a ton Symphony idea of giving as the recent B of ideas had been aristocratic orchestra Mr. Schnabel with some emphasis or less in this aristocratic manner it can never be cratic' plane. only by the artist's own plane. A have just lived wonderfully fine you are lifted thing that seems secondary in the phase of it, the orchestra. They are as they give to as this, they are soever. They goes much higher ever can go, then. When you listen you think of Berlin? Would you in Paris or Boston to hear such a not have felt not have been you might have fine and great the things that us into the thing.

To return to the viewer began the artist's great turned with a ton Symphony idea of giving as the recent B of ideas had been aristocratic orchestra Mr. Schnabel with some emphasis or less in this aristocratic manner it can never be cratic' plane. only by the artist's own plane. A have just lived wonderfully fine you are lifted thing that seems secondary in the phase of it, the orchestra. They are as they give to as this, they are soever. They goes much higher ever can go, then. When you listen you think of Berlin? Would you in Paris or Boston to hear such a not have felt not have been you might have fine and great the things that us into the thing.

Talking of Schnabel said, velous picture days. He has I last saw him in 1914, just playing with was very fine. Yes, I have time, four times war."

Here was a information I disclaimed about the social and Soviet Russia thing colossal

will be fruitful or not, who can say? The so-called proletarian a higher level than one else is being present Russia is. He will discover there is nothing in ical Communism. concerned with the artistic side of music chiefly as a part art itself has no or to any other and propaganda do with one another in common between aristocratic orchestra

"I am reminded since the beginning. There also one fine art as a part of perhaps a few notified by my mother were glad to have liked my playing, play in Italy I would up my programs no less than 50 per cent Italian. Imagine a pianist perhaps a violinist-Secondary in the phase of it, the orchestra. They are as they give to as this, they are soever. They goes much higher ever can go, then. When you listen you think of Berlin? Would you in Paris or Boston to hear such a not have felt not have been you might have fine and great the things that us into the thing.

"Similarly, the use art. Unquestionably strong talent and dents which this are possessed of a ing seriousness, eagerness and intense in contact with the ern Europe, they its lack of something are far, far behind doing many things utterly dead and la

Knowing the material and incorrect uses and hoping to get knowing further about the "classics," one about his attitude sic. The reaction demand for a de

"What does it mean quantity? A time out waiting for a launched into a of musical history

"If you mean, I will say that the century is to get eth century is to get ness which the ni ated." Upon that statement followed

"Music grew and 1650 until about 18 bel continued. The talent of the twentieth century has been decline. It must concern itself decline. The situation, in authorities. It must find the best bal- hopeful." And in explanation of those

Any discussion of the means of music brings up the problem of the banal and the trivial. Certain of the airs of Verdi, were the same successions of notes used by other composers in other contexts, would strike one as hopelessly trivial. In the work of Verdi, the air in its proper place as the proper quality against some opposing force, never strikes the ear or the mind as banal. It matters not if it were played by a barrel-organ on a street corner, if the tune were played in its context, triviality could not result. Thus the great and continued popularity of these works in the face of the changes and vicissitudes of time.

"Toward the end of the nineteenth century composers began to feel that the means at their disposal had become exhausted. The same combinations had been used over and over again until originality of utterance seemed almost impossible. Hence they began deliberately to extend the bounds of the materials of the art. And the twentieth century has been so far principally a period of experimentation with the problem of the enlargement of the vocabulary of the art. Latterly, the more serious question of the equilibrium of forces within an art-work has again come to the fore. Schönberg, Hindemith, Stravinsky, Kronek are writing works of genuine power, works in which the percentage of equilibrium of the opposing forces is growing higher and higher.

"Stravinsky began by writing music as a specialist, like most of the nineteenth century composers. I personally never cared much for 'Le Sacre.' His latest works show that he is at work on the fundamental problem of the art-work, that of a well-balanced synthesis. 'Oedipus Rex' and 'Apollon Musagete' go far in this direction. These works are not nervous, they are not specialized, they are headed in the direction of universality. They show less of the personal than his previous work. They are free from the impurities of the musically extraneous."

But while these matters were under discussion an ogre appeared to carry the artist away (—really the charming host-ess who had to keep Mr. Schnabel's schedule in mind; still for the purposes of the interview an ogre), announcing to us that we might talk just five minutes more. "I would like to say more of the present if there were time," Mr. Schnabel continued. The talent of the twentieth century is strong, sound, and clear. It is not nervous. It does not believe in authorities. It must find the best bal- hopeful." And in explanation of those positive views, Mr. with an equally "I don't see a piece between a piece piece by Beethoven, may be discovered a means which the c [emphatically] near Mozart, for example he uses in the making so simple that without count at all as a part yet there is a fresh there which makes music not of today, but that it is always tomorrow. No, mean what is behind the

"Every great piece great work of art, affirmation and revolution and hell, each maintaining the equilibrium of The great art work thing that is incident it uses the incident it must find something else. For the must be maintained transcendental calm is the perfect opposite tends toward nervous Haydn, Beethoven, transcendental music the percentage of c rious forces is un on the other hand, decorative. In the with its introduction with its introduction extraneous to music equilibrium within lower. The material nineteenth century advance in art. rather than elements was the result. The not after the release which it creates. may in some ways analogous to the as compared with preceded it.

"There are composers century who go current. There is specialization in V dependent of his er an excellently balanced posing force. The rium is rather hi music suffers too able unpopularity, though there are in Brahms, where universal qualities high degree of s little synthesis of ance for itself. It is striving for the absolute.

"My pupils? They are the gifted from all nations. They know the seriousness of work. They know that they can not mix their pleasures with their work and they give work its just preference. America? America sends me some of the best of my pupils. Their talent is incomparable. They are as well prepared as any others; but sometimes their outlook is a bit more naive than that of some of the others. They themselves have excellent poise, an excellent personal equilibrium, in that they have a strong sense of seriousness which carries with it nothing that is depressing. It is a great combination of qualities, this combination of the young Americans."

But the five minutes must have elapsed, and reluctantly but gratefully the interviewer surrendered the musician-philosopher to his next engagement.

A. H. M.

Herbert J. Butler, Long a Boston Musician

Herbert J. Butler, who up to several years ago had been a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for twenty-six years, having played contra-bass with this organization, died this morning following an illness of several years. He was in his eighty-sixth year.

He was born in Ashford, Conn., and was the son of Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Butler. He studied music for three years in Leipzig, and on his return to this country devoted the rest of his life to professional work. He saw service in the Civil War and was a member of the American Federation of Music, the Army and Navy Club and the Odd Fellows.

He is survived by his wife, who was Lot- ington, in which city Mr. Butler once resided. His home for many years had been at 2 Westland avenue. Since withdrawing from the Symphony Orchestra Mr. Butler had played at a Boston hotel until his last illness.

a love of mankind, playing, result well-rounded re- tters. Mr. Schn in whom a large active, penetra a condition of a

To return to viewer began the artist's gre turned with a ton Symphony idea of giving as the recent B of ideas had be aristocratic or Mr. Schnabel w firming and r with some emp or less in this aristocratic ma it can never be cratic' plane. only by the at own plane. A have just lived wonderfully fir Imagine a pianist you are lifted per thing that seem secondary in t phase of it, the tra. They are as they give t as this, they a soever. They goes much hie ever can go, t When you list you think of bica? Would y in Paris or B to hear such a not have felt not have been you might hav fine and great the things th us into the th

Talking of Schnabel said, velous picture days. He has I last saw h in 1914, just playing with was very fine. Yes, I have time, four tir war."

Here was a information I disclaimed ab the social at Soviet Russia thing colossal

will be fruitful or not, who can say? The so-called proletari a higher level t one else is being present Russia is He will discover there is nothing i leal Communism cerned with the artistic side of il chiefly as a part art itself has no or to any other and propaganda d do with one anot in common betw "I am reminded since the beginn There also one fir art as a part of p had given a few notified by my ma were glad to hav liked my playing, play in Italy I wo up my programs no less than 50 per Imagine a pianist per cent Italian. perhaps a violinist- Similarly, the S use art. Unquesti tra. They are strong talent and dents which this r are possessed of a ing seriousness. T eagerness and inte in contact with th ern Europe, they its lack of sometl are far, far behind doing many things utterly dead and la Knowing the ma and incorrect uses and hoping to get knowing further M the "classics," one about his attitude sic. The reaction demand for a de "What does it me quantity? A time c out waiting for ar launched into a j of musical history artist away (—really the charming host- "If you mean c will say that the ess who had to keep Mr. Schnabel's eth century is to g schedule in mind; still for the purposes ness which the ni of the interview an ogre), announcing to "Upon that us that we might talk just five minutes statement followed more. "I would like to say more of the present if there were time," Mr. Schna- "Music grew and 1650 until about 18 bel continued. The talent of the twen- has been decline. 19th century is strong, sound, and clear. It is not nervous. It does not believe decline. The situ in authorities. It must find the best bal- hopeful." And in explanation of those

Any discussion of the means of music brings up the problem of the banal and the trivial. Certain of the airs of Verdi, were the same successions of notes used by other composers in other contexts, would strike one as hopelessly trivial. In the work of Verdi, the air in its proper place as the proper quality against some opposing force, never strikes the ear or the mind as banal. It matters not if it were played by a barrel-organ on a street corner, if the tune were played in its context, triviality could not result. Thus the great and continued popularity of these works in the face of the changes and vicissitudes of time.

"Toward the end of the nineteenth century composers began to feel that the means at their disposal had become exhausted. The same combinations had been used over and over again until originality of utterance seemed almost impossible. Hence they began deliberately to extend the bounds of the materials of the art. And the twentieth century has been so far principally a period of experimentation with the problem of the enlargement of the vocabulary of the art. Latterly, the more serious question of the equilibrium of forces within an art-work has again come to the fore. Schönberg, Hindemith, Stravinsky, Krënek are writing works of genuine power, works in which the percentage of equilibrium of the opposing forces is growing higher and higher.

"Stravinsky began by writing music as a specialist, like most of the nineteenth century composers. I personally never cared much for 'Le Sacre.' His latest works show that he is at work on the fundamental problem of the art-work, that of a well-balanced synthesis. 'Oedipus Rex' and 'Apollon Musagete' go far in this direction. These works are not nervous, they are not specialized, they are headed in the direction of universality. They show less of the personal than his previous work. They are free from the impurities of the musically extraneous."

But while these matters were under discussion an ogre appeared to carry the artist away (—really the charming host-ess who had to keep Mr. Schnabel's schedule in mind; still for the purposes of the interview an ogre), announcing to us that we might talk just five minutes more. "I would like to say more of the present if there were time," Mr. Schnabel continued. The talent of the twentieth century is strong, sound, and clear. It is not nervous. It does not believe in authorities. It must find the best balance for itself. It is striving for the absolute.

positive views, Mr with an equally "I don't see a pa between a piece piece by Beethoven, may be discovered a means which the c [emphatically] near Mozart, for example he uses in the mak so simple that wit count at all as a par yet there is a fresh there which makes music not of today, but that it is alwa tomorrow. No, mean what is behind the

"Every great pie great work of art, affirmation and rev and hell, each mu the equilibrium of The great art work taling that is incle If it uses the incide it must find somethi ance it. For the must be maintained scendental calm w is the perfect oppos tends toward nervoi Haydn, Beethoven, transcendental mu the percentage of rious forces is un on the other hand, decorative. In the with its introduct with its introduction extraneous to mus equilibrium within lower. The material nineteenth century advance in art. rather than elem was the result. Th not after the relea which it creates. may in some ways analogous to the b as compared with t preceded it.

"There are comp century who go cot current. There is specialization in V dependent of his e an excellently bal posing forces. The rium is rather hi music suffers too able unpopularity, though there are in Brahms, where universal qualities high degree of s little synthesis of ance for itself. It is striving for the absolute.

"My pupils? They are the gifted from all nations. They know the seriousness of work. They know that they can not mix their pleasures with their work and they give work its just preference. America? America sends me some of the best of my pupils. Their talent is incomparable. They are as well prepared as any others; but sometimes their outlook is a bit more naive than that of some of the others. They themselves have excellent poise, an excellent personal equilibrium, in that they have a strong sense of seriousness which carries with it nothing that is depressing. It is a great combination of qualities, this combination of the young Americans."

But the five minutes must have elapsed, and reluctantly but gratefully the interviewer surrendered the musician-philosopher to his next engagement.

A. H. M.

Herbert J. Butler, Long a Boston Musician

Herbert J. Butler, who up to several years ago had been a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for twenty-six years, having played contra-bass with this organization, died this morning following an illness of several years. He was in his 62d year.

Word was received yesterday of the death of Gustav Georges Leopold Longy, better known as George Longy, who for 16 years played first oboe in the Boston Symphony orchestra, at his farm near Abbeville, Normandy. He was in his 62d year.

His professional musical life began in 1886, when he joined the famous Lamoureux orchestra, and from then on his rise was rapid. One after another, the Chatelet, the Folies Bergere and the Opera Comique claimed his talent. In 1888, he went to the Colonie as soloist, while still a member of the Opera Comique.

It was as a player in both of these that an accident found him and brought him to Boston. In a shipwreck, the Boston Symphony orchestra lost its first oboist, Maj. Henry L. Higginson, sponsor of the orchestra, wired Paris for the best oboist available to fill the gap. Longy was admittedly the best in Paris and he was induced to come to Boston. His daughter, Mme. Renee Longy Miquelle of Philadelphia is a pianist and teacher. Mr. Longy had attained the reputation of being the supreme master of the oboe in America.

In His Prime

Georges Longy

First Oboe of the Symphony Orchestra, 1909-1925

Twenty-second Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, APRIL 18, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, APRIL 19, at 8.15 o'clock

Stravinsky "Apollon Musagète," Ballet

Scene I. Birth of Apollo.

Scene II. Variation of Apollo (Apollo and the Muses)—Variation of Polymnia—Variation of Terpsichore—Variation of Apollo—Apollo and Terpsichore—Coda (Apollo and the Muses)—Apotheosis.

Gardner "Broadway"
(Conducted by the Composer)
(First performance)

Saint Saëns Symphony in C minor No. 3, Op. 78

I. Adagio; Allegro moderato; poco adagio.

II. Allegro moderato; Presto; Maestoso; Allegro.

Organ: ALBERT SNOW

STEINWAY PIANO USED

There will be an intermission before the symphony

In His Prime

Georges Longy

First Oboe of the Symphony Orchestra, 1909-1925

FORTY-NINTH SEASON, NINETEEN HUNDRED TWENTY-NINE AND THIRTY

Twenty-second Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, APRIL 18, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, APRIL 19, at 8.15 o'clock

Stravinsky "Apollon Musagète," Ballet

Scene I. Birth of Apollo.

Scene II. Variation of Apollo (Apollo and the Muses)—Variation of Polymnia—Variation of Terpsichore—Variation of Apollo—Apollo and Terpsichore—Coda (Apollo and the Muses)—Apotheosis.

Gardner "Broadway"

(Conducted by the Composer)

(First performance)

Saint Saëns Symphony in C minor No. 3, Op. 78

I. Adagio; Allegro moderato; poco adagio.

II. Allegro moderato; Presto; Maestoso; Allegro.

Organ: ALBERT SNOW

STEINWAY PIANO USED

There will be an intermission before the symphony

Saint-Saëns

Symphony Concert

By PHILIP HALE

The 22d concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program comprised Stravinsky's ballet, "Apollo, Leader of the Muses"; Samuel Gardner's "Broadway" (first performance, conducted by the composer); Saint-Saëns's Symphony C minor, No. 3 op. 78 (with organ).

"Broadway" was composed in 1924. There is no sub-title to the work; no argument; no explanatory note about the character of the music. Mr. Gardner, a sensible and modest man, wrote to us that he does not like to talk about his music before it is performed. "My piece is not built on my program, but comes out of the emotions; emotions are purely personal affairs and are not good to discuss publicly. Then, again, a piece can mean a different thing to each individual. I would always say, let's hear it first."

In this instance "Broadway" may picture the street, express the spirit of its life, or even the spirit of New York (Harlem included and indeed, prominent). It is not the street that William Horace Lingard had in mind when he sang "Walking Down Broadway"; not the Broadway in the shadows of which N. P. Willis met the outcast woman that inspired his sentimental verses; not the Broadway on which Vance Thompson walked with the ghost of Edgar Allan Poe; nor Walt Whitman's Broadway of the Pageant: the poem suggested by the envoys from Nippon: "Courteous, the swart-cheek'd two-sworded envoys, Leaning back in their open barouches, bare-headed, impassive"; in whose honor "million-footed Manhattan serpent descends to her pavements." The Broadway of the roaring forties, the Great White Way so graphically described by Paul Morand, the spectacular, crashing, stimulating, distracting street, this seems to be the source of Mr. Gardner's inspiration, or he may look on Broadway as the symbol of America's jazz decade.

His music is panoramic, with a constant return to the most vivid of the pictures; yet it cannot be called wholly exterior music, for it has personal intensity. There is at times a flamboyancy about it indispensable to the subject; one might say there is also the expression of the civic boastfulness, the craze for amusement, the turning of night into day, the contempt for quiet methods of business; the apotheosis of materialism. There is at times thematically and harmonically welcome strains of sensuousness, and just before the final reckless outburst—which in spite of its fury is the least effective portion of the work, for there has been a too long succession of climaxes without satisfactory relief—there are strangely fascinating measures, as though the revelling were at an end; the street now peaceful, thoughtful, brooding. With these measures the symphonic poem—the musical panorama—what you will—should have closed. The final and commonplace din destroyed what would have been a poetic, haunting ending.

It is a pleasure to note that Mr. Gardner's jazz is not sandpapered and polished. Jazz does not allow sophistication. It should suggest the Congo; not the Conservatory. The work would gain by condensation; there is too little of the element of surprise; too few strongly contrasting sections; yet the composer might answer, if they were present, the music would not be Broadway, the mad street of the tumultuous city.

In recent years the amazing Stravinsky has attempted, not with great success, to go back to Bach; more fortunate in his return to Handel as in "Oedipus," still later favoring Tchaikovsky; and in "Apollo" having in mind the French ballets of the 18th century. It is not necessary to say that this music of "Apollo" would make a deeper impression if it accompanied the mimes and dancers. Stravinsky did not wish to make a "deep" impression. If he had wished it, he would have been false to the tradition he would follow. Furthermore, seeing a performance of dancers, one often forgets to hear the music. The sections are all interesting; some of the pages have genuine beauty in an uncommon form.

Of course the sonority of Saint-Saëns's Finale, with the vociferous brass instruments, the frenzied strings, the wood-wind doing its utmost to have its say—all working in the "Hooray-boys" spirit excited thunderous applause; but there were many features of the performance before the Finale that deserved warm, if less demonstrative appreciation. The orchestra and the organ were in just proportion, which is not always the case; there were niceties in detail that would have satisfied even the not too easily pleased composer. He probably would have suggested that the long cantilena for the violins with organ accompaniment should have been taken at a little quicker pace. The long melodic line otherwise narrowly escapes sagging.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is as follows: Dukelsky, Symphony No. 2, D flat major (first performance). Chadwick, Sinfonietta in D major. Scriabin, Symphony No. 3 "The Divine Poem."

NEW TONE POEM AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

First Performance of Gardner's "Broadway"

Saint-Saens' Organ Symphony and Stravinsky's "Apollo" on Program

The novelty on yesterday's Symphony concert program was a tone poem by Samuel Gardner, entitled "Broadway," which the composer conducted brilliantly. It won and deserved applause markedly more cordial than is given to most new music by Boston Symphony subscribers. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted Stravinsky's "Apollo, Leader of the Muses," first performed here in 1928, and Saint-Saens' Organ Symphony.

Mr Gardner, born in Russia in 1893, was brought as a child of six to Providence. He studied violin and composition in Boston and in New York, where he now resides. Well known as a concert violinist, he has also written several prize winning compositions.

"Broadway," composed in 1924, and, according to the program book, performed yesterday for the first time, is not, according to Mr Gardner, "built on any program." "My piece," he writes, "comes out of the emotions; emotions are purely personal affairs, and are not good to discuss publicly. Then again, a piece can mean a different thing to each individual." The title is the only clue vouchsafed as to what Mr Gardner had in mind. But many listeners no doubt amused themselves by choosing subtitles to characterize the various episodes.

One wondered why so striking and individual a piece as "Broadway" should have had to wait six years for its first performance. Was it, as some American musicians would allege, because the conductors of our leading orchestras are less kindly disposed to the work of American composers than they are to the compositions of Europeans?

Or was it merely because Mr Gardner demanded an unusually large orchestra, including, for instance, five trumpets, three alto saxophones, banjo, and a great array of percussion instruments?

Or was it because neither the composer nor anyone else was prepared to meet the considerable expense of copying the parts of a work still in manuscript? Some benefactor ought to provide a fund which should save American composers from paying for this costly copying out of their own pockets.

Mr Gardner in "Broadway" uses the rhythms and the tone color of American popular music with notable success. He comes as near as anyone has yet done to solving the problem of writing symphonic jazz. His score avoids the excessive polyphony of Carpenter and Copland, wisely shuns the overrefinement of Ravel and Stravinsky, and seldom lapses into the banality of the ordinary jazz piece.

Mr Gardner has kept the rhythmic vitality and not a little of the brilliant sonorities that fascinate so many serious musicians when they listen to well-played jazz. Of all the countless attempts at "highbrow jazz" made in the past decade only Gershwin's celebrated "Rhapsody in Blue," and the unjustly neglected "Clowns" of Charles Martin Loeffler, written for Leo Reisman, seem comparable in merit to "Broadway."

"Broadway" is not slavishly imitative of jazz. In its most effective episode, for instance, the organ is the chief, almost the only instrument used. Mr Gardner has assimilated the musical idiom of the present century; and blended its component elements; of which, even in America, jazz is only one, into a personal and authoritative style. He had something deeply felt and vividly imagined to say, and he has said it with a good deal of eloquence. The only real fault with "Broadway" is that it is too long, and too episodic. If the piece were condensed, the remarkably impressive final climax would gain in power.

There is no need to comment at length on Saint-Saens' grandiose symphony, theatrical music in the bad sense of the term, and yesterday played overemphatically. Stravinsky's "Apollo" still seemed relatively sterile, compared to his "Oedipus," or to the piano concerto, the works most like it in style. But one noticed at a second hearing more than before how very subtly it is written, despite its apparent simplicity.

P. R.

LIGHTER MUSIC BY SYMPHONY

Gardner's "Broadway"
Played for First Time

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

For the Symphony Concerts of yesterday afternoon and this evening Dr. Koussevitzky prepared what he is unofficially said to have described as an Easter programme, in which the festive, rather than the more solemn, aspects of the season were suggested. The cynic might have called it a programme of music for the unmusical.

But, in any event, the audience of yesterday, in which were to be seen many unfamiliar faces, from first to last enjoyed it greatly.

ONE FIRST PERFORMANCE

There are but three pieces on this list of Stravinsky's ballet, "Apollo, Leader of the Muses," for string orchestra; Samuel Gardner's "Broadway," in its first performance anywhere and conducted by the composer; and Saint-Saens' Symphony in C minor, for orchestra with organ.

When Stravinsky's "Apollon Musagete" was first played here in the autumn of 1928 the music intrigued by reason of its utter unlikeness to any then known product of its author. But it hardly gains on renewed acquaintance. Its blandness, its innocuous melodiousness, suggestive in turn of the formal pomps of Lully, the saccharinities of Bellini, the graces of Chaminade and the showy brilliance of Delibes, become when the music is heard for a third time a trifle wearisome.

Gardner's "Broadway"

Although Mr. Gardner's "Broadway" has no published programme its purport and message seem definite enough. Quite obviously this young Russian-born but thoroughly Americanized composer would depict in this, the first of his orchestral pieces to be heard in Boston, not only the glitter and lure of the bright lights, the hurly-burly of Times square and the music of the American people at play; he would also hint at the undercurrent of sadness, of nostalgia even the tragedy that may underlie the feverish gaiety of a modern metropolis.

The scheme, if a bit unsubtle, is not without its potentialities for effective musical treatment, but Mr. Gardner, it would seem, has not as yet the musical resourcefulness to bring it to wholly successful and convincing fruition. The note of sadness; the hint of tragedy, he does achieve in measure. But his jazz, which by right should have been either super-jazz or jazz fantastically parodied, proved for the most part to be merely ordinary jazz, no better and no worse than most of that which comes over the radio or enlivens our lighter lyric theatres and dance halls. And there is too much of it. Mr. Gardner has written for the most part a sort of jazz fantasia for full orchestra. Yet it is easy to believe that he had in mind something more distinctive.

The Organ Symphony

With searching analysis Mr. Edward Burlingame Hill has called Saint-Saens "a baffling, and even a pathetic, figure, in view of the absence of that conviction in utterance which produces a true classicist, and in the incommensurability of his rare technical resources and their expressive result." And nowhere does he appear in this light so clearly as in this symphony of yesterday. But for all its cold precision, its hollow artificiality, this symphony is still effective, in the conventional sense, through most of its course.

The not-too-exacting listener will still enjoy the suave, quasi-religious Adagio, still respond to the ad captandum close with its shrilling trumpets, its cumulative sonorities of orchestra and organ.

Stravinsky, Saint-Saens, New American

Samuel Gardner's "Broadway"
For Notable Piece at
Symphony Hall

SUCH philosophers as frequent the Symphony Concerts might have observed last Saturday—unless, like many a subscriber, they were on week-end in the country—the working of the law of compensation. . . . The first number on the program was Stravinsky's ballet, "Apollo Musagetes," played as concert-piece for string orchestra. Since it is plotless and nearly actionless, it loses little by transfer from theater to concert-hall. The listener is not distracted by the sight of a painted tree, hollow and far-spreading, whence Apollo is born; nor may he observe the god mounting toward the summit of Olympus in a chariot likewise of paint upon canvas. Without too much regret he may even forego dissolving views of Apollo and the three attendant Muses engaged in variations (as the old vocabulary of the dance named them) sometimes a trifle overtaxing by reason of crossed rhythms. If he thus fails to see "Apollo" as mythological ballet—they were once written for the court at Versailles—he may listen the more closely to a music in which Stravinsky is again trying all the styles that occur to him as suitable for his purpose.

Back to Lully in some of the rhythms, since it was Lully who bestowed the mythological ballet upon his august master, Louis XIV. Back to Bach once more—as it seems in the solo-measures for violin that begin Scene Two. Back to Bellini (as some say) in the smoothness and sweetness of many a melody. Back certainly to Delibes in the phrasing and the accent of the dances. Perish the thought that any sudden jet of rhythm or any swift breaking of the flow should disturb unruffled flow. Here

$136,797.16 who of pur-of the low but the strings;
0 represent new and strange ents in poli the most part, to the retire paint in monothe uniform tony by subtle for food aduated volume.
spitals and lar pastiche into increase in t pression. Every wing the co d and charmed, approximate oussevitzky and ks in the pa od form as they ns of the Pu connoisseurs are ly for replac ut this, that, and ks purchas keln, marvelling lent to prop iskan ingenuities y from the com-
"Le Sacre" and who woos his ear

enes and the program, the ng at all ny of Saint-Saens amiable plo other orchestra a title whic firmly embedded ome such sol ys, in Paris itself be intereste e Colonne and the Beacon an ear it. (And at the strang ous Saint-Saens t might be who fancied the ld drama, b n the composer's as to do wit eloquently than young, fas was its foster-y the larg ll. Mr. Monteu r grandfath e; while Dr. Kousitations to icently assiduous efore she ca days Saint-Saens ust not drin om the shelf on ics nor weel generation has as for a peric him, better this he must tak the threadbare affairs. Ye all too neat con-how the lov all no mean craftsman os Llo's too much—and leacon—ima too much—and g in a sloving sonorities to ner until tted or over-laden at the lasties to be gran
the big su Lisztian-fashion.
rther, East Nor for most—and everyor both Friday and y and floweradays. And once a picture. ersuades himself
G. F. W. Early or late in e no routine.

Chain

heater

e and the beautire was room he Gardner's long he piece caught he sat as judge merican composwon the prize.
dway" in mind:
nd, found place

for it. Mr. Toscanini may cleave to his Italians; Mr. Stokowski sort out his Russians; but for Dr. Koussevitzky, there are Americans, even young Americans, also deserving opportunity. This time, and reasonably, he entrusted performance to the composer. The orchestra worked for Mr. Gardner as well as applauded him. Seemingly, he made "Broadway" sound as he had imagined, felt and written. The audience of neither Friday nor Saturday heard it unimpressed. There was the ring of interest, pleasure and excitement in the recalls.

Possibly—to light first upon short-comings—Mr. Gardner, being full of his matter, has overwritten it. Broadway may indeed be a street—mid-town and northward—of tumultuous jazz. But hardly, for the purposes of musical composition, of jazz and tumult so persistent and pervasive. Agreed that it is as rich-flavored, high-rhythmed, symphonic jazz as one may hear in a year of concert-going. Yet too much gives the piece a vehement monotony beyond even the prevalence of that quality along Broadway. Furthermore: Mr. Gardner scores this jazz for a super-orchestra—wood-winds in threes or fours, six horns, three saxophones, banjo, a variegated and busy percussion corner. Symphonic jazz must surely be sonorous; but it must also be sufficiently open for the hearer to catch the "quips and quirks and wanton wiles" with which separate instruments and separate choirs savor and diversify it. Oftener than need be Mr. Gardner's writing is so full-mouthed and in such turmoil that for the quickest ear (unless it be the composer-conductor's) there are no details, no arabesques—only large, on-rushing sonorities.

Yet in contrasts, as it seemed to one and another hearer, lay the emotional and the imaginative virtue of Mr. Gardner's musical design. Throughout "Broadway" he would set up a background, infuse an atmosphere, of jazz. Therewith he characters street and scene. Within this atmosphere, against this background, he would also suggest, even enact—so far as tones may do that office—an individual fate. There are waltz-like measures, half-sensuous, playful, intoxicating, as of one who savors and enjoys a new-found environment. There are measures, again, as of one who draws from it restless stimulus and will to do. There are measures, finally, of something stilled and spent and crushed—maybe of the spirit that had toyed with this flaunting world, believed itself kindled and master, only to be drained, stripped and tossed aside. And again, in the last measures of all, the jazz-like swells and clangs—iterum iter-

as it was in the beginning, so
the end. . . .

speculation is as good as another. is no program, Mr. Gardner avers; could he sketch any emotional. But emotional content there is, akable if undefined. Mr. Gardner manipulate tonal masses effectively ritedly. He knows the resources orchestra; plies them vigorously. alive to vivid rhythms; fertile in ic device. Sufficient for his e are the motifs whence his music. Better than most he writes sym-jazz, and makes it not too sym- Above most young Americans he "Broadway" forward with un- creative will. Readily enough all ets the ear—background, surface, and means to Mr. Gardner's half-half-implied tragedy. Call it d his environment. Out of that the romantic composers made onies and tone-poems and music- Out of it, in his turn, Mr. Gard- tes a jazzy piece. To every time— very setting—its own musical for an unending struggle. No Mr. Gardner is right. There is no explanation. H. T. P.

Koussevitzky Balancing Moods

evening the Boston Symphony Or-played its eighth concert of the dgo series in Sanders Theater. The n comprised just three numbers—
ven's Pastoral Symphony, Stravin-ballet, "Apollon Musagete," the and "Love-Death" out of Wagpera, "Tristan and Isolde." One
ed chiefly, as one sat listening,
e happy juxtaposition of the three Again and again came the
t that here was a particularly fine
e of the high art of program mak-to be sure, the mere names, Beet-Stravinsky, Wagner, might seem
erely snatched out of a grab-bag.
could the three possibly have in n, or how could they even be right
each other? The names of the ers raise the question; the actual give the answer. Beethoven of the al Symphony is Beethoven almost
It is Beethoven objective. The ony moves along placidly—yes,
y in spite of the thunder storm.
airly feels the golden sunlight—
elds perhaps of a yellowish green, pasants, the twittering birds, the

Stravinsky, Saint-Saens, New Ameri

Samuel Gardner's "Broadway Boogie Woogie"
For Notable Piece
Symphony Hall

SUCH philosophers as frequent Symphony Concerts might have observed last Saturday like many a subscriber, that on week-end in the country—their living of the law of compensation. The first number on the program was Stravinsky's ballet, "Apollo Mu-tilated," played as concert-piece for string orchestra. Since it is plotless and actionless, it loses little by transfer from theater to concert-hall. The listener is not distracted by the sight of a tree, hollow and far-spreading, from which Apollo is born; nor may he be troubled by god mounting toward the summit of Olympus in a chariot likewise upon canvas. Without too much to say he may even forego dissolving the Apollo and the three attendants into engaged in variations (as the old ballets of the dance named them) and times a trifle overtaking by the crossed rhythms. If he thus favors "Apollo" as mythological ballet, he was once written for the court dances—he may listen the more to a music in which Stravinsky is trying all the styles that occur suitable for his purpose.

Back to Lully in some of the since it was Lully who bestowed mythological ballet upon his augter, Louis XIV. Back to Bach of—as it seems in the solo-meas violin that begin Scene Two. Bellini (as some say) in the sm and sweetness of many a melody certainly to Delibes in the phra the accent of the dances. Pe thought that any sudden jet of or any swift breaking of t should disturb unruffled flow and now a Stravinsky who of purpose discards every choir but the strings; out of them searches no new and strange sonorities; prefers, for the most part, to use them as painters paint in monochrome, escaping monotony by subtle shadings or adroitly graduated volume. Here and now also a Stravinsky who somehow fuses this singular pastiche into coherence and unified impression. Every one's ears are interested and charmed especially when Dr. Koussevitzky and the strings are in as good form as they were on Saturday. The connoisseurs are amused as they single out this, that, and the other in the skein, marvelling the while at the Stravinskian ingenuities and assimilations. The lay listener hears a Stravinsky poles away from the composer of "Petruschka," "Le Sacre" and "Noces," a Stravinsky who woos his ear and pleases his fancy.

At the other end of the program, the so-called Organ Symphony of Saint-Saëns. In the repertory of no other orchestra in America is it so firmly embedded. Hardly oftener, nowadays, in Paris itself do the bourgeoisie of the Colonne and the Lamoureux Concerts hear it. (And at that bourgeoisie the young Saint-Saëns liked to gird.) Dr. Muck, who fancied the Symphony and who, in the composer's opinion, played it more eloquently than any French conductor, was its foster father at Symphony Hall. Mr. Monteux was no ungracious uncle; while Dr. Koussevitzky has been sufficiently assiduous guardian. If in these days Saint-Saëns must be taken down from the shelf on which the new musical generation has unanimously deposited him, better this Organ Symphony than the threadbare symphonic poems or the all too-neat concertos. Saint-Saëns was no mean craftsman—in fact he knew too much—and there are still interesting sonorities to echo out of thin-bodied or over-laden pages. And in the eighties to be grandiose and rhetorical, Lisztian-fashion, was no symphonic sin. Nor for most—witness the applause on both Friday and Saturday—is it such nowadays. And once more Dr. Koussevitzky persuades himself of the music before him. Early or late in the season, there shall be no routine.

With "the good, the true and the beautiful" thus distributed, there was room between for Mr. Samuel Gardner's long-promised "Broadway." The piece caught the conductor's eye when he sat as judge in the competition for American composers out of which Mr. Bloch won the prize. Last season he kept "Broadway" in mind; this season, almost at the end, found place for it. Mr. Toscanini may cleave to his Italians; Mr. Stokowski sort out his Russians; but for Dr. Koussevitzky, there are Americans, even young Americans, also deserving opportunity. This time, and reasonably, he entrusted performance to the composer. The orchestra worked for Mr. Gardner as well as applauded him. Seemingly, he made "Broadway" sound as he had imagined, felt and written. The audience of neither Friday nor Saturday heard it unimpressed. There was the ring of interest, pleasure and excitement in the recalls.

Possibly—to light first upon short-comings—Mr. Gardner, being full of his matter, has overwritten it. Broadway may indeed be a street—mid-town and northward—of tumultuous jazz. But hardly, for the purposes of musical composition, of jazz and tumult so persistent and pervasive. Agreed that it is as rich-flavored, high-rhythmed, symphonic jazz as one may hear in a year of concert-going. Yet too much gives the piece a vehement monotony beyond even the prevalence of that quality along Broadway. Furthermore: Mr. Gardner scores this jazz for a super-orchestra—wood-winds in threes or fours, six horns, three saxophones, banjo, a variegated and busy percussion corner. Symphonic jazz must surely be sonorous; but it must also be sufficiently open for the hearer to catch the “quips and quirks and wanton wiles” with which separate instruments and separate choirs savor and diversify it. Oftener than need be Mr. Gardner’s writing is so full-mouthed and in such turmoil that for the quickest ear (unless it be the composer-conductor’s) there are no details, no arabesques—only large, on-rushing sonorities.

Yet in contrasts, as it seemed to one and another hearer, lay the emotional and the imaginative virtue of Mr. Gardner's musical design. Throughout "Broadway" he would set up a background, infuse an atmosphere, of jazz. Therewith he characters street and scene. Within this atmosphere, against this background, he would also suggest, even enact—so far as tones may do that office—an individual fate. There are waltz-like measures, half-sensuous, playful, intoxicating, as of one who savors and enjoys a new-found environment. There are measures, again, as of one who draws from it restless stimulus and will to do. There are measures, finally, of something stilled and spent and crushed—maybe of the spirit that had toyed with this flaunting world, believed itself kindled and master, only to be drained, stripped and tossed aside. And again, in the last measures of all, the jazz-like

swells and clangs—iterum iter-
as it was in the beginning, so
the end. . . .

speculation is as good as another. There is no program, Mr. Gardner avers; could he sketch any emotional content there is, it would be unworkable if undefined. Mr. Gardner manipulates tonal masses effectively and rhythmically. He knows the resources of the orchestra; plies them vigorously. He is alive to vivid rhythms; fertile in melodic device. Sufficient for his purpose are the motifs whence his music grows. Better than most he writes symphonic jazz, and makes it not too symphonic. Above most young Americans he has the "Broadway" forward with unerring creative will. Readily enough all he sets the ear—background, surface, and means to Mr. Gardner's half-implied tragedy. Call it his environment. Out of that the romantic composers made symphonies and tone-poems and music-dramas. Out of it, in his turn, Mr. Gardner writes a jazzy piece. To every time—every setting—its own musical environment for an unending struggle. No wonder Mr. Gardner is right. There is no other explanation. H. T. P.

Koussevitzky Balancing Moods

evening the Boston Symphony Or-played its eighth concert of the dge series in Sanders Theater. The n comprised just three numbers—
ven's Pastoral Symphony, Stravinpallet, "Apollon Musagète," the
and "Love-Death" out of Wag-
pera, "Tristan and Isolde." One
ed chiefly, as one sat listening,
e happy juxtaposition of the three.
Again and again came the
t that here was a particularly fine
e of the high art of program mak-
o be sure, the mere names, Beet-Stravinsky, Wagner, might seem
erely snatched out of a grab-bag.
could the three possibly have in n, or how could they even be right
each other? The names of the
ers raise the question; the actual give the answer. Beethoven of the al Symphony is Beethoven almost
It is Beethoven objective. The
ony moves along placidly—yes,
y in spite of the thunder storm.
airly feels the golden sunlight—
elds perhaps of a yellowish green.
easants, the twittering birds, the

Stravinsky, Saint-Saens, New Ameri

Samuel Gardner's "Broadway" For Notable Piece Symphony Hall

SUCH philosophers as frequent Symphony Concerts might have observed last Saturday like many a subscriber, that on week-end in the country—the ing of the law of compensation. The first number on the program Stravinsky's ballet, "Apollo Mu played as concert-piece for string tra. Since it is plotless and n tionless, it loses little by trans theater to concert-hall. The li not distracted by the sight of a tree, hollow and far-spreading, Apollo is born; nor may he ob god mounting toward the su Olympus in a chariot likewise upon canvas. Without too mu he may even forego dissolving Apollo and the three attendan engaged in variations (as the ol lary of the dance named then times a trifle overtaxing by r crossed rhythms. If he thus fa "Apollo" as mythological ball were once written for the cour sailles—he may listen the more a music in which Stravinsky trying all the styles that occur suitable for his purpose.

Back to Lully in some of the since it was Lully who besto mythological ballet upon his aug ter, Louis XIV. Back to Bach or—as it seems in the solo-meas violin that begin Scene Two. Bellini (as some say) in the sm and sweetness of many a melod certainly to Delibes in the phra the accent of the dances. Pe thought that any sudden jet of or any swift breaking of should disturb unruffled flow.

and now a Stravinsky who of purpose discards every choir but the strings; out of them searches no new and strange sonorities; prefers, for the most part, to use them as painters paint in monochrome, escaping monotony by subtle shadings or adroitly graduated volume. Here and now also a Stravinsky who somehow fuses this singular pastiche into coherence and unified impression. Every one's ears are interested and charmed, especially when Dr. Koussevitzky and the strings are in as good form as they were on Saturday. The connoisseurs are amused as they single out this, that, and the other in the skein, marvelling the while at the Stravinskian ingenuities and assimilations. The lay listener hears a Stravinsky poles away from the composer of "Petrouchka," "Le Sacre" and "Noces," a Stravinsky who woos his ear and pleases his fancy.

At the other end of the program, the so-called Organ Symphony of Saint-Saens. In the repertory of no other orchestra in America is it so firmly embedded. Hardly oftener, nowadays, in Paris itself do the bourgeoisie of the Colonne and the Lamoureux Concerts hear it. (And at that bourgeoisie the young Saint-Saens liked to gird.) Dr. Muck, who fancied the Symphony and who, in the composer's opinion, played it more eloquently than any French conductor, was its foster father at Symphony Hall. Mr. Monteux was no ungracious uncle; while Dr. Koussevitzky has been sufficiently assiduous guardian. If in these days Saint-Saens must be taken down from the shelf on which the new musical generation has unanimously deposited him, better this Organ Symphony than the threadbare symphonic poems or the all too-neat concertos. Saint-Saens was no mean craftsman—in fact he knew too much—and there are still interesting sonorities to echo out of thin-bodied or over-laden pages. And in the eighties to be grandiose and rhetorical, Lisztian-fashion, was no symphonic sin. Nor for most—witness the applause on both Friday and Saturday—is it such nowadays. And once more Dr. Koussevitzky persuades himself of the music before him. Early or late in the season, there shall be no routine.

With "the good, the true and the beautiful" thus distributed, there was room between for Mr. Samuel Gardner's long promised "Broadway." The piece caught the conductor's eye when he sat as judge in the competition for American composers out of which Mr. Bloch won the prize. Last season he kept "Broadway" in mind; this season, almost at the end, found place for it. Mr. Toscanini; Mr. Stokowski; but for Dr. Americans, even deserving opportunity reasonably, he is the composer. T Mr. Gardner as Seemingly, he m as he had imagined audience of neith heard it unimpre of interest, please recalls.

Possibly—to lpd comings—Mr. Gaal matter, has oea may indeed be y, northward—of ty hardly, for the ped position, of jazz ch and pervasive. Fe flavored, high-rh as one may hear going. Yet too — vehement monoi prevalence of th way. Furthermo this jazz for a supe in threes or four: phones, banjo, a cussion corner.

surely be sonoro sufficiently open the "quips and qu with which sepa separate choirs s Oftener than ne writing is so full turmoil that for t it be the compose no details, no aral rushing sonorities

Yet in contrast and another hear and the imaginati ner's musical "Broadway" he v ground, infuse an Therewith he char Within this atm background, he wde enact—so far as toat —an individual fale like measures, halbe toxicating, as of ts enjoys a new-found are measures, aght draws from it resit to do. There are r something stilled pe —maybe of the se with this flaunting kindled and mastall stripped and tossed in the last measur

Papers Invo Th

By won confirmed have bee the Publ which w England tion chai picture deal inve

By the quires ha tion and Pinansky New Yor toco treat expected thus assa agement the coun

The th lix house worked o

Co

Com

reaching was two chilled. understa ment an musings prevail calclitran tired sing

The b of Schul warming hint of silent three m der Kind Wolf—

"Auch opportu chiseled linked a has long finel wous, hal sian Son at his c mental a him. I reached tumult swells and clangs—iterum iterumque, as it was in the beginning, so also at the end.

One speculation is as good as another. There is no program, Mr. Gardner avers; nor would he sketch any emotional scheme. But emotional content there is, unmistakable if undefined. Mr. Gardner can manipulate tonal masses effectively and spiritedly. He knows the resources of an orchestra; plies them vigorously. He is alive to vivid rhythms; fertile in harmonic device. Sufficient for his purpose are the motifs whence his music springs. Better than most he writes symphonic jazz, and makes it not too symphonic. Above most young Americans he drives "Broadway" forward with unflagging creative will. Readily enough all this meets the ear—background, surface, method and means to Mr. Gardner's half-audible, half-implied tragedy. Call it man and his environment. Out of that conflict the romantic composers made symphonies and tone-poems and music-dramas. Out of it, in his turn, Mr. Gardner writes a jazzy piece. To every time—and every setting—its own musical speech for an unending struggle. No doubt Mr. Gardner is right. There is no need of explanation. H. T. P.

Dr. Koussevitzky Balancing Moods

Last evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra played its eighth concert of the Cambridge series in Sanders Theater. The program comprised just three numbers—Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony, Stravinsky's ballet, "Apollon Musagete," the Prelude and "Love-Death" out of Wagner's opera, "Tristan and Isolde." One pondered chiefly, as one sat listening, upon the happy juxtaposition of the three works. Again and again came the thought that here was a particularly fine example of the high art of program making. To be sure, the mere names, Beethoven, Stravinsky, Wagner, might seem to be merely snatched out of a grab-bag.

What could the three possibly have in common, or how could they even be right foil for each other? The names of the composers raise the question; the actual works give the answer. Beethoven of the Pastoral Symphony is Beethoven almost unique. It is Beethoven objective. The symphony moves along placidly—yes, placidly in spite of the thunder storm. One fairly feels the golden sunlight—upon fields perhaps of a yellowish green. The peasants, the twittering birds, the scape upon which it hears the equally funny birds; the mind is lulled by the drowsy murmuring brook. For once Beethoven does not harrow the emotions; for once he soothes and quiets and heals. And the conductor gives him his free and gentle way.

One is still purring in the warm sunlight which this music spreads about one. Unless one's day has brought a very particular ax to grind, one is content. One would not, at least not yet, give up this somnolent mood. If only one could bask in the yellow sunshine a moment longer, dream out the dream of those sun-flooded fields. Nine pieces out of ten, indeed ninety-nine out of a hundred, would break in upon the reverie, would shatter the illusion. Dr. Koussevitzky found the hundredth piece which continues just enough of the essence of the mood not to disturb the storm, the shepherd, the religious song, are but incidents against the background of this peaceful landscape. There is no soul-painting, no self-revelation, no struggle with cosmic problems. The mind is at rest in the contemplation of this landscape upon which it sees these funny peasants, now dancing, now caught and drenched in the rain, then piously giving thanks that it was no worse; this landdreamer, changes it just enough to interest him afresh. Rustic plains now become Olympian fields, funny peasants turn into gods and muses. But the gods (like Beethoven writing his pastoral) are having their day off. Not Olympian dignities and grandeurs are heaped about one. Stravinsky, writing about and for them, is not wracking his brain trying to fathom the unfathomable. The gods and muses are engaged in the pleasures of the dance, and the accommodating and versatile Stravinsky is writing suitable measures for their very human steps. Again the music is objective. Again it moves about in the outskirts of human emotion. Again it reaches the heart only by giving frank pleasure to the senses. After all, why try to "judge" Stravinsky writing in an unaccustomed style, by comparing "Apollo" with earlier works. "Apollo" is a thing in itself, in its way perfect, giving exquisitely its own kind of pleasure—pleasure thrice trebled coming right after that other work of a composer on a holiday from himself, Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony.

But the hearer also would want his "thrill." Sunshine in the meadows of Austria or on the fields adjoining the mountains of the gods could hardly satisfy forever. Was there to be no searching of the heart this evening? Could such searching be subtly joined to the objectivities that had gone before? Along with the many pieces which could not accomplish this end was also at least but was accomplish it. The al way. In the proper mel- liss Edith to listen receptively dward D. which so slowly and was there in the heart of r Harlow of Isolde. It is by y from the Epicurean pian Dance to the shingly" of the begin- Years of the stan" prelude. It is ynn, died leads one on and on, bon park, re deeply into the re- years old sions of one's heart. siness for e thrill which is more in Eng- h is the sum-total of ed States depths of that passion. a member ll-high insensible the Lodge of a long way from the pment of the golden landscapes two sons sion of two of the t lovers.

that performance was aint and the evenness al levels of Beethoven, e finely chiselled and surfaces of Stravin- accumulating forces mounted, with Wag- gulping final release. Brookline, gram, perfectly given. his after- A. H. M.

ancis

oston

v York

ptionally

Apr. 14, 1930

ky Continues

is Festival

Plaudits

certs in New York season the Boston id Dr. Koussevitzky led by the audiences reviewers beyond cent precedent. The Carnegie Hall on nd Saturday after- ed a renewal, or a Brahms Festival . On Thursday the is "Academic Over- ccerto in B-flat, his r. On Saturday it academic Overture": ccerto in B minor minor. On both el was the pianist. ds the praise, and of igator

—Vice Pres

also the dispraise, that his playing provoked. For the moment orchestra and conductor are the matter in hand. Writing in The Tribune, Mr. Gilman gave them adept and amusing introduction.

"It may be recalled by those who have been privileged to witness or to read Mr. Connelly's inimitable 'Green Pastures' that the Lawd, complaining of an insufficiency of firmament in the seasoning of his custard, is informed that Paradise is at the moment all out of firmament. 'Dey ain't,' reports the custard-maker, 'a drap in de jug.' Whereupon the Lawd determines to make good the deficiency by a miracle. 'Let it be some firmament!' he commands. 'An' when I say let it be some firmament, I don't want jest a little bitty dab o' firmament . . . Let it be a whole mess o' firmament!'

"Mr. Koussevitzky, Lawd of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, appears to have concluded that both musical Boston and musical New York lacked an ingredient essential to their symphonic diet, and he decreed a while ago, 'Let it be some Brahms!' Apparently he added the warning, 'Not jest a little bitty dab o' Brahms. Let it be a whole mess o' Brahms.' And Brahms there was forthwith—a whole mess o' Brahms, a firmament of Brahms, in fact, filled with choiring stars and glorious with symphonic suns.

"Apparently Mr. Koussevitzky, like Mr. Connelly's Lawd, is a benevolently despotic individualist, satisfying his own taste when he feels impelled to do so. There was, admittedly, firmament in the Lawd's custard. And, indisputably, there was Brahms in our musical custard. Was there enough? Ah, that was for the imperious Mr. Koussevitzky to say. But apart from the suiting of his taste, there was really no particular occasion for a Brahms Festival, either in Boston or in New York. There is at the moment no Brahmsian anniversary to celebrate (though there will be one in 1933, when Mr. Koussevitzky may regret that he came in a few bars too soon). And certainly our condition differs from that of the heavenly larder; for there is plenty of Brahms in the jugs of our conductors, and they add it freely to our musical food.

Consequently

"But no matter: Mr. Koussevitzky wanted more Brahms, and he provided it. For the Bostonians, he contrived six all-Brahms concerts, exhibiting samples of the Olympian Johannes as composer of orchestral, choral and chamber works, with the aid of the Harvard and Radcliffe choruses and such luscious soloists as Mme. Matzenauer and the fabulously fashionable Mr. Artur Schnabel the imported pianist who has made intellectualism in music almost as popular (for the moment) as ankle-length skirts.

York we are not being quite provided by Mr. Koussevitzky hmsian firmament. Yet the the Bostonian heaven is doing by us. [Last] Thursday evening Carnegie Hall he set before his not a whole mess of Brahms, much more than a little bitty gave us one of the greatest of phonies, an overture, and the suasive, if not the weightiest no-concertos, with Mr. Schnabel anistic Gabriel, sounding his through Johannes's keyboard of a vernal earth.

everyone was happy there can doubt. Brahms is proper Festival, with or without an anniversary. He has the fullness and content, the volume, the power, nness of style, the imaginative d depth, to justify and reward alified disclosure of his works. te genius, a Maker (as the mystic Emerson might have called is fecund and inexhaustible. we had him in two of his mas: the Brahms who in the Con-B-flat is chiefly the poet of amplitudes and fervors, radiant, e, sensitive and magical, and the Brahms of the Symphony in the Northern Brahms, bardic, ial, and prevaillingly dark hued." g passed the Concerto in review, an ventured this final reflection: this, the Fourth Symphony, for lend of Gothic magnificence and peech, was an experience neces- ss revealing. The evening was abel's, and the Brahms that he to us. For this our thanks, are really due to Mr. Kousse- It was he, let it not be forgotten, uined this beneficent enrichment brahmsian skies. If there were murmured, like the Paradisaical s in "The Green Pastures." 'Now, wd, dat's too much firmament,' ces were not audible."

ductor's Share

mes was like-minded as to Con- Symphony, saying: "It was not pianist and interpreter of sym- nent who sat before us but a who matched every tint of s orchestration with one of his better say, a musician who real- wanted more Brahms, and he provided it. ness of Brahms's palette, and Brahms concerts, exhibiting samples of intuition for the right shading of color scheme. In view of the is easy to believe that Mr. with the aid of the Harvard and Rad- and Mr. Koussevitzky had cliffe choruses and such luscious soloists with special care and mutual zeal as Mme. Matzenauer and the fabulously the best possible coherence and fashionable Mr. Artur Schnabel the im- of all the elements of a work- ported pianist who has made intellectual- less a piano-concerto in the ac- sense of the term than it is one- ms's greatest symphonies. Mr.

scape upon which it hears the funny birds; the mind is lulled by the drowsy murmuring brook. For once hoven does not harrow the emotion once he soothes and quiets and And the conductor gives him his gentle way.

One is still purring in the war light which this music spreads one. Unless one's day has been very particular ax to grind, one tent. One would not, at least not give up this somnolent mood. one could bask in the yellow sun a monument longer, dream out the of those sun-flooded fields. Nine out of ten, indeed ninety-nine out of hundred, would break in upon the erie, would shatter the illusion Koussevitzky found the hundredth which continues just enough of sence of the mood not to disturb storm, the shepherd, the religious are but incidents against the back of this peaceful landscape. There soul-painting, no self-revelation, no gle with cosmic problems. The n at rest in the contemplation of this scape upon which it sees these peasants, now dancing, now caught drenched in the rain, then piously thanks that it was no worse; the dreamer, changes it just enough to rest him afresh. Rustic plains become Olympian fields, funny people turn into gods and muses. But then (like Beethoven writing his pastorate) having their day off. Not Olympianities and grandeurs are heaped one. Stravinsky, writing about them, is not wracking his brain to fathom the unfathomable. The and muses are engaged in the play of the dance, and the accompaniment and versatile Stravinsky is writing ble measures for their very human. Again the music is objective. A moves about in the outskirts of emotion. Again it reaches the hearer by giving frank pleasure to the After all, why try to "judge" Stravinsky in an unaccustomed way comparing "Apollo" with earlier "Apollo" is a thing in itself, in perfect, giving exquisitely its own of pleasure—pleasure thrice trebling right after that other wonderful composer on a holiday from Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony.

But the hearer also would want "thrill." Sunshine in the meadows Austria or on the fields adjoining mountains of the gods could hardly satisfy forever. Was there to be nothing of the heart this evening? such searching be subtly joined objectivities that had gone before with the many pieces which accomplished this end was also one which would accomplish it. The hearer was exactly in the proper mellowed mood in which to listen receptively to the murmurings which so slowly and so insinuatingly grew in the heart of Tristan, in the heart of Isolde. It is by no means a far cry from the Epicurean languors of Olympian Dance to the "Slowly and languishingly" of the beginnings of the "Tristan" prelude. It is Wagner then who leads one on and on, deeper and yet more deeply into the recesses and the passions of one's heart. And there comes the thrill which is more than a thrill, which is the sum-total of the heights and the depths of that passion. And by paths well-high insensible the evening has gone a long way from the purling brook in the golden landscapes to the searing passion of two of the world's most ardent lovers.

One can only add that performance was superb in the restraint and the evenness of the flat emotional levels of Beethoven, in maintaining the finely chiselled and perfectly polished surfaces of Stravinsky, in the slowly accumulating forces that mounted and mounted, with Wagner, in the all-engulfing final release. Yes, a perfect program, perfectly given. A. H. M.

From Boston To New York Exceptionally Frank. — April 14, 1930 Dr. Koussevitzky Continues The Brahms Festival To Loud Plaudits

At the final concerts in New York—for the season the Boston Orchestra and Dr. Koussevitzky were applauded by the audiences and praised by the reviewers beyond current custom or recent precedent. The concerts befell in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon last; were indeed a renewal, or a continuance, of the Brahms Festival lately ended in Boston. On Thursday the program essembled his "Academic Overture," his Piano-Concerto in B-flat, his Symphony in E Minor. On Saturday it again contained the "Academic Overture," added to it the Concerto in B minor and the Symphony in C minor. On both occasions Mr. Schnabel was the pianist. Another column records the praise, and also the dispraise, that his playing provoked. For the moment orchestra and conductor are the matter in hand. Writing in The Tribune, Mr. Gilman gave them adept and amusing introduction.

"It may be recalled by those who have been privileged to witness or to read Mr. Connelly's inimitable 'Green Pastures' that the Lawd, complaining of an insufficiency of firmament in the seasoning of his custard, is informed that Paradise is at the moment all out of firmament. 'Dey ain't,' reports the custard-maker, 'a drap in de jug.' Whereupon the Lawd determines to make good the deficiency by a miracle. 'Let it be some firmament!' he commands. 'An' when I say let it be some firmament, I don't want jest a little bitty dab o' firmament. . . . Let it be a whole mess o' firmament!'

"Mr. Koussevitzky, Lawd of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, appears to have concluded that both musical Boston and musical New York lacked an ingredient essential to their symphonic diet, and he decreed a while ago, 'Let it be some Brahms!' Apparently he added the warning, 'Not jest a little bitty dab o' Brahms. Let it be a whole mess o' Brahms!' And Brahms there was forthwith—a whole mess o' Brahms, a firmament of Brahms, in fact, filled with choiring stars and glorious with symphonic suns.

"Apparently Mr. Koussevitzky, like Mr. Connelly's Lawd, is a benevolently despotic individualist, satisfying his own taste when he feels impelled to do so. There was, admittedly, firmament in the Lawd's custard. And, indisputably, there was Brahms in our musical custard. Was there enough? Ah, that was for the imperious Mr. Koussevitzky to say. But apart from the suiting of his taste, there was really no particular occasion for a Brahms Festival, either in Boston or in New York. There is at the moment no Brahmsian anniversary to celebrate (though there will be one in 1933, when Mr. Koussevitzky may regret that he came in a few bars too soon). And certainly our condition differs from that of the heavenly larder; for there is plenty of Brahms in the jugs of our conductors, and they add it freely to our musical food.

Consequently

"But no matter: Mr. Koussevitzky wanted more Brahms, and he provided it. For the Bostonians, he contrived six all-Brahms concerts, exhibiting samples of the Olympian Johannes as composer of orchestral, choral and chamber works, with the aid of the Harvard and Radcliffe choruses and such luscious soloists as Mme. Matzenauer and the fabulously fashionable Mr. Artur Schnabel the imported pianist who has made intellectualism in music almost as popular (for the moment) as ankle-length skirts.

York we are not being quite provided by Mr. Koussevitzky's Brahmsian firmament. Yet the the Bostonian heaven is doing by us. [Last] Thursday evening at Carnegie Hall he set before his not a whole mess of Brahms, much more than a little bitty gave us one of the greatest of phonies, an overture, and the suasive, if not the weightiest of no-concertos, with Mr. Schnabel's fantastic Gabriel, sounding his through Johannes's keyboard of a vernal earth.

everyone was happy there can doubt. Brahms is proper Festival, with or without an anniversary. He has the fullness and content, the volume, the power, the richness of style, the imaginative depth, to justify and reward alified disclosure of his works. He is genius, a Maker (as the mystic Emerson might have called him) is fecund and inexhaustible. we had him in two of his masterpieces: the Brahms who in the Concerto in B-flat is chiefly the poet of amplitudes and fervors, radiant, sensitive and magical, and the Brahms of the Symphony in the Northern Brahms, bardic, tal, and prevaillingly dark hued." passed the Concerto in review, and ventured this final reflection: this, the Fourth Symphony, for its blend of Gothic magnificence and speech, was an experience necessary revealing. The evening was label's, and the Brahms that he to us. For this our thanks, are really due to Mr. Koussevitzky. It was he, let it not be forgotten, who united this beneficent enrichment of Brahmsian skies. If there were murmured, like the Paradisaical in 'The Green Pastures.' 'Now, wd, dat's too much firmament,' ces were not audible."

Conductor's Share

mes was like-minded as to Concerto in D minor, saying: "It was not pianist and interpreter of symphonies, and they add it freely to our musical food. . . . better say, a musician who really unexampled felicity the hardness of Brahms's palette, and the Brahmsian instrument take its place, with intuition for the right shading of color scheme. In view of the it is easy to believe that Mr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Koussevitzky had with special care and mutual zeal the best possible coherence and of all the elements of a work less a piano-concerto in the ac-sense of the term than it is one of Brahms's greatest symphonies. Mr.

One is still purring in the war-light which this music spreads
one. Unless one's day has been very particular ax to grind, one tent. One would not, at least give up this somnolent mood.
one could bask in the yellow sun a moment longer, dream out the of those sun-flooded fields. Nine out of ten, indeed ninety-nine out hundred, would break in upon the erie, would shatter the illusion.
Koussevitzky found the hundredth which continues just enough of sence of the mood not to disturb storm, the shepherd, the religious are but incidents against the background of this peaceful landscape. The soul-painting, no self-revelation, no gle with cosmic problems. The at rest in the contemplation of the scape upon which it sees these peasants, now dancing, now caudrenched in the rain, then plough-thanks that it was no worse; that

But the hearer also would w
"thrill." Sunshine in the mead Austria or on the fields adjoin mountains of the gods could ha isfy forever. Was there to be n ing of the heart this evening?
such searching be subtly joined objectivities that had gone before with the many pieces which co accomplish this end was also

One can only add that performance was superb in the restraint and the evenness of the flat emotional levels of Beethoven, in maintaining the finely chiselled and perfectly polished surfaces of Stravinsky, in the slowly accumulating forces that mounted and mounted, with Wagner, in the all-engulfing final release. Yes, a perfect program, perfectly given.

A. H. M.

From Boston
To New York
Exceptionally
Frank. — Apr. 14, 1910
Dr. Koussevitzky Continues
The Brahms Festival
To Loud Plaudits

AT the final concerts in New York—for the season the Boston Orchestra and Dr. Koussevitzky were applauded by the audiences and praised by the reviewers beyond current custom or recent precedent. The concerts befell in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon last; were indeed a renewal, or a continuance, of the Brahms Festival lately ended in Boston. On Thursday the program assembled his "Academic Overture," his Piano-Concerto in B-flat, his Symphony in E Minor. On Saturday it again contained the "Academic Overture"; added to it the Concerto in E minor and the Symphony in C minor. On both occasions Mr. Schnabel was the pianist. Another column records the praise, and

and glorious wit
"Apparently J
Mr. Connelly's I despotic individu taste when he
There was, adm Lawd's custard, was Brahms tard. Was th was for the vitzky to say. ing of his taste ticular occasio either in Bosto is at the mome sary to celebra one in 1933, wh regret that he soon). And cer from that of here is plenty our conductors our musical.

Consequently
"But no n-wanted more E.
For the Boston Brahms conce
the Olympian orchestral, ch with the aid cliffe choruses
as Mme. Matz fashionable M ported pianist.
ism in music moment) as a

Seek

"That everyone was happy there can be little doubt. Brahms is proper Festival material, with or without an anniversary pretext. He has the fullness and variety of content, the volume, the power, the greatness of style, the imaginative reach and depth, to justify and reward an unqualified disclosure of his works. A first-rate genius, a Maker (as the mystically daring Emerson might have called him), he is fecund and inexhaustible. Thursday we had him in two of his major phases: the Brahms who in the Concerto in B-flat is chiefly the poet of southern amplitudes and fervors, radiant, expansive, sensitive and magical, and the austerer Brahms of the Symphony in E minor, the Northern Brahms, bardic, magisterial, and prevaillingly dark hued."

Having passed the Concerto in review, Mr. Gilman ventured this final reflection: "After this, the Fourth Symphony, foal lils blend of Gothic magnificence and bardic speech, was an experience necessarily less revealing. The evening was Mr. Schnabel's, and the Brahms that he conveyed to us. For this our thanks, however, are really due to Mr. Koussevitzky. It was he, let it not be forgotten, who ordained this beneficent enrichment of our Brahmsian skies. If there were any who murmured, like the Paradisaical witnesses in 'The Green Pastures,' 'Now, look, Lawd, dat's too much firmament,' their voices were not audible."

The Conductor's Share

The Times was like-minded as to Concerto and Symphony, saying: "It was not only a pianist and interpreter of symphonic intent who sat before us but a colorist who matched every tint of Brahms's orchestration with one of his own; or, better say, a musician who realized with unexampled felicity the harmoniousness of Brahms's palette, and made his instrument take its place, with infallible intuition for the right shading in the color scheme. In view of the result it is easy to believe that Mr. Schnabel and Mr. Koussevitzky had labored with special care and mutual zeal to achieve the best possible coherence and balance of all the elements of a work which is less a piano-concerto in the accepted sense of the term than it is one of Brahms's greatest symphonies. Mr.

[illegible]

Koussevitzky's exposition of the score and the manner in which he supplemented, as it were, every thought and wish of the soloist was a lesson, from a master of interpretation."

And again: "The orchestral pieces were taken from the best Brahms—the 'Academic' Overture, which is youth itself and the wine of life, and the Fourth Symphony. Perhaps the reading of the Overture, played with balance and clarity by the magnificent orchestra, was a trifle deliberate and over-attentive to detail. Or, again, one might not agree with every tempo, nuance, crescendo and decrescendo of the symphony as the conductor contrived them; but on the whole these were great readings of works none the less great because they are familiar. Mr. Koussevitzky, who came here heralded as a virtuoso conductor not to be esteemed a reader of the classics, proved in this as in so many other concerts his innate understanding of the works of classic masters and his constantly ripening grip of his medium. [The Times

Climax

Once more, of the matinée on Saturday: "On Thursday Mr. Schnabel had a triumph with the Concerto in B-flat. This triumph was but the half of the ovation he received when he finished the Concerto in D minor Saturday afternoon, when he was cheered and applauded and called back to the stage many times. At the end of the concert Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra received an even more tumultuous demonstration. All this was testimony to the powers of a magnificent orchestra, conductor, and pianist, but above all it was testimony to the amazing and the increasing appeal to the public imagination of Brahms.

"The performance of the First Symphony was admirably proportioned and had the fine sustained line that the performance of the much more unpretentious 'Academic' Overture had not. Reservations concerning the Overture were recorded here after the first performance. These reservations gained strength under repetition. There was the tendency which is possibly a recurrent weakness of Mr. Koussevitzky to over-refine the music, dress up a simple and vigorous spirited piece with a series of nuance which make it episodic and deprive it of a measure of its movement, spontaneity and vigor. Owing to the same cause the peroration of the Overture, when it came, was not sufficiently imposing. The symphony, however, was played with fine continuity and cumulative power is indeed as the music is, it is no rule, in the oldest hands, to present and coherently. The test audience showed how deep the impression was felt and appreciated. These concerts have been for a long time and his men a special feature of the season.

s Brahms v York Ears

Also Question for ing Through Concertos

—Apr. 14, 1930.
These columns report not to so many of public and press. The Boston Orchestra and at their final concerts, a New York. At both, the "assisting artist," piano-part in each of the two. Newcomer in his powers, making inevitable deep impression, he conductor the laurels of the matinée. He entered the questioning and disconcerted himself and his playmates so fresh in Bostonian praise and blame delivered.

performance of the Concerto, memorable. It would receive of an exposition of a conductor were more delivering to an audience large moods but all the composition and the deeply little ability of the solo instrument and the orchestra as theories were the drama. attempt the sentimentalism in only serve his perhaps chills his problem for crystalline supernatural for liquidity. On the at it." late sense of the curve of the course his fine perception of of Tuesday general scheme impelled instead of nuances of ravishing need. of his crescendo and so unerringly placed, executed as to lift they occurred into an and radiant glow of in the last movement only interpret Brahms as only a master can.

ing lent

The concerto was revealed in all its splendor, which is not the splendor of pageantry but of the last and most precious moments of the sunset. Here is beautiful music filled with nobility of thought and royalty of style. The applause was very warm and the pianist was recalled several times. The whole orchestra should have been recalled also. [The Sun

Mr. Schnabel . . . has pre-eminently that "high seriousness" which issues from absolute sincerity. The crowd, as a thing to be tickled or enticed or overawed, apparently does not exist for him. He is concerned only with the music before him; all else is irrelevant. Against this background of belief and practice he shows us the application of ideas to poetry—of the shaping, governing, proportioning will exerting itself upon the emotional stuff of beauty. Always they constitute an exhibition of reason confederate with loveliness, of logic warmed with sensibility.

The Concerto in B-flat gave Mr. Schnabel occasion and to spare for the influential exhibition of these traits. This abidingly wonderful music he helped us to understand in all its moods, from the vernal horn-call of the opening, with its keyboard echo that is the very voice of prodigality and fervor, as of some magnetic southern Noontide made articulate, to the exquisite musing of the piano at the close of the magical Andante, where the music seems to drift upward into a hovering silence, reminding us of that woman of whom Conrad wrote, "in whose precise saying there were enigmatical prolongations that vanished somewhere beyond the reach." [The Tribune

Doubt and Dissent

It was not a performance, however, to alter materially critical valuations made when Mr. Schnabel was last here. With power, clarity and a prehensile mastery of structure went more than a little harshness, chill and practicality. Though deep and intense absorption were not to be denied this playing, its effect only occasionally possessed atmosphere or romance, as in the closing measures of the slow movement. More often its earnestness seemed pedagogical, its emphasis heavily cerebral. Sturdy technical achievements were brought about in a manner that often implied subjugation of the music by main force rather than an unfoldment from within by means of the interpreter's imposing technique.

The concert otherwise was one which tended to the harshness of forced sonorities. In both the [Academic] Overture and the [Fourth] Symphony, there was which seemed to be a relentless questing after the sort of vitality which results from playing at once bright and edged, taut and loud. It was playing that the ear aggressively throughout—rico e passionato," according to letter of the passacaglia finale of the Symphony.

Impression left on this reviewer one of the most efficient performances of the concerto he had ever heard. This was, indeed, efficiency raised. Mr. Schnabel played every note of music with unheard-of precision. His precise was the pianist's rhythm in his presentation of the themes and developments. Employing a rather ringing tone, Mr. Schnabel laid bare the concerto as uncompromisingly as a man engaged in an important operation. When he relented at times for the passion of the lyrical element he gave the feeling that he was inwardly struggling at the necessity, so grudgingly of the softer qualities of the work poetic flights, the tender interludes. It was a remorseless performance, which placed the concerto in an entirely new light. [The World

yes Again

The Concerto in D minor, Mr. Schnabel, course, made light of the stupendous technical difficulties. For once the orchestral piano-part did not sound when contrasted with the tuttis. Main octave trills in the first movement were delivered with Herculean energy. His reading altogether was cast in Olympian mold. The aristocratic bearing, the absolute faithfulness to the of the composer, the undeviating of good taste, revealed once more the great stature of the Austrian pianist. Are those who find his playing cool intellectual, without the glow of passion. Perhaps the explanation is found in the integral masculinity of Schnabel's style. His art has none of the androgynous elements often to be met in interpretive as well as creative. [The Tribune

Schnabel again showed [on Saturday] that he could play beautifully when he, as in the slow movement of the Concerto. It is worth while to remember this, and also to place by it in memory the gigantic proclamation of roaring drums and in response to instruments of the orchestra, of a theme that flashes like lightning through the instruments. When that theme came—at the beginning with the orchestra, and at the outset of the recitation, with all the power and sur of which piano and orchestra capable—it conferred something to remember. But the fire and nobility of Schnabel's interpretation and his contempt for any device merely intended to please an audience or procure applause could hardly be gainsaid. Performances will remain one of the climaxes of the season that is going to an end. [The Times

Koussevitzky's exposition of the and the manner in which he supplemented it were, every thought and the soloist was a lesson, from a of interpretation."

And again: "The orchestral piece taken from the best Brahms 'Academic' Overture, which is yet self and the wine of life, and the Symphony. Perhaps the reading Overture, played with balance and by the magnificent orchestra, was deliberate and over-attentive to Or, again, one might not agree every tempo, nuance, crescendo decrescendo of the symphony as duction contrived them; but on these were great readings of work the less great because they are f Mr. Koussevitzky, who came he added as a virtuoso conductor not esteemed a reader of the classics, in this as in so many other conc innate understanding of the we classic masters and his constant ing grip of his medium. [The Tri

Climax

Once more, of the matinee on day: "On Thursday Mr. Schnabel triumph with the Concerto in This triumph was but the half ovation he received when he the Concerto in D minor Saturday noon, when he was cheered and plauded and called back to the many times. At the end of the Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra received an even more tumultuous stration. All this was testimony powers of a magnificent orchestra duction, and pianist, but above all testimony to the amazing and creasing appeal to the public in tion of Brahms.

"The performance of the First phony was admirably proportioned had the fine sustained line that t formance of the much more un tious 'Academic' Overture had not. vations concerning the Overture w corded here after the first perfor These reservations gained strength repetition. There was the te which is possibly a recurrent weak Mr. Koussevitzky to over-refine sic, dress up a simple and v spirited piece with a series of which make it episodic and depri a measure of its movement, spor and vigor. Owing to the same the peroration of the Overture, came, was not sufficiently imposin symphony, however, was played fine continuity and cumulative.

Familiar as the music is, it is no easy, even for the oldest hands, to present it so powerfully and coherently. The testimony of the audience showed how deeply this performance was felt and appreciated. These two concerts have been for Mr. Koussevitzky and his men a special triumph."

Schnabel's Brahms In New York Ears

Praise and Also Question for His Playing Through

The Concertos

3 days. — Apr. 14, 1932

ELSEWHERE these columns report the warmth of public and press toward the Boston Orchestra and Dr. Koussevitzky at their final concerts, for the season, in New York. At both, Mr. Schnabel was the "assisting artist," playing the piano-part in each of Brahms's Concertos. Newcomer in his present note and powers, making inevitably large and deep impression, he shared with the conductor the laurels of the evening and the matinee. He encountered as well questioning and dissenting voices. He himself and his playing of Brahms are so fresh in Bostonian memory that both praise and blame deserve quotation.

Light and Leading

Mr. Schnabel's performance of the Concerto in B-flat was memorable. It would be difficult to conceive of an exposition in which soloist and conductor were more closely united in delivering to an audience not only the large moods but all the details of the composition and the deeply significant relation of the solo instrument to the whole and the orchestra as ment to the whole and the orchestra as ment to the whole and the orchestra as

Mr. Schnabel eschews sentimentality in all its forms, and this perhaps chills his tone, which is admirable for crystalline quality rather than for liquidity. On the other hand his delicate sense of the curve of every phrase and his fine perception of its place in the general scheme impel him to the use of nuances of ravishing gradation. Some of his crescendi and diminuendi were so unerringly placed and so matchlessly executed as to lift the pages in which they occurred into an unusually beautiful and radiant glow of life. Particularly in the last movement did the pianist not only interpret Brahms but play the piano as only a master can.

The concerto was revealed in all its splendor, which is not the splendor of pageantry but of the last and most precious moments of the sunset. Here is beautiful music filled with nobility of thought and royalty of style. The applause was very warm and the pianist was recalled several times. The whole orchestra should have been recalled also. [The Sun

Mr. Schnabel . . . has pre-eminent-ly that "high seriousness" which issues from absolute sincerity. The crowd, as a thing to be tickled or enticed or over-awed, apparently does not exist for him. He is concerned only with the music before him; all else is irrelevant. Against this background of belief and practice he shows us the application of ideas to poetry—of the shaping, governing, proportioning will exerting itself upon the emotional stuff of beauty. Always they constitute an exhibition of reason confederate with loveliness, of logic warmed with sensibility.

The Concerto in B-flat gave Mr. Schnabel occasion and to spare for the influential exhibition of these traits. This abidingly wonderful music he helped us to understand in all its moods, from the vernal horn-call of the opening, with its keyboard echo that is the very voice of prodigality and fervor, as of some magnetic southern Noontide made articulate, to the exquisite musing of the piano at the close of the magical Andante, where the music seems to drift upward into a hovering silence, reminding us of that woman of whom Conrad wrote, "in whose precise saying there were enigmatical prolongations that vanished somewhere beyond the reach." [The Tribune

Doubt and Dissent

It was not a performance, however, to alter materially critical valuations made when Mr. Schnabel was last here. With power, clarity and a prehensile mastery of structure went more than a little harshness, chill and practicality. Though deep and intense absorption were not to be denied this playing, its effect only occasionally possessed atmosphere or romance, as in the closing measures of the slow movement. More often its earnestness seemed pedagogical, its emphasis heavily cerebral. Sturdy technical achievements were brought about in a manner that often implied subjugation of the music by main force rather than an unfoldment from within by means of the interpreter's imposing technique.

The concert otherwise was one which tended to the harshness of forced sonorities. In both the [Academic] Overture and the [Fourth] Symphony, there was which seemed to be a relentless questing after the sort of vitality which results from playing at once bright and edged, taut and loud. It was playing that the ear aggressively throughout—"rico e passionato," according to latter of the passacaglia finale of the Symphony.

Impression left on this reviewer one of the most efficient performers of the concerto he had ever This was, indeed, efficiency raised. Mr. Schnabel played every note music with unheard-of precision. ly precise was the pianist's rhythm in presentation of the themes and developments. Employing a rather edding tone, Mr. Schnabel laid bare oncerto as uncompromisingly as a on engaged in an important operation When he relented at times for the sion of the lyrical element he gave he feeling that he was inwardly at the necessity, so grudging e of the softer qualities of the work poetic flights, the tender inter- It was a remorseless performance, which placed the concerto in an en- new light. [The World

Yes Again

The Concerto in D minor, Mr. Schnabel course, made light of the stupend- technical difficulties. For once the orchestral piano-part did not sound when contrasted with the tuttis. Main octave trills in the first movement were delivered with Herculean energy. His reading altogether was cast Olympian mold. The aristocratic ng, the absolute faithfulness to the of the composer, the undeviating of good taste, revealed once more eat stature of the Austrian pianist. are those who find his playing cool intellectual, without the glow of nation. Perhaps the explanation is found in the integral masculinity of Schnabel's style. His art has none of androgynous elements often to be in interpretive as well as creative. [The Tribune

Schnabel again showed [on Saturday] that he could play beautifully when se, as in the slow movement of the or Concerto. It is worth while to ber this, and also to place by it in memory the gigantic proclamation roaring drums and in response to nt instruments of the orchestra, of me that flashes like lightning h the instruments. When that e came—at the beginning with the tra, and at the outset of the re- ation, with all the power and ur of which piano and orchestra capable—it conferred something to ber. But the fire and nobility of Schnabel's interpretation and his te contempt for any device merely ited to please an audience or pro- applause could hardly be gainsaid. rformances will remain one of the e climaxes of the season that is g to an end. [The Times

Koussevitzky's exposition of the and the manner in which he supplemented it were, every thought and the soloist was a lesson, from a of interpretation."

And again: "The orchestral piece taken from the best Brahms 'Academic' Overture, which is yet self and the wine of life, and the Symphony. Perhaps the reading Overture, played with balance and by the magnificent orchestra, was deliberate and over-attentive to Or, again, one might not agree every tempo, nuance, crescendo decrescendo of the symphony as duction contrived them; but on these were great readings of work the less great because they are f Mr. Koussevitzky, who came he alded as a virtuoso conductor not esteemed a reader of the classics, in this as in so many other conc innate understanding of the wo classic masters and his constantly ing grip of his medium. [The Th

Climax

Once more, of the matinée on day: "On Thursday Mr. Schnabel triumph with the Concerto in This triumph was but the half ovation he received when he the Concerto in D minor Saturday noon, when he was cheered and plauded and called back to the many times. At the end of the Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra received an even more tumultuous stration. All this was testimony powers of a magnificent orchestra duction, and pianist, but above all testimony to the amazing and creasing appeal to the public in tion of Brahms.

"The performance of the First phony was admirably proportion had the fine sustained line that t ment to the whole and the orchestra as formance of the much more unan equal partner in the drama. tious 'Academic' Overture had not. Mr. Schnabel eschews sentimentality in vations concerning the Overture wall its forms, and this perhaps chills his corded here after the first perfor tone, which is admirable for crystalline These reservations gained strength quality rather than for liquidity. On the repetition. There was the te other hand his delicate sense of the curve which is possibly a recurrent weal of every phrase and his fine perception of Mr. Koussevitzky to over-refine its place in the general scheme impel sic, dress up a simple and him to the use of nuances of ravishing spirited piece with a series of gradation. Some of his crescendo and which make it episodic and deprived diminuendi were so unerringly placed a measure of its movement, spor and so matchlessly executed as to lift and vigor. Owing to the same the pages in which they occurred into an the peroration of the Overture, unusually beautiful and radiant glow of came, was not sufficiently imposing life. Particularly in the last movement symphony, however, was played did the pianist not only interpret Brahms fine continuity and cumulative, but play the piano as only a master can.

Familiar as the music is, it is no easy, even for the oldest hands, to present it so powerfully and coherently. The testimony of the audience showed how deeply this performance was felt and appreciated. These two concerts have been to Mr. Koussevitzky and his men a special triumph."

Schnabel's Brahms In New York Ears

Praise and Also Question for His Playing Through

The Concertos

ELSEWHERE these columns report toward the Boston Orchestra and Dr. Koussevitzky at their final concerts, for the season, in New York. At both, Mr. Schnabel was the "assisting artist," playing the piano-part in each of Brahms's Concertos. Newcomer in his present note and powers, making inevitably large and deep impression, he shared with the conductor the laurels of the evening and the matinée. He encountered as well questioning and dissenting voices. He himself and his playing of Brahms are so fresh in Bostonian memory that both praise and blame deserve quotation.

Light and Leading

Mr. Schnabel's performance of the Concerto in B-flat was memorable. It would be difficult to conceive of an exposition in which soloist and conductor were more closely united in delivering to an audience not only the large moods but all the details of the composition and the deeply significant relation of the solo instrument to the whole and the orchestra as formance of the much more unan equal partner in the drama. tious 'Academic' Overture had not. Mr. Schnabel eschews sentimentality in vations concerning the Overture wall its forms, and this perhaps chills his corded here after the first perfor tone, which is admirable for crystalline These reservations gained strength quality rather than for liquidity. On the repetition. There was the te other hand his delicate sense of the curve which is possibly a recurrent weal of every phrase and his fine perception of Mr. Koussevitzky to over-refine its place in the general scheme impel sic, dress up a simple and him to the use of nuances of ravishing spirited piece with a series of gradation. Some of his crescendo and which make it episodic and deprived diminuendi were so unerringly placed a measure of its movement, spor and so matchlessly executed as to lift and vigor. Owing to the same the pages in which they occurred into an the peroration of the Overture, unusually beautiful and radiant glow of came, was not sufficiently imposing life. Particularly in the last movement symphony, however, was played did the pianist not only interpret Brahms fine continuity and cumulative, but play the piano as only a master can.

The concerto was splendor, which is pageantry but of precious moments of beautiful music filled with thought and royalty, pause was very was recalled several orchestra should have [The Sun

Mr. Schnabel ly that "high serious from absolute sincere a thing to be tickled awed, apparently do He is concerned only fore him; all else is this background of b shows us the appli poetry—of the shapi portioning will exert emotional stuff of be constitute an exhibit federate with loveline with sensibility.

The Concerto in Schnabel occasion an influential exhibition. This abidingly wor helped us to understa from the vernal horn with its keyboard ecl voice of prodigality some magnetic south articulate, to the exqu piano at the close o dante, where the mu upward into a hoveri ing us of that woman wrote, "in whose pr were enigmatical prok lished somewhere be [The Tribune

Doubt and Dissent

It was not a perform alter materially critica when Mr. Schnabel wi power, clarity and a of structure went m harshness, chill and p deep and intense, abso be denied this playing occasionally possessed at mance, as in the closin slow movement. More ness seemed pedagogic heavily cerebral. Sturdy nents were brought a that often implied su music by main force r foldment from within b terpreter's imposing te

The concert otherw tended to the harshne ties. In both the [A and the [Fourth] Sym which seemed to be a after the sort of vital from playing at once taut and loud. It v smote the ear aggressively throughout—"energico e passionato," according to the letter of the passacaglia finale of the Fourth Symphony.

The impression left on this reviewer was one of the most efficient performances of the concerto he had ever heard. This was, indeed, efficiency raised to art. Mr. Schnabel played every note of the music with unheard-of precision. Equally precise was the pianist's rhythm and his presentation of the themes and their developments. Employing a rather unyielding tone, Mr. Schnabel laid bare the concerto as uncompromisingly as a surgeon engaged in an important operation. When he relented at times for the expression of the lyrical element he gave one the feeling that he was inwardly chafing at the necessity, so grudging was he of the softer qualities of the work—the poetic flights, the tender interludes. It was a remorseless performance, one which placed the concerto in an entirely new light. [The World

The Ayes Again

In the Concerto in D minor, Mr. Schnabel, of course, made light of the stupendous technical difficulties. For once the truly orchestral piano-part did not sound puny when contrasted with the tutti. The chain octave trills in the first movement were delivered with Herculean energy. His reading altogether was cast in an Olympian mold. The aristocratic phrasing, the absolute faithfulness to the spirit of the composer, the undeviating fidelity of good taste, revealed once more the great stature of the Austrian pianist. There are those who find his playing cool and intellectual, without the glow of imagination. Perhaps the explanation is to be found in the integral masculinity of Mr. Schnabel's style. His art has none of those androgynous elements often to be found in interpretive as well as creative talents. [The Tribune

Mr. Schnabel again showed [on Saturday] that he could play beautifully when he chose, as in the slow movement of the D-Minor Concerto. It is worth while to remember this, and also to place by it in the memory the gigantic proclamation over roaring drums and in response to different instruments of the orchestra, of the theme that flashes like lightning through the instruments. When that passage came—at the beginning with the orchestra, and at the outset of the recapitulation, with all the power and grandeur of which piano and orchestra were capable—it conferred something to remember. But the fire and nobility of Mr. Schnabel's interpretation and his complete contempt for any device merely calculated to please an audience or provoke applause could hardly be gainsaid. His performances will remain one of the notable climaxes of the season that is drawing to an end. [The Times

Twenty-third Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, APRIL 25, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, APRIL 26, at 8.15 o'clock

Mozart Symphony in C major, No 34 (Koechel No 338)
I. Allegro vivace.
II. Andante di molto.
III. Finale: Allegro vivace.

Chadwick Sinfonietta in D major
I. Risolutamente.
II. Canzonetta.
III. Scherzino.
IV. Finale.

Dukelsky Symphony No. 2, in D-flat major
I. Allegro molto.
II. Menuetto.
III. Allegro giocoso. (First performance)

Strauss "Don Juan," Tone-poem, Op. 20
(after Lenau)

STEINWAY PIANO USED

There will be an intermission after Chadwick's "Sinfonietta"

Vladimir Dukelsky

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The 23d concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. Mozart, Symphony, C major (K. 338). Chadwick, Sinfonietta in D major. Dukelsky, Symphony, E flat major, No. 2 (first performance). Strauss, tone poem, "Don Juan."

Mr. Chadwick's overture to "Rip Van Winkle" was performed at a concert of the Harvard Musical Association in December, 1879, at a concert of the Handel and Haydn Society in May, 1880. His name first appeared on a program of the Boston Symphony orchestra on Jan. 13, 1883 (overture "Thalia"). It was eminently meet and proper that his jubilee should have been celebrated yesterday by the Boston Symphony orchestra, whose programs he has often enriched. The Sinfonietta, chosen for this occasion, was composed in 1904; the music is still fresh and pleasing by its firm structure, its melodic interest, its harmonic and orchestral expression, and above all by a musical enthusiasm that is kept within artistic bounds. This was no perfunctory work; the music was in the composer and it had to come out. Nor is the Sinfonietta too evidently of any school. There is individuality, which was rare among American composers at the time the Sinfonietta was written. And here, as in an earlier and famous Scherzo and in the earlier Symphonic Sketches there is more than the suggestion of the American spirit finding its voice in music. Perhaps today the first and second movements are the ones that command the most attention; the former by the thematic material—note the charming quasi oriental melody—and its development—Mr. Chadwick writing for orchestra has been especially happy in his use of the symphonic form; the second by the constant beauty of the musical thought, the melancholy that is poetic sentiment, and by the beautiful close with its exquisite orchestral invention.

Mr. Chadwick at the end of the Sinfonietta was most heartily applauded. One might borrow from newspaper jargon and say "he received an ovation," but this would do him an injustice, for among the ancient Romans an ovation was a lesser triumph, when the victorious general entered the city on horseback or on foot, not in a chariot, was crowned with myrtle, not with laurel, and only a sheep was sacrificed in his honor. Surely Mr. Chadwick for his musical activity during the 50 honorable years deserves the laurel.

Mr. Dukelsky, who was at the concert, is not a stranger here. Mr. Koussevitzky had already introduced a ballet-suite and a first symphony. Mr. Dukelsky has not yeached his 30th year—fortunate man! He has told in an amusing manner the story of his musical life from the time he was a boy; told the story in so ingenuous, modest, humorous way, that it should disarm one from severe, much less capricious, criticism of his music. He undoubtedly has talent, which now seems to staid hearers with preconceived, or traditional ideals, wild and irregular. This symphony is a more mature work than his first, yet it is often yeasty. While the reproach of being a poseur, or of striving to make the bourgeois sit up and take notice, cannot justly be brought against him, the impression is made that the thematic treatment and the instrumentation are often experimental; that he too anxiously shuns what to him is the obvious that it might be said of him by his friends in defence, he hears music in his own way, not as even many of his colleagues hear it; that rhythm and curious orchestral effects, sudden and disconcerting contrasts, are more significant, more important to him, than even the orthodoxy of such widely differing geniuses as Strauss and Debussy.

At present Mr. Dukelsky belongs to the extreme radical wing, but there is a vigor, an intensity at times in this symphony that makes one forget the lack of emotional beauty as that beauty has long been and is now in certain quarters recognized. After all, music, as Mozart said, should "klingen." And what a delightful performance of Mozart's symphony was that of yesterday! As delightful as the performance of "Don Juan" was dramatically, superbly eloquent. Seldom is a conductor so sensitive and skilled as Dr. Koussevitzky in the interpretation of works by both composers, Strauss and Mozart. Seldom is an orchestra found that can so aid in the interpretation.

"Don Juan" and Till Eulenspiegel are the two of Strauss's orchestral works that bid fair to live. When he wrote "Don Juan" musical blood was hot in his veins. He might say of his Sinfonia Domestica and his Alpine Symphony, as Lenau's Don Juan: "The fire of my blood has now burned out. . . . Exhausted is the fuel."

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week's concert, the last of the season's, is announced as follows: Weber, overture to "Oberon"; Hill, "Lilacs" (after Amy Lowell); Ravel, Rapsodie Espagnole, Brahms, Symphony C Minor, No. 1.

Vladimir Dukelsky

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The 23d concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. Mozart, Symphony, C major (K. 338). Chadwick, Sinfonietta in D major. Dukelsky, Symphony, E flat major, No. 2 (first performance). Strauss, tone poem, "Don Juan."

Mr. Chadwick's overture to "Rip Van Winkle" was performed at a concert of the Harvard Musical Association in December, 1879, at a concert of the Handel and Haydn Society in May, 1880. His name first appeared on a program of the Boston Symphony orchestra on Jan. 13, 1883 (overture "Thalia"). It was eminently meet and proper that his jubilee should have been celebrated yesterday by the Boston Symphony orchestra, whose programs he has often enriched. The Sinfonietta, chosen for this occasion, was composed in 1904; the music is still fresh and pleasing by its firm structure, its melodic interest, its harmonic and orchestral expression, and above all by a musical enthusiasm that is kept within artistic bounds. This was no perfunctory work; the music was in the composer and it had to come out. Nor is the Sinfonietta too evidently of any school. There is individuality, which was rare among American composers at the time the Sinfonietta was written. And here, as in an earlier and famous Scherzo and in the earlier Symphonic Sketches there is more than the suggestion of the American spirit finding its voice in music. Perhaps today the first and second movements are the ones that command the most attention; the former by the thematic material—note the charming quasi oriental melody—and its development—Mr. Chadwick writing for orchestra has been especially happy in his use of the symphonic form; the second by the constant beauty of the musical thought, the melancholy that is poetic sentiment, and by the beautiful close with its exquisite orchestral invention.

Mr. Chadwick at the end of the Sinfonietta was most heartily applauded. One might borrow from newspaper jargon and say "he received an ovation," but this would do him an injustice, for among the ancient Romans an ovation was a lesser triumph, when the victorious general entered the city on horseback or on foot, not in a chariot, was crowned with myrtle, not with laurel, and only a sheep was sacrificed in his honor. Surely Mr. Chadwick for his musical activity during the 50 honorable years deserves the laurel.

Mr. Dukelsky, who was at the concert, is not a stranger here. Mr. Koussevitzky had already introduced a ballet-suite and a first symphony. Mr. Dukelsky has not yeached his 30th year—fortunate man! He has told in an amusing manner the story of his musical life from the time he was a boy; told the story in so ingenuous, modest, humorous way, that it should disarm one from severe, much less capitious, criticism of his music. He undoubtedly has talent, which now seems to staid hearers with preconceived, or traditional ideals, wild and irregular. This symphony is a more mature work than his first, yet it is often yeasty. While the reproach of being a poseur, or of striving to make the bourgeois sit up and take notice, cannot justly be brought against him, the impression is made that the thematic treatment and the instrumentation are often experimental; that he too anxiously shuns what to him is the obvious that it might be said of him by his friends in defence, he hears music in his own way, not as even many of his colleagues hear it; that rhythm and curious orchestral effects, sudden and disconcerting contrasts, are more significant, more important to him, than even the orthodoxy of such widely differing geniuses as Strauss and Debussy.

At present Mr. Dukelsky belongs to the extreme radical wing, but there is a vigor, an intensity at times in this symphony that makes one forget the lack of emotional beauty as that beauty has long been and is now in certain quarters recognized. After all, music, as Mozart said, should "klingen." And what a delightful performance of Mozart's symphony was that of yesterday! As delightful as the performance of "Don Juan" was dramatically, superbly eloquent. Seldom is a conductor so sensitive and skilled as Dr. Koussevitzky in the interpretation of works by both composers, Strauss and Mozart. Seldom is an orchestra found that can so aid in the interpretation.

"Don Juan" and Till Eulenspiegel are the two of Strauss's orchestral works that bid fair to live. When he wrote "Don Juan" musical blood was hot in his veins. He might say of his Sinfonia Domestica and his Alpine Symphony, as Lenau's Don Juan: "The fire of my blood has now burned out. . . . Exhausted is the fuel."

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week's concerts, the last of the season's, is announced as follows: Weber, overture to "Oberon;" Hill, "Lilacs" (after Amy Lowell); Ravel, Rapsodie Espagnole, Brahms, Symphony C Minor, No. 1.

SYMPHONY HOMAGE TO CHADWICK

His "Sinfonietta" of 50 Years Ago
Played

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Two composers were present to hear their music at the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon, one of them the other's senior by a matter of 49 years. This spring marks the 50th anniversary of George Whitfield Chadwick's American debut as composer, and Dr. Koussevitzky took cognizance of the fact in the performance of Mr. Chadwick's Sinfonietta while finding place on the same programme for the Second Symphony of Vladimir Dukelsky.

A Symphony of Mozart in C major and Strauss' "Don Juan" respectively began and ended a generally diverting concert.

CORDIAL TO CHADWICK

Even if he were avid of adulation, which distinctly he is not, Mr. Chadwick could not have failed to be pleased by the nature of his reception yesterday at the hands of his fellow-townsmen.

Time and again he was compelled to rise from his seat and bow his acknowledgment. In his turn Mr. Dukelsky was liberally applauded and recalled to the stage whither, in accordance with the present custom, he had betaken himself when the last note of his Symphony in D flat major had sounded.

It was possible to wish that, having decided to take official note of Mr. Chadwick's anniversary Dr. Koussevitzky had chosen a score more characteristic, more completely representative of that composer than this Sinfonietta, composed for a student orchestra and purposely written with a certain brevity, preciseness, and economy of musical and orchestral means and resources—for example, the four Symphonic Sketches now generally held to be his masterpiece. But this Sinfonietta, for all its unpretending nature, is in many respects typical of its author. It is buoyant, straightforward and to the point. The invention is free and flowing, the handling always secure. In it, as in much else that Mr. Chadwick has written, there is both a lyricism and a humor that are subtly yet unmistakably American.

Music of Youth

No doubt the idea never entered Dr. Koussevitzky's mind, yet, Mr. Chadwick's Sinfonietta aside, the concert of yesterday was given over to the music of youth. Mozart's Symphony and Strauss' "Don Juan" were each written at the symphonically tender age of 24, and Mr. Dukelsky's Symphony was finished not long after his 25th birthday. The comparison is, of course, unfair; but the fact remains that Mozart's Symphony and "Don Juan" are the works of composers already matured, while Mr. Dukelsky's Symphony shows the prentice hand.

It is to Mr. Dukelsky's credit that he endeavors to write, so far as his thematic invention is concerned, simply and naturally, that he does not disdain melody. But the themes of this Symphony, like those of its predecessor, already heard here, are without physiognomy. They are amiable but undistinguished, and they hardly bear the orchestral weight that they are asked to carry. Had Mr. Dukelsky moulded this same material into a Sinfonietta for chamber orchestra the result might have been happier.

Age Honored, Youth Heard, Heights Won

Symphony Concert Full-Laden, Chadwick and Dukelsky,
Mozart to Strauss

THE Symphony Concert, Friday afternoon, deserved its name. Thrice over it exhibited the symphonic form. (The end of the season draws near. Promised performances, anniversaries, unfulfilled purposes, what not, press upon conductors till program-making becomes less work of art than of necessity.) Fortunately, in two of the chosen instances, that form was shortened. Mr. Dukelsky's new Symphony contained no slow movement as such. Instead, in the Finale stood episodic slow measures; while the middle Minuet was by no means gay. In turn, Mozart's old Symphony—in C major (No. 34), last heard at Symphony Hall from Sir T. Beecham—omitted any Minuet gay or grave. Finally, Mr. Chadwick's Sinfonietta, though it arrayed all four of the orthodox divisions, kept each as short as the title suggested.

There was other offset to surfeit. For the first time within recollection two composers graced with their presence a single matinée. From the balcony the youthful Dukelsky descended to the stage to take two or three recalls after the performance of his Symphony. Twice the venerable Chadwick rose from his seat to acknowledge still heartier plaudits. . . . Finally, conductor and orchestra outdid themselves in musics so wide apart as the slow division of Mozart's Symphony (Salzburg, 1780) and Strauss's tone-poem, "Don Juan" (Munich, 1888). The performance of the latter—and the piece itself is still thrilling stuff—would have whipped any stranger audience into tumults of applause. Our complacent matinée company merely patted its hands long enough to bring back Dr. Koussevitzky; then streamed through the doors. With sound reason the conductor seemed more disposed to return thanks to the players, still hot with their prowess, than to the retreating audience. If the history-book once written about the Symphony is extended to the approaching it should contain an edifying on the customs of their public.

reception. Mr. Chadwick was honored by the program-book with four lines of black type. They noted the fact that years ago—come May 6—he made his first appearance in Boston as composer and conductor. To mark the occasion Dr. Koussevitzky was replete with the Sinfonietta. It will be further honored by a concert of Mr. Chadwick's at the Conservatory and by a dinner in his honor. The Sinfonietta itself written in 1904; last heard at the Symphony Concerts in 1910. To most ears, it came new, strange and, as it proved, surprising. For in later years—since there must be an advocate at festal occasions—Mr. Chadwick's just quality and worth have been passed. In his last productive days he worked in the symphonic poem in that neither quickened his imagination nor freed his hand. Most have short memories. The music that sat before "Aphrodite," "The Angel" and "The Adonais" tended to forget the composer Melpomene and the "Adonais" of the Second and the Third Symphonies, the Symphonic Sketches—Chadwickian masterpiece—and the Sinfonietta. The maker of symphonic music of thought and will, care and labor-effaced the free-handed craftsman, the warm inventor, the quick and spry, the humorous American, earlier time had applauded.

the surprise, yesterday, of the Sinfonietta. It is short, especially in the movements—and pithy brevity of the modernistic virtues. It is in high spirits; while to most ears Chadwick has long been a name as there were kings before Agamemnon—so there were composers of earlier scores before these current orchestral grace. One such is the Sinfonietta; dated 1904, Boston and England; while Ravel himself may the fancy and felicity of the horns against the sustaining the end of the slow movement. The Sinfonietta springs away—all elastic and high spirits; a quasi-oriental adds charm to vigor. There is of the working of the musical fertile is their course, so apt the mental vesture.

to believe some of our young might almost be a twentieth-century invention. Yet, "way back" in the past, Chadwick evolves a broad and march, as though for the game of the rhythms of his slow scherzo—less lightly and brightly

SYMPHONY HOMAGE TO CHADWICK

His "Sinfonietta" of 50 Years Ago
Played

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Two composers were present to hear their music at the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon, one of them the other's senior by a matter of 49 years. This spring marks the 50th anniversary of George Whitfield Chadwick's American debut as composer, and Dr. Koussevitzky took cognizance of the fact in the performance of Mr. Chadwick's Sinfonietta while finding place on the same programme for the Second Symphony of Vladimir Dukelsky.

A Symphony of Mozart in C major and Strauss' "Don Juan" respectively began and ended a generally diverting concert.

CORDIAL TO CHADWICK

Even if he were avid of adulation, which distinctly he is not, Mr. Chadwick could not have failed to be pleased by the nature of his reception yesterday at the hands of his fellow-town-

men. Time and again he was compelled to rise from his seat and bow his acknowledgment. In his turn Mr. Dukelsky was liberally applauded and recalled to the stage whither, in accordance with the present custom, he had betaken himself when the last note of his Symphony in D flat major had sounded.

It was possible to wish that, having decided to take official note of Mr. Chadwick's anniversary Dr. Koussevitzky had chosen a score more characteristic, more completely representative of that composer than this Sinfonietta, composed for a student orchestra and purposely written with a certain brevity, preciseness, and economy of musical and orchestral means and resources—for example, the four Symphonic Sketches now generally held to be his masterpiece. But this Sinfonietta, for all its unpretending nature, is in many respects typical of its author. It is buoyant, straightforward and to the point. The invention is free and flowing, the handling always secure. In it, as in much else that Mr. Chadwick has written, there is both a lyricism and a humor that are subtly yet unmistakably American.

Music of Youth

No doubt the idea never entered Dr. Koussevitzky's mind, yet, Mr. Chadwick's Sinfonietta aside, the concert of yesterday was given over to the music of youth. Mozart's Symphony and Strauss' "Don Juan" were each written at the symphonically tender age of 24, and Mr. Dukelsky's Symphony was finished not long after his 25th birthday. The comparison is, of course, unfair; but the fact remains that Mozart's Symphony and "Don Juan" are the works of composers already matured, while Mr. Dukelsky's Symphony shows the prentice hand.

It is to Mr. Dukelsky's credit that he endeavors to write, so far as his thematic invention is concerned, simply and naturally, that he does not disdain melody. But the themes of this Symphony, like those of its predecessor already heard here, are without physiognomy. They are amiable but undistinguished, and they hardly bear the orchestral weight that they are asked to carry. Had Mr. Dukelsky moulded this same material into a Sinfonietta for chamber orchestra the result might have been happier.

Age Honor Youth Height

Symphony Concert
Chadwick and Mozart to

THE Symphony afternoon, thrice over its phonic form. son draws near. Pro- anniversaries, unfulfilled, not, press upon cond- making becomes less, necessity.) Fortuna- chosen instances, th- ened. Mr. Dukelsky contained no slow. Instead, in the F# slow measures; while was by no means ga- old Symphony—in C heard at Symphon- Beecham—omitted) grave. Finally, M- fonietta, though it a orthodox divisions, the title suggested. There was other the first time we composers graced a single matinée. F- youthful Dukelsky to take two or three- formance of his S- venerable Chadwick to acknowledge st- . . . Finally, co- outdid themselves apart as the slow Symphony (Salzbur- tone-poem, "Don- The performance piece itself is still have whipped any- tumults of appla- matinée company long enough to b- vitzky; then strea- With sound reaso- more disposed to players, still hot to the retreating a book once written

Concerts is extended to the approaching jubilee, it should contain an edifying chapter on the customs of their public.

By exception. Mr. Chadwick was honored in the program-book with four lines of bold, black type. They noted the fact that fifty years ago—come May 6—he made his first appearance in Boston as composer and conductor. To mark the anniversary Dr. Koussevitzky was reviving the Sinfonietta. It will be further marked by a concert of Mr. Chadwick's music at the Conservatory and by a dinner in his honor. The Sinfonietta itself was written in 1904; last heard at the Symphony Concerts in 1910. To most, therefore, it came new, strange and, as the event proved, surprising. For in these latter years—since there must be a devil's advocate at festal occasions—Mr. Chadwick's just quality and worth have been eclipsed. In his last productive days he chose to work in the symphonic poem—a form that neither quickened his imagination nor freed his hand. Most publics have short memories. The musical generation that sat before "Aphrodite," "Tam o' Shanter" and "The Angel of Death" tended to forget the composer of the "Melpomene" and the "Adonais" overtures, of the Second and the Third Symphonies, the Symphonic Sketches—the Chadwickian masterpiece—and the Sinfonietta. The maker of symphonic poems out of thought and will, care and pains, over-effaced the free-handed craftsman, the warm inventor, the quick and fertile spirit, the humorous American, that an earlier time had applauded.

Hence the surprise, yesterday, of the Sinfonietta. It is short, especially in the last two movements—and pithy brevity is one of the modernistic virtues. It is written in high spirits; while to most of us Mr. Chadwick has long been a sage. As there were kings before Agamemnon, so there were composers of transparent scores before these current years of orchestral grace. One such is this Sinfonietta; dated 1904, Boston and New England; while Ravel himself might envy the fancy and felicity of the distant horns against the sustaining viola at the end of the slow movement. The beginning springs away—all elasticity and high spirits; a quasi-oriental motif adds charm to vigor. There is no sense of the working of the musical ideas, so fertile is their course, so apt the instrumental vesture.

Rhythm—to believe some of our young lions—might almost be a twentieth-century invention. Yet, "way back" in 1904, Mr. Chadwick evolves a broad and tingling march, as though for the game of it, out of the rhythms of his slow song; tosses about the rhythmic figures of his Scherzo—less lightly and brightly vealed, in con- timbres Mr. Dupments, thar th century," but therapeutic is more for mood is increasing for cerebration; at we shall he prefers warm ady do, thar ency. Possibly for of liabilities twentieth-century

What the most of the usual therapeutic hose the unusual pretty diffi-C-sharp minor in or his Symphony. The feeling of feeling as in man and the wanderings of the wanderer. A digression. Now, the future of the fanciful interest. In the Finale Mr. Strauss dreams until the orchestra possess him. Toward the end of his career, the zest of him as a roadrunner. Not for a moment and a bet—down—if his tempering thereat. And if he does some of it now and then at a less inclination, he less imitates his own way—to an influence will come disease is—disease is—maladapted after another in the of saying, Mozart that began unhappy though through that tion in Salzburg, he he mentally out." now in one same and another. For the mental dis- movement might be personal un- tive, lightly ornate objects, not ed off" to please the at of sci- or such generous correction, geis Haffners. Pos-as worthy ce yesterday a little ases of the t in it are moments from the ozartear. perfection, ple of man's rteen sensibility—a are more odulation made, a i—come uppermost.

realize that, is a transparent and are one ing, blown again, civilization,

In Strauss's "Don Juan," which was closing piece, what did conductor and orchestra not do? They were rich-toned and sensuous. They teemed with vitalizing energy; strode in splendor; sang passionately, deliriously; etched and colored; cut sharp and knife-like. Through a music that time and change and fashion may not dim, burned the Straussian flame. Once more Don Juan himself leaped into tonal being. This page and that, and he was full characterized and panoplied. Measures of passionate sensuousness and as passionate disillusion. The horns sounding the ceaseless quest, the quenchless desire, the interminable adventure; voluptuous tumult, voluptuous torment; at the last, the dissonance of extinction. Music more completely and potently accomplishing its end has not been written in our time. Seldom in Symphony Hall has it received such intensive and all-prevailing performance. And after that Andante of Mozart! Every conductor, every orchestra, must be as manifold as—music itself.

H. T. P.

His Second Symphony for First Times, with Chadwick in Anniversary Days

Invoice. — Apr. 24, 1930

ON the twenty-third program of the season Dr. Koussevitzky places its last novelty, Vladimir Dukelsky's second Symphony, in D-flat. Mr. Dukelsky is no stranger to these concerts. Excerpts from his ballet, "Zephyr and Flore," as well as his first symphony have been played under Dr. Koussevitzky's baton. The key D-flat is an unusual one for a symphony. Memory does not recall another. Asked yesterday morning whether the key had any special significance, Dr. Dukelsky replied: "The key of D-flat has always fascinated me. I chose it because of the special color it has when played by orchestral instruments. Prokofiev's concerto in the same key first gave me the idea of a symphony in this key." The symphony, which is in manuscript, bears the date 1928. Yesterday at a rehearsal ukelsky, with protesting up-

 ands and horror in his eye,
 he complete absence of any pro-
 Which makes him neither more than a child of his own day. s are decidedly not in the mode
 it. The three movements of the y in D-flat follow the orthodox le plan: the first Allegro mod-a sonata-form; it is followed by no more than two minutes in which, ending somewhat tenu-
 also introduction for the finale,
 Spanish Zapateado.

...the heavens be praised,
dared to write a melody. There ly a single theme in the three its which is not frankly and ely melodic. Withal, there is a and a buoyancy in its rhythms is or that devotee or the good een may consider lacking in the suitable to so lofty a form as phony. Again, in his rhythm, elsky is a child of his day. Harof course draw upon all the re-which the last few decades have
into existence.

two introductory measures oboes principal theme. This is developed repeatedly extensively. With a down of the tempo comes the theme, warmly from the strings, religious in character. The exposition of themes ends quietly in D. The working-out section follows and begins by introducing a theme, which serves as the subject matter. But this new theme is used as a counterpoint to the main theme of the movement, which soon enters an episode in the fugue. The played than the other three m——as to the manner born. An Finale—to crown the whole—high-humored, robustious, hones ican Chadwick. He is fling rondo-fashion; singing loud ashamed; even dashing it here with sentiment—the more Ame

Our composers go their several Heaven, this life and the art have made them. Not one was, masculine as this Chadwick of h and fifties, before symphon sapped him.

Over one of his piano-pieces B wrote "Sonata quasi una Fantasia inappropriately, Mr. Dukelsky have written over his Symphon flat, heard for the first time in any concert-hall, "Sinfonia q Fantasia." True, the first mov orthodoxy itself—principal, sec third theme, fugato in the mi prise, coda—all that symphon may exact. Forthwith, howe Dukelsky begins to stray f straight and narrow path. Hi division is one of the shortest dance-like of symphonic Minuet a moody motif it unfolds, short through harmonies that turn it melancholy. The first measures of t mock it with snapping Spanish and high tonal colors. The Eng sobers and stays them. By grac curial temperament, Mr. Duke turns to melancholy and is song and twice, as though to say to t ring Spanish rhythm "Get the me, Satan." So to a close in mouthed sonorities dear to any young composer with a many-v chestra for his playground.

By this evidence a symphony individuality. Mr. Dukelsky has a design to please himself, filled complished it. (Incidentally th pal motif of the first movement
ing in the Finale, holds it well t
No less, this design imposes its hearers, interesting and pleasur For aught the listener knows, M sky may "toll terribly" at his table; but in the concert-hall he with abundant spontaneity and animation. Unquestionably he gift of melodic invention. His ripen, but not over-ripen, into measures. As yet this melody be too distinguished or bear a Dukelskian trade-mark; but it warm, ingratiating. There is n it, and also mood. Being "twenti ture," Mr. Dukelsky is keen for plies it variously and invigorating age for subtleties, unless a com over-cerebral—or a pupil of Schö comes not at twenty-seven.

For harmonies and timbres Mr. Du kelsky is also "twentieth century," but with the harmonies he is more for mood and suggestion than for cerebration;
while with the timbres he prefers warm clang to pale transparency. Possibly for its plangency out of a twentieth-century orchestra—piano and most of the usual window-dressing—he chose the unusual key of D-flat major—C-sharp minor in the slow episodes—for his Symphony.
And he can be as changeable of feeling as the mixed blood in him and the wander ing life he has led may warrant. A dig nified young composer writes the first movement largely, warmly, vigorously.
Melancholy streaks the fanciful inter mezzo of the Minuet. In the Finale Mr.
Dukelsky dances or dreams until the sonorities of the orchestra possess him.
The eagerness, the glow, the zest of him commend his Symphony. Not for a while need he "settle down"—if his tem perament ever permits. And if he does glance over his shoulder now and then at his admired Prokofiev, he less imitates than reacts—in his own way—to an influ ence.

There is one style after another in the little Symphony of Mozart that began the afternoon, as though through that summer of composition in Salzburg, he was "feeling himself out," now in one direction, again in another. For the most part, the first movement might be the suave, decorative, lightly ornate music that he "turned off" to please the Cardinal-Archbishop or such generous patrons as the bourgeois Haffners. Pos sibly, the performance yesterday a little over-weighted it. Yet in it are moments in which the cool Mozartean perfection, the exquisite Mozartean sensibility—a phrase shaped, a modulation made, a figure set in motion—come uppermost.
The Finale, in turn, is a transparent bubble, blown, breaking, blown again, sparkling and gay.

Believably the slow movement pre serves the little Symphony. For here is Mozart, pensive, melancholy, romantic (if the hearer likes) but unfailingly limpid, lucid and precise. Blend mood, matter, form and means and they coa lesce into a cloudless loveliness that is the Mozartian perfection that most evades twentieth-century performance. With an infinite pains, Dr. Koussevitzky, the strings and the shadowing bassoons—the rest of the orchestra is silent—gained it.
The tone was transparent; the shaping of every contour delicately clear and exact: the light flow of the music itself. Yet underneath this gentle brightness as gentle a melancholy. At times it varies and invigorating ideal that his imagination raises. Once and again in the concert he captures it—as yesterday in this Andante of Mozart.

In Strauss's "Don Juan," which was closing piece, what did conductor and or chestra not do? They were rich-toned and sensuous. They teemed with vitalizing energy; strode in splendor; sang passion ately, deliriously; etched and colored; cut sharp and knife-like. Through a music that time and change and fashion may not dim, burned the Straussian flame.
Once more Don Juan himself leaped into tonal being. This page and that, and he was full characterized and panoplied. Mea sures of passionate sensuousness and as passionate disillusion. The horns sounding the ceaseless quest, the quenchless desire, the interminable adventure; voluptuous tumult, voluptuous torment; at the last, the dissonance of extinction. Music more completely and potently accomplishing its end has not been written in our time.
Seldom in Symphony Hall has it received such intensive and all-prevailing perform ance. And after that Andante of Mozart!
Every conductor, every orchestra, must be as manifold as—music itself.

H. T. P.

New Dukelsky For Symphony Hall Hearing

His Second Symphony for First Times, with Chadwick in Anniversary Days

—Apr. 24, 1930

ON the twenty-third program of the the season Dr. Koussevitzky places its last novelty, Vladimir Dukelsky's second Symphony, in Mr. Dukelsky is no stranger to these concerts. Excerpts from his ballet,
"Zephyr and Flore," as well as his first symphony have been played under Dr.
Koussevitzky's baton. The key D-flat is an unusual one for a symphony. Mem ory does not recall another. Asked yes terday morning whether the key had any special significance, Dr. Dukelsky re plied: "The key of D-flat has always fascinated me. I chose it because of the color it has when played by orchestral instruments. Prokofiev's con certo in the same key first gave me the idea of a symphony in this key." The symphony, which is in manuscript, bears the date 1928. Yesterday at a rehearsal first time its young composer heard it in other than his imag or his four-hand piano version.

if you please, is a world-

Dukelsky, with protesting up
ands and horror in his eye,
he complete absence of any pro
which makes him neither more than a child of his own day.
are decidedly not in the mode
it. The three movements of the y in D-flat follow the orthodox ic plan: the first Allegro mod
a sonata-form; it is followed by
no more than two minutes in
which, ending somewhat tenu
also introduction for the finale,
Spanish Zapateado.

Dukelsky, the heavens be praised,
dared to write a melody. There
ly a single theme in the three
its which is not frankly and ely melodic. Withal, there is a
and a buoyancy in its rhythms
is or that devotee or the good een may consider lacking in the
suitable to so lofty a form as phony. Again, in his rhythm,
elsky is a child of his day. Har
if course draw upon all the re which the last few decades have
into existence.

two introductory measures oboes principal theme. This is devel d repeated extensively. With a down of the tempo comes the heme, warmly from the strings, ligious in character. The ex of themes ends quietly in D
The working-out section follows tely and begins by introducing a me, which serves as the subject
ue. But this new theme is used as a counterpoint to the main f the movement, which soon en an episode in the fugue. The ation is perfectly normal and

The second theme, however, Vladimir harmonic background and is in abbreviated. The coda is of toted rhythmical design.
port minuet, whose theme is also oly mood than the minuet of symphonies. There is no trio.
of theme of the finale is in the
and the manner of the Spanish or which it is named—the Zapa An English horn introduces the ntrasting melodic idea. Through hythmic variants the chief theme At least twice one hears the ntrasting theme. There is a so hymn-like ending.

played than the other three m—as to the manner born. An Finale—to crown the whole—high-humored, robustious, honest Chadwick. He is flinging rondo-fashion; singing loud ashamed; even dashing it here with sentiment—the more American composers go their several Heaven, this life and the art have made them. Not one was masculine as this Chadwick of his and fifties, before symphony sapped him.

Over one of his piano-pieces he wrote "Sonata quasi una Fantasia." Inappropriately, Mr. Dukelsky have written over his Symphony in D-flat, heard for the first time in any concert-hall, "Sinfonia quasi Fantasia." True, the first movement orthodox itself—principal, second theme, fugato in the middle, coda—all that symphony may exact. Forthwith, however, Dukelsky begins to stray from straight and narrow path. His division is one of the shortest dance-like of symphonic Minuet, a moody motif it unfolds, short, through harmonies that turn it melancholy. The first measures of the mock it with snapping Spanish and high tonal colors. The English sobers and stays them. By graceful curial temperament, Mr. Dukelsky turns to melancholy and is song, and twice, as though to say to the ring Spanish rhythm "Get thee me, Satan." So to a close in mouthed sonorities dear to any young composer with a many-voiced orchestra for his playground.

By this evidence a symphony individuality. Mr. Dukelsky has a design to please himself, filled with abundant spontaneity and animation. Unquestionably he has the gift of melodic invention. His ripen, but not over-ripen, into measures. As yet this melody is not too distinguished or bear a Dukelskian trade-mark; but it is warm, ingratiating. There is no exact: the light flow of the music is it, and also mood. Being "twenty-first century," Mr. Dukelsky is keen for brightness as gentle a melancholy. At times it variously and invigorating rehearsal Dr. Koussevitzky pursues the age for subtleties, unless a complete over-cerebral—or a pupil of Schoenberg comes not at twenty-seven.

For harmonies and timbres Mr. Dukelsky is also "twentieth century," but with the harmonies he is more for mood and suggestion than for cerebration; while with the timbres he prefers warm clang to pale transparency. Possibly for its plangency out of a twentieth-century orchestra—piano and most of the usual window-dressing—he chose the unusual key of D-flat major—C-sharp minor in the slow episodes—for his Symphony. And he can be as changeable of feeling as the mixed blood in him and the wandering life he has led may warrant. A dignified young composer writes the first movement largely, warmly, vigorously. Melancholy streaks the fanciful intermezzo of the Minuet. In the Finale Mr. Dukelsky dances or dreams until the sonorities of the orchestra possess him. The eagerness, the glow, the zest of him commend his Symphony. Not for a while need he "settle down"—if his temperament ever permits. And if he does glance over his shoulder now and then at his admired Prokofiev, he less imitates than reacts—in his own way—to an influence.

There is one style after another in the little Symphony of Mozart that began the afternoon, as though through that summer of composition in Salzburg, he was "feeling himself out," now in one direction, again in another. For the most part, the first movement might be the suave, decorative, lightly ornate music that he "turned off" to please the Cardinal-Archbishop or such generous patrons as the bourgeois Haffners. Possibly, the performance yesterday a little over-weighted it. Yet in it are moments in which the cool Mozartean perfection, the exquisite Mozartean sensibility—a phrase shaped, a modulation made, a figure set in motion—come uppermost. The Finale, in turn, is a transparent bubble, blown, breaking, blown again, sparkling and gay.

Believably the slow movement preserves the little Symphony. For here is Mozart, pensive, melancholy, romantic (if the hearer likes) but unflinching, limpid, lucid and precise. Blend mood, matter, form and means and they coalesce into a cloudless loveliness that is the Mozartian perfection that most evades twentieth-century performance. With an infinite pains, Dr. Koussevitzky, the strings and the shadowing bassoons—the rest of the orchestra is silent—gained it. The tone was transparent; the shaping of every contour delicately clear and warm, ingratiating. There is no exact: the light flow of the music is it, and also mood. Being "twenty-first century," Mr. Dukelsky is keen for brightness as gentle a melancholy. At times it variously and invigorating rehearsal Dr. Koussevitzky pursues the age for subtleties, unless a complete over-cerebral—or a pupil of Schoenberg comes not at twenty-seven.

In Strauss's "Don Juan" closing piece, what did the orchestra not do? They were sensuous. They teemed energy; strode in splendorately, deliriously; etched sharp and knife-like, that time and change not dim, burned the Once more Don Juan tonal being. This page was full characterized by aures of passionate and passionate disillusion. The ceaseless quest, the the interminable adventure, tumult, voluptuous for the dissonance of extinction completely and potent its end has not been without Seldom in Symphony has such intensive and all-pervading. And after that Every conductor, every be as manifold as—music.

This was the first time its young composer had ever heard it in other than his imagination—or his four-hand piano version. For this, if you please, is a world-première.

Mr. Dukelsky, with protesting up-raised hands and horror in his eye, affirms the complete absence of any program. Which makes him neither more nor less than a child of his own day. Programs are decidedly not in the mode at present. The three movements of the Symphony in D-flat follow the orthodox symphonic plan: the first Allegro moderato is a sonata-form; it is followed by a minuet no more than two minutes in length which, ending somewhat tenuously, is also introduction for the finale, a lively Spanish Zapateado.

Mr. Dukelsky, the heavens be praised, is not afraid to write a melody. There is scarcely a single theme in the three movements which is not frankly and wholesomely melodic. Withal, there is a lightness and a buoyancy in its rhythms which this or that devotee or the good old has been may consider lacking in the dignity suitable to so lofty a form as the symphony. Again, in his rhythm, Mr. Dukelsky is a child of his day. Harmonies of course draw upon all the resources which the last few decades have brought into existence.

After two introductory measures oboes sing the principal theme. This is developed and repeated extensively. With a slowing down of the tempo comes the second theme, warmly from the strings, quasi-religious in character. The exposition of themes ends quietly in D major. The working-out section follows immediately and begins by introducing a new theme, which serves as the subject of a fugue. But this new theme is used chiefly as a counterpoint to the main theme of the movement, which soon enters—as an episode in the fugue. The recapitulation is perfectly normal and regular. The second theme, however, has a new harmonic background and is somewhat abbreviated. The coda is of syncopated rhythmical design.

The short minuet, whose theme is also melodic, moves more slowly and in more melancholy mood than the minuet of classical symphonies. There is no trio. The chief theme of the finale is in the rhythm and the manner of the Spanish Dance for which it is named—the Zapateado. An English horn introduces the chief contrasting melodic idea. Through several rhythmic variants the chief theme moves. At least twice one hears the lyric, contrasting theme. There is a sonorous, hymn-like ending.

New Dukelsky For Symphony Hall

His Second Symphony Times, with C Anniversary

ON the twenty-first of the season places its last Dukelsky's second symphony. These concerts. Except "Zephyr and Flore," these symphonies have been unusual one for a day does not recall yesterday morning when any special significance applied: "The key of far color me. I chose orchestral instruments, certainly in the same key idea of a symphony symphony, which is the date 1928. Yesterday

"Novelty" of 1904

Fittingly, since these are anniversary days for Mr. Chadwick, a work of his comes to hearing at these concerts. For "novel" old piece, his Sinfonietta in D, from 1904, has place on this program. Fittingly it may receive a few paragraphs here. Fittingly (for the third and last time), the reviewers who heard it in 1904 when Mr. Chadwick conducted it, and those who heard it in 1910 from Mr. Fiedler, may be called upon for descriptive phrases. Be it said first that the sinfonietta takes only about twenty minutes for performance, that it is cast into four short movements—Risolutamente, Canzonetta, Scherzino, Finale.

From the reviewers of 1904 and 1910, we learn then, that this sinfonietta is "masculine music—robust, elastic, a music of high spirits," that Mr. Chadwick "dared to write as man for man." From other hands we learn that it is "purling, babbling music, light and transparent. The prevailing character of the music, with its lively, snappy motives, is a little Scotch and more plain, home-brewed American." (And this in pre-Volsteadian days!) One reads about the "free untrammelled vein" of the chief theme of the first movement, of "a subordinate theme that is one of the most charmingly Oriental bits imaginable," of another subordinate theme that "smacks of the soil" that (one presumes from its near-Negroid character) is "post-Dvorakian." Knowing Mr. Chadwick, one is sure that he must have appreciated "post Dvorakian."

One learns also that the song of the Canzonetta by the repetition and insistence upon its rhythms develops into a formidable march. But no reviewer called more than passing attention to the beautiful horn call, to be played very softly, at the end of this movement, a solo viola all the while sustaining a high harmonic above it. One finds still further that the piquantly rhythmized scherzo has a "pastoral trio," that the finale is "frankly tuneful, well rhythmized, full of vitality."—One looks upon the score and finds these several items of the reviewers graven upon its pages. In conclusion one may quote, "In the Sinfonietta, his latest work, Mr. Chadwick has probably reached his high water mark." And the Sinfonietta is by no means an early work: at least three symphonies and the Symphonic Sketches, as well as many things of smaller proportions, had been written.

A. H. M.

ETS

ment ons!

need,
ment

HOP
ON

ch

REET

t s

G

rs in

CO.

on

Orchestra

program but one the indefatigable st introduce a Boston Symphony concert of April 25, the first time any—d Symphony of that young Russian—those First Sym—Suite from the Flore," had preceded to us by Dr. composer is that an who was "disileff, who writes under an assumed appeared in vaude—t it be known that ernism," but loves ry clever and very you see, whose ty are manifested cores. In a some—career he has by d what has been essors. Indeed, he hest compliment. is cast in three n the second is a o. It has broad distinction, and y upon dance ky in Tin-Pan

George Whitfield tor of the New y of Music, who ring the fiftieth t public appear—conductor, this a" was included posed in 1904, it esh and charm—elodic material. g Scherzino for ere was much nguished com—nt to bow his with a beauti—rformance of C major. No. a lambent auss's "Don L. A. S.

LIGHT PROGRAM AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

First Performance of Dukelsky's Symphony

Chadwick's Sinfonietta Marks 50th Anniversary of Debut

Dr Koussevitzky chose a program of light music for yesterday's Symphony concert, omitting from it Skriabin's "Divine Poem," originally announced, and adding an early Mozart symphony in C major, and Strauss' "Don Juan." The other numbers were as at first planned, a new symphony by Dukelsky, and a sinfonietta by George Whitefield Cradwick, performed to mark the 50th anniversary of Mr Chadwick's Boston debut.

Mr Dukelsky, who was present to hear his new symphony, came to the stage to bow his acknowledgments of the applause. Mr Chadwick, wishing, perhaps, to minimize the demonstration to be expected from the audience, contented himself with rising and bowing in his place midway on the floor of the hall. The audience applauded him heartily, and Dr Koussevitzky and the orchestra also clapped him.

"Light" is not the adjective one would commonly choose to describe a program including two symphonies and a sinfonietta. But neither Mozart, Chadwick nor Dukelsky wrote in the music heard yesterday with the ponderous intricacy and the considerable lengths one commonly expects of symphonies old and new.

Each in his own way composed ingratiating music, easy to listen to, making no great exactions upon mind or emotions. Strauss' "Don Juan" is much more intricate and much more intensely emotional than these three pieces of symphonic character. But Strauss' tone poem, too, is light compared to his "Ein Heldenleben" or "Zarathustra."

Mr Chadwick, born at Lowell in 1854, made his first public appearance as a musician at a concert of the Handel and Haydn Society in Boston, May 6, 1880, when he conducted a performance of his overture, "Rip Van Winkle." At the New England Conservatory, of which Mr Chadwick has long been the director, an anniversary concert of his music is announced for May 6, 1930, with the "Rip Van Winkle" overture on the program. At the Eastman School in Rochester, N. Y., the anniversary was recently commemorated by the performance of some of Mr Chadwick's music.

The Sinfonietta in D major heard yesterday was written in 1904. Hearing it yesterday, one wished younger American composers might learn from Mr Chadwick the virtues of clarity, simplicity and sincerity of style. His music is always honestly and unpretentiously American. His Americanism owes nothing to the music of the redmen, or of the Negro, or of Broadway.

He, with a unique wisdom, faces the fact that we have not yet in this country a distinctively national type of music, and contents himself with the musical idiom natural to an American of his generation, brought up on the sort of thing to be heard when he was a young man in what Whitman would have called the "churches and parlors," and subsequently well grounded in European masterpieces.

It speaks volumes for Mr Chadwick's native originality that his music, unlike that of most Americans, never recalls the work of any one composer. His style is a personal one, and in this Sinfonietta he has something agreeable to say, which he says modestly and gracefully. It is hard to see how an American composer of his generation could have done more than Mr Chadwick has accomplished in all his chief works, unless he had been a genius of the very first rank, a Bach, a Beethoven or a Wagner, able to transcend the limits that condition the work of those lesser men who belong to but never originate schools or periods of music.

Dukelsky's Symphony in the unusual key of D flat, of which yesterday's was the first public performance, has something of the spontaneity that distinguishes Mr Chadwick's music. Like most of the young men born since 1900, Dukelsky is self-consciously clever in some of his musical devices. Unlike most of them, he is quite free from pedantry and priggishness.

This little symphony is full of jolly tunes, and without needless complexities of style. It convinced one hearer that, could he but find somebody to play Gilbert to his Sullivan, Dukelsky would help give the world something now greatly to be desired and not to be had, an operette that would appeal both to the general public and to fastidious tastes.

"Novelty" of 1904

Fittingly, since these are anniversary days for Mr. Chadwick, a work comes to hearing at these concerts, "novel" old piece, his Sinfonietta from 1904, has place on this program. Fittingly it may receive a few paragraphs here. Fittingly (for the third or fourth time), the reviewers who heard it when Mr. Chadwick conducted it, those who heard it in 1910 from Fiedler, may be called upon for descriptive phrases. Be it said first that the Sinfonietta takes only about twenty minutes for performance, that it is cast in short movements—Risolutamente, Zonetta, Scherzino, Finale.

From the reviewers of 1904 and we learn then, that this Sinfonietta "masculine music—robust, elastic, full of high spirits," that Mr. Chadwick "dared to write as man for man." In other hands we learn that it is "pompous music, light and transparent." The prevailing character of the music, with its lively, snappy motives, is Scotch and more plain, homely, American. (And this in pre-Volsky days!) One reads about the "frustrated vein" of the chief theme of the first movement, of "a subordinate theme that is one of the most charmingly Oriental bits imaginable," of a subordinate theme that "smacks of soil" that (one presumes from its Negro character) is "post-Dvorak." Knowing Mr. Chadwick, one is sure he must have appreciated "post-Dvorakian."

One learns also that the song Canzonetta by the repetition of assistance upon its rhythms develops a formidable march. But no more called more than passing attention beautiful horn call, to be played softly, at the end of this movement solo viola all the while sustaining harmonic above it. One finds still further that the piquantly rhythmical has a "pastoral trio," that the first "frankly tuneful, well rhythmical, vitality."—One looks upon the score finds these several items of the composers graven upon its pages. In his latest work, Mr. Chadwick has ably reached his high water mark. The Sinfonietta is by no means a work; at least three symphonies and Symphonic Sketches, as well as things of smaller proportions, have been written.

Boston Orchestra

Even on his last program but one of the season, the indefatigable Koussevitzky must introduce a novelty. Thus the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at its concert of April 25, made public for the first time anywhere the Second Symphony of Vladimir Dukelsky, that young Russian expatriate whose First Symphony and whose Suite from the ballet, "Zéphyr et Flore," had previously been unfolded to us by Dr. Koussevitzky. The composer is that irresistible young man who was "discovered" by Diaghileff, who writes "musical thrillers" under an assumed name, who has appeared in vaudeville and who has let it be known that he "hates all modernism," but loves being modern. A very clever and very facile young man, you see, whose cleverness and facility are manifested in his symphonic scores. In a somewhat breath-taking career he has by no means overlooked what has been done by his predecessors. Indeed, he pays them the highest compliment. This new symphony is cast in three movements, of which the second is a very brief Menuetto. It has broad melodies which lack distinction, and it depends heavily upon dance rhythms. Tchaikovsky in Tin-Pan-Alley.

In honor of George Whitfield Chadwick, the director of the New England Conservatory of Music, who is celebrating this spring the fiftieth anniversary of his first public appearance as composer and conductor, this musician's "Sinfonietta" was included in the program. Composed in 1904, it sounded remarkably fresh and charming. It abounds in melodic material, and it has a captivating Scherzino for its third movement. There was much applause for the distinguished composer, who was present to bow his acknowledgements.

The concert opened with a beautifully proportioned performance of Mozart's Symphony in C major, No. 34, and closed with a lambent proclamation of Strauss's "Don Juan."

L. A. S.

LIGHT PROGRAM AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

First Performance of Dukelsky's Symphony

Chadwick's Sinfonietta Marks 50th Anniversary of Debut

Dr. Koussevitzky chose a program of light music for yesterday's Symphony concert, omitting from it Skriabin's "Divine Poem," originally announced, and adding an early Mozart symphony in C major, and Strauss' "Don Juan." The other numbers were as at first planned, a new symphony by Dukelsky, and a Sinfonietta by George Whitfield Chadwick, performed to mark the 50th anniversary of Mr. Chadwick's Boston debut.

Mr. Dukelsky, who was present to hear his new symphony, came to the stage to bow his acknowledgments of the applause. Mr. Chadwick, wishing, perhaps, to minimize the demonstration to be expected from the audience, contented himself with rising and bowing in his place midway on the floor of the hall. The audience applauded him heartily, and Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra also clapped him.

"Light" is not the adjective one would commonly choose to describe a program including two symphonies and a Sinfonietta. But neither Mozart, Chadwick nor Dukelsky wrote in the music heard yesterday with the ponderous intricacy and the considerable lengths one commonly expects of symphonies old and new.

Each in his own way composed ingratiating music, easy to listen to, making no great exactions upon mind or emotions. Strauss' "Don Juan" is much more intricate and much more intensely emotional than these three pieces of symphonic character. But Strauss' tone poem, too, is light compared to his "Ein Heldenleben" or "Zarathustra."

Mr. Chadwick, born at Lowell in 1854, made his first public appearance as a musician at a concert of the Handel and Haydn Society in Boston, May 6, 1880, when he conducted a performance of his overture, "Rip Van Winkle." At the New England Conservatory, of which Mr. Chadwick has long been the director, an anniversary concert of his music is announced for May 6, 1930, with the "Rip Van Winkle" overture on the program. At the Eastman School in Rochester, N. Y., the anniversary was recently commemorated by the performance of some of Mr. Chadwick's music.

The Sinfonietta in D major heard yesterday was written in 1904. Hearing it yesterday, one wished younger American composers might learn from Mr. Chadwick the virtues of clarity, simplicity and sincerity of style. His music is always honestly and unpretentiously American. His Americanism owes nothing to the music of the redmen, or of the Negro, or of Broadway.

He, with a unique wisdom, faces the fact that we have not yet in this country a distinctively national type of music, and contents himself with the musical idiom natural to an American of his generation, brought up on the sort of thing to be heard when he was a young man in what Whitman would have called the "churches and parlors," and subsequently well grounded in European masterpieces.

It speaks volumes for Mr. Chadwick's native originality that his music, unlike that of most Americans, never recalls the work of any one composer. His style is a personal one, and in this Sinfonietta he has something agreeable to say, which he says modestly and gracefully. It is hard to see how an American composer of his generation could have done more than Mr. Chadwick has accomplished in all his chief works, unless he had been a genius of the very first rank, a Bach, a Beethoven or a Wagner, able to transcend the limits that condition the work of those lesser men who belong to but never originate schools or periods of music.

Dukelsky's Symphony in the unusual key of D flat, of which yesterday's was the first public performance, has something of the spontaneity that distinguishes Mr. Chadwick's music. Like most of the young men born since 1900, Dukelsky is self-consciously clever in some of his musical devices. Unlike most of them, he is quite free from pedantry and priggishness.

This little symphony is full of jolly tunes, and without needless complexities of style. It convinced one hearer that, could he but find somebody to play Gilbert to his Sullivan, Dukelsky would help give the world something now greatly to be desired and not to be had, an operette that would appeal both to the general public and to fastidious tastes.

Prokofieff and Gershwin, to whom Mr Dukelsky is obviously indebted for helpful musical influence upon his budding talent, could probably do the same. But all our young Gilberts are sad young men, disillusioned sentimentalists, like Aldous Huxley and Noel Coward. Mr Coward's one commercially successful operetta, "Bittersweet," is not lively and amusing enough to have Dukelsky music. But he could do another, and a better, perhaps.

The Mozart symphony, which Koussevitzky had conducted here before, was again badly played yesterday. His version of "Don Juan" was again eloquent and thrilling. P. R.

Itzky's Year at Symphony Hall

British, No Routine, s, Few Regrets,
ns Fostered

ISOR texts before their rehearsal Dr. Koussevitzky's plans for the current Symphony Concerts. Rather, rambling retrospect. al number on the list, a little Symphony of r. The first and the movements are bright a them conductor and remarkable lightness motion, resiliency and The vice-one. The intervening as played with rare d All, in and accent, grace of p-operated ce. Throughout, the arler civil quality in general, the med has of this Symphony in lounded and unalloyed. e present sified because neither has been success; but each was in India, animated. Through- be to pre-estra was adept, re- by the responsive, instrument. d his folag the record—a ted- als to the in the course of the ent situa- oof of such merit. hi. is a pretty, if rather nizes that to knock about in o write his concert-hall as a t some In- urt. But inspiration of friend- earsal accomplishes ment and til every detail of ovement of ad and fixed in the er recalled, nveyed to the or- Legislative shed and enlivened, ho viceroymselves, ease and llation. In his prepared con- That policyenters only when ong as the and testing oca- nment must spontaneity. Most Koussevitzky as the ster of the orches- ill, whipping it to t, through himself, ice and life. They forget the other Koussevitzky, tireless in the mutual work of rehearsal, ceaseless in the pursuit of perfection, discovering the means thereto, imposing them to the utmost of human limitation. Yet it is this Koussevitzky who achieves such performances as that of Mozart's little Symphony or, with Mr. Schnabel, of Brahms's full-freighted Piano-Concertos. Oftener than most, conductor and orchestra gain this adeptness. At the will of the composer into beauty it flowers. When they fall short, remember the human variability of creative or re-creative work.

At the other end of the program last week stood Strauss's tone-poem, "Don Juan." Repertory piece—said the knowing—always half-ready after thirty years of performance at Symphony Hall, convenient to fill a gap in the list. Yet when the final dissonance sounded, one and all had heard the poem with the first fires renewed, the passion of proclamation and progress fresh-heated, the power intensified, the sensuous and the characterizing quality deep-bitten into listening imagination. Excitement done, admiration hesitated between the sweep, glow and pulse of the whole, the lucidity, significance and proportioning of each detail. Had the moment been the first, performance of a new-found and acclaimed masterpiece, conductor and orchestra could not have been more on their mettle. Nor was this "Don Juan" a mere occasion, a tour de force, springing out of nowhere, into it vanishing. In these years at Symphony Hall, it is custom to play "standard pieces" as though they were discoveries, not obligations or conveniences; to reanimate muscles long neglected. A new life gives them reason.

For Dr. Koussevitzky there is no routine. In his little book about acting Mr. Gillette insisted that the player must nightly create "the illusion of the first time." That is to say, his speech and action must seem the impulse and the expression of the given moment newly experienced. Dr. Koussevitzky is the perpetual embodiment of that illusion. How many times here and elsewhere has he conducted in the Symphonies of Chaikovsky, Beethoven, Brahms, Schumann, in miscellaneous pieces out of Ravel, Debussy, Strauss, other standard composers? The patient editor of the program-book, with a taste for statistics, might hardly count them. Yet each performance seems a new adventure for Dr. Koussevitzky, awakening and stretching his technical powers, quickening his insight, enlarging or correcting his imagination, stirring him to ampler or finer accomplishment. Even the "New World"

hony of Dvorak, the "organ" Symphony of Saint-Saens, the "Alpine Symphony" of Strauss, nothing daunt him. Conductor has two imperative duties he classics—to make them sound sh and vital, after years, as they the first audiences; to make them also as a new generation of listeners would hear them. (If the shade of e were to revisit Symphony nd conduct in the First or the Symphony of Brahms, most of us believe his version deplorably unnatural. If we listened to Weingartner thoven, we should count the perice no better than mid-Victorian.) luctor is equally bound to keep to ginal conviction with the more en- moderns—that from them pro- new rhythm, new color, new manip- of form and means, new outlet isical thought and emotion. Lose conviction and he is only following mphonie fashion of the hour. Dr. avitzky fulfills the double obligation classics; keeps his faith in the ns. Hence the unabating vitality Symphony Concerts through the ars of his conductorship. The open the tireless hand, the quenchless have prevailed. There is new ng and refining as well. Far above most sit before him, expectantly, ently.

n now to the program for the con- of tomorrow and Saturday. The d number is Mr. Hill's tone-poem a hint from Amy Lowell—"Lilacs." ong ago, it was "new: first times" played a little tentatively. Like all worth the name, it required to be —not read; to be performed pub- to make full effect. Its interest and were then plain; but so are the est and the merit of other pieces produced. They crowd so fast upon another that the best-balanced ictor tends to forget the old loves he new. An approved "novelty"; comparative oblivion. Little by Dr. Koussevitzky seems to be re- ag this error in American orchestral es. He returns to Mr. Hill's es" and Mr. Walton's "Portsmouth t." He repeats Mr. Bax's new Sym- y and Sibelius's freshly heard Sixth; s Stravinsky's "Apollo" in the active tory; remembers Prokofiev's "Scyth- Suite"; finds room for de Falla's hts in the Gardens of Spain." If are to be perennial classics, there d also be repeated moderns and rnists. Dr. Koussevitzky has dis- ed the necessity; now sets the ex- Hill is an American composer. e any other conductor, now prac-

Prokofieff and Gershwin, to Mr Dukelsky is obviously in for helpful musical influence upon budding talent, could probably be the same. But all our young G are sad young men, disillusioned sentimentalists, like Aldous H and Noel Coward. Mr Coward commercially successful opera "Bittersweet," is not lively amusing enough to have Dul music. But he could do an and a better, perhaps.

The Mozart symphony, Koussevitzky had conducted herfore, was again badly played y day. His version of "Don Juan" again eloquent and thrilling. P.

Koussevitzky's Sixth Year at Symphony Hall

Tireless Pains, No Routine, New Courses, Few Regrets, Americans Fostered

As parsons set texts before their sermons, so shall Dr. Koussevitzky's final programs for the current series of Symphony Concerts give cue for casual, rambling retrospect. . . . Opening number on the list, a week ago, was a little Symphony of Mozart in C major. The first and the third of the three movements are bright and gallant. With them conductor and orchestra gained remarkable lightness and plasticity of motion, resiliency and transparency of tone. The intervening slow movement was played with rare felicity of pace and accent, grace of phrasing and transition, delicacy and sweetness of voice. Throughout, the lighter Mozartian quality in general, the particular quality of this Symphony in C major, ran unclouded and unalloyed. Neither was intensified because neither will bear that process; but each was preserved, clarified, animated. Throughout, again, the orchestra was adept, refined, immediately responsive, instrument. Without re-traversing the record—a tedious business—often in the course of the year, it has given proof of such merit.

Now, inspiration is a pretty, if rather weary, word, as easy to knock about in the commerce of the concert-hall as a ball in the tennis court. But inspiration does not bring these things to pass. Insistent, exacting rehearsal accomplishes them, continuing until every detail of performance is shaped and fixed in the conductor's mind, conveyed to the orchestra, there established and enlivened. In the concerts themselves, ease and surety are born of this prepared confidence. Inspiration enters only when the stimulus of public and testing occasion spurs such spontaneity. Most hearers think of Dr. Koussevitzky as the ardent, imperious master of the orchestra, firing it to his will, whipping it to his intensities, out of it, through himself, giving the composer voice and life. They forget the other Koussevitzky, tireless in the mutual work of rehearsal, ceaseless in the pursuit of perfection, discovering the means thereto, imposing them to the utmost of human limitation. Yet it is this Koussevitzky who achieves such performances as that of Mozart's little Symphony or, with Mr. Schnabel, of Brahms's full-freighted Piano-Concertos. Oftener than most, conductor and orchestra gain this adeptness. At the will of the composer into beauty it flows. When they fall short, remember the human variability of creative or re-creative work.

At the other end of the program last week stood Strauss's tone-poem, "Don Juan." Repertory piece—said the knowing—always half-ready after thirty years of performance at Symphony Hall, convenient to fill a gap in the list. Yet when the final dissonance sounded, one and all had heard the poem with the first fires renewed, the passion of proclamation and progress fresh-heated, the power intensified, the sensuous and the characterizing quality deep-bitten into listening imagination. Excitement done, admiration hesitated between the sweep, glow and pulse of the whole, the lucidity, significance and proportioning of each detail. Had the moment been the first, performance of a new-found and acclaimed masterpiece, conductor and orchestra could not have been more on their mettle. Nor was this "Don Juan" a mere occasion, a tour de force, springing out of nowhere, into it vanishing. In these years at Symphony Hall, it is custom to play "standard pieces" as though they were discoveries, not obligations or conveniences; to reanimate musics long neglected. A new life gives them reason.

For Dr. Koussevitzky there is no routine. In his little book about acting Mr. Gillette insisted that the player must nightly create "the illusion of the first time." That is to say, his speech and action must seem the impulse and the expression of the given moment newly experienced. Dr. Koussevitzky is the perpetual embodiment of that illusion. How many times here and elsewhere has he conducted in the Symphonies of Chaikovsky, Beethoven, Brahms, Schumann, in miscellaneous pieces out of Ravel, Debussy, Strauss, other standard composers? The patient editor of the program-book, with a taste for statistics, might hardly count them. Yet each performance seems a new adventure for Dr. Koussevitzky, awakening and stretching his technical powers, quickening his insight, enlarging or correcting his imagination, stirring him to ampler or finer accomplishment. Even the "New World"

Symphony of Dvorak, the "organ" Symphony of Saint-Saens, the "Alpine Symphony" of Strauss, nothing daunt him. Conductor has two imperative duties to the classics—to make them sound fresh and vital, after years, as they are the first audiences; to make them also as a new generation of listeners could hear them. (If the shade of Beethoven were to revisit Symphony and conduct in the First or the Symphony of Brahms, most of us believe his version deplorably unnatural. If we listened to Weingartner play Beethoven, we should count the performance no better than mid-Victorian.) Conductor is equally bound to keep to the original conviction with the more moderns—that from them to procure new rhythm, new color, new manipulation of form and means, new outlet for musical thought and emotion. Lose conviction and he is only following the phonetic fashion of the hour. Dr. Koussevitzky fulfills the double obligation to the classics; keeps his faith in the moderns. Hence the unabating vitality of his Symphony Concerts through the years of his conductorship. The openness of the tireless hand, the quenchless fire, the refinement as well. Far above most sit before him, expectantly, and gently.

Now to the program for the concert of tomorrow and Saturday. The first number is Mr. Hill's tone-poem "Lilacs," a hint from Amy Lowell—"Lilacs." Long ago, it was "new: first times" played a little tentatively. Like all new things, it required to be not read; to be performed publicly to make full effect. Its interest and value were then plain; but so are the merits and the merit of other pieces produced. They crowd so fast upon another that the best-balanced conductor tends to forget the old loves for the new. An approved "novelty"; comparative oblivion. Little by little Dr. Koussevitzky seems to be re-creating this error in American orchestral programming. He returns to Mr. Hill's "Lilacs" and Mr. Walton's "Portsmouth." He repeats Mr. Bax's new Symphony and Sibelius's freshly heard Sixth; Stravinsky's "Apollo" in the active repertoire; remembers Prokofiev's "Scythian Suite"; finds room for de Falla's "The Gardens of Spain." If these are to be perennial classics, there should also be repeated moderns and artists. Dr. Koussevitzky has distinguished the necessity; now sets the example. Hill is an American composer. Any other conductor, now practicing Prokofieff and Gershwin, to Mr Dukelsky is obviously in for helpful musical influence upon budding talent, could probably be the same. But all our young G are sad young men, disillusioned sentimentalists, like Aldous H and Noel Coward. Mr Coward commercially successful opera "Bittersweet," is not lively amusing enough to have Dul music. But he could do an and a better, perhaps.

The Mozart symphony, Koussevitzky had conducted here before, was again badly played yesterday. His version of "Don Juan" again eloquent and thrilling. P.

Koussevitzky's Sixth Year at Symphony Hall

Tireless Pains, No Routine, New Courses, Few Regrets, Americans Fostered

As parsons set texts before their sermons, so shall Dr. Koussevitzky's final programs for the current series of Symphony Concerts give cue for casual, rambling retrospect. Opening number on the list, a week ago, was a little Symphony of Mozart in C major. The first and the third of the three movements are bright and gallant. With them conductor and orchestra gained remarkable lightness and plasticity of motion, resiliency and transparency of tone. The intervening slow movement was played with rare felicity of pace and accent, grace of phrasing and transition, delicacy and sweetness of voice. Throughout, the lighter Mozartian quality in general, the particular quality of this Symphony in C major, ran unclouded and unalloyed. Neither was intensified because neither will bear that process; but each was preserved, clarified, animated. Throughout, again, the orchestra was adept, refined, immediately responsive, instrument. Without re-traversing the record—a tedious business—often in the course of the year, it has given proof of such merit.

Now, inspiration is a pretty, if rather weary, word, as easy to knock about in the commerce of the concert-hall as a ball in the tennis court. But inspiration does not bring these things to pass. Insistent, exacting rehearsal accomplishes them, continuing until every detail of the performance is shaped and fixed in the conductor's mind, conveyed to the orchestra, there established and enlivened. In the concerts themselves, ease and surety are born of this prepared confidence. Inspiration enters only when the stimulus of public and testing occasion spurs such spontaneity. Most hearers think of Dr. Koussevitzky as the ardent, imperious master of the orchestra, firing it to his will, whipping it to his intensities, out of it, through himself, giving the composer voice and life. They forget the other in the mutual warless in the pursuit of the means to the utmost of his it is this Koussevitzky performances as the Symphony or, with Brahms's full-fledged. Oftener than most, orchestra gain this as of the composer in. When they fall short, man variability of work.

At the other end of the week stood Strauss "Juan." Repertory ing—always half-ready of performance at convenient to fill a gap, the final dissonance had heard the poem renewed, the passion progress fresh-heated, the sensuous quality deep-bitten in tion. Excitement d tated between the sy of the whole, the lucid proportioning of each ment been the first new-found and acc conductor and orchestra been more on their this "Don Juan" a r ge force, springing it vanishing. In t phony Hall, it is cust pieces" as though t not obligations or com mate musics long ne gives them reason.

For Dr. Koussevitzky. In his little be Gillette insisted that mightily create "the time." That is to action must seem t expression of the g experienced. Dr. I perpetual embodiment. How many times has he conducted in Chaikovsky, Beethoven, in miscellany Ravel, Debussy, Stravinsky composers? The program-book, with might hardly count. Performance seems a ne Koussevitzky, awake his technical powers sight, enlarging or ination, stirring him accomplishment. Ev the paper decided today rather than $1800) den paper und ship ordi ample of and the C. Rajag foremost ranyam was sent prisoner $70. His longer fine.

At Po unruly court was being prisoner act. For streets v

Economic

The ci hatma C nomic spread that the ish the cancelled as were the conse some dis

The G or reduced urged tr The con can be only a season held up salt fam

Members committed understood was urged of civil ernment Gandhi's

Press Ur

London pers today the India the app would put down of Mahatma tional C Gandhi quarters Mahatma ed as in Symphony of Dvorak, the "organ" Symphony of Saint-Saens, the "Alpine Symphony" of Strauss, nothing daunt him.

A conductor has two imperative duties with the classics—to make them sound as fresh and vital, after years, as they did to the first audiences; to make them sound also as a new generation of listeners would hear them. (If the shade of Gericke were to revisit Symphony Hall and conduct in the First or the Fourth Symphony of Brahms, most of us might believe his version deplorably unemotional. If we listened to Weingartner in Beethoven, we should count the performance no better than mid-Victorian.) A conductor is equally bound to keep to his original conviction with the more enduring moderns—that from them proceeds new rhythm, new color, new manipulation of form and means, new outlet for musical thought and emotion. Lose that conviction and he is only following the symphonic fashion of the hour. Dr. Koussevitzky fulfills the double obligation to the classics; keeps his faith in the moderns. Hence the unabating vitality of the Symphony Concerts through the six years of his conductorship. The open mind, the tireless hand, the quenchless spirit have prevailed. There is new ripening and refining as well. Far above 1924, most sit before him, expectantly, confidently.

Turn now to the program for the concerts of tomorrow and Saturday. The second number is Mr. Hill's tone-poem—on a hint from Amy Lowell—"Lilacs." Not long ago, it was "new; first times" and played a little tentatively. Like all music worth the name, it required to be heard—not read; to be performed publicly to make full effect. Its interest and merit were then plain; but so are the interest and the merit of other pieces newly produced. They crowd so fast one upon another that the best-balanced conductor tends to forget the old loves for the new. An approved "novelty"; then comparative oblivion. Little by little, Dr. Koussevitzky seems to be repairing this error in American orchestral courses. He returns to Mr. Hill's "Lilacs" and Mr. Walton's "Portsmouth Point." He repeats Mr. Bax's new Symphony and Sibelius's freshly heard Sixth; keeps Stravinsky's "Apollo" in the active repertory; remembers Prokofiev's "Scythian Suite"; finds room for de Falla's "Nights in the Gardens of Spain." If there are to be perennial classics, there should also be repeated moderns and modernists. Dr. Koussevitzky has discovered the necessity; now sets the example.

Mr. Hill is an American composer. Above any other conductor, now practicing on this side of the Atlantic—unless it is Mr. Stock in Chicago—Dr. Koussevitzky gives them opportunity. Mr. Toscanini in New York seldom forsakes his fellow-Italians; Mr. Stokowski in Philadelphia wanders from field to field. Of late new Russians have enamored him. To discovered, rising or established Europeans Dr. Koussevitzky holds out, as he should, a welcoming hand. He is as warmly disposed (as again he should be) to Americans. This season, Mr. Chadwick is honored; Mr. Hill repeated; Mr. Loeffler remembered; Mr. Gardner disclosed; Mr. Josten and Mr. Piston tested; Mr. Eichheim called; Mr. Gruenberg given double room. On the conductor's table for performance next year—it is an open secret—lie a Second Symphony from Mr. Hill, a first Symphony from Mr. Copland. In a word, Dr. Koussevitzky holds American composers to the same standards, gives them also the same consideration and opportunity, as he follows with Europeans. There is no more to be asked; no more to be done. It is the way of a just, open, wisely fostering mind.

At the Symphony Concerts, last week, Mr. Dukelsky's Second Symphony was produced. Again Dr. Koussevitzky as the friend of young abilities. No less to the American Gardner; the Hungarian Lazar; the Corsican Martelli. Various epitaphs are written for men when they finish their work, withdraw and die. Dr. Koussevitzky will deserve one of the choicest and rarest: friend and encourager of youth. And to no neglect of the preceding, semi-established but still ripening generation. Bax, Honegger, Prokofiev, are the proof. And the approved masters—there was the Sixth Symphony of Sibelius; his Violin-Concerto; Debussy's "Saint Sebastian" and "Blessed Damozel"; the whole Brahms Festival. Upon the reviewer's desk drop the programs of this, that and the other symphony orchestra. His eye runs casually down programs in London, Paris, Berlin. Scarcely a conductor chooses his new pieces more widely and deservingly than Dr. Koussevitzky; keeps better balance between ancients and moderns, classics and modernists; with one hand condescends (no oftener than he must) to his less sophisticated and curious public; with the other cultivates his larger, finer ambitions.

So to the final grumbling without which any retrospect of a symphonic year would be incomplete. . . . Last season, Dr. Koussevitzky bravely began the restoration of Bruckner and Mahler to warrantable place in the Symphony Concerts. The public was responsive; continue; but neither . . . Since the . . . Brussels . . . $300,- . . . ce . . . k . . . ons met to . . . eide cond . . . 000 repa . . . e floated . . . e meeting . . . o days, w . . . n Fraser, . . . nternatio . . . arrival on . . . ent of the . . . composer of one . . . not more of him? . . . nstant Lambert of . . . as symphonic jazz . . . n reluctant London . . . ding of the piece next season? . . . a minute . . . tra, does Dr. Kous . . . Committe . . . e clarinets as some . . . will begin . . . choir otherwise . . . These hear . . . But next year . . . two weeks . . . fiftieth anniver . . . members o are . . . H. T. P. . . tials of the . . . upon the . . . will l . . . be mo . . . that . . . to Prompt Acts . . . r 100,0 . . . were . . . the 194 . . . Account the Sym . . . 0,000: . . . orchestra Still Needs . . . rease . . . $15,000 . . . treme . . . of ment . . . ram-book for the Sym . . . y on ti . . . Concerts of this week . . . opulat . . . across two pages, this . . . ate insa . . . and explici . . . table: . . . course; . . . Deficit esti . . . et of ti . . . for year 1929- . . . n the in . . . $100,000 . . . n actu . . . ons to date. 85,000 . . . r such . . . aggerin . . . Willia . . . unsubscri . . . $15,000 . . . natio . . . a single sentence is . . . that u . . . ly it w . . . ie orchestra may close . . . pressu . . . (July 31) without a . . . ly acue . . . Trustees hope that . . . usly in . . . $15,000 will be . . . I bid promptly . . . ne of le . . . ms no more to be . . . ssary . . . omething to be done . . . eulum . . . eadem . . .

Honored by King of Italy

(Photo by Bachrach)

Charles F. D. Belden

The Director of the Boston Public Library, Has Been Made a Cavaliere of the Order of the Crown of Italy in Recognition of His Services to the Appreciation of Italian Art and Letters and His Promotion of Better Understanding Between the United States and Italy

ting on this side of the Atlantic—there was reason to continue; but neither it is Mr. Stock in Chicago—Dr. K. composer returned. . . . Since the vitzky gives them opportunity. M days of Dr. Muck, only transcriptions by canini in New York seldom forsake Schönberg and his early "Verklarte fellow-Italians; Mr. Stokowski in Nacht" have been heard at Symphony delphia wanders from field to field Hall. As not a few believe, it is time to late new Russians have enamored hear him at least once in his present To discovered, rising or established theory and practice, singular, "cerebral" and forbidding though they be. Dr. Kous- ropeans Dr. Koussevitzky holds a sevitzy announced the recent "Varia- he should, a welcoming hand. He tions"; then put them by. Philadelphia warmly disposed (as again he shout and New York heard them from Mr. to Americans. This season, Mr. Stokowski; but neither city is Boston; wick is honored; Mr. Hill repeated Loeffler remembered; Mr. Gardner. . . . Once more most listened gladly closed; Mr. Josten and Mr. Piston to the Strauss of "Don Juan," "Eulenspie- Mr. Eichheim called; Mr. Gruengel," the "Domestica." But after six given double room. On the condueyears of waiting why not "Don Quixote" table for performance next year—it—music in which Dr. Koussevitzky should open secret—lie a Second Symphonyexcel? . . . At single hearing in a Mr. Hill, a first Symphony frompiano-concerto, Toch seemed an engaging Copland. In a word, Dr. Koussevmodernist. Is he a composer of one holds American composers to the piece? If not, why not more of him? standards, gives them also the same . . . There is Constant Lambert of sideration and opportunity, as he "Too Grande" which as symphonic jazz lows with Europeans. There is no carried all before it in reluctant London. to be asked; no more to be done. Shall we enjoy the piece next season? the way of a just, open, wisely fost. . . . For the orchestra, does Dr. Kous- sevitzy quite hear the clarinets as some hear them in a wind choir otherwise weekly pleasure? . . . But next year Mr. Dukelsky's Second Symphony brings an all-absorbing fiftieth anniver- produced. Again Dr. Koussevitzky sary. And there you are. H. T. P.

At the Symphony Concerts, last the friend of young abilities. No let the American Gardner; the Hungarian Lazar; the Corsican Martelli. Various epitaphs are written for men when they finish their work, withdraw and die. Dr. Koussevitzky will deserve one of the choicest and rarest: friend and encourager of youth. And to no neglect of the preceding, semi-established but still ripening generation. Bax, Honegger, Prokofiev, are the proof. And the proved masters—there was the Sixth Symphony of Sibelius; his Violin-Concerto; Debussy's "Saint Sebastian" at the "Blessed Damsel"; the whole Brahms Festival. Upon the reviewer's desk during the programs of this, that and the other symphony orchestra. His eye runs casually down programs in London, Paris, Berlin. Scarcely a conductor chooses new pieces more widely and deservingly than Dr. Koussevitzky; keeps better balance between ancients and modern classics and modernists; with one hand condescends (no oftener than he must) his less sophisticated and curious public with the other cultivates his larger, finer ambitions.

So to the final grumbling without which any retrospect of a symphony year would be incomplete. . . . Last season, Dr. Koussevitzky bravely began the restoration of Bruckner and Mahler to warrantable place in the Symphony Concerts. The public was responsive;

Words to Prompt Acts

On Current Account the Symphony Orchestra Still Needs $15,000

THE program-book for the Symphony Concerts of this week contains, across two pages, this simple, clear and explicit table:

Operating Deficit estimated for year 1929-
1930	$100,000
Subscriptions to date.	85,000

Balance unsubscribed. $15,000

To the table a single sentence is appended:

That the orchestra may close the year (July 31) without a deficit, the Trustees hope that the remaining $15,000 will be subscribed promptly.

There seems no more to be said—but something to be done.

Honored by King of Italy

(Photo by Bachrach)

Charles F. D. Belden

The Director of the Boston Public Library, Has Been Made a Cavaliere of the Order of the Crown of Italy in Recognition of His Services to the Appreciation of Italian Art and Letters and His Promotion of Better Understanding Between the United States and Italy

CHARLES F. D. BELDEN, director of the Boston Public Library, has been created a Cavaliere of the Order of the Crown of Italy by King Victor Emmanuel. The insignia of the order was conferred on Mr. Belden yesterday afternoon by Commendatore Pio Margotti, the Italian consul general at Boston.

The honor was bestowed in recognition of Mr. Belden's services to the appreciation of Italian art and letters in Boston and his promotion of better understanding between Italy and the United States in matters relating to the general public, as well as of his work as one of the leaders of the International Conference of Librarians at Rome in 1929.

Twice previously Mr. Belden has received honors from Italy. He was honored by the city of Ravenna in 1923 by the award of the Dante Medal and he received the Medal of the Cassa di Dante in Rome in 1924. These were bronze medals bestowed because of his services through the library to the Italian residents of Boston.

The Boston Public Library has more than 16,000 books in Italian and most of these volumes are circulated from the branch libraries in the sections of the city which have the largest Italian population.

Symphony Season's End for Cambridge

LAST evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its last concert of the season in Cambridge. The program followed the same lines of the concerts in Symphony Hall today and tomorrow, save only that in Cambridge the symphony was Brahms's second instead of Brahms's first, as at Symphony Hall. Weber's "Oberon" overture, Hill's "Lilacs," Ravel's Spanish Rhapsody, and the Brahms symphony. The orchestra, which this year has several times distinguished itself at Cambridge, played at top bent. No concert this season aroused more enthusiasm. Mingled with the enthusiasm were rites of the season's farewell. As has happened more than once, applause did not subside at the intermission until the conductor bade the men rise in acknowledgment. When the same scene was repeated at the end of the concert, the audience, to a man, rose with the orchestra. Those who were closely watching Dr. Koussevitzky must have noticed that this tribute more than casually affected him: as his listeners appreciated his work, so he deeply appreciated their expression of approval. Thus the Cambridge season of 1929-30 passed into history.

In the midst of all this no work fared better than Mr. Hill's tone-poem,

"Lilacs," after a poem of the same name by the late Amy Lowell. And the applause was more than tribute to a fellow townsman. "Lilacs" was well received when it was first played three years ago. One could read that it marked a milestone in Professor Hill's career as a composer. Fresh hearing only confirms and strengthens those impressions. "Lilacs" derives (as the phrase goes) from no other composer—though it might possibly have taken somewhat different form had not Debussy done his work. It is in an idiom that has its roots deeply in Mr. Hill's New England ancestry, which has since become more pronounced in the composer's more recent symphony. It is an almost perfect expression of subtle moods born of Miss Lowell's beautiful poem. It is well made beyond the surmise of the casual listener. In several seasons' "novelties" nothing has excelled it in the artistic certainty of its craftsmanship. Add to this craftsmanship a "musicality" to match, a highly poetic idea to be expressed, and the reason for the enthusiasm of last evening becomes apparent.

It had been preceded by a particularly captivating performance of the overture to "Oberon." The mysterious horn call at once set the atmosphere. The lyric melodies sang expressively. The fairy measures tripped more lightly than most fairies (manipulated of course by mere humans) are wont to trip. The bustle and excitement of passage after passage made telling effect. Audience no less than orchestra were transported to the land of fairy make-believe in which Weber would have had them dwell. A right beginning is sometimes half the battle in a program. It disposes listeners the better to receive. No more propitious beginning could have been made than with this overture.

And after "Lilacs" had in its subtler way sustained the high expectations roused by "Oberon," there followed the four divisions of Ravel's "Spanish Rhapsody,"—the mysterious prelude, "To the Night," the dances Malaguena and Habanera, the final brilliant "Feria." Again, at the beginning, a study in subtleties and in perfumes, in impressions and in fleeting half-realized emotions. To follow it, Ravel, in his own personal manner with the Spanish dances, the almost improvisational Malaguena, the more definitely rhythmical Habanera. And finally all the brilliances, and the sparkle and verve of the "Feria." Again the orchestra responded with a will, the conductor illumined a score. And a rhapsodic suite rounded out a half-program that had auspiciously been brought thus far on its way.

For the other half, Brahms's second symphony. In this Brahmsian year it is perhaps futile to add comment upon a Brahms symphony. For the season Brahms has come into his own in a manner unpredictable even ten years ago. And the season is no more than culmination of Dr. Koussevitzky's way with Brahms. The composer is a high favorite with the conductor. To no other composer, not even the contemporaries whom he takes under his wing, has he done greater service. Last evening was but one more example of that high service. One could not imagine better performance of the symphony. That the audience was also thus persuaded was evident.

A. H. M.

4 269
FORTY-NINTH SEASON, NINETEEN HUNDRED TWENTY-NINE AND THIRTY

Twenty-fourth Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, MAY 2, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, MAY 3, at 8.15 o'clock

Weber Overture to "Oberon"

Hill "Lilacs," Poem for Orchestra, Op. 33
(after Amy Lowell)

Ravel Rapsodie Espagnole
I. Prélude à la Nuit.
II. Malagueña.
III. Habanera.
IV. Feria.

Brahms Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Op. 68
I. Un poco sostenuto; Allegro.
II. Andante sostenuto.
III. Un poco allegretto e grazioso.
IV. Adagio; Allegro non troppo, ma con brio.

STEINWAY PIANO USED

There will be an intermission before the symphony

A series of lectures on these programmes will be given next season at the Boston Public Library on Thursday afternoons beginning October 9.

Symphony Season's End for Cambridge

May 2, 1930 from
LAST evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its last concert of the season in Cambridge. The program followed the same lines of the concerts in Symphony Hall today and tomorrow, save only that in Cambridge the symphony was Brahms's second instead of Brahms's first, as at Symphony Hall, Weber's "Oberon" overture, Hill's "Lilacs," Ravel's Spanish Rhapsody, and the Brahms symphony. The orchestra, which this year has several times distinguished itself at Cambridge, played at top bent. No concert this season aroused more enthusiasm. Mingled with the enthusiasm were rites of the season's farewell. As has happened more than once, applause did not subside at the intermission until the conductor bade the men rise in acknowledgment. When the same scene was repeated at the end of the concert, the audience, to a man, rose with the orchestra. Those who were closely watching Dr. Koussevitzky must have noticed that this tribute more than casually affected him: as his listeners appreciated his work, so he deeply appreciated their expression of approval. Thus the Cambridge season of 1929-30 passed into history.

In the midst of all this no work fared better than Mr. Hill's tone-poem,

"Lilacs," after a poem of the same name by the late Amy Lowell. And the applause was more than tribute to a fellow townsman. "Lilacs" was well received when it was first played three years ago. One could read that it marked a milestone in Professor Hill's career as a composer. Fresh hearing only confirms and strengthens those impressions. "Lilacs" derives (as the phrase goes) from no other composer—though it might possibly have taken somewhat different form had not Debussy done his work. It is in an idiom that has its roots deeply in Mr. Hill's New England ancestry, which has since become more pronounced in the composer's more recent symphony. It is an almost perfect expression of subtle moods born of Miss Lowell's beautiful poem. It is well made beyond the surmise of the casual listener. In several seasons' "novelties" nothing has excelled it in the artistic certainty of its craftsmanship. Add to this craftsmanship a "musicality" to match, a highly poetic idea to be expressed, and the reason for the enthusiasm of last evening becomes apparent.

It had been preceded by a particularly captivating performance of the overture to "Oberon." The mysterious horn call at once set the atmosphere. The lyric melodies sang expressively. The fairy measures tripped more lightly than most fairies (manipulated of course by mere humans) are wont to trip. The bustle and excitements of passage after passage made telling effect. Audience no less than orchestra were transported to the land of fairy make-believe in which Weber would have had them dwell. A right beginning is sometimes half the battle in a program. It disposes listeners the better to receive. No more propitious beginning could have been made than with this overture.

And after "Lilacs" had in its subtler way sustained the high expectations roused by "Oberon," there followed the four divisions of Ravel's "Spanish Rhapsody,"—the mysterious prelude, "To the Night," the dances Malaguena and Habanera, the final brilliant "Feria." Again, at the beginning, a study in subtleties and in perfumes, in impressions and in fleeting half-realized emotions. To follow it, Ravel, in his own personal manner with the Spanish dances, the almost improvisational Malaguena, the more definitely rhythmed Habanera. And finally all the brilliances, and the sparkle and verve of the "Feria." Again the orchestra responded with a will, the conductor illumined a score. And a rhapsody duly rounded out a half-program that had auspiciously been brought thus far on its way.

For the other half, Brahms's second symphony. In this Brahmsian year it is perhaps futile to add comment upon a Brahms symphony. For the season Brahms has come into his own in a manner unpredictable even ten years ago. And the season is no more than culmination of Dr. Koussevitzky's war with Brahms. The composer is a high favorite with the conductor. To no other composer, not even the contemporaries whom he takes under his wing, has he done greater service. Last evening was but one more example of that high service. One could not imagine better performance of the symphony. That the audience was also thus persuaded was evident.

FORTY-NINTH SEASON, NINETEEN HUNDRED TWENTY-NINE AND THIRTY

Twenty-fourth Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, MAY 2, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, MAY 3, at 8.15 o'clock

Weber Overture to "Oberon"

Hill "Lilacs," Poem for Orchestra, Op. 33
(after Amy Lowell)

Ravel Rapsodie Espagnole
I. Prélude à la Nuit.
II. Malagueña.
III. Habanera.
IV. Feria.

Brahms Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Op. 68
I. Un poco sostenuto; Allegro.
II. Andante sostenuto.
III. Un poco allegretto e grazioso.
IV. Adagio; Allegro non troppo, ma con brio.

STEINWAY PIANO USED

There will be an intermission before the symphony

A series of lectures on these programmes will be given next season at the Boston Public Library on Thursday afternoons beginning October 9.

Maurice Ravel

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, gave the 24th and last concert of its 49th season yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall; last with the exception of the repetition to-night. The program was as follows: Weber, Overture to "Oberon." Hill, "Lilacs" (after a poem by Amy Lowell). Ravel, Rapsodie Espagnolle. Brahms, Symphony No. 1.

A year ago the program of the final concert was arranged by popular vote. "Request" programs are amusing for they show the taste of the majority of the audience: in some instances, the poor taste, a conductor might say. Dr. Koussevitzky formed the program of yesterday to please himself. He at the same time gave the audience great pleasure, for enthusiasm reigned from the time he came on the platform, when the audience stood to do him honor, to the end of the magnificent performance of the symphony when he was recalled again and again. Nor was the orchestra forgotten in the tribute paid. The audience seemed loath to leave the hall.

This program was designed to suit all tastes. For the conservatives there was the brilliant overture with its poetic introduction and its chivalric Allegro with the characteristic Weberian flourishes of bravura; also the symphony dear to Dr. Koussevitzky and to many hearers, among them some who have been brought into the fold by the interpretative genius of the conductor. For those who, respecting the masters of past years, listen eagerly to the music of the contemporaneous school, there was Ravel's Rapsodie which in music, suggested as it is by Spanish pride, melancholy, rhythms, is as Maurice Barres's "Secret of Toledo" and Havelock Ellis's "Soul of Spain" in literature. There was also Hill's "Lilacs," a poetic composition, not too literal in its translation of Miss Lowell's free verse—for there were moments when to one demanding literalism the composer's lilac bushes were at least a hundred feet high—but music expressive of the spirit in which she wrote.

The season has been an interesting one, not "unusually" interesting, for all the seasons of the past half-dozen years have attracted marked attention as one concert followed another, and many have remained fast in the memory. Although the "die-hards," for there are still the poker-backed and those afraid of unfamiliar musical idioms, unwilling to admit that music is in a large measure inspired by the feelings, the sentiments, the materialism or the spirituality, of the years that give it birth—these "hearers"—if only they would hear!—are among us and are voluble in their non-appreciation. Fortunately for the general public, Dr. Koussevitzky is not shaken in his belief that audiences have a right to know what is going on in the musical world; that it is the duty of a conductor to acquaint them with it. No doubt some of the contemporaneous works will be short-lived, if they are not still-born; but prophecy is never safe in matters of art, and if death follows a performance or a few performances, the corpse shows as corpse, modern tendencies unskillfully worked out, or emotion sacrificed for experiments in form, or contrapuntal weavings, or rhythm.

Nearly 50 composers were represented with 83 performances. Beethoven led with six; Strauss followed with five; Brahms, Mozart, Ravel and Sibelius with four each; but the sixth symphony of Sibelius, heard here for the first time, was performed twice, as was Ravel's Bolero, Haydn's symphony (with the horn call, Schoenberg's orchestration of an organ prelude and Fugue by Bach, and the fine symphony by Bax. The names of Fairchild, Gruenberg, Gardner, Martelli, Pick-Mangialgalli, Fournier, Metzler were on the programs for the first time. Eight compositions—by Bax, Dukelsky, Fairchild, Gardner, Josten, Lazar, Piston, Tournier were played for the first time. Seventeen compositions were performed for the first time in Boston. Povla Frijs, soprano; Messrs. Burgin, Rabinoff, Thibaud, violinists; Iturbi, Prokofieff, Sanroma, Schnabel were the pianists. Mr. Salmond, cellist, and Mr. B. Zighera, harpist, made up the list of soloists.

Among the leading features of the season were the second symphony of Bax, Bloch's "Schelomo," Debussy's "Blessed Damsel" and "Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian," the concert conducted by Glazunov, the charming symphony by Haydn, Lazar's Concerto Grosso, Mr. Iturbi's performance of Liszt's Concerto No. 1, Loeffler's "Canticum Fratris Solis," the performance of Mozart's little symphony in C major, the prelude and Fugue by Pick-Mangialgalli, Prokofieff's playing of his second piano concerto, Mr. Burgin's playing of the violin concerto by Sibelius, the "Apollon Musagete" by Stravinsky, and the remarkable performance of Strauss's "Don Juan" and of Brahms's first symphony. There were admirable performances of other works, led by Dr. Koussevitzky with great gusto and indisputable art.

The guest conductors were Messrs. Burgin, Glazunov, Goossens. Mr. Chadwick's jubilee was appropriately commemorated, nor should the Brahms festival, although only one of the five concerts came in the regular subscription series, be forgotten. The first concert of the 50th season will be on Oct. 10.

Maurice Ravel

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, gave the 24th and last concert of its 49th season yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall; last with the exception of the repetition to-night. The program was as follows: Weber, Overture to "Oberon." Hill, "Lilacs" (after a poem by Amy Lowell). Ravel, Rapsodie Espagnole. Brahms, Symphony No. 1.

A year ago the program of the final concert was arranged by popular vote. "Request" programs are amusing for they show the taste of the majority of the audience; in some instances, the poor taste, a conductor might say. Dr. Koussevitzky formed the program of yesterday to please himself. He at the same time gave the audience great pleasure, for enthusiasm reigned from the time he came on the platform, when the audience stood to do him honor, to the end of the magnificent performance of the symphony when he was recalled again and again. Nor was the orchestra forgotten in the tribute paid. The audience seemed loath to leave the hall.

This program was designed to suit all tastes. For the conservatives there was the brilliant overture with its poetic introduction and its chivalric Allegro with the characteristic Weberian flourishes of bravura; also the symphony dear to Dr. Koussevitzky and to many hearers, among them some who have been brought into the fold by the interpretative genius of the conductor. For those who, respecting the masters of past years, listen eagerly to the music of the contemporaneous school, there was Ravel's Rapsodie which in music, suggested as it is by Spanish pride, melancholy, rhythms, is as Maurice Barres's "Secret of Toledo" and Havelock Ellis's "Soul of Spain" in literature. There was also Hill's "Lilacs," a poetic composition, not too literal in its translation of Miss Lowell's free verse—for there were moments when to one demanding literalism the composer's lilac bushes were at least a hundred feet high—but music expressive of the spirit in which she wrote.

The season has been an interesting one, not "unusually" interesting, for all the seasons of the past half-dozen years have attracted marked attention as one concert followed another, and many have remained fast in the memory. Although the "die-hards," for there are still the poker-backed and those afraid of unfamiliar musical idioms, unwilling to admit that music is in a large measure inspired by the feelings, the sentiments, the materialism or the spirituality of the years that give it birth—these "hearers"—if only they would hear!—are among us and are voluble in their non-appreciation. Fortunately for the general public, Dr. Koussevitzky is not shaken in his belief that audiences have a right to know what is going on in the musical world; that it is the duty of a conductor to acquaint them with it. No doubt some of the contemporaneous works will be short-lived, if they are not still-born; but prophecy is never safe in matters of art, and if death follows a performance or a few performances, the corpse shows as corpse, modern tendencies unskillfully worked out, or emotion sacrificed for experiments in form, or contrapuntal weavings, or rhythm.

Nearly 50 composers were represented with 83 performances. Beethoven led with six; Strauss followed with five; Brahms, Mozart, Ravel and Sibelius with four each; but the sixth symphony of Sibelius, heard here for the first time, was performed twice, as was Ravel's Bolero. Haydn's symphony (with the horn call, Schoenberg's orchestration of an organ prelude and Fugue by Bach, and the fine symphony by Bax. The names of Fairchild, Gruenberg, Gardner, Martelli, Pick-Mangiagalli, Fournier, Metzler were on the programs for the first time. Eight compositions—by Bax, Dukelsky, Fairchild, Gardner, Josten, Lazar, Piston, Tournier were played for the first time. Seventeen compositions were performed for the first time in Boston. Povla Frijsh, soprano; Messrs. Burgin, Rabinoff, Thibaud, violinists; Iturbi, Prokofieff, Sanroma, Schnabel were the pianists. Mr. Salmond, cellist, and Mr. B. Zighera, harpist, made up the list of soloists.

Among the leading features of the season were the second symphony of Bax, Bloch's "Schelomo," Debussy's "Blessed Damsel" and "Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian," the concert conducted by Glazunov, the charming symphony by Haydn, Lazar's Concerto Grosso, Mr. Iturbi's performance of Liszt's Concerto No. 1, Loeffler's "Canticum Fratris Solis," the performance of Mozart's little symphony in C major, the prelude and Fugue by Pick-Mangiagalli, Prokofieff's playing of his second piano concerto, Mr. Burgin's playing of the violin concerto by Sibelius, the "Apollon Musagete" by Stravinsky, and the remarkable performance of Stauss's "Don Juan" and of Brahms's first symphony. There were admirable performances of other works, led by Dr. Koussevitzky with great gusto and indisputable art.

The guest conductors were Messrs. Burgin, Glazounov, Goossens. Mr. Chadwick's jubilee was appropriately commemorated, nor should the Brahms festival, although only one of the five concerts came in the regular subscription series, be forgotten. The first concert of the 50th season will be on Oct. 10.

FINAL PROGRAM OF SYMPHONY SEASON

Dr Koussevitzky and Orchestra Cheered

Music by Prof Hill, Ravel, Weber
and Brahms' First Symphony Played

Dr Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra were greeted with exceptionally cordial applause yesterday afternoon at the beginning of the final concert of the Friday series. At the end of the concert the audience remained for some minutes, stamping its feet, and finally cheering conductor and players. The program, to be repeated tonight, included Prof E. B. Hill's "Lilacs," Weber's overture to "Oberon," Ravel's "Spanish Rhapsody" and Brahms' First Symphony.

The 50th season of Boston Symphony concerts, Dr Koussevitzky, conductor, will begin Oct 10. This season's subscribers, if they wish to retain their seats for next year, should apply promptly, as the lengthy visiting list will probably absorb all season tickets not reengaged by the present holders.

Yesterday's program contained a list of donors to the fund being raised to meet the deficit of the present season, estimated at $100,000. Its heading read: "The trustees thank all those who by their subscriptions have made these concerts possible." The sum of $14,264.35 is still needed to meet the estimated deficit.

Every season ticket for the 24 Fridays, 24 Saturdays and six Mondays was sold this year, and almost every ticket for the six Tuesdays. The inevitable great expense of the concerts, and not any lack of public support, is responsible for the deficit.

Dr Koussevitzky, now ending his sixth season as conductor, has won a popularity with the Symphony audiences unsurpassed by that of any of his predecessors. The eloquence, the imaginative intensity of his interpretations of music of all types, the enthusiasm and, what is equally important, the hard work he has lavished on his tasks of choosing programs and players, and rehearsing the music to be performed, have notably raised the artistic level of the concerts as well as strengthening their hold on the public.

Even those who not infrequently disagree with Dr Koussevitzky's conception of particular pieces of music, and object to his choice of programs, must respect him for the rare and notable qualities he brings to his task. The unusual tribute paid him by yesterday's audience was not undeserved. He has restored the Boston Symphony Orchestra to its old proud position of equality with the best orchestras in other American and European cities. It is again unsurpassed in the entire world, and equalled by a mere handful of other celebrated bands.

Listening to Ravel's "Spanish Rhapsody" one could not but think how much finer it is than that other Spanish piece of his, the Bolero, which has lately made such a sensation with audiences the world over. This rhapsody, finely wrought out of original and ingratiating music material, and clothed in a delicate orchestral texture full of distinctive sonorities, may lack the instantaneous popular appeal of the reiterated commonplace melody and conventional rhythm of the Bolero.

But at a 10th hearing Ravel's Bolero would prove intolerable to any sensitive listener, and the "Spanish Rhapsody" would be even more agreeable than at first hearing. Now, it is the 10th, and not the first hearing of a piece of music, which establishes its claim to merit.

Dr Koussevitzky, in repeating Prof Hill's "Lilacs," paid to an American composition a compliment few such pieces have in the past received. Yet anything worth playing once at the Symphony concerts should be worth playing more than once. On the principle just stated, it is the repetitions that really test the value of a piece. One is sorry to have to add that the repetition of "Lilacs" confirmed the impression the piece made at a first hearing; that, though it is well written, it lacks the imaginative power of Amy Lowell's verses from which Mr Hill drew his inspiration.

Brilliant, if excessively noisy, performances of the familiar classics on the program, Weber's "Oberon" overture, and Brahms' C minor symphony, won hearty applause. Dr Koussevitzky is more successful with this first of Brahms' symphonies than he has been with the third and fourth. The intrinsic power of the splendid finale, in particular, was, as always, emotionally almost overwhelming.

With several details of Dr Koussevitzky's reading one disagreed, but on these enough has been written on previous occasions. The general effect was thrilling, and to the average listener that is enough.

P. R.

So Forward Toward The Jubilee Year

To Full-Mettled Close Comes
The Forty-Ninth Season of Symphony Concerts

ONE of the usual rites was lacking. One or another was even prolonged beyond custom at the end yesterday, for the matinee audience, of the symphonic year. Loud and general applause hailed Dr. Koussevitzky when he first appeared. At signal from Mr. Burgin the orchestra rose in salute. For a moment the audience hesitated to do likewise; then found its feet in the scraggly fashion that usually makes such "homage" more honored in the breach than the observance. By gesture the conductor returned thanks to the orchestra and blessed it. By redoubled plaudits, the audience did as much. At intermission old hands with the stopwatch reported these mutual salutations as exceptionally prolonged.

The concert then proceeded in customary course, diversified after the playing of "Lilacs" by amusing confusions between the conductor and the composer, Mr. Hill. Amy Lowell, one of whose poems suggested the piece; New England, its bushy flower that the heat of the day might almost have brought into blossom; Mr. Hill's full-throated and warm-hearted music, brought no small gust of applause. The conductor sought him vainly in one direction; he appeared suddenly from another. The bystanders wore a fête-day smile. . . . Weber's Overture to "Oberon" evoked the usual warmth. The audience listened with dutiful admiration to Ravel's "Spanish Rhapsody," heard for the first time from Dr. Koussevitzky. Brahms's Symphony in C minor was again tour de force of conductor, orchestra and — helpfully — composer. Then the final demonstrations—the conductor, twice and thrice recalled, with both hands strewing invisible laurels upon the standing orchestra; clapping, stamping, up-gazing audience. The old hands again held their watches. The matinee subscribers had beaten down five minutes by the clock. In more senses than one a warmish day.

program was discreetly assembled on occasion—Weber's romantic Over—a century passing from the opera to become classic of the concert hall's Rhapsody, dated 1907-08, but years afterward sounding more distinct than most of his later pieces; his Symphony, by many now counted peer of Beethoven's; enjoying for the more ardent vogue than they; a notable symphonic summit in the half of the nineteenth century; a shining instance of the songful, deep-intensified Brahms that a generation of conductors has imposed upon a re-world. (This is not the time for over a twentieth-century Brahms or a twentieth-century Brahms rated, not to say distorted. Possibly this present and persistent incarnation partakes of all three). Add Mr. "Lilacs," American, New-England, born; to make a catholic pro-after Dr. Koussevitzky's familiar Some regretted the absence of an nineteenth-century piece. They have fewer this season—they say—than for example, Bach, only once finished by Schoenberg. But—they—Mozart four times over.

classic Brahms, the romantic Weber take at face value a conventional none too firm-grounded distinction; the quasi-programmatic century, Ravel and Mr. Hill of twentieth; the quasi-programmatic Rhapsody" and "Lilacs," the watch reported these mutual salutations as exceptionally prolonged. Elf-King's Oath"); the pure-lined self-contained Symphony. The "reputable" overture in which our deepest-ing of "Lilacs" by amusing confusions and stiffest-backed conservatives to rejoice perennially; the modern poems suggested the piece; New England to rather different vibrations of sound. A racial and geographical day might almost have brought into sound from German Dresden and blossom; Mr. Hill's full-throated and warm-hearted music, brought no small gust of applause. The conductor sought him vainly in one direction; he appeared suddenly from another. The bystanders wore a fête-day smile. . . . Weber's Overture to "Oberon" evoked the usual warmth. The audience listened with dutiful admiration to Ravel's "Spanish Rhapsody," heard for the first time from Dr. Koussevitzky. Brahms's Symphony in C minor was again tour de force of conductor, orchestra and — helpfully — composer. Then the final demonstrations—the conductor, twice and thrice recalled, with both hands strewing invisible laurels upon the standing orchestra; clapping, stamping, up-gazing audience. The old hands again held their watches. The matinee subscribers had beaten down five minutes by the clock. In more senses than one a warmish day.

ed that it were better to wait and selective.

FINAL PROGRAM OF SYMPHONY SEASON

Dr Koussevitzky and Orchestra Cheered

Music by Prof Hill, Ravel, Weber
and Brahms' First Symphony Played

Dr Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra were greeted with exceptionally cordial applause yesterday afternoon at the beginning of the final concert of the Friday series. At the end of the concert the audience remained for some minutes, stamping its feet, and finally cheering conductor and players. The program, to be repeated tonight, included Prof E. B. Hill's "Lilacs," Weber's overture to "Oberon," Ravel's "Spanish Rhapsody" and Brahms' First Symphony.

The 50th season of Boston Symphony concerts, Dr Koussevitzky, conductor, will begin Oct 10. This season's subscribers, if they wish to retain their seats for next year, should apply promptly, as the lengthy visiting list will probably absorb all season tickets not reengaged by the present holders.

Yesterday's program contained a list of donors to the fund being raised to meet the deficit of the present season, estimated at $100,000. Its heading read: "The trustees thank all those who by their subscriptions have made these concerts possible." The sum of $14,264.35 is still needed to meet the estimated deficit.

Every season ticket for the 24 Fridays, 24 Saturdays and six Mondays was sold this year, and almost every ticket for the six Tuesdays. The inevitably great expense of the concerts, and not any lack of public support, is responsible for the deficit.

Dr Koussevitzky, now ending his sixth season as conductor, has won a popularity with the Symphony audiences unsurpassed by that of any of his predecessors. The eloquence, the imaginative intensity of his interpretations of music of all types, the enthusiasm and, what is equally important, the hard work he has lavished on his tasks of choosing programs and players, and rehearsing the music to be performed, have notably raised the artistic level of the concerts as well as strengthening their hold on the public.

Even those who not infrequently disagree with Dr Koussevitzky's conception of particular pieces of music, and object to his choice of programs, must respect him for the rare and notable qualities he brings to his task. The unusual tribute paid him by yesterday's audience was not undeserved. He has restored the Boston Symphony Orchestra to its old proud position of equality with the best orchestras in other American and European cities. It is again unsurpassed in the entire world, and equalled by a mere handful of other celebrated bands.

Listening to Ravel's "Spanish Rhapsody" one could not but think how much finer it is than that other Spanish piece of his, the Bolero, which has lately made such a sensation with audiences the world over. This rhapsody, finely wrought out of original and ingratiating music material, and clothed in a delicate orchestral texture full of distinctive sonorities, may lack the instantaneous popular appeal of the reiterated commonplace melody and conventional rhythm of the Bolero.

But at a 10th hearing Ravel's Bolero would prove intolerable to any sensitive listener, and the "Spanish Rhapsody" would be even more agreeable than at first hearing. Now, it is the 10th, and not the first hearing of a piece of music, which establishes its claim to merit.

Dr Koussevitzky, in repeating Prof Hill's "Lilacs," paid to an American composition a compliment few such pieces have in the past received. Yet anything worth playing once at the Symphony concerts should be worth playing more than once. On the principle just stated, it is the repetitions that really test the value of a piece. One is sorry to have to add that the repetition of "Lilacs" confirmed the impression the piece made at a first hearing: that, though it is well written, it lacks the imaginative power of Amy Lowell's verses from which Mr Hill drew his inspiration.

Brilliant, if excessively noisy, performances of the familiar classics on the program, Weber's "Oberon" overture, and Brahms' C minor symphony, won hearty applause. Dr Koussevitzky is more successful with this first of Brahms' symphonies than he has been with the third and fourth. The intrinsic power of the splendid finale, in particular, was, as always, emotionally almost overwhelming.

With several details of Dr Koussevitzky's reading one disagreed, but on these enough has been written on previous occasions. The general effect was thrilling, and to the average listener that is enough.

P. R.

So Forw Towa Jul

To Full-Mett
The Forty-N
Sympho

NONE of the audience, of the s and general appla vitzky when he fir from Mr. Burgin salute. For a mon tated to do ilkev feet in the scragl makes such "hom the breach than th ture the conductor orchestra and ble plaudits, the audie intermission old watch reported th as exceptionally pr The concert th tatory course, div ing of "Lilacs" b between the condu Mr. Hill. Amy I poems suggested land, its bushy fl the day might alm blossom; Mr. HI warm-hearted mus gust of applause. him vainly in one suddenly from an wore a fête-day Overture to usual warmths. with dutiful ad "Spanish Rhapso first time from Brahms's Sympho again tour de orchestra and — Then the final de ductor, twice and both hands strev upon the standi stamping, up-gazi hands again held matinée subscribe precedent; out-don five minutes by senses than one a

1100 Tager
1900 Tamp
8500 Techn
1900 Tech
100 Tenn
700 Tex
11706 Thern
11125 Thern
100 Tishu
100 Tob &
6800 Thatch
20 Thake
300 Tobi
22100 Trans
4400 Tran
2300 Trans
4500 Tel Co
1400 Tel U
200 Tel I
700 Triples
400 Trmo
100 Trmo
200 Turs
700 Tab
200 Tug

300 Ulen
4700 Unger
1400 Union
6200 Union
300 Un B
200 Un B
76600 Un P
125100 Un G
11600 Un G
15400 Un G
14300 Un G
2700 Un G
128000 Un L
4200 Un L
200 Un
200 Un
1100 Un C
200 Un C
100 Un C
22200 Un C
3000 Un D
1300 Un N
206 Un P
100 Un R 2700 US &
800 US F
3500 US I 11400 US F
500 US F
3100 US F
3300 US O
300 US G
1400 US &
400 US Ir
8200 US LI
2000 US R
200 US R
100 US R
1500 US S
200 Un St
100 Un T
2200 Un Ve

The program was discreetly assembled for the occasion—Weber's romantic Overture, in a century passing from the opera house to become classic of the concert hall; Ravel's Rhapsody, dated 1907-08, but twenty years afterward sounding more modernist than most of his later pieces; Brahms's Symphony, by many now counted the peer of Beethoven's; enjoying for the while more ardent vogue than they; unmistakable symphonic summit in the second half of the nineteenth century; outstanding instance of the songful, deep-colored, intensified Brahms that a generation of conductors has imposed upon a responsive world. (This is not the time for debate over a twentieth-century Brahms released or a twentieth-century Brahms exaggerated, not to say distorted. Possibly in this present and persistent incarnation he partakes of all three). Add Mr. Hill's "Lilacs," American, New-England, Bostonian-born; to make a catholic program after Dr. Koussevitzky's familiar habit. Some regretted the absence of an eighteenth-century piece. They have been fewer this season—they say—than hitherto. For example, Bach, only once unvarnished by Schoenberg. But—they forget—Mozart four times over.

The classic Brahms, the romantic Weber—to take at face value a conventional and none too firm-grounded distinction; Weber and Brahms of the nineteenth century, Ravel and Mr. Hill of the twentieth; the quasi-programmatic "Spanish Rhapsody" and "Lilacs," the quasi-operatic overture to "Oberon" (or "The Elf-King's Oath"); the pure-lined and self-contained Symphony. The "repertory" overture in which our deepest-dyed and stiffest-backed conservatives profess to rejoice perennially; the modernistic "Spanish Rhapsody" for ears open to rather different vibrations of musical sound. A racial and geographical round from German Dresden and Austrian Vienna through French Paris to American Boston and to New-England Franconia, where, by preference, Mr. Hill sits, down to a composer's job.

Men and brethren, Dr. Koussevitzky practises the only wise and salutary way with American composers, treating them like any other, exacting only an equal ability and accomplishment. Likewise with music Boston-made. There has been such music—as from Mr. Foote or Mr. Chadwick—that deserves, and receives, performance at the Symphony Concerts. There is such music, as from Mr. Loeffler or Mr. Hill. There is also music, dull and of no individual quality, whether it is made in the suburbs of Boston, Paris, Budapest or Rome; therefore anywhere and everywhere to be overlooked. Some like to say, clearing their throats, that Dr. Koussevitzky has been slow to musical discovery in the city in which he now practises his profession. He may have reasoned that it were better to wait and be selective.

A program likewise to disclose the virtuosity of conductor and orchestra; the ear of Dr. Koussevitzky, the technical range, the tonal valor, of the players; the response, each to each, of leader and men; of both to the composer. One man upon one instrument might have played the full orchestral chord that divides the Overture to "Oberon." Some conductors, like Mr. Mengelberg, will have it a stinging blow. Dr. Koussevitzky prefers the rapier flash. And how warm the voice, how glowing the accents and the phrasing, how ardent and climactic the progress, through the main body of the Overture! For contrast, the whispered introduction yet still of warm-bodied tone.

Ravel asks recurring feats of his woodwinds and strings. They were done—in the clear color, the high pointing, the dry suggestion, almost to beauty, of this etched Rhapsody—impressionist music in the heyday of that quality, but without the harmonic haze. (From his beginnings Ravel was no Debussy.) Audibly, adroitly and sensitively, Mr. Speyer at the English horn and Mr. Lefranc at the first viola did these feats. And always the conductor exciting or measuring the rhythm that is life to this color.

Nowhere within recollection has Mr. Hill written with the spontaneity, the propulsive freedom, sounding out of "Lilacs." If internal evidence counts, here is music made not only con amore but, under the spell of Amy Lowell, con fuoco as well. Nowhere, again, within recollection, has Mr. Hill upbuilt such tonal mass and movement; handled them so ardently. At the climax his music upswells and glows. It has begun and it ends with the fine-cut Gallic line, that may serve a New-England tone-poet no less. In the warm-blooded, pungent "Lilacs," that line is uncommonly vitalized and supple. Out of it, and what seems the restless rhythm of the blowing bushes, a new found and individual beauty suffuses the piece. Though Mr. Hill has now betaken himself to symphonies, "Lilacs" remains music of personal and poetic quality, of his largest, if not his finest, command of symphonic means. Throughout conductor and orchestra returned him the eloquence—in the better sense of the word—that he sought.

To end the concert and to crystallize the residue of the afternoon, Brahms's Symphony in C minor. The virtuosity of the orchestra, man or man, and in the conductor's ear, was never more in evidence than in the playing of the horns—Mr. Boettcher at the first—and of the flute (Mr. Laurent) in the prelude to the fourth movement; in the subsequent, sonorous, superb intervention of the collective virtuosity, the design by the conductor in the spacing and the introduction to the or of the movement that both went the openness, parent, detailing, the sub- oring of a truly orchestra. For contrast, the veiled tone, half misty, the intermezzo that is zky's imagination is in musing Brahms, remembered, dreams through slow movement. Seldom laid out, diversified, d cumulated a larger, ensive design than that prears the finale from ng to dithyrambic close. sures to last, a spelled l to the Symphony as ed and to power evoked conductor and an orches- surpassing themselves. for so it seemed—to of the Symphony Con- e in which they were filled. H. T. P.

PHONY FINAL CONCERT "Lilacs" Creates Favorable Impression

EN STOREY SMITH and listeners who, to d the untimely summer Symphony Concert of ernoons might well have themselves martyrs in the ic. But there was no nce that they did. The l, so far as spirit was concerned, as th beginning, not ter were more sive.

BRAH

It has become Symphony conce audience to rise makes his initial too, for the audi tain enthusiasm hand-clapping, signs of approv playing of Brah yesterday was d the performance formance, in whi made by the com and even doubly lated, as the phr audience cold. T plain that certain matter of tempo larly in the Fina tionalism, But D Brahms in his ov tion, he is chiefly ing made Brah hereabouts, and play the music i own convictions.

Weber of the with which the c Brahms, somewh day; but the perfe exhilarating, and beauty. Better, t underscored than Weber in lifeless rou tine. Here, at least, was orchestral virtuosity, and there was more of it in the Rhapsodie Espagnole of Ravel, a piece that of itself is wearing thin, and needs all the aid that its interpreters can give it.

Nor were the eloquence and fervor that marked so much of the playing yesterday denied to the music of Edward Burlingame Hill, whose tone poem, "Lilacs," after Amy Lowell, first played here three years ago, came yesterday between Overture and Rhapsodie. In "Lilacs," Mr. Hill has made music that is both beautiful and expressive, that summons a rapturous quality that matches Miss Lowell's verses, and suits the vernal season which inspired them. Here is music that moves the listener, music of an emotional quality, doubly welcome in a day when most composers avoid beauty and emotional expression as they would the plague. Mr. Hill, who was present yesterday, was warmly applauded, and, after he had bowed several times, standing at his place in the hall, he was summoned by Dr. Koussevitzky to the front of the auditorium, there to acknowledge further plaudits.

Restored Pops?

A Hint from Arthur Fiedler's First Program

THOSE who would have the Pop Concerts "what they used to be" may take heart and find pleasure in the list of pieces announced by Mr. Fiedler for the "opening night" of Wednesday, May 7. It contains nearly all the old ingredients—introductory march; operatic overture and operatic fantasia; dance-tunes; fragment from Wagner; potpourri from a musical play of the better sort; amiable trifles; the "sensation," not too heavy, from the ended symphonic season. Once more, seemingly, the light-minded and the musically loafing are to have their way with The Pops, as indeed they should. Here is the program:

Pomp and Circumstance.....	Elgar
Overture to "Mignon".....	Thomas
"Rosenkavalier" Waltzes.....	R. Strauss
Fantasia, "Aida".....	Verdi
Siegfried's Rhine-Journey from "Götterdämmerung".....	Wagner
Tambourin Chinois.....	Kreisler
Bolero.....	Ravel
Selection, "New Moon".....	Romberg
Whispering Flowers.....	Blon
American Fantasy.....	Herbert

A program likewise to disclose the virtuosity of conductor and orchestra. Dr. Koussevitzky, the ear of the tonal valor, of the response, each to each, of the men; of both to the composer. O upon one instrument might have the full orchestral chord that divides the Overture to "Oberon." Some conductors like Mr. Mengelberg, will have the stinging blow. Dr. Koussevitzky the raptur flash. And how was the voice, how glowing the accents, phrasing, how ardent and climactic progress, through the main body of the Overture! For contrast, the introduction yet still of warm-bodied winds and strings. They were of the clear color, the high point of dry suggestion, almost to beauty, etched Rhapsody—Impressionist in the heyday of that quality, but the harmonic haze. (From his writings Ravel was no Debussyan.) adroitly and sensitively, Mr. Sp the English horn and Mr. Lefranc first viola did these feats. And the conductor exciting or measuring rhythm that is life to this color.

Nowhere within recollection has Hill written with the spontaneity, propulsive freedom, sounding out "Lilacs." If internal evidence could here is music made not only for an but, under the spell of Amy Lowell, fuoco as well. Nowhere, again, with recollection, has Mr. Hill upbuilt a tonal mass and movement; handled it so ardently. At the climax his music upswells and glows. It has begun it ends with the fine-cut Gallic line, may serve a New-England tone-poet less. In the warm-blooded, pungent "lacs," that line is uncommonly vital and supple. Out of it, and what is the restless rhythm of the blowing bushes, a new found and individual beauty suffuses the piece. Though Mr. Hill has now betaken himself to symphony "Lilacs" remains music of personal poetic quality, of his largest, if not finest, command of symphonic means. Throughout conductor and orchestra turned him the eloquence—in the best sense of the word—that he sought.

To end the concert and to crystallize the residue of the afternoon, Brahms' Symphony in C minor. The virtuosity of the orchestra, man or man, and the conductor's ear, was never more evident than in the playing of the flute (Mr. Laurent) in the prelude to the fourth movement: in the subsequent sonorous, superb intervention of trombones. The collective virtuosity, the divinity—and the desiring by the conductor, ran as clear in the spacing and the coloring of the introduction to the whole Symphony, or of the movement that follows. Through both went the openness, the fine, transparent, detailing, the subdued but intense coloring of a truly Brahmsian orchestra. For contrast, the gentle accent, the veiled tone, half misty, half sun-lit, of the intermezzo that is third division.

Dr. Koussevitzky's imagination is in play when the musing Brahms, remembering and resigned, dreams through measures of the slow movement. Seldom has the conductor laid out, diversified, proportioned and cumulated a larger, bolder, more intensive design than that in which he uprears the finale from plangent beginning to dithyrambic close. From first measures to last, a spelled audience listened to the Symphony as to beauty unfolded and to power evoked upon them by a conductor and an orchestra for the hour surpassing themselves. In such passage—for so it seemed—to the fiftieth year of the Symphony Concerts, the purpose in which they were founded, stood fulfilled. H. T. P.

SYMPHONY IN FINAL CONCERT

Hill's "Lilacs" Creates
Very Favorable
Impression

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Musicians and listeners who, together, braved the untimely summer heat at the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon might well have considered themselves martyrs in the cause of music. But there was no outward evidence that they did. The former played, so far as spirit was concerned, as the beginning, not later were more alive.

BRAHMS

It has become a Symphony concert audience to rise and makes his initial too, for the audience enthusiasm hand-clapping, signs of approval playing of Brahms yesterday was the performance, in which made by the conductor and even doubly lated, as the phrase audience cold. To plain that certain matter of tempo, early in the finale. Brahms in his opinion, he is chiefly ing made Brahms hereabouts, and play the music in own convictions.

Weber of the C with which the conductor Brahms, somewhat day; but the performance exhilarating, and beauty. Better, than underscored than Weber in lifeless routine. Here, at least, was orchestral virtuosity, and there was more of it in the Rhapsodie Espagnole of Ravel, a piece that of itself is wearing thin, and needs all the aid that its interpreters can give it.

Nor were the eloquence and fervor that marked so much of the playing yesterday denied to the music of Edward Burlingame Hill, whose tone poem, "Lilacs," after Amy Lowell, first played here three years ago, came yesterday between Overture and Rhapsodie. In "Lilacs," Mr. Hill has made music that is both beautiful and expressive, that summons a rapturous quality that matches Miss Lowell's verses, and suits the vernal season which inspired them. Here is music that moves the listener, music of an emotional quality, doubly welcome in a day when most composers avoid beauty and emotional expression as they would the plague. Mr. Hill, who was present yesterday, was warmly applauded, and, after he had bowed several times, standing at his place in the hall, he was summoned by Dr. Koussevitzky to the front of the auditorium, there to acknowledge further plaudits.

Restored Pops?

A Hint from Arthur Fiedler's
First Program

THOSE who would have the Pop Concerts "what they used to be" may take heart and find pleasure in the list of pieces announced by Mr. Fiedler for the "opening night" of Wednesday, May 7. It contains nearly all the old ingredients—Introductory march; operatic overture and operatic fantasia; dance-tunes; fragment from Wagner; potpourri from a musical play of the better sort; amiable trifles; the "sensation," not too heavy, from the ended symphonic season. Once more, seemingly, the light-minded and the musically loafing are to have their way with The Pops, as indeed they should. Here is the program:

Pomp and Circumstance.....Elgar
Overture to "Mignon".....Thomas
"Rosenkavalier" Waltzes.....R. Strauss
Fantasia, "Aida".....Verdi Siegfried's Rhine-Journey from "Götterdämmerung".....Wagner
Tambourin Chinois.....Kreisler
Bolero.....Ravel
Selection, "New Moon".....Romberg
Whispering Flowers.....Blon
American Fantasy.....Herbert

A program likewise to disclose the virtuosity of conductor and orchestra of Dr. Koussevitzky, the range, the tonal valor, of the response, each to each, of the men; of both to the composer. O upon one instrument might have the full orchestral chord that divides the Overture to "Oberon." Some conductors like Mr. Mengelberg, will have a stinging blow. Dr. Koussevitzky the rapier flash. And how was the voice, how glowing the accents, phrasing, how ardent and climactic progress, through the main body Overture! For contrast, the whole introduction yet still of warm-bodied.

Ravel asks recurring feats of his winds and strings. They were of the clear color, the high point of dry suggestion, almost to beauty, etched Rhapsody—Impressionist in the heyday of that quality, but the harmonic haze. (From his writings Ravel was no Debussy.) adroitly and sensitively, Mr. Sp the English horn and Mr. Lefranc first viola did these feats. And the conductor exciting or measuring rhythm that is life to this color.

Nowhere within recollection Hill written with the spontaneity, propulsive freedom, sounding out "Lilacs." If internal evidence could here is music made not only con but, under the spell of Amy Lowell, fuoco as well. Nowhere, again, within recollection, has Mr. Hill upbuilt a tonal mass and movement; handled it so ardently. At the climax his music upswells and glows. It has begun, it ends with the fine-cut Gallic line, may serve a New-England tone-poet less. In the warm-blooded, pungent "Lilacs," that line is uncommonly vital and supple. Out of it, and what sets the restless rhythm of the blowing bushes, a new found and individual beauty suffuses the piece. Though Mr. Hill has now betaken himself to symphony, "Lilacs" remains music of personal poetic quality, of his largest, if not finest, command of symphonic means. Throughout conductor and orchestra turned him the eloquence—in the best sense of the word—that he sought.

To end the concert and to crystallize the residue of the afternoon, Brahms' Symphony in C minor. The virtuosity of the orchestra, man or man, and the conductor's ear, was never more evident than in the playing of the flute—Mr. Boettcher at the first—and of the flute (Mr. Laurent) in the prelude to the fourth movement—in the subsequent sonorous, superb intervention of trombones. The collective virtuosity, the divinity—and the desiring by the conductor, ran as clear in the spacing and the coloring of the introduction to the whole Symphony, or of the movement that follows. Through both went the openness, the fine, transparent, detailing, the subdued but intense coloring of a truly Brahmsian orchestra. For contrast, the gentle accent, the veiled tone, half misty, half sunlit, of the intermezzo that is third division.

Dr. Koussevitzky's imagination is in play when the musing Brahms, remembering and resigned, dreams through measures of the slow movement. Seldom has the conductor laid out, diversified, proportioned and cumulated a larger, bolder, more intensive design than that in which he uprears the finale from plangent beginning to dithyrambic close. From first measures to last, a spelled audience listened to the Symphony as to beauty unfolded and to power evoked upon them by a conductor and an orchestra for the hour surpassing themselves. In such passage—for so it seemed—to the fiftieth year of the Symphony Concerts, the purpose in which they were founded, stood fulfilled. H. T. P.

SYMPHONY IN FINAL CONCERT

Hill's "Lilacs" Creates
Very Favorable
Impression

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Musicians and listeners who, together, braved the untimely summer heat at the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon might well have considered themselves martyrs in the cause of music. But there was no outward evidence that they did. The former played, so far as spirit was concerned, as though the season were beginning, not ending, and the latter were more than usually responsive.

BRAHMS' FIRST

It has become the custom at the final Symphony concerts for orchestra and audience to rise when Dr. Koussevitzky makes his initial entrance. It is usual, too, for the audience to display a certain enthusiasm at the end, but the hand-clapping, augmented by other signs of approval, that followed the playing of Brahms' First Symphony yesterday was directly attributable to the performance itself. For the performance, in which most of the points made by the composer were underlined, and even doubly underlined, was calculated, as the phrase goes, to knock an audience cold. The purist might complain that certain extravagances in the matter of tempo and dynamics, particularly in the Finale, savored of sensationalism. But Dr. Koussevitzky hears Brahms in his own way. Beyond question, he is chiefly responsible for having made Brahms a popular composer hereabouts, and he is well entitled to play the music in accordance with his own convictions.

Weber of the Overture to "Oberon," with which the concert began, was, like Brahms, somewhat "played up" yesterday; but the performance was generally exhilarating, and often marked by tonal beauty. Better, too, Weber pointed and underscored than Weber in lifeless routine. Here, at least, was orchestral virtuosity, and there was more of it in the Rhapsodie Espagnole of Ravel, a piece that of itself is wearing thin, and needs all the aid that its interpreters can give it.

Nor were the eloquence and fervor that marked so much of the playing yesterday denied to the music of Edward Burlingame Hill, whose tone poem, "Lilacs," after Amy Lowell, first played here three years ago, came yesterday between Overture and Rhapsodie. In "Lilacs," Mr. Hill has made music that is both beautiful and expressive, that summons a rapturous quality that matches Miss Lowell's verses, and suits the vernal season which inspired them. Here is music that moves the listener, music of an emotional quality, doubly welcome in a day when most composers avoid beauty and emotional expression as they would the plague. Mr. Hill, who was present yesterday, was warmly applauded, and, after he had bowed several times, standing at his place in the hall, he was summoned by Dr. Koussevitzky to the front of the auditorium, there to acknowledge further plaudits.

tioning was used. I had, my intestinal trouble, old energy returned. My life with the yeast "

S BROS. Inc

ly

Fiedler's

ve the ey used may have heart and measure in the list of pieces all ended by Mr. Fiedler for the aftering night" of Wednesday, el A. It contains nearly all gation ingredients—introductory operatic overture and a, for fantasia; dance-tunes;
ent from Wagner; potpourri of the musical play of the better n, J. amiable trifles; the "sensan, "3 not too heavy, from the y, 10 symphonic season. Once 1, "3 seemingly, the light-minded Sweethearts musically loafing are to E. 1 their way with The Pops, chained they should. Here is Fsets program:

and Circumstance.....Elgar to "Mignon".....Thomas kavaller" Waltzes.....R. Strauss
la. "Aida".....Verdi id's Rhine-Journey from terdämmerung".....Wagner
rin Chinols.....Kreisler ity.....Ravel
on. "New Moon".....Romberg ring Flowers.....Blond an Fantasy.....Herbert Hal
phon

Boston, Bach and a Jubilee

By L. A. SLOPER

AS THE forty-ninth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra closes, thoughts of its supporters and friends are directed toward its jubilee year. A half-century does not perhaps constitute an amazing span of life for a musical organization, but as matters go on the shores of New England, so lately Indian-infested, it is a quite respectable record. Therefore it is to be duly celebrated.

Details of what is to come to pass next season are not officially available. It is known that our ears are to be saluted by many new compositions written in honor of the event. It is understood that composers thus co-operating include Stravinsky, Prokofieff, Bloch, Hanson and Copland. It is possible that Sir George Henschel, the first conductor of the orchestra, will visit Boston for the celebration; it is certain that he will be invited.

But beyond a bare semi-centennial observance, the Boston Orchestra will give also another festival next season. The festival idea has taken a strong hold on Dr. Koussevitzky, no doubt because of the success of his Beethoven festival in the centenary year. This was followed in the season now closing by a festival of the works of Brahms. There was no anniversary to demand this festival, but Dr. Koussevitzky is not a man to be restricted by the literal limitations of the calendar.

A Bach Festival

If he were, he would not have fixed on Bach to honor next season, in connection with the jubilee; but that is what he has done. In the spring of 1931, a Bach Festival will be given in Symphony Hall. It will last, presumably, about a week. One of the principal items of the programs will be the B minor Mass, in which the orchestra will be assisted by the Har-

Choral Society. There will be other choral numbers, certain of the Brandenburg Concertos and other instrumental compositions still to be specified. It is likely that some famous exponent of the music of Bach, such as Harold Samuel, will present some of the piano works.

Dr. Koussevitzky's present contract with the orchestra, it is understood, will expire at the close of next season. No official word is forthcoming for the present as to its renewal. There is some reason, however, to expect that it will be renewed, if terms can be agreed on. Dr. Koussevitzky has been a box office as well as an artistic success. He has brought the orchestra in the last six years to a level where it need not raise its eyes to any other in America. He is an indefatigable worker, demanding only a brief vacation period in midwinter. With no sacrifice of his artistic aims, he contrives to get along without unpleasant "incidents." All things considered, it would be difficult to find another man as suitable.

Novelties of the Season

The novelties offered during the present season were perhaps more numerous than impressive; masterpieces are not written every day. Nevertheless, several items stand out as welcome additions to the repertory. Such are Bax's Second Symphony, Sibelius's Sixth, Prokofieff's Second Piano Concerto, the Bach-Schönberg Organ Prelude and Fugue in E flat and Samuel Gardner's "Broadway."

Next season, we trust, Dr. Koussevitzky will control better his generous nature in the matter of permitting soloists. We have had this season an extraordinary crop of them, and not all, we regret to say, have been first or even second rank. It has been in the past one of Dr. Koussevitzky's merits that he let us hear for the most part the orchestra, with an occasional soloist of the first class. We hope that hereafter he will return to that excellent custom.

The final program of the season, heard on the afternoon of May 2 was made up of Weber's "Oberon" Overture, Edward Burlingame Hill's "Lilacs," Ravel's "Rapsodie Espagnole" and Brahms First Symphony.

Thus even to the end the interest of the programs was maintained—this was not a request program; that experiment of last year has been abandoned—for Mr. Hill's poem was one of the novelties introduced three years ago by Dr. Koussevitzky. A rehearing served to strengthen the pleasant impression made by this music at that time. Its fresh, charming and colorful measures mirror exquisitely the mood of the poem by Amy Lowell, on New England's lilacs, which inspired it. The Rapsodie was a nostalgic performance, and the Overture was made amazingly alive by the sharp contrasts which marked its brilliant exposition. The symphony, which was of course the culminating feature of the recent Brahms Festival, was played on this occasion as fervidly as if it had just been snatched from the shelf.

Dr. Koussevitzky, who had been greeted on his appearance by a standing orchestra and audience, was recalled repeatedly at the close to receive the thanks of his Friday afternoon subscribers, whose good wishes could hardly have been more warmly conveyed.

The BRAHMS FESTIVAL

A preliminary announcement of the programmes to be performed, with a description of the music.

Boston, Bach and a Jubilee

By L. A. SLOPER

AS THE forty-ninth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra closes, thoughts of its supporters and friends are directed toward its jubilee year. A half-century does not perhaps constitute an amazing span of life for a musical organization, but as matters go on the shores of New England, so lately Indian-infested, it is a quite respectable record. Therefore it is to be duly celebrated.

Details of what is to come to pass next season are not officially available. It is known that our ears are to be saluted by many new compositions written in honor of the event. It is understood that composers thus co-operating include Stravinsky, Prokofieff, Bloch, Hanson and Copland. It is possible that Sir George Henschel, the first conductor of the orchestra, will visit Boston for the celebration; it is certain that he will be invited.

But beyond a bare semi-centennial observance, the Boston Orchestra will give also another festival next season. The festival idea has taken a strong hold on Dr. Koussevitzky, no doubt because of the success of his Beethoven festival in the centenary year. This was followed in the season now closing by a festival of the works of Brahms. There was no anniversary to demand this festival, but Dr. Koussevitzky is not a man to be restricted by the literal limitations of the calendar.

A Bach Festival

If he were, he would not have fixed on Bach to honor next season, in connection with the jubilee; but that is what he has done. In the spring of 1931, a Bach Festival will be given in Symphony Hall. It will last, presumably, about a week. One of the principal items of the programs will be the B minor Mass, in which the orchestra will be assisted by the Harvard Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society. There will be other choral numbers, certain of the Brandenburg Concertos and other instrumental compositions still to be specified. It is likely that some famous exponent of the music of Bach, such as Harold Samuel, will present some of the piano works.

Dr. Koussevitzky's present contract with the orchestra, it is understood, will expire at the close of next season. No official word is forthcoming for the present as to its renewal. There is some reason, however, to expect that it will be renewed, if terms can be agreed on. Dr. Koussevitzky has been a box office as well as an artistic success. He has brought the orchestra in the last six years to a level where it need not raise its eyes to any other in America. He is an indefatigable worker, demanding only a brief vacation period in midwinter. With no sacrifice of his artistic aims, he contrives to get along without unpleasant "incidents." All things considered, it would be difficult to find another man as suitable.

Novelties of the Season

The novelties offered during the present season were perhaps more numerous than impressive; masterpieces are not written every day. Nevertheless, several items stand out as welcome additions to the repertory. Such are Bax's Second Symphony, Sibelius's Sixth, Prokofieff's Second Piano Concerto, the Bach-Schönberg Organ Prelude and Fugue in E flat and Samuel Gardner's "Broadway."

Next season, we trust, Dr. Koussevitzky will control better his generous nature in the matter of permitting soloists. We have had this season an extraordinary crop of them, and not all, we regret to say, have been first or even second rank. It has been in the past one of Dr. Koussevitzky's merits that he let us hear for the most part the orchestra, with an occasional soloist of the first class. We hope that hereafter he will return to that excellent custom.

The final program of the season, heard on the afternoon of May 2 was made up of Weber's "Oberon" Overture, Edward Burlingame Hill's "Lilacs," Ravel's "Rapsodie Espagnole" and Brahms First Symphony.

Thus even to the end the interest of the programs was maintained—this was not a request program; that experiment of last year has been abandoned—for Mr. Hill's poem was one of the novelties introduced three years ago by Dr. Koussevitzky. A rehearsal served to strengthen the pleasant impression made by this music at that time. Its fresh, charming and colorful measures mirror exquisitely the mood of the poem by Amy Lowell, on New England's lilacs, which inspired it. The Rapsodie had a nostalgic performance, and the Overture was made amazingly alive by the sharp contrasts which marked its brilliant exposition. The symphony, which was of course the culminating feature of the recent Brahms Festival, was played on this occasion as fervidly as if it had just been snatched from the shelf.

Dr. Koussevitzky, who had been greeted on his appearance by a standing orchestra and audience, was recalled repeatedly at the close to receive the thanks of his Friday afternoon subscribers, whose good wishes could hardly have been more warmly conveyed.

The BRAHMS FESTIVAL

A preliminary announcement of the programmes to be performed, with a description of the music.

Dr. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

SYMPHONY HALL - - - - BOSTON

March 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 1930

BRAHMS FESTIVAL

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Dr. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor

Assisted by

HARVARD GLEE CLUB

Dr. ARCHIBALD T. DAVISON, Conductor

RADCLIFFE CHORAL SOCIETY

G. WALLACE WOODWORTH, Conductor

ARTUR SCHNABEL

Piano

MARGARET MATZENAUER

Mezzo-Soprano

JEANNETTE VREELAND

Soprano

FRASER GANGE

Baritone

BURGIN STRING QUARTET

First Violin: RICHARD BURGIN

Viola: JEAN LEFRANC

Second Violin: ROBERT GUNDERSEN

Violoncello: JEAN BEDETTI

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

SYMPHONY HALL BOSTON

March 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 1930

BRAHMS FESTIVAL

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor

Assisted by

HARVARD GLEE CLUB

Dr. ARCHIBALD T. DAVISON, Conductor

RADCLIFFE CHORAL SOCIETY

G. WALLACE WOODWORTH, Conductor

ARTUR SCHNABEL

Piano

MARGARET MATZENAUEr

Mezzo-Soprano

JEANNETTE VREELAND

Soprano

FRASER GANGE

Baritone

BURGIN STRING QUARTET

First Violin: RICHARD BURGIN

Viola: JEAN LEFRANC

Second Violin: ROBERT GUNDERSEN

Violoncello: JEAN BEDETTI

PROGRAMME

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, MARCH 21, at 2.30
AND
SATURDAY EVENING, MARCH 22, at 8.15

ACADEMIC FESTIVAL OVERTURE, Op. 80

SYMPHONY No. 3 in F major, Op. 90

- I. Allegro con brio.
 - II. Andante.
 - III. Poco allegretto.
 - IV. Allegro.
-

SYMPHONY No. 2, D major, Op. 73

- I. Allegro non troppo.
- II. Adagio non troppo.
- III. Allegretto grazioso, quasi andantino.
- IV. Allegro con spirito.

PROGRAMME

SUNDAY AFTERNOON, MARCH 23, at 3.30

VARIATIONS on a Theme by Haydn, Op. 56a

CONCERTO No. 2 in B-flat major for Pianoforte and Orchestra, Op. 83

- I. Allegro non troppo.
 - II. Allegro appassionato.
 - III. Andante.
 - IV. Allegretto grazioso.
-

SYMPHONY No. 4 in E minor, Op. 98

- I. Allegro non troppo.
 - II. Andante moderato.
 - III. Allegro giocoso.
 - IV. Allegro energico e passionato.
-

SOLOIST

ARTUR SCHNABEL

BECHSTEIN PIANO USED

PROGRAMME

MONDAY EVENING, MARCH 24, at 8.15

A SONG OF DESTINY, for Chorus and Orchestra, Op. 54

A GERMAN REQUIEM, for Solo Voices, Chorus and Orchestra, Op. 45

- I. Chorus.
- II. Chorus.
- III. Baritone Solo and Chorus.
- IV. Chorus.
- V. Soprano Solo and Chorus.
- VI. Baritone Solo and Chorus.
- VII. Chorus.

SOLOISTS

HARVARD and RADCLIFFE CHORUSES

JEANNETTE VREELAND, Soprano

FRASER GANGE, Baritone

PROGRAMME

TUESDAY EVENING, MARCH 25, at 8.15

LIEBESLIEDER Waltzes, for Pianoforte duet and four vocal parts, Op. 52

Small Chorus from the Harvard Glee Club, and the Radcliffe Choral Society

PIANISTS: DR. ARCHIBALD T. DAVISON and G. WALLACE WOODWORTH.

PIANO Pieces, Op. 119

Intermezzo in B minor.

Intermezzo in E minor.

Intermezzo in C major.

Rhapsody in E-flat major.

ARTUR SCHNABEL

SONGS with Pianoforte

Sapphische Ode.

Von Ewiger Liebe.

Immer Leiser wird mein Schlummer.

Meine Liebe ist grün.

MARGARET MATZENAUER

PIANO QUINTET in F minor, Op. 34a

I. Allegro non troppo.

II. Andante, un poco adagio.

III. Scherzo: Allegro.

IV. Finale: Allegro.

ARTUR SCHNABEL and the BURGIN STRING QUARTET

PROGRAMME

WEDNESDAY EVENING, MARCH 26, at 8.15

RHAPSODY from Goethe's "Harzreise im Winter," for Alto
Solo, Male Chorus and Orchestra, Op. 53
(Chorus from the Harvard Glee Club)

CONCERTO for Pianoforte No. 1 in D Minor, Op. 15

- I. Maestoso.
 - II. Adagio.
 - III. Rondo: Allegro non troppo.
-

SYMPHONY No. 1 in C minor, Op. 68

- I. Un poco sostenuto; Allegro.
 - II. Andante sostenuto.
 - III. Un poco allegretto e grazioso.
 - IV. Adagio; Allegro non troppo, ma con brio.
-

SOLOISTS

MARGARET MATZENAUER
ARTUR SCHNABEL

BECHSTEIN PIANO USED

Brahms in 1930

The general increase in the popularity of Brahms in the last ten years is fresh proof that a half century is none too little for a more than approximate estimate of a composer. While the "importance" of Wagner, or Mendelssohn, or Tchaikovsky has varied with musical fashions, the graph of Brahms has shown a fairly constant rise through the years.

One critical moment was at the turn of the century. The smoke of the great Brahms-Wagner and Brahms-Bruckner wars having cleared away, people gazed over a battle field strewn with broken friendships, and suddenly realized that this world is large enough comfortably to hold two divergent musical styles at the same time.

Then, it seemed, was the moment for critics to pronounce the last rites over Brahms as an issue, and to give him his just niche among the immortals. As it now appears, the final word was not then spoken. There has been still another accounting by Time, that cool and leisurely critic.

That the symphonies of Brahms could ever be classed as general favorites would have been the last prediction of Brahms' most extravagant champions, not so very long ago. "Brahms is not, even in the best sense of the word, a 'popular' composer," wrote Markham Lee in his book on "Brahms," as recently as 1916. "To the ordinary amateur, who can enjoy his Beethoven or his Schubert, the work of Brahms is very often a sealed book. Not only can he not enjoy it, but it is apt to repel him."

The adjectives "austere," "harsh," "repellent," "obscure," persisted for years, reappearing whenever Brahms was summed up in print. Then there was the metaphor of the "unapproachable altitudes." James Hunecker, with whom Brahms was a hobby, wrote—"His topmost peaks are tremendously remote, and glitter and gleam in an atmosphere almost too thin for dwellers of the plains" (Mezzo Tints in Modern Music, 1905). And again Lee—"He rarely descends to earth, and prefers to remain on his pinnacle rather than come to our level; if we want him we must climb to him by steps that are perhaps painful and slow." R. A. Streatfield looked upon Brahms as "wrapped in obscurity," and followed this with the astonishing observation that "he touches no chord of human sympathy!" He continues in his "Modern Music and Musicians" (1906), "It is perhaps this very austerity, this severe self-repression, this remoteness of personality, that constitute to some minds the charm of Brahms' music." In a similar vein, others placed him on lonely heights, expecting him to stay there forever, with a small circle of the elect at his feet.

Such opinions as these need no other answer than the present festival, which perhaps no other 19th century composer except Beethoven or Wagner could have successfully furnished forth on such a scale (One must admit, however, that the Nordic Brahms has never greatly thrived on Mediterranean shores).

As for the "limitations" listed above, they have proved to be in large part the limitations of a tardy world. Time and custom, which solve all musical enigmas and resolve all discords, has thrown a clarifying beam into the dark places of Brahms, that the world might see, and smoothed out his arbitrary harshnesses, that the world might accept. In this way the "murky fog," which in the eighties was supposed to enshroud the symphonies, soon lifted. Still, the atmosphere was not yet clear about these four mountains, for a mist of wordy legends, such as those quoted above, hung over them.

But the sun, strong and patient, has at last cleared the air. It is doubtful whether an audience of 1930, listening to the First Symphony, or the Fourth, is particularly aware of anything austere, harsh, or forbidding about them. One looks in vain for the chords of "pain" which Riemann found in the first movement of the Fourth. Surely the melodious profusion of Brahms' themes, the command of his structure, the splendor of his harmonic coloring—in a word the sheer musical wealth is uppermost in a symphony as it is performed today—and applauded to the echo. As for the graver moods that once repelled—they now only add a special character and impressiveness.

Perhaps outspoken 1930 finds something kindred in the directness of Brahms, and in particular those passages which his contemporaries found too abrupt. The reticence and profundity of his emotional current, and the placid endings of his movements estranged him from many in his day of much romantic inflation and heroic fustian. These qualities are outblown and dated, while the sobrieties of Brahms endure. The lustre of Brahms' essential gold is more fully revealed rather than diminished by time. ✕

50 Years of Brahms in Boston

George Henschel had not long taken charge of the newly organized Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1881, when the public realized that there was no escape for them from the music of Johannes Brahms. As a matter of fact, the promising young German conductor was not only a sworn champion of Brahms, but an intimate friend of this fearful "modern"—(the word seems to have borne the same dread implications which it has for many today toward composers correspondingly advanced).

This was not merely a local attitude, nor was Boston entirely an outpost of musical civilization. Even in Brahms' native Germany his symphonies were scarcely received with unmixed enthusiasm, the principal difference being that his defenders there were more numerous and zealous.

Brahms was no new name to Boston, for Carl Zerrahn, with his Harvard Musical Society Orchestra, had given a bitter foretaste, introducing the First Symphony on January 3, 1878. The critics arose thereupon, and spoke in the lusty, vitriolic manner of the day, calling it "Morbidity (!), strained, unnatural—ugly" (Boston Gazette, Jan. 20, 1878). And that excellent musician, William F. Apthorp, in the "Courier" of the same date found the symphony "on the whole, disappointing." But conductors in those times also knew the spirit of battle. Zerrahn repeated the C minor Symphony on January 31. When he gave the Second Symphony its first Boston performance on January 9, 1879, John S. Dwight voiced the general coldness by saying that even Sterndale Bennett could have written a better symphony.

After such episodes, together with certain descents upon the town by Theodore Thomas, another historic captain in the Brahms cause, Boston knew what to expect with a Brahmsian at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Henschel began on his second programme by giving the first Boston performance of the Tragic Overture, repeating it the following week. He likewise introduced and repeated the Alto Rhapsody, and brought forth the two symphonies each season, apparently unmoved by indignant letters to the newspapers.

Wilhelm Gericke came with a new symphony of Brahms, the Third, (November 8, 1884) about which one critic remarked, "the themes would hardly do credit to a musical primer." The Variations on a Theme by Haydn, performed on December 6, the Transcript pronounced "stupendous," but another paper called it "twenty minutes wasted." The Fourth Symphony was announced for its first performance in this country at the concert of November 29, 1886. But Mr. Gericke was not satisfied with the way this "insuperably difficult" score went at the public rehearsal, and postponed the first performance until December 23. Meanwhile, Dr. Leopold Damrosch took the honors in New York, introducing the new work on December 11th.

The symphonies apparently had many musical friends by this time—a small, though constantly growing minority. The bulk of the public still wondered why this wrong-headed German insisted upon writing symphonies, instead of his more reasonable Hungarian Dances and Liebeslieder. When Gericke put the Second Symphony at the end of his programme of January 17 in the same season, the audience saw its opportunity, and according to a report of the concert, "there was a general uprising and leave-taking after each of the first two movements." "This is an encouraging sign," the reviewer went on. "Possibly in another season the small claim of this composer to his present prominent position will be more generally acknowledged."

The clarity, thorough musicianship, and high standards of Gericke's performances must have had an immediate effect in elucidating Brahms to the Bostonian public. The reviewer of the Transcript, on November 16, 1885, reported a performance of the First Symphony which was distinctly encouraging, although again many had "walked out":

"One has a shrewd notion that, had it been Beethoven's C minor Symphony, instead of Brahms', almost every one would have kept his seat to the end. It must be admitted that, to the larger part of our public, Brahms is still an incomprehensible terror. People speak of him pretty much as they used to speak of Schumann twenty years ago. Abstruseness and obscurity of style is the charge made against him by those of his dislikers who are frank in the acknowledgment of their own impotence to enjoy his music. In one way or another, Brahms is an unqualified bore to four music-lovers out of five in this good Boston of ours. But is this a reason for not playing Brahms' Symphonies at concerts here? By no manner of means! There is not an inconsiderable portion of our public to whom the announcement of a Brahms symphony is a promise of unspeakable delight; people who look at their programmes with anxious solicitude to see if there be not something by Brahms on it. Let them have their Brahms now and then, and let the rest of the public go hang, if it objects."

This "not inconsiderable portion of our public" did grow apace, and when Arthur Nikisch became the conductor in 1889, Boston was astonished to discover that the symphonies which they had assumed to be learned and dry, were in fact aglow with dramatic fire and romance. This was the magician who also startled the hidebound and wary public of the Leipzig Gewandhaus into an appreciation of Brahms, the melodist, colorist and poet. Under the eloquent apostle there bloomed a flourishing faction. It became a cult, with its fringe of priggishness and other accompanying phenomena. Ere long Boston was spoken of as a Brahms center.

At the news of Brahms' death (April 3, 1897) Emil Paur, who was then conductor, arranged for the regular concerts of April 9 and 10, the following appropriate and impressive, if decidedly sombre, programme—

Tragic Overture, Op. 81
Vier Ernste Gesänge, Op. 121
Concerto for Violin and Violoncello, Op. 102
Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Op. 98

Soloists:

Mr. Max Heinrich
Mr. Franz Kneisel
Mr. Alwin Schroeder

It would be interesting to know who first referred to the Brahms Symphonies as "classics," and when the remark was made. It was probably in the first years of this century. In any case, Emil Paur must have done his admirable part in giving them this label of permanence and universal respect. Boston, fortunate in its Brahms conductors, had surely one of the very finest of them in Dr. Karl Muck, in whose artist's nature the style of the composer seems closely ingrained. He combined the precision of a Gericke with the romance of a Nikisch in performances which are cherished memories.

This retrospect is hardly the place to dwell upon the status of Brahms at the symphony concerts today, or what new and surpassing beauties Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's interpretations may have revealed. We can but record the obvious by pointing out that the composer's genius, lifted free and clear of routine, was never so keenly and generally alive in this town.

Caricature by
DR. OTTO BÖHLER

A Chronology of the Works to be Performed

	Opus Number	Year Composed	Year of First Performance	First Performed by Boston Symphony Orchestra
Pianoforte Concerto No. 1, in D minor	15	1853-8	1861	1900
Piano Quintet in F minor	34a	1864	1865
A German Requiem	45	1857-66	1868	1926
Song of Destiny	54	1868	1871	1893
Liebeslieder	52	1869	1869	1886
Rhapsody for Chorus	53	1869	1870	1882
Variations on a Theme by Haydn	56a	1872	1874	1884
Symphony No. 1, in C minor	68	1854-76	1877	1881
Symphony No. 2, in D major	73	1877	1878	1882
Pianoforte Concerto No. 2, in B-flat	83	1878-81	1882	1884
Academic Festival Overture	80	1880	1881	1882
Symphony No. 3, in F major	90	1883	1884	1884
Symphony No. 4, in E minor	98	1884-5	1886	1886
Four Piano Pieces	119	1892	1892

The Four Symphonies

It was not until the age of forty-three that Brahms gave his first symphony to the world. After Beethoven's towering Ninth, his first sketches seemed unworthy to this inwardly modest and self-exacting artist. "I shall never compose a symphony!" he wrote to Levi; "You have no conception of how the likes of us feel when we hear the tramp of a giant like him behind us."

His first attempt at a symphony, at the age of twenty, was diverted to other uses, two movements becoming the basis of the D minor piano concerto. He sketched another first movement at about the same time (1854), but it lay in his desk for years before he felt ready to take the momentous plunge. The sketches emerged as the dark introduction and the abrupt and rugged main theme of the C minor Symphony as it finally appeared in 1876. The first symphony tells its own story of sheer mastery, for, technically speaking, the succeeding symphonies had little to add to this magnificent, perfectly realized, and finely matured score.

That Beethoven should have left some mark on the symphony was of course to be expected. Von Bülow's dictum about "a Tenth Symphony" was more just than wise, for it enabled the enemy to wag their heads in delight over a slogan which was taken as wrongly as slogans immemorably are.

The similarity was immediately noted between the chorale-like proclamation at the close, and the first measures of the Finale of Beethoven's Fifth. The two episodes are undoubtedly similar, although rather as emotional peaks than by a note for note comparison. Here, as elsewhere in the symphony, the cautious Brahms was for once led unawares by the titan of Bonn into an open emotionalism into which he was never betrayed before or since. Beethoven's shadow seems to lie across the impassioned declamation of the first and last movements, the unusually fervid romanticism of the Andante with its characteristic woodwind solo passages, and again, that gathering and outbursting climax. Such sturm und drang vividness was hardly like the Brahms who, in moments of intense feeling, tended the more to withdraw into himself. But these external features scarcely deprive the C minor Symphony of its thoroughly Brahmsian character, inherent in its melody, its development and bulk of detail. Nothing could be more completely Brahms than the Allegretto throughout and such episodes as the glamorous horn solo in the last movement. What other "first" symphony, one may ask, ever showed such a proud and imposing independence?

Into the second symphony, composed shortly after the first, Brahms concentrated his rarest expression of that poetic and tender lyricism which runs recurrently through his entire works. Its pastoral, idyllic mood prevails, for the veiled sadness of the adagio is only a cloud passing over the sun's face. Felix Weingartner (unless he has changed his mind since 1905) considers this symphony Brahms' master work—"In none of his other works does Brahms' spring of invention flow so freshly and spontaneously as in this one; never before or afterwards did he handle the orchestra so sonorously."

It was not until after a six years' interval that Brahms gave forth his final two symphonies. In their way, these are the most personal, the most Brahmsian of the four. The proclamatory voice of the first, and the limpid voice of the second are left behind as this sober artist tempers his ardors into a fine, even glow. A golden coloring softly transfuses the third symphony. Richter, and others called it Brahms' "Eroica," but its heroism is surely chivalric in the Old-German sense rather than militant, for the symphony has no great sonorities, no trumpet calls, no funeral march. In the Finale, as if to correct the "extravagance" of his C minor Symphony, he lays open the heavens once more, but this time it is a peaceful unfolding of widening vistas, closing softly, as a sunset from which the last light is departing.

The Fourth Symphony, in E minor, is sombre, autumnal in mood, massive in structure. But the course of years has taken away its forbidding aspect, and left it all the more impressive in its essential grandeur. Needless to say, the public at first found the E minor Symphony hardly to its liking. What consolation Brahms must have had in such a confidante as Elisabeth Herzogenberg to whom he sent the manuscript of the first two movements in 1885. Such paragraphs as the following (from Elisabeth) must have warmed the heart of one who knew that his mighty score was destined for a dimly-comprehending world—

"The Andante has that freshness and distinction of character with which only you could endow it, and even you have had recourse to certain locked chambers of your soul for the first time. How free and flowing it is, too! . . . How exquisitely melodious it all is!—the parting phrase of the theme in E major, the beautiful way in which the second subject is ushered in by an abridged version of itself. How every 'cellist, beginning with Hausmann, to whom we played it yesterday, will revel in this glorious, long-drawn-out breathing of summer! And these, I presume, are the cherries which refuse to ripen at Mürzzuschlag! The close, too, is delicious, with its modulation to C, which carries one back so happily to the opening bars, with their tinge of the Phrygian mode."

This lady was no less quick to sense the wonders of the Finale, in Passacaglia form, and particularly that imposing moment when the trombones, appearing for the first time in the symphony, intone the theme. The passacaglia, or chaconne, the difference between which is a first rate subject for hair-splitting, consists of a series of variations on a short ground bass, always in triple time. Brahms' skill in weaving his eight-bar theme through the middle and upper registers as well as the bass, in thirty-two variations, has been the perennial admiration of structure students.

Joachim, conducting the symphony on February 1, 1886, in Berlin, had the last movement announced as "Variations," and, that the complexities might not be lost to the audience, had the theme of the passacaglia printed in the programme. On early Boston Symphony Orchestra programmes, this movement bore the title Ciaccona.

But such precautions were hardly essential. The broad lines of a cathedral are not obscured to the general vision by its filigree, nor does the layman miss the nobility and sweep of Brahms' architecture.

The Two Pianoforte Concertos

To Brahms, appearing as pianist in Germany's concert halls winter after winter, pianoforte concertos would have been eminently useful. The fact that he wrote only two,—one at the age of twenty, and the other in the riper, symphonic years,—is entirely explicable in view of the problem which confronted him.

*Brahms had sent the score from Mürzzuschlag in August, with this comparison—"Cherries never get ripe for eating in these parts, so don't be afraid to say if you don't like the taste."

In the first place Brahms was an avowed opponent of virtuosity of the Lisztian sort. It was not in his nature to compose nor perform piano music for the sake of brilliance and display. This involved, of course, a complete recasting of the concerto style. Moreover, it was not Brahms' way to make the orchestra, nor yet the piano, subsidiary. To combine the two without sacrifice involved a conflict. The stout-hearted Brahms struggled twice with a problem which in each case took him four years to solve.

The early concerto was first conceived as a symphony, and the first movement was even orchestrated. This, with sketches for a second and third movement, he transformed into a sonata for two pianofortes. Clara Schumann and Julius Grimm, who played the work with him, encouraged Brahms to re-score it as a concerto. Having thus tried his material in each medium by turn, he girded himself for two years of travail (1857-8) from which he emerged with the piano concerto in D Minor. The first two movements of the two-piano sonata survived in the concerto. The third appeared in the "German Requiem" upon which he was then working, as the movement, "Behold all Flesh."

The first movement of the concerto bears the conflict not only of two welded media, but the inner conflict of personal sorrow. Its themes were conceived in the heavy year of Robert Schumann's approaching insanity and his attempt at suicide. The slow movement, in the form of a Romanza, bore the motto, Benedictus qui venit in nomine Domini, a supposed allusion to the bereaved and heart-broken Clara. The finale, the only movement which was new, and not worked over from earlier attempts, is a rondo.

The concerto was first performed at Hanover in January 22, 1859, and Brahms played it five days later at the conservative and in part hostile Gewandhaus concerts in Leipzig. That a concerto of such unexpected proportions and substantial content was greeted with censure as well as praise was hardly surprising. "A brilliant, and decided failure," wrote Brahms to Joachim.

This concerto was first performed at the Boston Symphony concerts on December 30, 1900, by Harold Bauer. It was the pianist's American debut. Mr. Bauer has established himself as a particular protagonist of the work by repeating it at these concerts in 1914 and again in 1920.

It was not until twenty years later, the spring after the completion of the second symphony, that Brahms, having at last mastered the symphonic form to his own satisfaction, turned once more to a piano concerto. His more complete orchestral mastery did not this time make his task easier, for the indefatigable composer proportionately enlarged his horizon. The Second Concerto in B-flat has often been referred to as a "symphony with piano obligato." The definition is in part justified by the great scope of the work, its abundant orchestral interest, and its four movements. As a matter of fact it remains a concerto, formally speaking, Brahms having added the scherzo as a second movement, because according to Dr. Billroth, "the opening movement appeared to him to be too simple; he required something strongly passionate before the equally simple andante."

This interloping "Allegro appassionata," of formidable proportions, was what Brahms referred to in a letter announcing a "tiny, tiny piano-forte concerto, with a tiny, tiny wisp of a scherzo"—thereby displaying his playful humor which Lawrence Gilman (a gentleman of apt adjectives) describes as "mastodonic."

The concerto takes its place between the second and third symphonies, filling the gap of time which separates them, as if indeed this were a third symphony, and as if the two following in fairly regular succession, were a fourth and a fifth. Here is the one concerto in history where the orchestra and piano are treated simultaneously in their most fulsome and musically pregnant vein. Even Beethoven's piano concertos, which most nearly approximate Brahms' in this aim, often subside into frank bravura, particularly in their first movements. The slow movements, with their deeper current, have recourse largely to alternating dialogue between piano and tutti, an evasion which our stalwart Brahms, bent upon fusion, would not have permitted himself. The result is a magnificent score which taxes a pianist's utmost powers without properly rewarding him, for its worst difficulties are not apparent to the listener. As Brahms remarked to the young pianist, Ella Pancera, who played it in Vienna, "It is decidedly not for little girls."

The fact that Brahms wrote this concerto after his first spring in Italy, has set many a rhapsodic critic to imagining in it "Italian hills first touched with green," and the "newly mantled groves and valleys of the haunted south." Yet perhaps with this absolutist, such picturings should be understood as strictly personal interpretations. As a matter of fact, Brahms made his first sketches at Portschiach, in May, after his return from Italy. It also happens that the Second Symphony, that most Italian of Brahms' scores, was composed a year before he first set foot in Italy. If it had been otherwise, we can well imagine how Kalbeck, whom Philip Hale calls Brahms "exhaustive and exhausting" biographer, would have read into it Naples, Venice, or the Adriatic! But Portschiach on the Wörthen See gave birth to this second symphony. A lovely spot this Carinthian lake must be, to inspire such rapt lyricism! The concerto suggests the vein of the symphony more than once, as in the opening with its horn call, the slow movement (worthy of any symphony) with its delicate 'cello solo, and the tender, contemplative mood of the Finale. It is interesting to note that the opening notes of the 'cello solo are identical to the first phrase of the song "Immer leiser wird mein Schlummer," which, as it happens, occurs on a later programme of this festival. The song itself was written several years later.

The Variations on a Theme by Haydn, and the Academic Festival Overture

The Akademische Festouvertüre, with its complementary companion piece, the Tragische Ouvertüre, were composed in the gap between the first two and the last two symphonies. The Variations hold the interesting position of being Brahms' first purely orchestral score (disregarding the two youthful and tentative Serenades). Not yet ready to complete his first symphony, he chose this then unusual form for an orchestral piece. He found his theme in a Divertimento of Haydn, labelled Chorale St. Antoni. There are eight Variations and a Finale, the delightful color and rhythmic contrasts by no means interfering with a sense of progression which leads to a climax notably brilliant for Brahms.

According to John Fuller-Maitland, the Academic Festival Overture is proof of Brahms' "sense of humor." But is the piece not rather good humored than humorous? The laughter of Brahms was the overflow of high spirits in the warmth of a friendly circle, good-natured (with an occasional barb), as often as not at a bürgerlich tavern table, and quite in accord with the festive mood of German student jollification. It was hardly comparable to the "unbuttoned" Beethoven, touching the fundamentals, Mozart, sparkling on the instant, or Wagner, expansively mocking and loving his Nurembergers. One can imagine Brahms enjoying the kind regard implied by the degree of Doctor of Philosophy which was being bestowed upon him by the University Breslau, while holding off the hated stiffness of its ceremonials with this jovial music.

The "Song of Destiny"

Albert Dietrich was visiting the naval port of Wilhelmshaven with Brahms one summer morning, when he noticed that his companion was unusually thoughtful. The composer admitted that he had happened upon a book of Hölderlin's Poems that morning and had been much impressed with the Schicksalslied. A little later Dietrich found him seated on the beach, quietly writing. It was the first sketch for the "Schicksalslied." Brahms foreswore a projected excursion and hurried back to Hamburg, in order to give himself up to his work.

This score, which has been called the "Little Requiem," has something of the mood of veiled sorrow found in the larger work. The poem, from "Hyperion," contrasts the immaculate, undisturbed blissfulness of the celestials, with the cruel sufferings and struggles of fate-ridden man.

The composer treats his subject with characteristic restraint. He tempers its fatalism with an orchestral postlude, which is a final sigh of tender pity, softening the inexorable burden of the poet's concept.

The "German Requiem"

Brahms was thirty-three when he completed his German Requiem: an earnest young composer, who, though loudly championed in certain quarters, had as yet acquired neither a beard nor general fame.

But it did not take Germany, land of Singvereine, long to find out that he had produced a splendid score. To be sure, a preliminary performance of the first three movements in Vienna on December 1, 1866 was hissed, and even the loyal Hanslick found it necessary to compare the fugue which concludes the third movement over a pedal point in D to "an express train rattling through a tunnel."

But in the infinitely more favorable setting of the Cathedral at Bremen on Good Friday, April 10, 1868, the Requiem was performed with far different results. This time the score lacked only the fifth chorus, in place of which Frau Joachim sang I know that my Redeemer Liveth from The Messiah, and Herr Joachim played Schumann's Abendlied (the barbarous interpolation seems to have been taken in good part).

The score made a profound impression and soon went the rounds of German-speaking towns. In the following year alone, it was given at Basil, Leipzig (twice), Hamburg, Oldenburg (twice), Karlsruhe, Zurich, and Münster.

Here was another case of complete achievement of a medium, matched with that reflective, inward mood which showed Brahms' stiller pools to be his deepest. Those months had apparently not been wasted, in which he had presided (with many amiable quips) over a ladies' choir in Hamburg, trying his hand at arranging and writing pieces for them. Nor yet his season as director of the Singakademie in Vienna, when he delved widely into the past choral masters for his programmes.

Some have tried to prove, by the date of its composition, that Brahms was moved by the death of his mother, others that Robert Schumann's death, which certainly profoundly affected him, was the motive cause. In any case, it is a personal music, transcending ritual and sect, albeit so thoroughgoing a North German as Brahms could scarcely have composed religious music entirely free of Protestant implications. In any case, the awe of death is minimized, save in one arresting passage in the sixth movement, where the Dies Irae briefly dominates. The century shows no great choral work so innocent of the sensational. The prevailing mood is gently elegaic, with a quiet but entirely convincing affirmation of faith.

Walter Niemann, whose book on Brahms is refreshingly sane, after the partisan and indiscriminate extravagance of earlier biographers, reserves some of his highest praise for the Requiem. He sums up the score as follows:

"Brahms always has the most beautiful and personal message to give when his aim is to express in music serene resignation, mild, grave consolation, a deep Weltschmerz, sorrowful lamentation, deeply agitated moral unrest, an exquisitely idyllic atmosphere, or mystic visionary absorption. To such moods, for instance, belong the whole of the first and last movements, with the wonderful nobility of their ample melodic line and suave cantilena passages, and, again, the rigid, gloomy passage in the form of a funeral march in the second movement, the prayerful passage of the third movement, which only gradually and painfully regains its composure after tortures of moral suffering, the soft, Biblical idyll of the fourth, or, lastly, the melancholy mingling of grief and consolation in the fifth, and the powerful imaginative conceptions of death, the grave, the last judgment, and the resurrection in the sixth movement. Perhaps, indeed, it is precisely these inexorably harsh, wild, and gloomy imaginative passages in the second and sixth movements which form the crown of the whole work, both spiritually and musically."

The Alto Rhapsody

"Conductors will not exactly fight for this opus," wrote Brahms to his friend Dietrich in 1869, in his characteristic way of speaking flippantly of his most deeply felt works. "To you at least it may be gratifying that I do not always express myself in the frivolous $\frac{3}{4}$ time."*

The Rhapsody, for Alto solo, Male chorus and Orchestra, was a setting of four stanzas from Goethe's Harzreise im Winter. Brahms had been greatly impressed by the poem, finding in its Wertherian solitude, its romantic melancholy, and its final resurgence of love and life under the spell of the Prussian mountain-range, a kindred mood, setting his musical imagination aglow.

Goethe had visited the Harz mountains in the winter of 1777. He was then twenty-eight, fulfilling his Weimar post, and under the spell of Charlotte von Stein, his passion of the moment. His expedition was in part geological, for these were also the scientific years. But Goethe, the poet, likewise sought the scenic grandeur of the Brocken. Werthers Leiden was but four years off his pen, and although he had already parodied it, he had not outgrown its mood.

The Liebeslieder Waltzes

"Brahms and waltzes!" wrote Hanslick when these vocal waltzes appeared. "The two words stare at each other in positive amazement on the elegant title page. The earnest, silent Brahms, a true younger brother of Schumann, and just as North German, Protestant and unworldly as he—writing waltzes!"

And yet it is hardly to be wondered at that a composer who based his songs and instrumental melodies on the German Volkslied and succumbed periodically through his life to the sinuous Magyar rhythms, should have fallen, like all of his illustrious predecessors before gay and seductive Vienna.

The sheer delight of Brahms' musical settings of popular melodies, which lend them harmonic distinction without disturbing their native lightness, is nowhere more apparent than in these "Love Songs" for "Pianoforte Duet and Four voices (ad libitum)." Their slow tempo rather suggests the Ländler which had tempted Schubert.

The Piano Quintet

Brahms' single Piano Quintet (in F minor, Op. 34a) belongs to that same tortured and formative period in Hamburg when he wrestled with another score, the D minor Piano Concerto, until having assumed the shape of a symphony and a two-piano sonata by turn, it took its final fair form.

The piano quintet presented a second Herculean labor of merging the piano and the string quartet. The piece first saw the light in 1861 as a string quintet with two 'cellos. Its first metamorphosis resulted in a sonata for two pianos, in 1864. But the indomitable Brahms held the monster firmly by the throat, encouraged by his fair lady, Clara Schumann, until it assumed its final shape in 1865.

*The Liebeslieder had just had their first performance.

The composer was outgrowing the transparent style of Schumann, and courting the emotional conflicts and thematic plenitude of Beethoven, which by no means made matters easier. Again as with Beethoven, these two scores seem to have gained vitality with labor.

The Soloists

ARTUR SCHNABEL was born in Lipnik, Galicia, on April 17, 1882. Although he began to study the pianoforte at the age of six in Vienna with Hans Schmitt, he was not exploited as a prodigy. He was accepted three years later by Theodor Leschitzky into the class of which Ossip Gabrilowitsch was also a member. He graduated at the age of fifteen. For many years, Artur Schnabel has been esteemed as one of the leading pianists in Europe, holding a special reputation as an interpreter of Brahms' music. He has made only a few appearances in America, however. His first performance in this country was in New York on December 27, 1921. He appeared as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the regular concerts of March 30-31, 1923, playing the Fourth Concerto of Beethoven—Bruno Walter conducting. Artur Schnabel is coming to America for the special purpose of appearing in this Festival.

MARGARET MATZENAUER was born in Hungary of a family musical on both sides. She began her career as an operatic singer, appearing in "Oberon" in Strassburg, and subsequently became a regular singer in the Hof Teater and the Prinzregenten Teater in Munich, and the Wagner Festivals in Bayreuth. She made her American debut at the Metropolitan Opera House at New York, in 1911. In her many years' connection with this company, her Wagnerian rôles of Kundry, Brünnhilde, Isolde, Venus, and the contralto roles of Brangaene and Ortrud are particularly remembered. Mme. Matzenauer has appeared as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra a number of times—notably in Stravinsky's "Oedipus Rex" in 1928.

JEANNETTE VREELAND was born in Los Angeles, the daughter of Judge Vreeland of Denver. Her career as a concert singer has included appearances with this orchestra in the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven in 1925, 1927 (Beethoven Festival), and 1928 (Pension Fund Concert).

FRASER GANGE's versatility is shown by the varying character of the parts he has taken as soloist with this orchestra on past occasions. The baritone sang in Handel's "Messiah" at a Pension Fund concert in 1927. He also appeared in "Oedipus Rex" in 1928, and in the Ninth Symphony in 1928 and 1929.

RICHARD BURGIN organized the BURGIN STRING QUARTET during his first season in America as concertmaster of this orchestra (1921). This was in accord with his previous activities in chamber music in Europe, and brings to mind the Kneisel Quartet which was formed in 1885 under similar circumstances.

—JOHN N. BURK.

SYMPHONY HALL, BOSTON

SUNDAY, MARCH 23, 1930

BRAHMS FESTIVAL

SECOND PROGRAMME

HISTORICAL AND DESCRIPTIVE NOTES
BY PHILIP HALE

"SONG OF DESTINY" ("SCHICKSALS LIED") FOR CHORUS AND ORCHESTRA, OP. 54 JOHANNES BRAHMS

(Born at Hamburg on May 7, 1833; died at Vienna on April 3, 1897)

Brahms, sojourning in 1868 in the north of Germany, driving one summer day from Oldenburg to Wilhelmshaven, was unusually absent-minded and serious. He said that he had been much impressed by Hölderlin's* poem "Hyperion's Song of Destiny," which he had read that morning for the first time. After he had inspected the great northern war-harbor, he went to the beach and made the sketches of the music for the poem.

This poem pictures the serene, unchanging existence of the celestials, contrasted with the changing life of the "Complaining Millions of men." It is a wholly fatalistic conception.

*Johann Christian Friedrich Hölderlin was born at Lauffen on the Neckar, March 20, 1770. He made his studies at Tübingen. Having lived as a family tutor in various cities, he became insane in 1806, and thus lived from 1806 at Tübingen, where he died on June 7, 1843.

A limited number of single tickets are available at the Symphony Hall Box Office for the Concerts of March 23, 24, 25, 26

This poem from "Hyperion" is dated 1799:

Ihr wandelt droben im Licht,
Auf weichem Bogen, selige Genien!
Glänzende Götterlüfte
Rühren euch leicht,
Wie die Finger der Künstlerin Heilige Saiten.

Schicksallos, wie der schlafende
Säugling, athmen die Himmlischen;
Keusch bewahrt
In bescheidener Knospe, Blühet ewig
Ihnen der Geist,
Und die seligen Augen
Blicken in stiller, Ewiger Klarheit.

Doch uns ist gegeben,
Auf keiner Stätte zu ruhen;
Es schwinden, es fallen Die leidenden Menschen Blindlings von einer
Stunde zur andern,
Wie Wasser von Klippe
Zu Klippe geworfen, Jahrlang ins Ungewisse hinab.

Ye wander above in light,
On tender soil, blessed immortals!
Glistening divine breezes Touch you gently,
As the fingers of the artist
Sacred strings.

Calm as the sleeping child
Breathe the celestials;
Chastely guarded
In modest bud,
Their spirits bloom eternally,
And their blissful eyes
Gaze in quiet, eternal stillness.

But to us it is given
On no spot to rest;
Suffering men
Vanish, blindly fall
From hour to hour,
As water thrown
From rock to rock,
Year-long down into uncertainty.

Brahms wrote his orchestral postlude, regarding it as, in a sense, Miss Florence May says from personal knowledge, the most important part of the composition, for it brings "a message of consolation, hope, faith, courage" to those depressed by Hölderlin's gloomy view of life.

The "Schicksalslied" was published in December, 1871, and performed early in Bremen, Breslau, Frankfort, and Vienna, but the first performance was from manuscript on October 18, 1871, under the direction of the composer at a concert of the Carlsruhe Philharmonic Society. The programme also included the overture, garden scene, and the conclusion of the second part of Schumann's "Faust," conducted by Hermann Levi, and two of Schubert's songs, "Griesengesang" and "Geheimes," with the accompaniment orchestrated by Brahms. The solo singers were Johanna Schwarz and Stockhausen. The second performance, the first after publication, was at a Gesellschaft concert in Vienna, on January 21, 1872. Anton Rubinstein conducted.

The first performance in Boston was at a Theodore Thomas concert on November 11, 1874.

"The Song of Destiny" was performed at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on February 4, 1893. The chorus was the Boston Symphony Chorus. The programme comprised Beethoven's Overture to "Coriolanus"; Foote's Ballad for chorus, quartet (Mmes. Barnard-Smith, and Carlsmith; Messrs. Parker and Hay) and orchestra, conducted by Mr. Foote; and Paine's Columbus March and Hymn. A second performance was on March 4, 1927 with the Cecilia Society.

Mr. ARTUR SCHNABEL, born on April 17, 1882, at Lipnik, began at the age of six years to study the pianoforte with Hans Schmitt. In the years 1888-1897 he studied with Leschetizky at Vienna. He soon became known as a virtuoso, especially as a player of music by Brahms. In 1919 he received the title of Professor. He married the contralto, Therese Behr, a distinguished concert singer. Among his compositions are a string quartet, a Dance Suite for the pianoforte, and a solo sonata for violin. With Karl Flesch he edited an edition of Mozart's Sonatas for violin and pianoforte. Mr. Schnabel's dwelling place is Berlin. He visited the United States in the season of 1922-23 and played in Boston with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on March 30, 1923 (Beethoven's Concerto, No. 4, in G major).

CONCERTO NO. 2, IN B-FLAT MAJOR, FOR PIANOFORTE AND ORCHESTRA,
OP. 83 JOHANNES BRAHMS

(Born at Hamburg on May 7, 1833; died at Vienna on April 3, 1897)

This concerto was performed for the first time at Budapest, from manuscript, November 9, 1881, when the composer was the pianist.*

The first performance in Boston was at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on March 15, 1884, when B. J. Lang was the pianist. The concerto has been played at these concerts by Carl Baermann, Rafael Joseffy, Adele aus der Ohe, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Harold Bauer, Carl Friedberg, Felix Fox, November 21, 1919 (concert in memory of Major Higginson); Moriz Rosenthal.

On April 8, 1878, Brahms, in company with Dr. Billroth and Carl Goldmark, made a journey to Italy. Goldmark, who went to Rome to be present at the last rehearsals of his opera, "Die Königin von Saba,"—production was postponed until the next year on account of the illness of the leading soprano,—did not accompany his friends to Naples and Sicily. Returning to Pörttschach, Brahms sketched themes of the Concerto in B-flat major on the evening before his birthday; but he left the sketches, in which "he mirrored the Italian spring turning to summer," undeveloped.

His violin concerto originally contained a scherzo movement. Conferring with Joachim, he omitted this movement. Max Kalbeck thinks that this Scherzo found a home in the second pianoforte concerto.

In March, 1881, Brahms set out on a second journey in Italy. He visited Venice, Florence, Siena, Orvieto, Rome, Naples, and Sicily.

*The statement made by Miss Florence May in her Life of Brahms (Vol. II., p. 104) that the first performance was at Stuttgart on November 22, 1881, is incorrect.

He returned to Vienna on his birthday of that year with his mind full of Italian scenes in springtime and with thoughts of the pianoforte concerto inspired by his first visit. On May 22 he went to Pressbaum near Vienna, and lived in the villa of Mme. Heingartner. In 1907, Orestes Ritter von Connevay, then the possessor of the villa, erected a monument to Brahms in the garden. A bronze bust stands on a stone pedestal. An iron tablet bears this inscription: "Here in the summer of 1881 Johannes Brahms completed 'Nänie,' Op. 82, and the pianoforte concerto, Op. 83." Brahms was moved by the death of Anselm Feuerbach, the painter, to set music for chorus and orchestra to Schiller's poem, "Nänie."

Miss May says in her Life of Brahms that the manuscript of "Nänie," and portions of the concerto, were soon lent by Brahms to Dr. Billroth,* "the concerto movements being handed to him with the words 'A few little pianoforte pieces.'" "It is always a delight to me," wrote Billroth, "when Brahms, after paying me a short visit, during which we have talked of indifferent things, takes a roll out of his greatcoat pocket, and says casually, 'Look at that and write me what you think of it.'"

Max Kalbeck, the exhaustive and exhausting biographer of Brahms, says that Elisabet von Herzogenberg was the first to know something about the existence of the concerto. In the Brahms-Herzogenberg correspondence, edited by Kalbeck and translated into English by Hannah Bryant (New York, 1909), is a letter written by Brahms to Eliasbet from Pressbaum, July 7, 1881. In it he says: "I don't mind telling you that I have written a tiny, tiny pianoforte concerto with a tiny, tiny wisp of a scherzo. It is in B-flat, and I have reason to fear I have worked this udder, which has always yielded good milk before, too often and too vigorously." In a footnote, Kalbeck says that the concerto was completed on July 7; on July 11, Brahms sent the whole of it to Billroth with this note: "I am sending you some small pianoforte pieces." In her answer Elisabet thanked Brahms for the news of "a tiny, tiny pianoforte Konzertchen with a tiny, tiny Scherzerl and in B-flat—the true and tried B-flat." "Scherzerl," Kalbeck takes pains to say, "is the name given to the crusty ends of a long roll of bread in Vienna."

In a letter to Billroth accompanying the concerto, Brahms begged him not to show "the little pianoforte pieces" to anyone and to return them as soon as possible; if they interested him, he would like a word about them. Billroth immediately wrote out his opinion. He praised the "musical music," rejoiced in the happy mood, said that the second concerto was to the first as the man to the youth, but he thought the "charming Scherzo hardly in keeping with the simpler form of the first movement. This Allegro appassionato put between the Allegro non troppo and the Andante gave the concerto the form of a symphony. Indeed, Hanslick, Riemann, and others have described the concerto as "a symphony with pianoforte obbligato." But Brahms did not insert the Scherzo for the sake of symphonic form; he feared that without it the "Adagio mood" would dominate the work. Billroth, who afterwards wrote to Wilhelm Lübke that the Scherzo could be omitted without injury, for, interesting as it was, it was unnecessary, conferring with Brahms in the matter, received the answer that, as the first movement was so simple, there was need of a vigorous and passionate movement before the simple Andante.

*Theodore Billroth, the eminent Viennese professor of surgery, was born at Bergen, on the island of Rügen, April 26, 1829. He died at Abbazia on February 6, 1894. He was a thoroughly educated musician. His book, "Wer ist musikalisch?" edited by Hanslick, was published at Berlin in 1896.

The concerto was published in 1882 with the dedication to "his dear friend and teacher Eduard Marxsen."* An edition for two pianofortes was also published in 1882. It was made by Brahms.

At the first performance at Budapest in a Philharmonic concert in the Redouten Saal, the concerto followed, as second number, Cherubini's "Medea" overture. Brahms's Academic Festival overture and C minor symphony followed. They were new to Budapest. The composer conducted them. Alexander Erkel conducted the orchestra of the National Theatre in the performance of the concerto.

Brahms's friends in Vienna first knew the concerto in the version for two pianofortes played by Brahms and Brüll at Ehbar's pianoforte establishment. The hearers were Billroth, Hanslick, Richter, and Kalbeck.

The concerto was played by Brahms at Stuttgart, November 22, 1881; at Zurich, December 6, 1881, when "Nänie," conducted by him, was performed for the first time; at Meiningen, November 27; at Berlin by him with the Meiningen orchestra led by Bülow; at Baden-Baden, December 16; at Breslau, December 20; at Vienna, December 26, where the success was dampened by the composer's "uneven and at times heavy performance." The concerto was heard in other cities: Kiel, Bremen, Hamburg, Münster, Utrecht, Frankfort.

At Leipsic, January 1, 1882, the concerto was coolly received.

*Marxsen was born on July 23, 1806, at Nienstädten near Altona. He died at Altona, November 18, 1887. He studied at Altona, Hamburg, and in 1830 at Vienna; then he made Hamburg his home and taught there. Brahms at the age of twelve began to study with him at Altona and made his first appearance as a pianist, November 20, 1847, at Hamburg. Marxsen received the title of Royal Music Director in 1875.

The accompaniment of the concerto is scored for two flutes, two oboes, two clarinets, two bassoons, four horns, two trumpets, kettle-drums, and strings.

..

I. Allegro non troppo, B-flat major, 4-4. The movement opens with hints at the first theme. The horn gives out a phrase which to Kalbeck is the awakening cry of Spring to cross the Alps and to inspire the longing heart of the composer with a new romantic feeling. The pianoforte answers this phrase; there is another horn phrase, with an answer. The wood-wind, strengthened later by strings, completes the period. Cadenza-like passage work follows for the pianoforte alone. This leads to a tutti in which the first and second themes, also subsidiary themes, are exposed. The development and the free fantasia section are long and elaborate. The coda is in the shape of a decrescendo passage-work, with ornamental arpeggios for the pianoforte. A few fortissimo measures bring the close.

II. Allegro appassionato, D minor, 3-4. The movement is in the form of a scherzo. A middle section in D major answers for the traditional Trio.

III. Andante, B-flat major, 6-4. The movement opens with the announcement and development of an expressive theme, sung first by a solo violoncello, and later by first violins and bassoons. There is a resemblance between this theme and the melody of Brahms's song "Immer leiser wird mein Schlummer"; but Kalbeck says that Brahms had no thought of quoting himself, for he did not know Lingg's poem until five years later, and he set music to it in 1886. (There is also in this movement a reminder of Brahms's "Todessehnen," composed in 1878.) The pianoforte enters with free preluding passages. The orchestra takes up the theme again. There is figuration of a varied character for the pianoforte (B-flat major, B-flat minor). A transitional passage in B major leads to the last return of the theme. The orchestra uses it for the coda, while the pianoforte has trills and arpeggios.

IV. Allegretto grazioso, B-flat major, 2-4. The Finale is in full rondo form. There are three themes: a lively one announced by the pianoforte and developed at length by it and the orchestra; a more cantabile theme of a Hungarian character given out alternately by strings and wood-wind with an arpeggio accompaniment by the pianoforte; a playful theme, which first appears for the pianoforte with a pizzicato string accompaniment. These themes are elaborately developed. There is a long coda, un poco più presto.

SYMPHONY IN E MINOR, OP. 98 JOHANNES BRAHMS
(Born at Hamburg, May 7, 1833; died at Vienna, April 3, 1897)

This symphony was first performed at Meiningen, October 25, 1885, under the direction of the composer.

Simrock, the publisher, is said to have paid Brahms forty thousand marks for the work. It was played at a public rehearsal of the Symphony Orchestra in Boston, November 26, 1886. Although Mr. Gericke "did not stop the orchestra"—to quote from a review of the concert the next day—he was not satisfied with the performance. Schumann's Symphony in B-flat was substituted for the concert of November 27; there were further rehearsals. The work was played for the first time in Boston at a concert of this orchestra on December 23, 1886. The first performance in the United States was by the Symphony Society, New York, December 11, 1886.

The symphony was composed in the summers of 1884 and 1885 at Mürzzuschlag in Styria: the Allegro and Andante during the first summer, the Scherzo and Finale during the last. Miss Florence May in her Life of Brahms says that the manuscript was nearly destroyed in 1885: "Returning one afternoon from a walk, he (Brahms) found that the house in which he lodged had caught fire, and that his friends were busily engaged in bringing his papers, and amongst them the nearly finished manuscript of the new symphony, into the garden. He immediately set to work to help in getting the fire under, whilst Frau Fellingner sat out of doors with either arm outspread on the precious papers piled on each side of her."

In a letter, Brahms described this symphony as "a couple of entr'actes," also as "a choral work without text." He was doubtful about its worth. He consulted his friends, and he and Ignaz Brüll played a pianoforte arrangement in the presence of several of them. He judged from their attitude that they did not like it and he was much depressed. There was a preliminary orchestral rehearsal at Meiningen in October, 1885, conducted by Hans von Bülow. Brahms arrived in time for the first performance. The symphony was most warmly applauded, and the audience endeavored, but in vain, to obtain a repetition of the third movement. The work was repeated November 1 under Bülow's direction, and was conducted by the composer in the course of a three weeks' tour with the orchestra and Bülow in Germany and in Netherlands. The first performance in Vienna was at a Philharmonic concert, led by Richter, January 17, 1886. "Though the symphony was applauded by the public and praised by all but the inveterately hostile section of the press, it did not reach the hearts of the Vienna audience in the same unmistakable manner as its two immediate predecessors, both of which had made a more striking impression on a first hearing in Austria than the first symphony in C minor. Strangely enough, the fourth symphony at once obtained some measure of real appreciation in Leipsic, where the first had been far more successful than the second and third." This statement is too friendly towards Brahms. As a matter of fact, the symphony disappointed Brahms's friends. Hugo Wolf wrote a bitter review in which he made all manner of fun at the fact, trumpeted by Brahms's admirers, that at last there was a symphony in E minor. (See "Hugo Wolf's Musikalische Kritiken," Leipsic, 1911, pp. 241-244.) It was performed under the composer's direction at the Gewandhaus concert in Leipsic of February 18, 1886.

This symphony was performed at a Philharmonic concert in Vienna on March 7, 1897, the last Philharmonic concert heard by Brahms. We quote from Miss May's biography: "The fourth symphony had never become a favorite work in Vienna. Received with reserve on its first performance, it had not since gained much more from the general public of the city than the respect sure to be accorded there to an important work by Brahms. To-day [sic], however, a storm of applause broke out at the end of the first movement, not to be quieted until the composer, coming to the front of the artist's box in which he was seated, showed himself to the audience. The demonstration was renewed after the second and the third movements, and an extraordinary scene followed the conclusion of the work. The applauding, shouting house, its gaze riveted on the figure standing in the balcony, so familiar and yet in present aspect so strange, seemed unable to let him go. Tears ran down his cheeks as he stood there, shrunken in form, with lined countenance, strained expression, white hair hanging lank; and through the audience there was a feeling as of a stifled sob, for each knew that they were saying farewell. Another outburst of applause and yet another; one more acknowledgment from the master; and Brahms and his Vienna had parted forever."*

In the summers of 1884 and 1885 the tragedies of Sophocles, translated into German by Gustav Wendt, were read diligently by Brahms. It is thought that they influenced him in the composition of this symphony. Kalbeck thinks that the whole symphony pictures the tragedy of human life. He sees in the Andante a waste and ruined field, as the Campagna near Rome; he notes the appearance of a passage from Brahms's song, "Auf dem Kirchhofe," with the words "Ich war an manch vergess'nem Grab gewesen"; to him the

*Brahms attended the production of Johann Strauss's operetta, "Die Göttin der Vernunft," March 13, but was obliged to leave after the second act, and he attended a rehearsal of the Raeger-Soldat Quartet less than a fortnight before his death.—Ed.

Scherzo is the Carnival at Milan. While Speidel saw in the Finale the burial of a soldier, Kalbeck is reminded by the music of the passage in Sophocles's "Œdipus Coloneus": "Not to have been born at all is superior to every view of the question; and this, when one may have seen the light, to return thence whence he came as quickly as possible, is far the next best."

The symphony was published in 1886. It is scored for two flutes (one interchangeable with piccolo), two oboes, two clarinets, two bassoons, one double-bassoon, four horns, two trumpets, three trombones, a set of three kettledrums, triangle, and strings.

• •

Brahms warned Bülow against the acerbity of this symphony. "I have often, while writing, had a pleasing vision of rehearsing it with you in a nice leisurely way—a vision that I still have, although I wonder if it will ever have any other audience! I rather fear it has been influenced by this climate, where the cherries never ripen. You would never touch them."

The tonality of this symphony has occasioned remark. Dr. Hugo Riemann suggests that Brahms chose the key of E minor, on account of its pale, wan character, to express the deepest melancholy. "E minor is the tonality of the fall of the year: it reminds one of the perishableness of all green and blooming things, which the two sister tonalities, G major and E major, are capable of expressing so truthfully to life." Composers of symphonies have, as a rule, avoided E minor as the chief tonality. There is a symphony by Haydn, the "Trauersymphonie" (composed in 1772), and, in marked contrast with Riemann's view, Raff's ninth symphony, "In Summer" (composed in 1878), is in E minor. One of Bach's greatest organ preludes and fugues, Beethoven's Sonata, Op. 90, and one of the quartets of his Op. 59 are in this tonality, which has been described as dull in color, shadowy, suggestive of solitude and desolation. Huber's "Böcklin" symphony is in E minor; so is Rachmaninoff's Second Symphony. Chopin's Concerto in E minor for piano is surely not a long, desolate waste. Riemann reminds us that there are hints in this symphony of music by Handel—"Brahms's favorite composer"—not only in the tonality, but in moments of detail, as in the aria, "Behold and see," from "The Messiah," the structure of which contains as in a nutshell the substance of the first movement; also the dotted rhythm of the violoncellos in the aria, "I know that my Redeemer liveth," which, as will be remembered, is in E major.

Heinrich Reimann does not discuss this question of tonality in his short description of the symphony: "It begins as in ballad fashion. Blaring fanfares of horns and cries of pain interrupt the narration, which passes into an earnest and ardent melody (B major, violoncellos). The themes, especially those in fanfare fashion, change form and color. 'The formal appearance, now powerful, prayerful, now caressing, tender, mocking, homely, now far away, now near, now hurried, now quietly expanding, ever surprises us, is ever welcome: it brings joy and gives dramatic impetus to the movement.'* A theme of the second movement constantly returns in varied form, from which the chief theme, the staccato figure given to the wind, and the melodious song of the violoncellos are derived. The third movement, Allegro giocoso, sports with old-fashioned harmonies, which should not be taken too seriously. This is not the case with the Finale, an artfully contrived Ciacona of antique form, but of modern contents. The first eight measures give the 'title-page' of the Ciacona.† The measures that follow are variations of the leading theme; wind instruments prevail in the first three, then the strings enter; the movement grows livelier, clarinets and oboes lead to E major; and now comes the solemn climax of this movement, the trombone passage. The old theme enters again after the fermata, and rises to full force, which finds expression in a Più allegro for the close."

We have seen that, while Dr. Hugo Riemann finds E minor the tonality of fall, Raff, the composer, chose that tonality for his symphony, "In Summer."

Many singular statements have been made concerning the character and influence of ancient modes and modern tonalities. Take this same tonality, E minor. C. F. D. Schubart (1739-91) described it as "naïve, feminine, the declaration of innocent love, a lamentation without querulous complaint, sighing with only a few tears. This tonality speaks of the serenest hope, which finds happiness by flowing into C major. As E minor has naturally only one color, the tonality may be likened unto a maiden robed in white, with a rose-red bow on her breast." Friedrich Zamminer, in his "Die Musik" (1855), quotes from an æthetician of 1838, a popular and fruitful professor of taste, who characterized all the tonalities: "E minor is only limited and restricted life, a struggle, the complaint of compassion, sorrow over lack of strength." A celebrated pianist told Dr. A. Breton, of Dijon, that to her G major was red, E major red, E-flat deep blue, etc.; when any piece of music that she knew was transposed into another key, she was physically distressed. Did not Louis Ehlert declare that A major "says green"?

*Dr. Reimann here quotes from Hermann Kretzschmar's "Führer durch den Concertsaal."—Ed.

†Ciacona (Chaconne) is the name of an old dance, probably of Spanish origin. The dance was usually in 3-4 time, moderately slow. In many cases there was a set of variations on a ground bass. The chaconne resembles the passacaglia, though the latter was taken at a slower pace, and began as a rule on the third beat of the measure, while the chaconne began on the first. In the chaconne the theme was in the bass; in the passacaglia, the place of the theme was changeable. Couperin wrote a chaconne in 2-4 time.

BRAHMS FESTIVAL TO BE GIVEN BY BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA UNDER DR. KOUSSEVITZKY

A landmark in the history of music in Boston will be the Brahms Festival, to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, in Symphony Hall, on the successive days of March 21-26. The principal orchestral, choral and smaller works of the German master will be presented by the orchestra in collaboration with the choruses of Harvard and Radcliffe, and the soloists here pictured.

JOHANNES BRAHMS, noted composer, who will be honored March 21 to 26, when many of the works of the German master will be presented at Symphony hall.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA with choruses of Harvard and Radcliffe, who will be heard under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky during the Brahms festival.

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, who will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra as they present, in collaboration with the choruses of Harvard and Radcliffe and the soloists shown below, the principal orchestral, choral and smaller works of Johannes Brahms. (Garo)

(At left)
JEANNETTE VREELAND,
soprano.

(At right)
FRASER GANGE, baritone.

(At left)
MARGARET MATZEN-AUER, contralto.

(At right)
ARTUR SCHNABEL, pianist.

SYMPHONY HALL

:

BOSTON

BRAHMS FESTIVAL

(Second Programme)

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Dr. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor

Chorus from

HARVARD GLEE CLUB

Dr. Archibald T. Davison, Conductor

RADCLIFFE CHORAL SOCIETY

G. Wallace Woodworth, Conductor

Soloist

ARTUR SCHNABEL

Piano

SUNDAY AFTERNOON
MARCH TWENTY-THREE, 1930
AT 3.30

W. H. BRENNAN

Management

G. E. JUDD

BECHSTEIN THE PIANO OF THE MASTERS

To Say

... that one piano is better than another is to express an opinion—

To Say

... that the Bechstein is better than any other is to express the enthusiastic opinion of the world's greatest musicians—past and present..

READ WHAT THEY SAID:

FRANZ LISZT: For twenty-eight years I have now used your Pianos, and they have maintained their superiority. . . . IN A WORD, YOUR INSTRUMENTS ARE PERFECT. . . . To pass judgment upon your instruments were only to bestow upon them the most unqualified praise.

RICHARD WAGNER: The warm crystal tones of this beautiful instrument delight and fascinate me and inspire me to produce the best I can.

ANTON RUBINSTEIN: At my concerts I use BECHSTEIN'S Pianos almost exclusively. . . . A noble, inexhaustible, and sympathetic fullness of tone, together with an exquisite action, which admits of the utmost variety of shade, bear testimony to the fact that the manufacturer has attained the utmost degree of perfection in the art of instrument making.

CLAUDE DEBUSSY: One should compose pianoforte music only for the BECHSTEIN Piano.

EDWARD GRIEG: My enthusiasm for your production in the art of pianoforte making has ever been far too great for it possibly to be increased.

THEODOR LESCHETIZKY: The BECHSTEIN Piano is of the same importance to the pianist as a Stradivarius is to the violinist. Nobility and power of tone, warmth and refinement in singing quality, perfection in mechanism, with the utmost capacity for expression and shading, are the great qualities of a BECHSTEIN Piano.

And Now

BECHSTEIN The Piano of the Masters

has come to America and is as great in this country as it is in the rest of the world. In coming to the U.S. it is only fulfilling that natural destiny which inevitably operates to place the greatest art products of the Old World at the service of the New.

Grand Pianos $1,435 from

For Catalogues, etc. apply to

JOHN WANAMAKER, New York, N.Y.

SERGEI RACHMANINOFF

Symphony Hall, Sunday Afternoon, March 30, at 3.30

Jays Boston
Templeplace
Eleven

NEW SPRING SUITS are reaching us daily—not such as may be found anywhere—but the sort that are truly distinguished in their use of fine fabric, unusual cut, blending color. We have them for Women and Misses. Like all Jays things, sensibly priced. Third Floor.

The Majestic ELECTRIC RADIO

Unequalled! The Outstanding Combination Radio-Phonograph!

Prove it by Comparison $225 Complete with Majestic Tubes

SYMPHONY HALL, Boston

March 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26

BRAHMS FESTIVAL

By the
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
Dr. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
Conductor

Assisted by the
HARVARD and RADCLIFFE CHORUSES
Dr. ARCHIBALD T. DAVISON and G. WALLACE WOODWORTH Conductors

ARTUR SCHNABEL Piano	JEANNETTE VREELAND Soprano
MARGARET MATZENAUER Mezzo-Soprano	FRAZER GANGE Baritone
BURGIN STRING QUARTET

Monday eve. March 24 A German Requiem

Tuesday eve. March 25	Wednesday eve. March 26
Liebeslieder (Mixed Chorus)	Rhapsody (Male Chorus, Alto and Orchestra)
Pianoforte Works (Artur Schnabel)	Pianoforte Concerto in D minor, No. 1
Songs (Margaret Matzenauer)	Symphony No. 1 in C minor
Quintet in F minor

Tickets for the remaining concerts now on sale

Photographic wit

"True wit is wisdom to advantage dressed. What oft was thought but ne'er so well expressed."

Our portrait wit shows itself in photographs where likeness and individuality were ne'er so well expressed.

In return, we have received many expressions of pleasure and gratitude for our skill and painstaking.

Photography with expression.

Purdy

160 Tremont Street

Concert Direction: AARON RICHMOND
Presents
JORDAN HALL

Thurs. Eve., at 8.15

BALDASSARE FERLAZZO

Violin Recital

(Mason & Hamlin)

NEXT SAT. AFT., at 3.00

Boston Debut

STANLEY LICHTENSTEIN

Tenor

(Mason & Hamlin)

APRIL 3, THURS. EVE.

Second Boston Appearance

FRANCES GETTYS

Soprano

(Mason & Hamlin)

SYMPHONY HALL

APRIL 4, FRI. EVE.

"An Intimate Review in Miniature"

AGNES de MILLE

Assisted by

WARREN LEONARD

Dancers

and

FRANK PARKER, Diseur

LOUIS HORST, Musical Director

ROLAND HAYES

Sunday Afternoon, April 20, at 3.30

BEFORE AND AFTER THE CONCERT DINE AT

CAFÉ MINERVA

216 Huntington Ave., one block from Symphony Hall

Famous for good food and service at moderate prices

MINERVA CAFETERIA

The best of the kind.

Under management of the

HOTEL MINERVA

HARRY C. DEMETER

Established 1905

Phone Kenmore 6380

HERRICK ALWAYS THE

Phones { 4760 4763 }
 { 4761 4764 } KEN { 4762 4765 }

BEST SEATS

All applications for advertising space in this programme should be made to L. S. B. Jefferds, Advertising Manager, Symphony Hall, Boston, Mass.

THE ORDINARY OF THE MASS

(Gregorian Chant)

Sung by PIUS X CHOIR

MUSICAL MASTERPIECES
on VICTOR RECORDS (Orthophonic Recording)

Now on Sale at

M. STEINERT & SONS
162 Boylston Street : 35 Arch Street

SUNDAY AFTERNOON, MARCH 23, 1930
PROGRAMME

SONG OF DESTINY, for Chorus and Orchestra, Op. 54

CONCERTO No. 2 in B-flat major for Pianoforte and Orchestra, Op. 83

- I. Allegro non troppo.
- II. Allegro appassionato.
- III. Andante.
- IV. Allegretto grazioso.

INTERMISSION

SYMPHONY No. 4 in E minor, Op. 98

- I. Allegro non troppo.
- II. Andante moderato.
- III. Allegro giocoso.
- IV. Allegro energico e passionato.

SOLOIST

ARTUR SCHNABEL

BECHSTEIN PIANO USED

See page 11 for Sunday Afternoon Concert Announcements

The PARTY SEASON is here

ALREADY the party season is foreshadowed by the orders coming into the great LEWANDOS dry-cleaning plant. For everyone recognizes the quality and skill of LEWANDOS dry-cleaning. There's a "snap" and sparkle in the fabric—a gleam and glint of freshness. Colors have life. The finish is an exquisite piece of craftsmanship. And good as LEWANDOS dry-cleaning has always been it is now made vastly superior by a totally new process—giving results never before dreamed of.

PARTY DRESSES cleaned and refreshed from $3.50 up

TUXEDOS
$3.00

EVENING WRAPS
from $3.50 up

Daily Collection and Delivery in Your Neighborhood

LEWANDOS

46 Temple Place
284 Boylston Street
29 State Street
1 Galen Street Watertown

Telephones
MID dlesex 5700
BAC k Bay 3900

You Can Rely on Lewandos

SYMPHONY HALL

SUNDAY AFTERNOON CONCERTS
THE WORLD'S GREATEST ARTISTS

Sunday
MAR. 30
at 3.30

RACHMANINOFF

CHOPIN-LISZT PROGRAMME

Sunday
APR. 6
at 3.30

HANDEL and HAYDN SOCIETY

THOMPSON STONE, Conductor

(See page 12)

Sunday
APR. 20
at 3.30

ROLAND HAYES

SYMPHONY HALL

Sun. aft., April 6, 1930

HANDEL and HAYDN SOCIETY
THOMPSON STONE, Conductor

VERDI'S "REQUIEM"

And PSALMUS HUNGARICUS
By KODALY

(First time in Boston)

Soloists: NANETTE GUILFORD, Soprano, Met. Opera Co.

MERLE ALCOCK, Alto, Met. Opera Co.

PAUL ALTHOUSE, Tenor

WILLIAM SIMMONS, Baritone

CHORUS OF THREE HUNDRED VOICES

Boston Symphony Orchestra Players

TICKETS $2.50, $2.00, $1.50, $1.00

Now on sale at Box Office

ANITA DAVIS-CHASE, Business Agent

TOWN
TAXI

LOWEST RATE OF FARE IN BOSTON

TOWN
TAXI

Taxi Cabs

AT SYMPHONY HALL
AFTER ALL CONCERTS

Notify the usher or taxi agent at entrance

TOURING CARS

LOW RATES

LIMOUSINES

QUALITY SERVICE

TOWN TAXI

INCORPORATED

KENMORE 5000

TOWN
TAXI

LOWEST RATE OF FARE IN BOSTON

TOWN
TAXI

MUSICAL INSTRUCTION

SINGERS! Do you wish to add to your Range of Voice in a short time?
Eliminate that great Bug-bear of Singing—Breath, and learn how to make use of the Body Resonances. Anyone possessing a Normal Speaking Voice should sing.

MARY TRACY, Art of Singing

Auditions will be given free of charge.

Studio: 30 HUNTINGTON AVENUE

Telephones: KENMORE 7873
COLUMBIA 2041

RODOLPHE JANSON-LA PALME, Baritone

CONCERT - OPERA - ORATORIO

TEACHER OF SINGING AS A FINE ART

Voice Production, Theory, Solfege, Technique, Languages, Diction, Lyric and Dramatic Interpretation Repertoire, Style.

ONE HOUR LESSONS ONLY

TUESDAY: 615 Jackson Building, Westminister St.
Telephone: Gaspee 1738 Providence, R.I.

WEDNESDAY: 29 Steinert Hall, 162 Boylston St.
Telephone: Hancock 8956 Boston, Mass.

FREDERICK LAMB STUDIOS

SINGING

ENGLISH, FRENCH, ITALIAN AND GERMAN DICTION

ANN CULLINANE, Accompanist

GRAND OPERA SCHOOL

CHEVALIER RODOLFO FORNARI, Director

1069 BOYLSTON STREET

Corner MASSACHUSETTS AVENUE

Telephone Kenmore 0564

THE LISTER STUDIOS

(Boston and Providence)

The Studios of Successful Singers

Mr. and Mrs. Robert N. Lister and Assistants

SAFE and PROGRESSIVE METHODS OF

VOICE TRAINING

COACHING: French and Italian Songs and Arias Oratorio and Opera

TRINITY COURT, BOSTON

Kenmore 6520

MUSICAL INSTRUCTION

The Arthur Wilson Studio of Singing ^{908 BEACON ST.} BOSTON

BEN REDDEN, Tenor JOHN PERCIVAL, Baritone
Recital Debut, JORDAN HALL, December 19.

"... revealed in Mr. Redden a singer admirably schooled and endowed with a voice of fine quality and true tenor resonance."
"He sang the recitative ("Comfort ye" from "The Messiah") with excellent smoothness and beauty of tone, phrasing musically and articulating with care. In the long florid passages of the air he displayed a most rare and commendable skill in the management of his breath and voice, singing them with an even fluency that gave no hint of their difficulty."—Globe.
"Two singers of unusual ability and promise."—Globe.

The Art of Singing

VOICE PLACING AND TECHNIQUE A SPECIALTY
MARGARET A. AGNEW
VOCAL COACH AND ACCOMPANIST
146 Massachusetts Ave. Phone: Kenmore 7850

DOROTHY DIAMOND

Soprano Soloist Teacher of Singing
Available for Concerts and Musicals English Diction Languages
A Voice of Unusual Beauty."—Boston Herald Correct Speaking and Breathing Studio: 208 HUNTINGTON CHAMBERS, Copley Square, Boston Glee Club Direction

PAUL BREGOR

ROOM 14
STEINERT HALL
BOSTON, MASS.

Pianist and Teacher
BALDWIN PIANO

53 HAZELTON STREET
DORCHESTER, MASS.
Telephone: Milton 6004

MRS. HALL McALLISTER

TEACHER OF SINGING

384 Commonwealth Ave. KENmore 0384 Boston, Mass.

HARRIOT EUDORA BARROWS

TEACHER OF SINGING

37 COMMONWEALTH AVENUE, BOSTON

Telephone KENmore 9330

VOICE DEVELOPMENT

Henry Jackson Warren
BARITONE

SINGING

KEN more 3763

Studio: 138 Newbury Street, Boston

BRENDAN KEENAN

THE CULTURAL, SPIRITUAL AND PHYSICAL PROBLEMS OF PIANO MASTERY
"—rarely profound understanding of music—broad culture—rare intuition and psychological understanding—inspiring teacher—"
"—I have only the best wishes for this genius, hoping he has the opportunities to reach the great heights of which he is surely capable—"
"—you will be a success as a teacher which I believe will lead to greater things—"
Mme. Elly Ney
Mme. Sigrid Onégin
Willem van Hoogstraten

77 AUDUBON ROAD

14

MUSICAL INSTRUCTION

VINCENT V. HUBBARD

Successor to the late Arthur J. Hubbard
VOCAL STUDIO 246 Huntington Avenue

First Assistant, Dr. GEORGE L. DWYER

EDWARD MATTHEWS in Jordan Hall Debut, February 17, 1930

"Not in a long time has a young singer with a reputation still to make proved so well equipped vocally, so expert technically, so careful of details, so sensitive to musical and poetic values."—Boston Post.

"The sincerity and simplicity of his performance, the warmth and intensity of his feeling, the deft grace of his phrasing, make his songs delightful. It is his power to give musical audiences glimpses of fresh beauty in the songs so often heard in concert halls."—Boston Herald.

"His diction is remarkably clear. . . . He has no difficulties with that bugbear breath control."—Boston Globe.

JOHN ORTH
PIANIST AND TEACHER
Liszt Lecture Recitals
WITH PERSONAL REMINISCENCES
STEINERT HALL, BOSTON

KARL DOERING

Pupil of Jachman-Wagner, Berlin, and Galliera, Italy
TEACHER OF SINGING
27 Steinert Hall Tel. Hancock 5337

OTTO G. T. STRAUB

THEORY, HARMONY, COUNTERPOINT, COMPOSITION, ORCHESTRATION
Courses in Musicianship—Ear Training Classes

STUDIO: 23 Steinert Hall, 162 Boylston Street, Tuesdays, Wednesdays and Fridays Telephone, University 9488

H. GERBER

RUSSIAN VIOLINIST
AND TEACHER

Modern and Practical Individual Instruction in All Grades
Write for free booklet entitled "Music and You"

Studio 208
30 HUNTINGTON AVE., BOSTON, MASS.
Tel. KENmore 4714

JOHN LANE

TEACHER OF SINGING
STEINERT HALL

162 BOYLSTON STREET BOSTON
Telephone Hubbard 6677

MARGARET GOW

TEACHER OF SINGING

18 JACKSON HALL TRINITY COURT
175 DARTMOUTH STREET
Kenmore 6520 BOSTON, MASSACHUSETTS

FÉLIX FOX SCHOOL OF PIANOFORTE PLAYING

FÉLIX FOX, Director

PIANOFORTE from elementary to most advanced grade; THEORY; SOLFEGGIO; HARMONY; SIGHT PLAYING; HISTORY OF MUSIC; STRING ORCHESTRA for weekly practice and experience in ENSEMBLE PLAYING; NORMAL COURSE; ASSEMBLIES; PUBLIC PUPILS' CONCERTS.

Address THE SECRETARY, 403 Marlborough St., Boston. Telephone, KENmore 0716
Mason & Hamlin Pianoforte

BORIS KREININ

VIOLIN STUDIO

103 Hemenway Street

Phone KENmore 6337

PHRAE HERNAN

SPECIALIZING IN THE CORRECT FOUNDATION OF THE VOICE
RHYTHMIC DIAPHRAGMATIC BREATHING

TEACHER OF SINGING

316 Pierce Building, Copley Square

Telephones { Kenmore 8399
University 2911

THE NEW SERIES EIGHTS

Finest in Packard History

PACKARD cars have always been noted for their fine engineering and supreme craftsmanship; their superb performance and long life; their comfort, beauty and distinction. Yet in the new series Packard Eights, Packard has surpassed in every way its greatest achievements of the past.

In these new Packards, nothing that can be provided for the comfort, convenience and enjoyment of the owners has been overlooked. All the knowledge and skill of Packard's thirty years of fine car building has been called upon to aid in making the new series cars the finest in Packard history.

And when you have inspected the new Packard Eights, you will agree that naught but years of careful striving for perfection could have produced such altogether luxurious motor cars.

PACKARD MOTOR CAR CO. OF BOSTON

John T. Fuller.
1089 COMMONWEALTH AVE.

ASK THE MAN WHO OWNS ONE

SATURDAY, MARCH 22, 1930

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT,

Brahms in Full Feather: First American Festival of His Music

Sorting Out the Backgrounds—Fifty Years of Brahms from the Symphony Orchestra

THE general increase in the popularity of Brahms in the last ten years is fresh proof that a half century is none too little for a composer. While the "importance of Wagner, or Mendelssohn, or Chaikovsky has varied with musical fashions, the graph of Brahms has shown a fairly constant rise through the years. One critical moment was at the turn of the century. The smoke of the great Brahms-Wagner and Brahms-Bruckner wars having cleared away, people gazed over a battle field strewn with broken friendships, and suddenly realized that this world is large enough comfortably to hold two divergent musical styles at the same time. Then, it seemed, was the moment for critics to pronounce the last rites over as an issue, and to give him his niche among the immortals. As it appears, the final word was not then said. There has been still another accounting by time, that cool and leisurely the symphonies of Brahms could be classed as general favorites have been the last prediction of his most extravagant champions, very long ago. "Brahms is not, in the best sense of the word, a 'composer,'" wrote Markham Lee in his book on "Brahms," as recently as 1906. "To the ordinary amateur, who enjoys his Beethoven or his Schubert, the work of Brahms is very often a sealed book. Not only can he not enjoy it, it is apt to repel him."

THE NEW SERIES EIGHTS

Finest in Packard History

PACKARD cars have always been noted for their fine engineering and supreme craftsmanship; their superb performance and long life; their comfort, beauty and distinction. Yet in the new series Packard Eights, Packard has surpassed in every way its greatest achievements of the past.

In these new Packards, nothing that can be provided for the comfort, convenience and enjoyment of the owners has been overlooked. All the knowledge and skill of Packard's thirty years of fine car building has been called upon to aid in making the new series cars the finest in Packard history.

And when you have inspected the new Packard Eights, you will agree that naught but years of careful striving for perfection could have produced such altogether luxurious motor cars.

PACKARD MOTOR CAR CO. OF BOSTON

Alvan T. Fuller.
1089 COMMONWEALTH AVE.

ASK THE MAN WHO OWNS ONE

SATURDAY, MARCH 22, 1930

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT,

Brahms in Full Feather: First American Festival of His Music

Sorting Out the Backgrounds—Fifty Years of Brahms from the Symphony Orchestra

THE general increase in the popularity of Brahms in the last ten years is fresh proof that a half century is none too little for a more than approximate estimate of a composer. While the "importance of Wagner, or Mendelssohn, or Chalkovsky has varied with musical fashions, the graph of Brahms has shown a fairly constant rise through the years. One critical moment was at the turn of the century. The smoke of the great Brahms-Wagner and Brahms-Bruckner wars having cleared away, people gazed over a battle field strewn with broken friendships, and suddenly realized that this world is large enough comfortably to hold two divergent musical styles at the same time. Then, it seemed, was the moment for critics to pronounce the last rites over as an issue, and to give him his niche among the immortals. As it appears, the final word was not then said. There has been still another acting by time, that cool and leisurely

the symphonies of Brahms could be classed as general favorites have been the last prediction of his most extravagant champions, very long ago. "Brahms is not, in the best sense of the word, a composer," wrote Markham Lee in his book on "Brahms," as recently as 1906. "To the ordinary amateur, who enjoy his Beethoven or his Schubert, the work of Brahms is very often a sealed book. Not only can he not enjoy it, it is apt to repel him."

THE NEW SERIES EIGHTS

Finest in Packard History

PACKARD cars have always been noted for their fine engineering and supreme craftsmanship; their superb performance and long life; their comfort, beauty and distinction. Yet in the new series Packard Eights, Packard has surpassed in every way its greatest achievements of the past.

In these new Packards, nothing that can be provided for the comfort, convenience and enjoyment of the owners has been overlooked. All the knowledge and skill of Packard's thirty years of fine car building has been called upon to aid in making the new series cars the finest in Packard history.

And when you have inspected the new Packard Eights, you will agree that naught but years of careful striving for perfection could have produced such altogether luxurious motor cars.

PACKARD MOTOR CAR CO. OF BOSTON

Wm. T. Fuller.
1089 COMMONWEALTH AVE.

ASK THE MAN WHO OWNS ONE

SATURDAY, MARCH 22, 1930

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT,

Brahms in Full Feather: First American Festival of His Music

Sorting Out the Backgrounds—Fifty Years of Brahms from the Symphony Orchestra

THE general familiarity of Brahms's music in this century is more than approximated by the composer. While Wagner, or Mendelssohn, has varied with the graph of Brahms's constant rise through critical moment was century. The smoke of Wagner and Brahms having cleared away, a battle field strewn with ships, and suddenly world is large enough for two divergent musical time. Then, it seemed for critics to pronounce Brahms as an issue, and to give him his just niche among the immortals. As it now appears, the final word was not then spoken. There has been still another accounting by time, that cool and leisurely critic.

That the symphonies of Brahms could ever be classed as general favorites would have been the last prediction of Brahms's most extravagant champions, not so very long ago. "Brahms is not, even in the best sense of the word, a 'popular' composer," wrote Markham Lee in his book on "Brahms," as recently as 1916. "To the ordinary amateur, who can enjoy his Beethoven or his Schubert, the work of Brahms is very often a sealed book. Not only can he not enjoy it, but it is apt to repel him."

The adjectives "austere," "harsh," "repellent," "obscure," persisted for years, reappearing whenever Brahms was summed up in print. Then there was the metaphor of the "unapproachable altitudes." James Huneker, with whom Brahms was a hobby, wrote—"His topmost peaks are tremendously remote, and glitter and gleam in an atmosphere almost too thin for dwellers of the plains" ("Mezzo Tints in Modern Music," 1905). And again Lee—"He rarely descends to earth, and prefers to remain on his pinnacle rather than come to our level; if we want him we must climb to him by steps that are perhaps painful and slow." R. A. Streatfield looked upon Brahms as "wrapped in obscurity," and followed this with the astonishing observation that "he touches no chord of human sympathy." He continues in his "Modern Music and Musicians" (1906), "It is perhaps this very austerity, this severe self-repression, this remoteness of personality, that constitute to some minds the charm of Brahms's music. In a similar vein, others placed him on lonely heights, expecting him to stay there forever, with a small circle of the elect at his feet.

Such opinions as these need no other answer than the present festival, which perhaps no other Nineteenth Century composer except Beethoven or Wagner could have successfully furnished forth on such a scale (One must admit, however, that the Nordic Brahms has never greatly thrived on Mediterranean shores).

As for the "limitations" listed above, they have proved to be in large part the limitations of a tardy world. Time and custom, which solve all musical enigmas and resolve all discords, has thrown a clarifying beam into the dark places of Brahms, that the world might see, and smoothed out his arbitrary harshnesses, that the world might accept. In this way the "murky fog," which in the eighties was supposed to enshroud the symphonies, soon lifted. Still, the atmosphere was not yet clear about these four mountains, for a mist of wordy legends, such as those quoted above hung over them.

But the sun, strong and patient, has at last cleared the air. It is doubtful whether an audience of 1930, listening to the First Symphony, or the Fourth, is particularly aware of anything austere, harsh, or forbidding about them. One looks in vain for the chords of "pain" which Riemann found in the first movement of the Fourth. Surely the melodious profusion of Brahms's themes, the command of his structure, the splendor of his harmonic coloring—in a word the sheer musical wealth is uppermost in a symphony as it is performed today—and applauded to the echo. As for the graver

Given Saturday

Newton Centered, while the for "East Is. The lustre souvenir pro-is more fully will be present-finished by hool on Satur-

It is for the long taken unized Boston clude Charles $1 when the ank M. Bald-was no escape T. Schirmer, of Johannes Boothby, New-act, the prom- William H-actor was not ld D. McKay, Brahms, but Stevens, New- fearful "mod- r D. Salinger, have borne the B. Eustis of West, who is ts and candy, le" teinsleck, as- Ashley Day, er, Mrs. W. C. Nutting, s Gwendolyn bly long list

armacy a Singer

Webster of have a sum- dlson, N. H., nent of their lmont Web- ton, son of . Cullington

f the Arling- 3, is now at- College of er of the rity of that ho is well Greater Bos- University . He is a and Cam- of a male with the New Eng- Company of

to be next e Park Ave- lecting

ey now only impressive-finds some- rectness of those pas- les found too profundity of e placid end- ach romantic These qual-

same dread implications which it has for many today toward composers correspondingly advanced). This was not merely a local attitude, nor was Boston entirely an outpost of musical civilization. Even in Brahms's native Germany his symphonies were scarcely received with unmixed enthusiasm, the principal difference being that his defenders there were more numerous and zealous.

Brahms was no new name to Boston, for Carl Zerrahn, with his Harvard Musical Society Orchestra, had given a bitter foretaste, introducing the First Symphony on January 3, 1878. The critics arose in euphon, and spoke in the lusty, vitriolic manner of the day, calling it "Morbidity (!), strained, unnatural—ugly" (Boston Gazette, Jan. 20, 1878). And that excellent musician, William F. Apthorp, in the "Courier" of the same date found the symphony "on the whole, disappointing." But conductors in those times also knew the spirit of battle. Zerrahn repeated the C minor Symphony on January 31. When he gave the Second Symphony its first Boston performance on January 9, 1879, John S. Dwight voiced the general coldness by saying that even Sterndale Bennett could have written a better symphony.

After such episodes, together with certain descents upon the town by Theodore Thomas, another historic captain in the Brahms cause, Boston knew what to expect with a Brahmsian at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Henschel began on his second program by giving the first Boston performance of the Tragic Overture, repeating it the following week. He likewise introduced and repeated the Alto Rhapsody, and brought forth the two symphonies each season, apparently unmoved by indignant letters to the newspapers.

Wilhelm Gericke came with a new symphony of Brahms, the Third (November 8, 1884), about which one critic remarked, "the themes would hardly do credit to a musical primer." The Variations on a Theme by Haydn, performed on December 6, the Transcript pronounced "stupendous," but another paper called it "twenty minutes wasted." The Fourth Symphony was announced for its first performance in this country at the concert of November 29, 1886. But Mr. Gericke was not satisfied with the way this "insuperably difficult" score went at the public rehearsal, and postponed the first performance until December 23. Meanwhile, Dr. Leopold Damrosch took the honors in New York, introducing the new work on December 11.

The symphonies apparently had many musical friends by this time—a small, but an appreciation of rowing minority. Dorist and poet. He still wondered there bloomed German insisted became a cult, lies, instead of his hness and other arian Dances and na. Ere long Gericke put the as a Brahms he end of his pro- s's death (April the same season, was then con- opportunity, and ie regular con- of the concert, he following ap- e, if decidedly e Overture, Op. e, Op. 121; Con- cello, Op. 102; minor, Op. 98. einrich, Franz der.

gh musicianship, to know who Gericke's perform- ms Symphonies the remark was n immediate effect to the Bostonian a the first years of the Transcript, case, Emil Paur i, reported a per- nirable part in Symphony which permanence and araging, although in, fortunate in id surely one of

Dr. Karl Muck, the style of the ingrained. He f a Gericke with sch in perform- ed memories. dly the place to Brahms at the y, or what new Dr. Serge Kous- s may have re- cord the obvious the composer's clear of routine, 1 generally alive JOHN N. BURK four music-lovers good Boston of a reason for not symphonies at con- ber 8, 1884), about which one critic re- manner of means! marked, "the themes would hardly do considerable por- credit to a musical primer." The Varia- to whom the an- tions on a Theme by Haydn, performed rahms symphony speakable delight; nounced "stupendous," but another t their programs ade to see if there The Fourth Symphony was announced by Brahms on it. by Brahms now for its first performance in this country their Brahms now at the concert of November 29, 1886. But he rest of the pub- Mr. Gericke was not satisfied with the objects.

way this "insuperably difficult" score went at the public rehearsal, and post- rable portion of our oned the first performance until Decem- e, and when Arthur ber 23. Meanwhile, Dr. Leopold Dam- conductor in 1889, rosch took the honors in New York, in- ed to discover that h they had assumed were in fact aglow and romance. This ho also startled the public of the Leip- an appreciation of

The adjectives "austere," "harsh," "pellucid," "obscure," persisted in reappearing whenever Brahms was summed up in print. Then the metaphor of the "unapproachable altitudes." James Huneker, who wrote that Brahms was a hobby, wrote—"most peaks are tremendously and glitter and gleam in an atmosphere almost too thin for dwellers of the earth." And again Lee—"He rarely descends to earth, and prefers to remain on a nacre rather than come to our steps that are perhaps painful and R. A. Streatfield looked upon him as "wrapped in obscurity," and this with the astonishing observation that "he touches no chord of sympathy!" He continues in his Modern Music and Musicians (1906) perhaps this very austerity, this self-repression, this remoteness of ality, that constitute to some men the charm of Brahms's music. In a vein, others placed him on lonely expecting him to stay there forever a small circle of the elect at his

Such opinions as these need an answer than the present festive perhaps no other Nineteenth-century composer except Beethoven or could have successfully furnished on such a scale (One must admit, I think that the Nordic Brahms has greatly thrived on Mediterranean

As for the "limitations" listed they have proved to be in large limitations of a tardy world. The custom, which solve all musical and resolve all discords, has the clarifying beam into the dark of Brahms, that the world might be smoothed out his arbitrary harsh that the world might accept. The way the "murky fog," which eighties was supposed to enshroud symphonies, soon lifted. Still, the sphere was not yet clear about the mountains, for a mist of wordy such as those quoted above hung over them.

But the sun, strong and patient at last cleared the air. It is whether an audience of 1930, I think to the First Symphony, or the Fourth, particularly aware of anything harsh, or forbidding about them looks in vain for the chords of which Riemann found in the first movement of the Fourth. Surely the profusion of Brahms's then command of his structure, the subtlety of his harmonic coloring—in a word, sheer musical wealth is uppermost in the symphony as it is performed today applauded to the echo. As for the moods that once repelled—they now only add a special character and impressiveness.

Perhaps outspoken 1930 finds something kindred in the directness of Brahms, and in particular those passages which his contemporaries found too abrupt. The reticence and profundity of his emotional current, and the placid endings of his movements estranged him from many in his day of much romantic inflation and heroic fustian. These qualities are outblown and dated, while the sobrieties of Brahms endure. The lustre of Brahms's essential gold is more fully revealed rather than diminished by time.

George Henschel had not long taken charge of the newly organized Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1881 when the public realized that there was no escape for them from the music of Johannes Brahms. As a matter of fact, the promising young German conductor was not only a sworn champion of Brahms, but an intimate friend of this fearful "modern"—(the word seems to have borne the same dread implications which it has for many today toward composers correspondingly advanced). This was not merely a local attitude, nor was Boston entirely an outpost of musical civilization. Even in Brahms's native Germany his symphonies were scarcely received with unmixed enthusiasm, the principal difference being that his defenders there were more numerous and zealous.

"Largamente"

Brahms Conducting

Brahms was no new name to Boston, for Carl Zerrahn, with his Harvard Musical Society Orchestra, had given a bitter foretaste, introducing the First Symphony on January 3, 1878. The critics arose then upon, and spoke in the lusty, vitriolic manner of the day, calling it "Morbidity (!), strained, unnatural—ugly" (Boston Gazette, Jan. 20, 1878). And that excellent musician, William F. Apthorp, in the Courier of the same date found the symphony "on the whole, disappointing." But conductors in those times also knew the spirit of battle. Zerrahn repeated the C minor Symphony on January 31. When he gave the Second Symphony its first Boston performance on January 9, 1879, John S. Dwight voiced the general coldness by saying that even Sterndale Bennett could have written a better symphony.

After such episodes, together with certain descents upon the town by Theodore Thomas, another historic captain in the Brahms cause, Boston knew what to expect with a Brahmsian at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Henschel began on his second program by giving the first Boston performance of the Tragic Overture, repeating it the following week. He likewise introduced and repeated the Alto Rhapsody, and brought forth the two symphonies each season, apparently unmoved by indignant letters to the newspapers.

Wilhelm Gericke came with a new symphony of Brahms, the Third (November 8, 1884), about which one critic remarked, "the themes would hardly do credit to a musical primer." The Variations on a Theme by Haydn, performed on December 6, the Transcript pronounced "stupendous," but another paper called it "twenty minutes wasted." The Fourth Symphony was announced for its first performance in this country at the concert of November 29, 1886. But Mr. Gericke was not satisfied with the way this "insuperably difficult" score went at the public rehearsal, and postponed the first performance until December 23. Meanwhile, Dr. Leopold Damrosch took the honors in New York, introducing the new work on December 11.

The symphonies apparently had many musical friends by this time—a small, but an appreciation of growing minority. Forist and poet. He still wondered if there bloomed a German insisted became a cult, instead of his business and other Arian Dances and na. Ere long Gericke put the as a Brahms the end of his pro- s's death (April the same season, was then con- opportunity, and he regular con- t of the concert, he following ap- prising and leave- e, if decidedly e, Op. 121; Con- encouraging sign," e, Op. 102; Con- "Possibly in an- claim of this com- minor, Op. 98. prominent position minor, Op. 98. acknowledged." Heinrich, Franz der.

high musicianship, to know who Gericke's perform- ms Symphonies n immediate effect the remark was to the Bostonian a the first years of the Transcript, case, Emil Paur i, reported a per- mirable part in Symphony which permanence and araging, although in, fortunate in ed surely one of

Dr. Karl Muck, the style of the ingraind. He f a Gericke with ch in perform- ed memories. dly the place to Brahms at the y, or what new Dr. Serge Kous- s may have re- cord the obvious the composer's clear of routine, l generally alive JOHN N. BURK notion that, had C minor Sym- Brahms's, almost ve kept his seat be admitted that, of our public, incomprehensible f Brahms at the y, or what new Dr. Serge Kous- s may have re- cord the obvious the composer's clear of routine, l generally alive JOHN N. BURK good Boston of a reason for not a symphonies at con- manner of means! considerable por- to whom the an- rahms symphony speakable delight; t their programs ade to see if there by Brahms on it. ihr Brahms now ie rest of the pub- jects.

The adjectives "austere," "harsh," "pellent," "obscure," persisted in reappearing whenever Brahms was summed up in print. Then the metaphor of the "unapproachable altitudes." James Huneker, with Brahms was a hobby, wrote—"most peaks are tremendously and glitter and gleam in an atmosphere almost too thin for dwellers of the earth." And again Lee—"He rarely descends to earth, and prefers to remain on his mountain rather than come to our level. We want him we must climb to steps that are perhaps painful and R. A. Streatfield looked upon him as "wrapped in obscurity," and this with the astonishing observation that "he touches no chord of sympathy!" He continues in his "Modern Music and Musicians" (1906) perhaps this very austerity, this self-repression, this remoteness of personality, that constitute to some the charm of Brahms's music. In a certain vein, others placed him on a lonely mountain expecting him to stay there forever in a small circle of the elect at his side.

Such opinions as these need an answer than the present festival perhaps no other Nineteenth century composer except Beethoven or Wagner could have successfully furnished on such a scale (One must admit, however, that the Nordic Brahms has greatly thrived on Mediterranean sun).

As for the "limitations" listed they have proved to be in large measure limitations of a tardy world. The custom, which solve all musical problems and resolve all discords, has thrown its clarifying beam into the dark path of Brahms, that the world might see the smoothed out his arbitrary hars that the world might accept. The way the "murky fog," which has shrouded the eighties was supposed to enshroud symphonies, soon lifted. Still, there was not yet clear about the mountains, for a mist of wordy such as those quoted above hung about them.

But the sun, strong and patient at last cleared the air. It is whether an audience of 1930, like the First Symphony, or the Fourth, particularly aware of anything harsh, or forbidding about them looks in vain for the chords of which Riemann found in the first movement of the Fourth. Surely the obvious profusion of Brahms's then command of his structure, the subtlety of his harmonic coloring—in a word sheer musical wealth is uppermost in the symphony as it is performed today applauded to the echo. As for the moods that once repelled—they now add a special character and interest.

Perhaps outspoken 1930 find something kindred in the directness of Brahms, and in particular the sagas which his contemporaries found abrupt. The reticence and profundity of his emotional current, and the plainness of his movements estranged from many in his day of much inflation and heroic fustian. The titles are outblown and dated, the sobrieties of Brahms endure. The gold of Brahms's essential gold is more revealed rather than diminished with time.

George Henschel had not long been in charge of the newly organized Symphony Orchestra in 1881 when the public realized that there was something for them from the music of Brahms. As a matter of fact, the young German conductor was only a sworn champion of Brahms, an intimate friend of this fearful "German"—(the word seems to have

"Largamente"

Brahms Conductor | Mrs. Charles E. Guild, Miss

Miss

Miss Clark Is the Daughter of Lakeview Avenue, Cambridge, Mass. Miss Clark's Engagement to O. at the Episcopal Theological School. Returned from though constantly growing minority. The bulk of the public still wondered why this wrong-headed German insisted upon writing symphonies, instead of more reasonable Hungarian Dances and Liebeslieder. When Gericke put the Second Symphony at the end of his program of January 17 in the same season, the audience saw its opportunity, and according to a report of the concert, "there was a general uprising and leaving after each of the first two movements." "This is an encouraging sign," the reviewer went on. "Possibly in another season the small claim of this composer to his present prominent position will be more generally acknowledged."

The clarity, thorough musicianship, and high standards of Gericke's performances must have had an immediate effect in elucidating Brahms to the Bostonian public. The reviewer of the Transcript, on November 16, 1885, reported a performance of the First Symphony which was distinctly encouraging, although again many had "walked out":

One has a shrewd notion that, had it been Beethoven's C minor Symphony, instead of Brahms's, almost every one would have kept his seat to the end. It must be admitted that, to the larger part of our public, Brahms is still an incomprehensible terror. People speak of him pretty much as they used to speak of Schumann twenty years ago. Abstruseness and obscurity of style is the charge made against him by those of his dislikers who are frank in the acknowledgement of their own impotence to enjoy his music. In one way or another, Brahms is an unqualified bore to four music-lovers out of five in this good Boston of ours. But is this a reason for not playing Brahms's Symphonies at concerts here? By no manner of means! There is not an inconsiderable portion of our public to whom the announcement of a Brahms symphony is a promise of unspeakable delight; people who look at their programs with anxious solicitude to see if there be not something by Brahms on it. Let them have their Brahms now and then, and let the rest of the public go hang, if it objects.

This "not inconsiderable portion of our public" did grow apace, and when Arthur Nikisch became the conductor in 1889, Boston was astonished to discover that the symphonies which they had assumed to be learned and dry, were in fact aglow with dramatic fire and romance. This was the magician who also startled the hidebound and wary public of the Leipzig Gewandhaus into an appreciation of his death (April 1896) was then considered a regular concert, the following appearance, if decidedly a masterpiece, Op. 121; Concerto for Cello, Op. 102; minor, Op. 98. Heinrich, Franz to know who Brahms's Symphonies the remark was the first years case, Emil Paur a remarkable part in performance and permanence and in, fortunate in and surely one of

Dr. Karl Muck, the style of the ingrained. He [a Gericke with] in performance memories. dly the place to Brahms at the y, or what new Dr. Serge Koussevitzky may have recorded the obvious the composer's clear of routine, I generally alive JOHN N. BURK

The adjectives "austere," "harsh," "pellent," "obscure," persisted in reappearing whenever Brahms was summed up in print. Then the metaphor of the "unapproachable altitudes." James Huneker, with Brahms was a hobby, wrote—"most peaks are tremendously and glitter and gleam in an atmosphere almost too thin for dwellers of the earth." ("Mezzo Tints in Modern Music") And again Lee—"He rarely descends to earth, and prefers to remain on a nacle rather than come to our level. We want him we must climb to steps that are perhaps painful and R. A. Streatfield looked upon him as "wrapped in obscurity," and this with the astonishing observation that "he touches no chord of sympathy!" He continues in his "Modern Music and Musicians" (1906) perhaps this very austerity, this self-repression, this remoteness of quality, that constitute to some the charm of Brahms's music. In a vein, others placed him on lonely heights, expecting him to stay there forever in a small circle of the elect at his side.

Such opinions as these need no answer than the present festival perhaps no other Nineteenth century composer except Beethoven or Schumann could have successfully furnished on such a scale (One must admit, I think that the Nordic Brahms has greatly thrived on Mediterranean).

As for the "limitations" listed they have proved to be in large measure limitations of a tardy world. The custom, which solve all musical problems and resolve all discords, has thrown a clarifying beam into the dark path of Brahms, that the world might see smoothed out his arbitrary hars that the world might accept. The way the "murky fog," which the eighties was supposed to enshrine symphonies, soon lifted. Still, there was not yet clear about the mountains, for a mist of wordy such as those quoted above hung about them.

But the sun, strong and patient at last cleared the air. It is whether an audience of 1930, like the First Symphony, or the Fourth, particularly aware of anything harsh, or forbidding about them looks in vain for the chords of which Riemann found in the first movement of the Fourth. Surely the obvious profusion of Brahms's then command of his structure, the sense of his harmonic coloring—in a word sheer musical wealth is uppermost in the symphony as it is performed today applauded to the echo. As for the moods that once repelled—they add a special character and interest.

Perhaps outspoken 1930 find something kindred in the directness of Brahms, and in particular the abruptness which his contemporaries find abrupt. The reticence and profoundness of his emotional current, and the plainness of his movements estranged from many in his day of much inflation and heroic fustian. The subtleties are outblown and dated, the sobrieties of Brahms endure. The gold of Brahms's essential gold is more revealed rather than dimmed with time.

George Henschel had not long been in charge of the newly organized Symphony Orchestra in 1881 when the public realized that there was something for them from the music of Brahms. As a matter of fact, this young German conductor was only a sworn champion of Brahms, an intimate friend of this fearful "German"—(the word seems to have

"Largamente"

Brahms Conducting Mrs. Charles E. G.

Guild, Mrs. Ralph Hornblower, Mrs. Ernest Hocking, Mrs. Edward J. Holmes, Mrs. M. Hunnewell, Mrs. Charles Richard Hamlin Jones, Mrs. F. Nedy, Miss Mabel Lyman, Miss E. Miss Emily McKibbin, Mrs. R. man, Mrs. John F. Moors, Mrs. ray, Miss Rose Standish Nichols, Packard, Mrs. George L. Pair, Gorham Palfrey, Mrs. F. Wain, Mrs. Josiah Quincy, Miss Evelyn Arthur A. Shurtleff, Mrs. Charles Robert G. Valentine, Mrs. Wadsworth, Mrs. Fiske Warren, Mrs. Wentworth, Mrs. Walter Mrs. William Morton Wheeler, Burt Wolbach.

Final Wednesday Musical Ma

Concluding a successful Boston School of Occupation under whose auspices the Musical Ma have been given winter on Wednesdays in the ballroom, the final series of six will be given on day morning, with a recital by Onegin, the world-famous.

Special arrangements have been made for the final program in the high professional standard. Mrs. John W. Myers, chairman, committee, and Mrs. H. Parson, who has been active in the series, as co-chairman. Mrs. Theodore T. Whitney.

It is of interest that a majority of this season's subscribers requested an assignment for 1930-31, of the seats for the committee asks that all in this class be made by April.

Mrs. John F. Capron of the Center and Mrs. Walter A. Cline have been asked to preside the hour preceding the concert begins at eleven o'clock. Mrs. be assisted by Mrs. Wilton and Mrs. Ernest V. Alley of ton and Mrs. William Aye Center. Mrs. Carl will have the honor of Mrs. Charles Cott Howard Turner of Boston; L. Bunce and Mrs. William rett of Brookline, and Mrs. and Mrs. Prescott Bigelow Hill.

At the ballroom door will be D. Adams of Brookline, M. C. Bacon and Mrs. Winthrop of Belmont, Mrs. Frederic of Boston, Mrs. Charles T. Cotton, Mrs. Lawrence Black, R. C. Borden of Brookline, Plimpton of Hingham, Mrs. stock of Dedham, and Mrs. Plimpton of Norwood.

In charge of the ticket

Brahms, the melodist, colorist and poet. Under the eloquent apostle there bloomed a flourishing faction. It became a cult, with its fringe of priggishness and other accompanying phenomena. Ere long Boston was spoken of as a Brahms center.

At the news of Brahms's death (April 3, 1897) Emil Paur, who was then conductor, arranged for the regular concerts of April 9 and 10, the following appropriate and impressive, if decidedly sombre, program. Tragic Overture, Op. 81; Vier Ernste Gesänge, Op. 121; Concerto for Violin and Violoncello, Op. 102; Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Op. 98. Soloists were: Max Heinrich, Franz Kneisel and Alwin Schroeder.

It would be interesting to know who first referred to the Brahms Symphonies as "classics," and when the remark was made. It was probably in the first years of this century. In any case, Emil Paur must have done his admirable part in giving them this label of permanence and universal respect. Boston, fortunate in its Brahms conductors had surely one of the very finest of them in Dr. Karl Muck, in whose artist's nature the style of the composer seems closely ingrained. He combined the precision of a Gericke with the romance of a Nikisch in performances which are cherished memories.

This retrospect is hardly the place to dwell upon the status of Brahms at the symphony concerts today, or what new and surpassing beauties Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's interpretations may have revealed. We can but record the obvious by pointing out that the composer's genius, lifted free and clear of routine, was never so keenly and generally alive in this town. JOHN N. BURK

Miss Clark is the daughter of Lakeview Avenue, Cambridge. Miss Clark's Engagements at the Episcopal The

Re

As Memory Summons Him—Brahms In The Eyes and The Ears of An American Student

IT was on December 12, 1891, that I first heard Brahms play the piano. It was at a Joachim Quartet Concert at the venerable Singakademie in Berlin. The famous composer had come to the Prussian capitol to attend the performance of his clarinet quintet and to play the piano part in his new trio in A minor op. 114 for piano, cello and clarinet. He had written both works, which were still in manuscript, for Richard Muehfeld of Meiningen, who was by far the greatest virtuoso on the clarinet I have ever heard.

On this occasion the Joachim Quartet, which was then the foremost chamber music organization in the world, broke with its traditions, which had been in force 1869, and played for the first time works not written exclusively for strings. The interest to see and hear the great man from Vienna was intense and when Brahms stepped onto the stage he was given a rousing welcome.

The great composer was by no means a piano virtuoso in the modern sense of the word, and yet he had a big technique although a faulty one. He went rough shod over difficult passages, often hitting false notes, but he had a great deal of facility and remarkable independence and strength of fingers. Two years later I heard Brahms play again and both times I gained the impression that he never would have been a really great pianist even if he had devoted himself exclusively to the instrument. Considering how little time he had for practice, however, his playing was wonderful. There was something sublime about his conceptions and his attitude toward the compositions. He was utterly oblivious to the audience and was concerned only with the interpretation of the music; and his readings were all the more interesting because he was discoursing his own works.

He played the cantabile parts beautifully, proclaiming the themes in a very individual manner, with great warmth and feeling, and he lingered lovingly on certain details that particularly pleased him. I was struck by the freedom with which he played and by his precision of rhythm and elasticity of tempo. In his trio Brahms paid no attention whatever to his partners, Richard Muehfeld, clarinet, and Robert Hausmann, cello. They

las Br
75 Lo
Simme
er of wight, tow D r and pman

h G. I Hunt
olmes, worth gis I
s. Au
Judg
Fra sgood,
s Pe
Mrs. kman,
eston,
mery
Mrs.
Charl
Willie
V. St Salt
Charl
h E.
and

p lat

com ttenc
Ap fit o l Se ant k Pa prog rick on st ony
ting.
Mr.
on,
race gelow es for elston
Mar

and the hawk-like watched him, and to his every mood, on of tempo and awe in which they man.

Brahms's tone was r orchestral effects ic of the Deutsche Brahms has a bear- hat einen baerem- was quite right. The at times completely ello and the clarinet had a voluminous carrying power.

his technical short- even the greatest could not be oblivious. llscriminating, it was fting to hear him in or there was a divine ing as well as in his as twenty-three years I first heard Brahms. ough to appreciate the occasion.

et Brahms, I had no discuss his music with rs later, in 1893, with m I succeeded in draw- a musical discussion. ry touchy on certain meanwhile ascertained, out by bringing up one or which he had been

I to be utterly indiffer- critics wrote about his when I touched on the fessional pianists who pieces "unpianistic," he made with considerable iving remarks, which I ediate afterward be- their great significance ttience with the pian- because of a few new lties. Shall progress f a few hard nuts to ty life I have been d in piano technique, leavored in my piano ne good musical ideas is. You will find the new technique more particularly in my Paganini variations and in my Capricelli. I admit that many of the passages lie awkwardly for the hands. This new kind of technique seems inconvenient ("unbequem," was the word he used) because arms, hands and fingers are used in a new way. The new idiom requires greater strength, freedom and independence of fingers than the traditional classical piano technique. But this is no reason why my innovations should be called unpianistic. I know that there are some very mean places in the Paganini Variations, but my original intention in writing the two sets was that they should be technical exercises for practice only. It was not until later that I decided to have them published as concert pieces, and that was partly because von Buelow, Clara Schumann and Tausig advised me to do so. Musically, I consider my Handel Variations more important.

In later years, when such great virtuosi as Joseffy, Pachmann, Busoni, and Godowsky began to play the Paganini Variations and to take delight in the new kinds of pianistic difficulties, I recalled the famous composer's words and realized how wisely he had expressed himself on this point.

When I asked Brahms if he ever intended to compose a second violin concerto, he replied with great vehemence, "under no circumstances whatever." On being questioned as to his reasons, he quoted scripture, Matthew VI, 34. When I told him I could not see the application of the passage to a new violin concerto, he replied, "I said 'sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof,' because I had more than enough trouble with my first and only violin concerto. I feel too circumscribed by the tonal limitations of the four strings. I think sympathetically."

It seems strange to me that Brahms should use the term "tonal limitations" instead of "technical limitations," for all the violinists were up in arms against the new kind of difficulties in the Brahms violin concerto. Even as great a critic as Otto Neitzel of Cologne had written, "The Brahms concerto is not written for it is written against the violin." I spoke of this to Brahms, whereupon he said in a very impatient manner:

I don't understand why the violinists make such a fuss over the passages in my concerto. They are worse than the pianists. Why are not more concerned with the effects? They are all so abed with the technique that they look euphony (Klang). Hardly of them can make the passages the first movement and finale nd well, and that is why I can't to hear the younger violinists it any more. It bores me to th when some young fiddler comes asks permission to play my cono for me Now you know why hall never write another violin certo.

him, to whom Brahms had been ing quite as much as to me, after- said to me, "those were two in- y interesting statements by Brahms ening his new piano and violin t. And for him they were un- y long ones, for he is generally aciturn."

great composer's last visit to Ber- s in 1896, the year before his death. m, who was his most intimate, had invited him to hear a pri- performance of one of his string ts at a small select social com- This was my last meeting with s. He had aged visibly. His com- a which had formerly been ruddy rned to a sickly yellowish brown. ad cancer of the liver, of which d in April of the following year.

first thing Brahms said to me s occasion was, "You are an Ameri- o you play the banjo?" nished at such a question from e replied "No, I am sorry to say ot, but why do you ask?" ause I met an American girl in g," he replied, "who played the for me. It was the first and only ever heard the instrument and I uch interested in the rhythm of e which she played very cleverly." time was then all the rage in ca, and Brahms seemed so inter- in it that I asked him if he in- to utilize the rhythm in one of n compositions. A far-away look into his expressive blue eyes while d, "I had thought of doing so but t if I shall ever get to it. My no longer flow as easily as they

e have been in the Brahms biog- s contradictory reports concerning nsposing a Beethoven Sonata half higher when playing in public Eduard Remenyi, with whom he a tour of northern Germany in In the sketch of Brahms's life,

As Memory Summons Him—Brahms In The Eyes and The Ears of An American Student

IT was on December 12, 1891, I first heard Brahms play the piano. It was at a Joachim Quartet at the venerable Singakademie in Berlin. The famous composer had come to the Prussian capital to attend the performance of his clarinet quintet, in which he played the piano part in his new A minor op. 114 for piano, 'cello and clarinet. He had written both of which were still in manuscript, for Richard Muehfeld of Meiningen, who was far the greatest virtuoso on the cello I have ever heard.

On this occasion the Joachim Quartet, which was then the foremost chamber music organization in the world with its traditions, which had since 1869, and played for the first time works not written exclusively for the quartet. The interest to see and hear the man from Vienna was intense and Brahms stepped onto the stage to give a rousing welcome.

The great composer was by no means a piano virtuoso in the modern sense of the word, and yet he had a big technique, although a faulty one. He went straight over difficult passages, often with false notes, but he had a great facility and remarkable independence of fingers. Two years later I heard Brahms play again and both times I gained the impression that he would have been a really great pianist even if he had devoted himself exclusively to the instrument. Considering how much time he had for practice, however, his playing was wonderful. There was something sublime about his conception of the music; and his reading of the score was utterly oblivious to the audience, was concerned only with the intention of the music; and his reading of the score was all the more interesting because he was discoursing his own works.

He played the cantabile parts of the quartet fully, proclaiming the themes in an individual manner, with great feeling, and he lingered lovingly over certain details that particularly struck him. I was struck by the freedom which he played and by his precise rhythm and elasticity of tempo. In his trio Brahms paid no attention whatever to his partners, Richard Muehfeld on cello, and Robert Hausmann, 'cello.

had to follow him, and the hawk-like manner in which they watched him, and the way they yielded to his every mood, whim and modification of tempo and nuance bespoke the awe in which they stood of the illustrious man.

In heavy chords Brahms's tone was hard. He strove for orchestral effects and the Berlin critic of the Deutsche Warte who wrote "Brahms has a bear-like touch" (Brahms hat einen baeremaessigen Anschlag) was quite right. The famous composer at times completely drowned out the 'cello and the clarinet although Muehfeld had a voluminous tone of remarkable carrying power.

Notwithstanding his technical shortcomings, to which even the greatest Brahms enthusiast could not be oblivious, if he was at all discriminating, it was inspiring and uplifting to hear him in his own works, for there was a divine spark in his playing as well as in his compositions. I was twenty-three years old in 1891, when I first heard Brahms, so I was old enough to appreciate the greatness of the occasion.

When I first met Brahms, I had no opportunity to discuss his music with him, but two years later, in 1893, with the help of Joachim I succeeded in drawing him into a musical discussion. Brahms was very touchy on certain points, as I had meanwhile ascertained, and I drew him out by bringing up one of his hobbies for which he had been much criticized.

Brahms seemed to be utterly indifferent to what the critics wrote about his compositions, but when I touched on the censure of professional pianists who called his piano pieces "unpianistic," he warmed up and made with considerable asperity the following remarks, which I noted down immediately afterward because I realized their great significance:

I have no patience with the pianists, who growl because of a few new technical difficulties. Shall progress stop because of a few hard nuts to crack? All my life I have been deeply interested in piano technique, and I have endeavored in my piano works to combine good musical ideas with new idioms. You will find the new technique more particularly in my Paganini variations and in my Capriccio. I admit that many of the passages lie awkwardly for the hands. This new kind of technique seems inconvenient ("unbequem," was the word he used) because arms, hands and fingers are used in a new way. The new idiom requires greater strength, freedom and independence of fingers than the traditional classical piano technique. But this is no reason why my innovations should be called unpianistic. I know that there are some very mean places in the Paganini Variations, but my original intention in writing the two sets was that they should be technical exercises for practice only. It was not until later that I decided to have them published as concert pieces, and that was partly because von Bülow, Clara Schumann and Tausig advised me to do so. Musically, I consider my Handel Variations more important.

In later years, when such great virtuosi as Josefffy, Pachmann, Busoni, and Godowsky began to play the Paganini Variations and to take delight in the new kinds of pianistic difficulties, I recalled the famous composer's words and realized how wisely he had expressed himself on this point.

When I asked Brahms if he ever intended to compose a second violin concerto, he replied with great vehemence, "under no circumstances whatever." On being questioned as to his reasons, he quoted scripture, Matthew VI, 34. When I told him I could not see the application of the passage to a new violin concerto, he replied, "I said 'sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof,' because I had more than enough trouble with my first and only violin concerto. I feel too circumscribed by the tonal limitations of the four strings. I think sympathetically."

It seems strange to me that Brahms should use the term "tonal limitations" instead of "technical limitations," for all the violinists were up in arms against the new kind of difficulties in the Brahms violin concerto. Even as great a critic as Otto Neitzel of Cologne had written, "The Brahms concerto is not written for it is written against the violin." I spoke of this to Brahms, whereupon he said in a very impatient manner:

I don't understand why the violinists make such a fuss over the passages in my concerto. They are worse than the pianists. Why are not more concerned with the effects? They are all so abed with the technique that they look euphony (Klang). Hardly of them can make the passages the first movement and finale and well, and that is why I can't hear the younger violinists any more. It bores me to death when some young fiddler comes asks permission to play my concerto for me. Now you know why I shall never write another violin concerto.

him, to whom Brahms had been saying quite as much as to me, after said to me, "those were two interesting statements by Brahms concerning his new piano and violin concerto. And for him they were very long ones, for he is generally taciturn."

The great composer's last visit to Berlin was in 1896, the year before his death. He, who was his most intimate friend, had invited him to hear a performance of one of his string quartets at a small select social concert. This was my last meeting with him. He had aged visibly. His complexion which had formerly been ruddy had turned to a sickly yellowish brown, and cancer of the liver, of which he died in April of the following year.

The first thing Brahms said to me on that occasion was, "You are an American, do you play the banjo?"

He finished at such a question from me, replied, "No, I am sorry to say not, but why do you ask?"

Because I met an American girl in Berlin," he replied, "who played the banjo for me. It was the first and only time I ever heard the instrument and I was much interested in the rhythm of it which she played very cleverly."

At that time was then all the rage in Berlin, and Brahms seemed so interested in it that I asked him if he intended to utilize the rhythm in one of his compositions. A far-away look came into his expressive blue eyes while he said, "I had thought of doing so but it if I shall ever get to it. My compositions no longer flow as easily as they used to."

We have been in the Brahms biography, and contradictory reports concerning his composing a Beethoven Sonata half an hour higher when playing in public with Eduard Remenyi, with whom he was on a tour of northern Germany in 1894. In the sketch of Brahms's life,

As Memory Summons Him—Brahms In The Eyes and The Ears of An American Student

IT was on December 12, 1891, I first heard Brahms play the piano. It was at a Joachim Quartet at the venerable Singakademie in Berlin. The famous composer had come to the Prussian capital to attend the performance of his clarinet quintet, and he played the piano part in his new minor op. 114 for piano, 'cello and clarinet. He had written both which were still in manuscript, for Richard Muehfeld of Meiningen, who was far the greatest virtuoso on the 'cello I have ever heard.

On this occasion the Joachim Quartet, which was then the foremost chamber music organization in the world with its traditions, which had since 1869, and played for the first time works not written exclusively for the quartet. The interest to see and hear the man from Vienna was intense and Brahms stepped onto the stage and given a rousing welcome.

The great composer was by no means a piano virtuoso in the modern sense of the word, and yet he had a big technique, although a faulty one. He went straight over difficult passages, often with false notes, but he had a great facility and remarkable independence of strength of fingers. Two years later I heard Brahms play again and both I gained the impression that he would have been a really great pianist even if he had devoted himself exclusively to the instrument. Considering how much time he had for practice, however, his playing was wonderful. There was something sublime about his conception of his attitude toward the composition, which was utterly oblivious to the audience, was concerned only with the intention of the music; and his reading of all the more interesting because he was discoursing his own works.

He played the cantabile parts fully, proclaiming the themes in an individual manner, with great feeling, and he lingered lovingly over certain details that particularly struck him. I was struck by the freedom which he played and by his precise rhythm and elasticity of tempo. In his trio Brahms paid no attention whatever to his partners, Richard Muehfeld, 'cello, and Robert Hausmann, 'cello, had to follow him, and the hawk-like manner in which they watched him, and the way they yielded to his every mood, whim and modification of tempo and nuance bespoke the awe in which they stood of the illustrious man.

In heavy chords Brahms's tone was hard. He strove for orchestral effects and the Berlin critic of the Deutsche Warte who wrote "Brahms hat einen baeremaessigen Anschlag" was quite right. The famous composer at times completely drowned out the 'cello and the clarinet although Muehfeld had a voluminous tone of remarkable carrying power.

Notwithstanding his technical shortcomings, to which even the greatest Brahms enthusiast could not be oblivious, if he was at all discriminating, it was inspiring and uplifting to hear him in his own works, for there was a divine spark in his playing as well as in his compositions. I was twenty-three years old in 1891, when I first heard Brahms, so I was old enough to appreciate the greatness of the occasion.

When I first met Brahms, I had no opportunity to discuss his music with him, but two years later, in 1893, with the help of Joachim I succeeded in drawing him into a musical discussion. Brahms was very touchy on certain points, as I had meanwhile ascertained, and I drew him out by bringing up one of his hobbies for which he had been much criticized.

Brahms seemed to be utterly indifferent to what the critics wrote about his compositions, but when I touched on the censure of professional pianists who called his piano pieces "unpianistic," he warmed up and made with considerable asperity the following remarks, which I noted down immediately afterward because I realized their great significance:

I have no patience with the pianists, who growl because of a few new technical difficulties. Shall progress stop because of a few hard nuts to crack? All my life I have been deeply interested in piano technique, and I have endeavored in my piano works to combine good musical ideas with new idioms. You will find the new technique more in my Paganini variations, Capricci. I admit the passages lie awkwardly on the hands. This new idiom seems inconvenient, but it was the word he used. His hands and fingers are strong, freedom and strength, freedom and of fingers than the technical piano technique, reason why my innovation called unpianistic. I am sure some very mean Paganini Variations, intention in writing that they should be exercises for practice until later that I had them published as exercises that was partly because Clara Schumann and me to do so. Must my Handel Variations be so important.

In later years, with virtuosi as Josef, and Godowsky began Paganini Variations in the new kinds of exercises. I recalled the famous and realized how wise he was on this point.

When I asked Brahms to compose a concerto, he replied with "under no circumstances being questioned as quoted scripture, Ma I told him I could not do the passage, certo, he replied, "I the day is the evil had more than enough first and only violin circumscribed by the of the four strings phonically."

It seems strange should use the term instead of "technical" the violinists were the new kind of difficult violin concerto. E. as Otto Neitzel of "The Brahms concerto for it is written in the style of the 18th century he said in a very

I don't understand why pianists make such passages in my piano works worse than the

Winn and M Willia
Beal,
Gardne
Mrs. N
D. Tha
Frankl
Goodwi
George
and M
The
of Mrs erick C
Warner
F. A. I
Charles Hutchin
liam St Clough
ray A.
Mrs. E Lyman,
Mrs. H
son, M William
Richard
Mrs. P
Sprague
E. M. C
Emily W house a Mrs. C responsi
performa
Vincent volunte stall, M
Prince,
Mianne
Miss Be
ingham, garet Em

Proper M

The P musicale
day after Somerset
dent, ha
Donoghue man. The speaker, I sul here fo in the pro berini, bar
soprano,
harper; als Assisting cers and o following-r committee

they not more concerned with the tonal effects? They are all so absorbed with the technique that they overlook euphony (Klang). Hardly any of them can make the passages of the first movement and finale sound well, and that is why I can't bear to hear the younger violinists play it any more. It bores me to death when some young fiddler comes and asks permission to play my concerto for me. Now you know why I shall never write another violin concerto.

Joachim, to whom Brahms had been speaking quite as much as to me, afterward said to me, "those were two intensely interesting statements by Brahms concerning his new piano and violin idioms. And for him they were unusually long ones, for he is generally very taciturn."

The great composer's last visit to Berlin was in 1896, the year before his death. Joachim, who was his most intimate friend, had invited him to hear a private performance of one of his string quartets at a small select social company. This was my last meeting with Brahms. He had aged visibly. His complexion which had formerly been ruddy had turned to a sickly yellowish brown. He had cancer of the liver, of which he died in April of the following year.

The first thing Brahms said to me on this occasion was, "You are an American, do you play the banjo?"

Astonished at such a question from him, I replied "No, I am sorry to say I do not, but why do you ask?"

"Because I met an American girl in Leipzig," he replied, "who played the banjo for me. It was the first and only time I ever heard the instrument and I was much interested in the rhythm of ragtime which she played very cleverly."

Ragtime was then all the rage in America, and Brahms seemed so interested in it that I asked him if he intended to utilize the rhythm in one of his own compositions. A far-away look came into his expressive blue eyes while he said, "I had thought of doing so but I doubt if I shall ever get to it. My ideas no longer flow as easily as they used to."

There have been in the Brahms biographies contradictory reports concerning his transposing a Beethoven Sonata half a tone higher when playing in public with Eduard Remenyi, with whom he made a tour of northern Germany in 1853. In the sketch of Brahms's life, for instance, in the Encyclopedia Britannica, it is stated that the illustrious composer compassed this feat at Goettingen and that he and Remenyi were playing the Beethoven "Kreutzer" Sonata. I questioned Brahms concerning this and he said that it happened in the little town of Celle and that the Sonata was not the "Kreutzer" but the Beethoven C Minor Sonata. Joachim once told me that he had played the "Kreutzer" Sonata with Brahms at Goettingen when they were both young men in the fifties, and that Brahms had transposed it from A major to B flat major, because the piano was half a tone flat.

Speaking of the concert in Celle, the composer said, "The piano was half a tone flat and as Remenyi had absolute pitch, he could not possibly play with it as it was, so he tuned his violin to the B flat of the piano, which was real" and I transposed the program half a tone higher."

Brahms's attitude toward this historic affair seemed to me to be altogether too modest. He seemed to attach no importance whatever to it. What pianist in our day would consider it a small feat to transpose the C Minor Sonata to C sharp minor. It was a stroke of genius!

Brahms was a very difficult man to talk to as he had a very crusty nature. Moreover he was not at all loquacious. If I had not had the assistance of Joachim, I probably should not have succeeded in drawing him out as extensively as I did. I questioned him concerning his visit to Liszt with Remenyi and derived some interesting information about his meeting with the great pianist at Weimar.

Further conversation revealed the interesting news that Brahms was Liszt's guest at the "Altenburg" (Liszt's home in Weimar) for two weeks, and that he met many interesting people there, including the Princess Wittgenstein, Peter Cornelius, Carl Klindworth, William Mason and Carl Tausig, who was then a boy of twelve, but "already a formidable pianist," as Brahms put it.

It was during that memorable visit that Liszt played his own B minor Sonata for Brahms, who fell asleep during the performance. Liszt never forgave him for instance, in the Encyclopedia Britannica, it is stated that the illustrious composer compassed this feat at Goettingen and that he and Remenyi were playing the Beethoven "Kreutzer" Sonata. I questioned Brahms concerning this and he said that it happened in the little town of Celle and that the Sonata was not the "Kreutzer" but the Beethoven C Minor Sonata. Joachim once told me that he had played the "Kreutzer" Sonata with Brahms at Goettingen when they were both young men in the fifties, and that Brahms had transposed it from A major to B flat major, because the piano was half a tone flat.

Speaking of the concert in Celle, the composer said, "The piano was half a tone flat and as Remenyi had absolute pitch, he could not possibly play with it as it was, so he tuned his violin to the B flat of the piano, which was real" and I transposed the program half a tone higher."

Brahms's attitude toward this historic affair seemed to me to be altogether too modest. He seemed to attach no importance whatever to it. What pianist in our day would consider it a small feat to transpose the C Minor Sonata to C sharp minor. It was a stroke of genius!

Brahms was a very difficult man to talk to as he had a very crusty nature. Moreover he was not at all loquacious. If I had not had the assistance of Joachim, I probably should not have succeeded in drawing him out as extensively as I did. I questioned him concerning his visit to Liszt with Remenyi and derived some interesting information about his meeting with the great pianist at Weimar.

Further conversation revealed the interesting news that Brahms was Liszt's guest at the "Altenburg" (Liszt's home in Weimar) for two weeks, and that he met many interesting people there, including the Princess Wittgenstein, Peter Cornelius, Carl Klindworth, William Mason and Carl Tausig, who was then a boy of twelve, but "already a formidable pianist," as Brahms put it.

It was during that memorable visit that Liszt played his own B minor Sonata for Brahms, who fell asleep during the performance. Liszt never forgave him

The Puissant Brahms Ends The Festival

High - Pitched Performance Brings An Evening Of Excitements

EVENT belied anticipation. Not last Sunday afternoon, with the Second Piano-Concerto and the Fourth Symphony, but last evening with the First Piano-Concerto and the First Symphony, came the climax of the Brahms Festival. For a fourth occasion a notable audience filled Symphony Hall; was patient under fifteen minutes' delay in beginning—rare lapse from promptness in that seat of precision; from the outset gave signs of latent excitement. It bubbled when Mme. Matzenauer was warmly and repeatedly recalled after she had sung the alto-part in the "Winter Rhapsody." It was in flow when Mr. Schnabel, long and heartily greeted, came to his place at the piano for the First Concerto. It beat higher when he had done, when Dr. Koussevitzky at last joined him, when both saluted the standing orchestra. It ran full tide at the close of the First Symphony, the concert, and the festival. The house rang with the plaudits. By the new Bostonian custom, feet now stamped for the conductor as they had for Mr. Dr. Koussevitzky was recalled until at last the whole audience was on its feet for better acclamation. In his years at Symphony Hall, he has known many such scenes; but not one, to the best recollection, of equal ardor. Even the ends of seasons were no comparison.

By many a sign through these four concerts, Dr. Koussevitzky is establishing the occasional festival in the musical life of Boston. Three years ago the hundredth anniversary of Beethoven's death gave him first opportunity. Six concerts then assembled the symphonies, the mass, the chamber pieces of the master. They drew and stirred as much of the town as frequents symphonic music. The quality of performance ran high. When the conductor proposed a second festival, this time to the greater glory of Brahms, doubts and fears. No centenary, no anniversary of any kind, gave it reason. As he knows Shakspeare, the street knows Beethoven—and Brahms, to him, is an unquantity. Many a page of Beethoven may thrill unpractised listeners. Approach to Brahms exacts musical sound, a degree of musical culture. Beethoven canon teems with master.

There are not so many in the work of Brahms. A chorus, an orchestra, a conductor, a few solo-voices Beethoven may prevail. At the Brahms needs, besides, a master-pianist.

Koussevitzky persisted; Mr. Schnabel at hand; not a doubt or a fear stands justified. Again a festival has bled and excited the musical town. The standard of performance has again as much of the achievement as could be compressed into programs has held as many audient. (Only the Haydn Variations were really missed.) On second on the end has crowned the work of the conductor, if for so long he tarere, may go courageously forward third festival. Some predict De-

But is there enough of him and efficient variety? Moreover, "Pelleas and Mélisande" is essential; whereas Symphony Hall is no opera house. More fully, the manifold and inexhaustible with the Mass in B minor, with a whole generation unheard in, for climax.

he festival now ended there was to demur to some of Dr. Koussevitzky's program-making; but he chose when he set on the final list of the more dramatic works of the first was the so-called Winter Rhapsody—fragments of his poem "Winter Journey" to the set for alto voice—Mme. Matzenauer's men's chorus—from the Harvard Club; the usual Brahmsian order. One of the chosen fragments last the whole audience was on its feet as a youth, within the poet's acclaim, wandering the mountains to anguished melancholy, self-such scenes; but not one, to the best and misanthropy. The other is to the kind gods that he be ends of seasons were no comparison. ed, stayed and comforted. The orchestra and the solo-voice sound the and the fate of the youth; the in half voice enters the petition lose. For Brahms, the music hout is surprisingly dramatic and ve. Into orchestra and singing pass the youth's mental agony and al stress, often in unmistakable of music-drama. Farther on, the solo-voice is searching out his The chorus flows deep and high out fervors; ends as in the de- of peace.

By many a sign through these four concerts, Dr. Koussevitzky is establishing the occasional festival in the musical life of Boston. Three years ago the hundredth anniversary of Beethoven's death gave him first opportunity. Six concerts then assembled the symphonies, the mass, the chamber pieces of the master. They drew and stirred as much of the town as frequents symphonic music. The quality of performance ran high. When the conductor proposed a second festival, this time to the greater glory of Brahms, for instance, in the Encyclopedia Britannica, it is stated that the illustrious composer compassed this feat at Goettingen and that he and Remenyi were the Beethoven "Kreutzer" Sonata. Brahms concerning this he said that it happened in the little town of Celle and that the Sonata was "Kreutzer" but the Beethoven C Major Sonata. Joachim once told me that he had played the "Kreutzer" Sonata at Goettingen when they were both young men in the fifties, and Brahms had transposed it from A major to B flat major, because the pianist was half a tone flat.

Speaking of the concert in Cell, the composer said, "The piano was a tone flat and as Remenyi had a high pitch, he could not possibly play it as it was, so he tuned his violin to B flat of the piano, which was real and I transposed the program a half tone higher."

Brahms's attitude toward this affair seemed to me to be altogether modest. He seemed to attach no importance whatever to it. What pianist today would consider it a small feat to transpose the C Minor Sonata to C minor. It was a stroke of genius!

Brahms was a very difficult man to talk to as he had a very crusty nature. Moreover he was not at all loquacious. If I had not had the assistance of Joachim, I probably should not have succeeded in drawing him out as extensively as I did. I questioned him concerning his visit to Liszt with Remenyi and received some interesting information from his meeting with the great pianist in Weimar.

Further conversation revealed interesting news that Brahms was a guest at the "Altenburg" (Liszt's home in Weimar) for two weeks, and that he met many interesting people there, including the Princess Wittgenstein, Cornelius, Carl Klindworth, William Mason and Carl Tausig, who was then a boy of twelve, but "already a formidable pianist," as Brahms put it.

It was during that memorable time that Liszt played his own B minor Sonata for Brahms, who fell asleep during the performance. Liszt never forgave for that. The story is a true one as Carl Klindworth, who was present, assured me in later years.

Brahms like Schumann was a great Bible student and on the occasion of my first meeting with him in 1891, he at first paid no attention to me whatever, although I was introduced to him by Joachim. It was not until I quoted John III, 3, to him that he really looked at me. He then finished the quotation by quoting John III, 5, which is a continuation, and then we quoted both the old and the new Testament to each other until his interest was aroused. ARTHUR M. ABELL

"Molto Marcato"

Brahms Conducting

The Puissant Brahms Ends The Festival

High - Pitched Performance Brings An Evening Of Excitements

EVENT belied anticipation. Not last Sunday afternoon, with the Second Piano-Concerto and the Fourth Symphony, but last evening with the First Piano-Concerto and the First Symphony, came the climax of the Brahms Festival. For a fourth occasion a notable audience filled Symphony Hall; was patient under fifteen minutes' delay in beginning—rare lapse from promptness in that seat of precision; from the outset gave signs of latent excitement. It bubbled when Mme. Matzenauer was warmly and repeatedly recalled after she had sung the alto-part in the "Winter Rhapsody." It was in flow when Mr. Schnabel, long and heartily greeted, came to his place at the piano for the First Concerto. It beat higher when he had done, when Dr. Koussevitzky at last joined him, when both saluted the standing orchestra. It ran full tide at the close of the First Symphony, the concert, and the festival. The house rang with the plaudits. By the new Bostonian custom, feet now stamped for the conductor as they had for Mr. Schnabel. Shouts rose besides. Flowers were handed upward. Time and again Dr. Koussevitzky was recalled until at last the whole audience was on its feet for better acclamation. In his years at Symphony Hall, he has known many such scenes; but not one, to the best recollection, of equal ardor. Even the ends of seasons were no comparison.

By many a sign through these four concerts, Dr. Koussevitzky is establishing the occasional festival in the musical life of Boston. Three years ago the hundredth anniversary of Beethoven's death gave him first opportunity. Six concerts then assembled the symphonies, the mass, the chamber pieces of the master. They drew and stirred as much of the town as frequents symphonic music. The quality of performance ran high. When the conductor proposed a second festival, this time to the greater glory of Brahms, doubts and fears. No centenary, no anniversary of any kind, gave it reason. As he knows Shakspeare, the man in the street knows Beethoven—and Brahms, to him, is an unquantified quantity. Many a page of Beethoven may thrill unpractised listeners. Brahms exacts musical round, a degree of musical culture. Beethoven canon teems with master-

There are not so many in the field of Brahms. A chorus, an orchestra, a conductor, a few solo-voices Beethoven may prevail. At the Brahms needs, besides, a master-pianist.

Koussevitzky persisted; Mr. Schnabel at hand; not a doubt or a fear stands justified. Again a festival has been held and excited the musical town. The standard of performance has been high. Again as much of the achievements of Brahms as could be compressed into programs has held as many auditors intent. (Only the Haydn Variations were really missed.) On second thought the end has crowned the work of the conductor, if for so long he tarried, may go courageously forward to the third festival. Some predict Decline. But is there enough of him and his efficient variety? Moreover, "Pelleas and Mélisande" is essential; whereas Symphony Hall is no opera house. More than the manifold and inexhaustible variety of the Mass in B minor, with the whole generation unheard in, for climax.

The festival now ended there was to demur to some of Dr. Koussevitzky's program-making; but he chose when he set on the final list of the more dramatic works of Brahms. The first was the so-called Winter Rhapsody—fragments of his poem "Winter Journey" to the set for alto voice—Mme. Matzenauer's men's chorus—from the Harvard Club; the usual Brahmsian orchestra. One of the chosen fragments was a youth, within the poet's accent, wandering the mountains to anguished melancholy, self-such scenes; but not one, to the best recollection, of equal ardor. Even the ends of seasons were no comparison. The youth, within the poet's accent, wandered the mountains to anguished melancholy, self-such scenes; but not one, to the best recollection, of equal ardor. Even the ends of seasons were no comparison. The youth, within the poet's accent, wandered the mountains to anguished melancholy, self-such scenes; but not one, to the best recollection, of equal ardor. Even the ends of seasons were no comparison.

for instance, in the Encyclopedia Britanica, it is stated that the illustrious composer compassed this feat at Goettingen and that he and Remenyi were the first to play the Beethoven "Kreutzer" Sonata. Brahms questioned Brahms concerning this, he said that it happened in the little hall of Celle and that the Sonata was the "Kreutzer" but the Beethoven C Major Sonata. Joachim once told me that he had played the "Kreutzer" Sonata at Goettingen when they both young men in the fifties, and Brahms had transposed it from A major to B flat major, because the pianist was half a tone flat.

Speaking of the concert in Cell, the composer said, "The piano was a tone flat and as Remenyi had abhorred pitch, he could not possibly play as it was, so he tuned his violin to B flat of the piano, which was real and I transposed the program a half tone higher."

Brahms's attitude toward this affair seemed to me to be altogether modest. He seemed to attach no importance whatever to it. What pianist would consider it a small feat to transpose the C Minor Sonata to C minor. It was a stroke of genius!

Brahms was a very difficult man to talk to as he had a very crusty nature. Moreover he was not at all loquacious. If I had not had the assistance of Joachim, I probably should not have succeeded in drawing him out as extensively as I did. I questioned him concerning his visit to Liszt with Remenyi and received some interesting information about his meeting with the great pianist in Weimar.

Further conversation revealed interesting news that Brahms was a guest at the "Altenburg" (Liszt's home in Weimar) for two weeks, and that he met many interesting people there, including the Princess Wittgenstein, Cornelius, Carl Klindworth, William Mason and Carl Tausig, who was a boy of twelve, but "already a formidable pianist," as Brahms put it.

It was during that memorable time that Liszt played his own B minor Sonata for Brahms, who fell asleep during the performance. Liszt never forgave for that. The story is a true one as Carl Klindworth, who was present, assured me in later years.

Brahms like Schumann was a great Bible student and on the occasion of my first meeting with him in 1891, he at first paid no attention to me whatever, although I was introduced to him by Joachim. It was not until I quoted John III, 3, to him that he really looked at me. He then finished the quotation by quoting John III, 5, which is a continuation, and then we quoted both the old and the new Testament to each other until his interest was aroused. ARTHUR M. ABELL

"Molto Marcato"

Brahms Conducting

The Pui Brah The

High - Pitched Brings A
Of Exc

Is an.
E VENT belled
last Sunday
Second Plan
Fourth Sym
ning with the First
First Symphony, ca
Brahms Festival. F a notable audience was patient under in beginning—rare ness in that seat
the outset gave sig
ment. It bubbled ader was warmly an after she had sung
"Winter Rhapsody."
when Mr. Schnabel greeted, came to his for the First Conce
when he had done,
zky at last joined hi
the standing orchest at the close of the concert, and the fi rang with the plat Bostonian custom, fe the conductor as t Schnabel. Shouts re were handed upwar
Dr. Koussevitzky w last the whole audie for better acclamati Symphony Hall, he such scenes; but n recollection, of equa ends of seasons were

By many a sign concerts, Dr. Kousse
ing the occasional fes life of Boston. Three dredth anniversary o gave him first opport then assembled the sy the chamber pieces o drew and stirred as n frequents symphonie of performance ran h ductor proposed a time to the greater came doubts and fears. No centenary, no anniversary of any kind, gave it reason. Vaguely, as he knows Shakspeare, the man in the street knows Beethoven—and responds. Brahms, to him, is an unknown quantity. Many a page of Beethoven may thrill unpractised listeners. The approach to Brahms exacts musical background, a degree of musical culture. The Beethoven canon teems with masterpieces. There are not so many in the collected work of Brahms. A chorus, an orchestra, a conductor, a few solo-voices—and Beethoven may prevail. At the least, Brahms needs, besides, a masterful pianist.

Dr. Koussevitzky persisted; Mr. Schnabel was at hand; not a doubt or a fear now stands justified. Again a festival has assembled and excited the musical town. Again the standard of performance has run high. Again as much of the achieving Brahms as could be compressed into five programs has held as many audiences intent. (Only the Haydn Variations were really missed.) On second occasion the end has crowned the work and the conductor, if for so long he tarries here, may go courageously forward to a third festival. Some predict Debussy. But is there enough of him and in sufficient variety? Moreover, "Pelleas and Melisande" is essential; whereas Symphony Hall is no opera house. More probably, the manifold and inexhaustible Bach, with the Mass in B minor, through a whole generation unheard in Boston, for climax.

In the festival now ended there was reason to demur to some of Dr. Koussevitzky's program-making; but he chose wisely when he set on the final list three of the more dramatic works of Brahms. The first was the so-called Alto or Winter Rhapsody—fragments of Goethe's poem "Winter Journey to the Harz," set for alto voice—Mme. Matzenauer's; men's chorus—from the Harvard Glee Club; the usual Brahmsian orchestra. One of the chosen fragments pictures a youth, within the poet's acquaintance, wandering the mountains in prey to anguished melancholy, self-reproach and misanthropy. The other is prayer to the kind gods that he be enlightened, stayed and comforted. The orchestra and the solo-voice sound the woes and the fate of the youth; the chorus in half voice enters the petitioning close. For Brahms, the music throughout is surprisingly dramatic and objective. Into orchestra and singing voice pass the youth's mental agony and spiritual stress, often in unmistakable accents of music-drama. Farther on, and the solo-voice is searching out his heart. The chorus flows deep and high in devout fervors; ends as in the descent of peace.

It pleased Brahms to talk now and again of an opera, to pretend to be groping for a suitable text. Though he frequented the theater, it was alien to him as field for composition. His clear, self-critical mind readily perceived that limitation. None the less, the "Winter Rhapsody" is clear proof of his occasional will, his commensurate ability, to make music-drama for the stage of the imagination. It was not less so with the graphic and passioned singing of Mme. Matzenauer; with the vocal background, warming and brightening, of the Harvard choir.

Then ensued the Piano-Concerto of Brahms's young years, the First, in D minor, with Dr. Koussevitzky, Mr. Schnabel and the orchestra with them mutually resolved to carry it in the grand style, the sonorous voice, the utmost release, at need, of tone and passion. The first movement ran in titanic conflict. The orchestra flung out its declamation; the piano, though it was but a single man—and a composer—answered and overtopped it. (Remember the superb trills between them divided). A seething, swirling music cried its passion of defiance and revolt; was hardly to be stilled when the piano at last adventured the gentler calming motif. There was "development" that developed, inasmuch as each new measure had motion and meaning; sonorities that smote the air; rhythms that clove it; the sense, rare from Brahms, of incandescent phrase and tone. The "Winter Rhapsody," likewise from his younger years, had discovered him as dramatic composer. Now, through the first movement of the Piano-Concerto he raged in native wildness. Mr. Schnabel emerged as heroic pianist of boundless yet measured power; of conquering resonances that were never mere violence upon the ear; of great sweeps of tone out of which salient detail suddenly flashed. Or else they softened and stayed into some euphony with the orchestra. Dr. Koussevitzky was riding a music of contrasts, now torrential, again rigid. The orchestra played as though pianist and conductor were looking over each man's shoulder.

The foil was the beauty of the slow division, played by Mr. Schnabel with sensibility to every note and phrase, yet as though the whole were a chorale in noble and aspiring course. Under the conductor's hand and ear, the orchestra was his complement. They passed to the final Rondo, which is music of a semi-exhausted Brahms withdrawing within to the necessities of the commitment he must make a compromise. Mr. Schnabel, who has been as well as objective, Massachusetts would not have such a Concerto decline altogether reflection upon three with the fire still smoldering voice yet spoke out. pianist and conductor Concerto in Symphony for Mr. Schnabel and to transpose it into

Two trusts

to De-para-

phony in C minor with conductor, orchestra besides, lifted by the evening well above in memory the violins with such wealth and nter Tar-e. The whole string in the bill full-rounded unity or an in they as the composer twice of the clarinets, the deep and twice were truly Brahmsian. hands and pianist accomplished 262. Then, in turn, Dr. Koussevitzky and kindle, passion unced the Brahms, Nikisch-like; ous ques reason, might say him immediate symphony. The tran- riefly and roduction to the first port. It turns of the principal count the n into the musical uestion. Second, gentler subject, uestion of ms, the distribution ialist mo- instrumental color— return of, and conductor, laid a London-imagination. Toward r of lively was Brahms lifted; g Tardieu, movement as well, decided to itzky does not spare ards, with winds and horns may At one gly. The light, misty so violent veil of beauty upon t left the Allegretto. Neither test. The uck himself wrought nler a 57 the slow introduction ived from the horns from the trombones a. And the finale It- ne of us who love not shouting Ode to Joy h Symphony, would ith the Adagio. For idice or blasphemy, ches a spare and ex- r. Koussevitzky has ed horns and trom- oven's blindly flails is a Brahmsian time.

Quits

o Agree-nt

H. T. P.

Brahms in Middle Years

From a Little-Known Photograph Belonging to William Willeke

It pleased Brahms to talk not again of an opera, to pretend to be writing for a suitable text. Though he frequented the theater, it was alien to his field for composition. His clear critical mind readily perceived that. None the less, the "Winter Rhapsody" is clear proof of his personal will, his commensurate ability to make music-drama for the stage imagination. It was not less so with graphic and passionate singing of Matzenauer; with the vocal background warming and brightening, of the Ha choir.

Then ensued the Piano-Concerto in D minor, with Dr. Koussevitzky, Mr. Schnabel and the orchestra with them mutually solved to carry it in the grand style, sonorous voice, the utmost release, need, of tone and passion. The movement ran in titanic conflict. The orchestra flung out its declamatory piano, though it was but a single note and a composer—answered and topped it. (Remember the superb between them divided). A seething, living music cried its passion of defiance and revolt; was hardly to be stilled the piano at last adventured the great calming motif. There was "development" that developed, inasmuch as each measure had motion and meaning; sometimes that smote the air; rhythms clove it; the sense, rare from Brahms, incandescent phrase and tone. "Winter Rhapsody," likewise from younger years, had discovered him a dramatic composer. Now, through the movement of the Piano-Concerto he was in native wildness. Mr. Schnabel emphasized as heroic pianist of boundless yet unshared power; of conquering resonance that were never mere violence upon the ear; of great sweeps of tone out of salient detail suddenly flashed. Or they softened and stayed into euphony with the orchestra. Dr. Koussevitzky was riding a music of contrast now torrential, again rigid. The orchestra played as though pianist and conductor were looking over each man's shoulder.

The foil was the beauty of the division, played by Mr. Schnabel with sensibility to every note and phrase as though the whole were a choral noble and aspiring course. Under conductor's hand and ear, the orchestra was his complement. They passed the final Rondo, which is music of an exhausted Brahms withdrawing with himself, recalled to the necessities of the occasion only when he must make a pianist's cadenza. Mr. Schnabel, who can be subjective as well as objective, followed him; yet would not have such an end to such a Concerto decline altogether into musical reflection upon three motifs. Underneath the fire still smoldered; the heroic voice yet spoke out. One and the other pianist and conductor have played this Concerto in Symphony Hall. It remained for Mr. Schnabel and Dr. Koussevitzky to transpose it into grandeur.

The First Symphony in C minor brought the end, with conductor, orchestra, and audience besides, lifted by the excitements of the evening well above themselves. Within memory the violins have not played with such wealth and unanimity of tone. The whole string choir, indeed, was full-rounded unity or measured diversity as the composer willed. The horns, the clarinets, the deep-voiced trombones, were truly Brahmsian. The valiant tympanist accomplished prodigies of rhythm. In turn, Dr. Koussevitzky could light and kindle, passion and dramatize, his Brahms, Nikisch-like; while no one, with reason, might say him nay in this First Symphony. The transition from the introduction to the first movement, the returns of the principal theme, the infusion into the musical structure of the second, gentler subject, the tossing rhythms, the distribution of harmonic and instrumental color—all, from orchestra and conductor, laid hold upon the imagination. Toward grandeur again was Brahms lifted; through the slow movement as well, where Dr. Koussevitzky does not spare vigor, though woodwinds and horns may sing never so musingly. The light, misty orchestral tone was veil of beauty upon the intermezzo-like Allegretto. Neither Nikisch nor Dr. Muck himself wrought more suspensively the slow introduction to the finale; received from the horns more mysterious, from the trombones more sonorous, tone. And the finale itself? There are some of us who love not Beethoven's jigging, shouting Ode to Joy to climax the Ninth Symphony, would fain have it end with the Adagio. For them, be it prejudice or blasphemy, Brahms's finale touches a spare and exultant grandeur—Dr. Koussevitzky has reason for his added horns and trombones—while Beethoven's blindly flails the air. And this is a Brahmsian time.

H. T. P.

Brahms in Middle Years

From a Little-Known Photograph Belonging to William Willeke

It pleased Brahms to talk now himself, recalled to the necessities of the again of an opera, to pretend to be occasion only when he must make a ing for a suitable text. Though pianist's cadenza. Mr. Schnabel, who quented the theater, it was alien t can be subjective as well as objective, as field for composition. His clear followed him; yet would not have such critical mind readily perceived tha an end to such a Concerto decline alto- tation. None the less, the "V gether into musical reflection upon three Rhapsody" is clear proof of his motifs. Underneath the fire still smol- sional will, his commensurate abili- dered; the heroic voice yet spoke out. make music-drama for the stage. One and the other pianist and conductor imagination. It was not less so wil- have played this Concerto in Symphony graphic and passionate singing of Hall. It remained for Mr. Schnabel and Matzenauer; with the vocal backgr- Dr. Koussevitzky to transpose it into warming and brightening, of the Ha- grandeur. choir.

Then ensued the Piano-Concer- Brahms's young years, the First, in- nor, with Dr. Koussevitzky. Mr. Schnabel and the orchestra with them mutual- solved to carry it in the grand style: sonorous voice, the utmost releas- need, of tone and passion. The movement ran in titanic conflict. The orchestra flung out its declamation piano, though it was but a single n- and a composer—answered and topped it. (Remember the superb between them divided). A seething, ing music cried its passion of de- and revolt; was hardly to be stilled the piano at last adventured the a- calming motif. There was develop- that developed, inasmuch as each measure had motion and meaning; ties that smote the air; rhythms clove it; the sense, rare from Brahms incandescent phrase and tone. "Winter Rhapsody," likewise from younger years, had discovered him a- matic composer. Now, through the movement of the Piano-Concerto he in native wildness. Mr. Schnabel em- as heroic pianist of boundless yet- ured power; of conquering reson- that were never mere violence up- ear; of great sweeps of tone out of salient detail suddenly flashed. Or they softened and stayed into euphony with the orchestra. Dr. sevitzy was riding a music of con- now torrential, again rigid. The or- tra played as though pianist and co- tor were looking over each man's- der.

The foil was the beauty of the division, played by Mr. Schnabel sensibility to every note and phrase as though the whole were a chora- noble and aspiring course. Under conductor's hand and ear, the orch- was his complement. They passed the final Rondo, which is music of an exhausted Brahms withdrawing w-

The First Symphony in a minor brought the end, with conductor, orches- tra, and audience besides, lifted by the excitements of the evening well above themselves. Within memory the violins have not played with such wealth and unanimity of tone. The whole string choir, indeed, was full-rounded unity or measured diversity as the composer willed. The horns, the clarinets, the deep-voiced trombones, were truly Brahmsian. The valiant tympanist accomplished prodigies of rhythm. In turn, Dr. Koussevitzky could light and kindle, passion and dramatize, his Brahms, Nikisch-like, while no one, with reason, might say him nay in this First Symphony. The tran- sition from the introduction to the first movement, the returns of the principal theme, the infusion into the musical structure of the second, gentler subject, the tossing rhythms, the distribution of harmonic and instrumental color— all, from orchestra and conductor, laid hold upon the imagination. Toward grandeur again was Brahms lifted through the slow movement as well, where Dr. Koussevitzky does not spare vigor, though woodwinds and horns may sing never so musingly. The light, misty orchestral tone was veil of beauty upon the intermezzo-like Allegretto. Neither Nikisch nor Dr. Muck himself wrought more suspensively the slow introduction to the finale; received from the horns more mysterious, from the trombones more sonorous, tone. And the finale itself? There are some of us who love not Beethoven's jiggling, shouting Ode to Joy to climax the Ninth Symphony; would fain have it end with the Adagio. For them, be it prejudice or blasphemy, Brahms's finale touches a spare and ex- ultant grandeur—Dr. Koussevitzky has reason for his added horns and trom- bones—while Beethoven's blindly flails the air. And this is a Brahmsian time. H. T. P.

Brahms in Middle Years

From a Little-Known Photograph Belonging to William Willeke

Putting Their Backs Into It

Artur Schnabel and Serge Koussevitzky

BRAHMS FESTIVAL

By PHILIP HALE

The first concert of the Brahms festival took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted. The program was as follows: Academic Festival overture; Symphony, F major, No. 3; Symphony, D major, No. 2. The audience was enthusiastic throughout the concert.

One had supposed that Brahms knew what he was about when he described his overture, the Academic Festival, as "a very jolly potpourri on students' songs" music written in the manner of Franz Suppe, of "Fatinitza" fame. Brahms was to receive a degree from the University of Breslau and it was natural that he chose student songs for themes. It was also natural that he should describe the work as a "jolly" potpourri. But we are now told that he spoke "flippantly;" that there is a vein of sadness in the music; that the lively chatter at the beginning is really gloomy comment on the fleeting joys of university life. Why should Brahms have thus been a "Dismal Jemmy"? Because he had not enjoyed what are called the advantages of a collegiate education? Because the degree would put him in a class with some no doubt estimable persons who had written respectably dull music?

No. One likes to think that Brahms meant exactly what he said; that he wrote a jolly potpourri for a joyous occasion.

Surely this light-hearted work should be played in a light-hearted manner as students would sing the tunes. The music does not admit of dramatization for the interpretation. Nor does it admit of an infinite number of nuances; of changes in tempi other than those indicated. In this music eloquence is out of place. Whatever may be said against Brahms he was never bombastic.

It is the tendency in these days to find pessimism in works of Brahms that to Philistines, enjoying them, are conspicuous for serenity, sunshine and courage. There are works of his that are charged with a sadness akin to despair; a melancholy that is black with the blackness of darkness. He was often obsessed by the thought of death. So was Tchaikovsky. If Tchaikovsky groaned lustily, shrieked, as a strong man in agony, Brahms would often whine. It is as if he had said with Brachiano in John Webster's tragedy:

"On pain of death, let no man name death to me: it is a word infinitely terrible."

But how can recent biographers find the symphony in D major a work of epic grandeur? It has hitherto been regarded as agreeable in the Mendelssohnian manner, tuneful, with a piquant Scherzo, and a reassuring Finale, music that is free from storm, stress and passion; music that almost as a quotation pays a graceful compliment to Mendelssohn in flowing measures, as there is a tribute to Wagner in the first movement of the Third Symphony, a glimpse of Venus and her voluptuous train, refreshing after the crashing, defiant opening measures.

There is also a wide-spread tendency in performing the orchestral music of Brahms to make it more dramatic than the contents suggest. This comes from the wish to avoid the academic, respectful, perfunctory, one might say obsequious readings that in times past led many to find the symphonies too sober, it not dull. If jog-trot interpreters thought to reveal "the spirit of Brahms"—meaningless phrase to apply to any composer, but one that sounds well and impresses some—contemporary interpreters are often tempted to treat Brahms as if he were possessed with a demon; as if he were a daring innovation, with fire, not celestial ichor in his veins. Or in order to make the music more intense, there is undue importance given to episodes so that there is no continuous musical flow. The latter course appeals to the great majority. The music is, then, exciting; the dynamic contrasts hold the attention; the composer in the minds of the hearers is glorified; they might exclaim: "Is this Brahms? Who would have thought the old man to have so much blood in him?"

After all, whatever the purist may say, it is better to be pleasurably excited at a concert than to be lulled to sleep. In all probability the magnificent performance by the orchestra and the roaring applause of the audience would have delighted Johannes, for he was mortal, and all mortals like appreciation.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is as follows: Haydn, Symphony, D-major (with the horn call); Piston, Suite for orchestra (first performance); Sibelius, Symphony No. 6; Bach, Organ Prelude and Fugue in E-flat major, arranged for orchestra by Schoenberg.

The second concert of the Brahms festival will take place tomorrow afternoon in Symphony hall. Song of Destiny, Piano Concerto, B-flat, No. 2 (Arthur Schnabel, pianist); Symphony, E-minor, No. 4. Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor.

Quintet in F major (Mendelssohn)

Quintet in F major

ve. March 26

le Chorus, and Orchestra)

ncerto in D minor, No. 1

. 1 in C minor

concerts now on sale

Herald BRAHMS FESTIVAL ^{Mar. 27, 1930}

The second concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra's Brahms festival took place yesterday afternoon at Symphony hall. The amended program contained the Song of Destiny (Schicksalslied), op. 54, for chorus and orchestra; the 2d pianoforte concerto, op. 83, in B flat major, and the 4th symphony, op. 98, in E minor. Arthur Schnabel, the eminent pianist who has not been heard here since 1923, appeared as soloist in the concerto; the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society joined forces with the orchestra in the Song of Destiny.

The highwater mark of an afternoon which gave evident pleasure throughout to a numerous and vigorously plauditory audience was Mr. Schnabel's magnificently virile and intelligent performance of the concerto. The great length of this work, the number of its movements, and the relative subordination of the exceedingly difficult piano part, have caused it to be called "a symphony with piano obbligato." It has also been remarked that the strenuousness of its piano part is out of all proportion to the result achieved. Certainly there is less than usual here either of the placid cantilena in which a pianist may revel in beauty of tone and elegance of phrase or of the artfully disposed bravura by which he may easily delight and astonish his hearers. The pianist has too often to work like a demon with the unpleasing knowledge that the results of his toil, however excellent, are covered up by the orchestra. So it has been said. But Mr. Schnabel demonstrated yesterday that it is possible to play this music respectfully, with full sense of its unity and of his own inglorious function as part of the orchestra (though this view of the B flat concerto is a greatly exaggerated one) and still astonish an audience by brilliant virtuosity, stir it to excitement by urgently impelling rhythm, arouse its admiration by finely sensitive phrasing and tasteful musicianship. Yesterday's audience applauded loud and long, banged the seats, and shouted in token of its enthusiasm.

A careful but not emotionally convincing performance of the Schicksalslied had left the impression that in 1868 Brahms was more successful in depicting the bliss of the inhabitants of the celestial regions than the distress of mortal men. The serene and uplifting beauty of the orchestral prelude and epilogue, and of the earlier choral portions of the work, are what remain in the memory.

Mr. Koussevitzky's well-known interpretation of the E minor symphony, perhaps a shade too stressful and vigorous a performance for music so purely musical (despite its elegiac or tragic feeling), music which relies so little on emotional clichés for its effect. Mr. Koussevitzky was warmly applauded.

Tomorrow's program will be devoted to the German Requiem. S. S.

BRAHMS'S "GERMAN REQUIEM"

For the third program of the Brahms festival at Symphony hall, the Boston Symphony orchestra co-operated last night with the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society in a performance of the "German Requiem." The soloists were Jeannette Vreeland, soprano, and Fraser Gange, baritone. Dr. Koussevitzky, of course, was in command.

If, as is very probable, the "German Requiem" was composed in memory of Robert Schumann (and nothing could be more appropriate, not only by reason of the love, admiration, and gratitude he bore him, but also because it was Schumann who had urged the promising young composer to turn his attention to choral and orchestral forms), nevertheless, last night's performance must have been felt by most of those present as a solemn tribute to Brahms himself. It was on the whole an admirable performance that was given of this great but intensely human and German music, that matches so thoroughly the comfortable and reassuring doctrine of the chosen text. It was a performance lifted to occasional heights of superlative beauty by the superb singing of the soloists (how rarely can such a thing be said!). The powerfully dramatic effort achieved by chorus and orchestra in the second chorus ("Behold, All Flesh Is as the Grass"), the moments of brilliance and expressive beauty in which these young Radcliffe and Harvard singers reminded one of their splendid work in the great Beethoven Mass two years ago, were offset by barren stretches in which the timidity of the sopranos and altos, the gentlemanly restraint of the male singers, a certain lack of movement in the slower tempi, made for an effect lacking in the fullest conviction.

But the vitality and beauty and expressive force of Mr. Gange's singing in the solos "Lord, make me to know the measure of my days" and "Here on earth have we no continuing place," the exquisite charm of Miss Vreeland's beautiful voice and her delightfully modulated and expressive phrasing in "Ye now are sorrowful"—surely one of the loveliest things in the whole "Requiem"—were things to be long remembered. The enthusiasm of the audience was unbounded.

Tonight's program will contain piano pieces played by Mr. Schnabel, songs rendered by Mme. Matzenauer, and the F minor quintet performed by Mr. Schnabel and the Burgin string quartet. S. S.

BRAHMS FESTIVAL

By PHILIP HALE

The fourth concert of the Brahms festival took place last night in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: "Liebeslieder" waltzes for pianoforte duet (Mr. Davison and Mr. Woodworth), and four vocal parts (small chorus from the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society). Piano pieces: op. 119—intermezzo, B minor, intermezzo, E minor, intermezzo, C major, rhapsody, E flat major (Arthur Schnabel, pianist). Songs: Sapphische Ode, Von ewige Liebe, Immer leiser wird mein Schlummer, Meine liebe ist gruen (Margaret Matzenauer). Pianoforte quintet, F minor, op. 34a (Mr. Schnabel and the Burgin string quartet).

Again an enthusiastic audience that completely filled the hall, an audience impartial in its distribution of applause, and by its rapt attention during each performance paying, after all, the highest tribute. The waltzes were a revelation to some who had known the composer only by his austere, granitic works. If they expected waltz melodies after the manner of Schubert, Lanner or Johann Strauss, father and son, they could not have been reasonably disappointed, so admirable was the interpretation. Especially noteworthy were the pure, fresh virginal voices of the Radcliffe girls. How admirably, how musically this little chorus had been trained! The varied colors of the girls' costumes, artistically contrasted, delighted the eye.

Some one, and one not ignorant nor unappreciative of Brahms's instrumental works, had the courage to say that the composer would be longest and best remembered by his songs. The management of the Festival was fortunate in securing Mme. Matzenauer to sing the ones selected for the occasion. Her rich, luscious voice and her technical skill were at the service of the composer, not merely for her own glory. Whether the song called for tenderness or passion; whether the spirit of text and music was contemplative or one of wild regret for days that would be no more, the singer gave each sentiment and emotion full expression with an intimacy of appeal. Here was a singer famous in opera, that worked an irresistible spell by her art and womanly feeling as a mistress of the Lied. Mr. Schnabel's sympathetic, beautiful accompaniments emphasized the worth of the music and the rare ability of the singer.

Mr. Schnabel played the Intermezzi and the Rhapsody with a fine understanding that was something more than painstaking dissection of the musical body. He was especially fortunate in the performance of the Intermezzo in E minor. His playing as a whole was more objective than subjective. Perhaps that is what Brahms demands, but could not the individuality of a pianist be fused with that of the composer? If tone did not always carry, but stopped abruptly, if tone did not always sing, that no doubt was due to a condition over which Mr. Schnabel had no control. In the piano quintet, which was for years a stumbling block to many admirers of Brahms, he showed himself again the true artist, regarding himself as one of five, all working together in eloquent preaching. The gospel according to Johanns.

The fifth and last concert of the Festival will take place tonight: The Alto Rhapsody (Mme. Matzenauer, male chorus and orchestra); piano concerto, D minor, No. 1 (Mr. Schnabel, pianist); Symphony C minor, No. 1. Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct.

Herald BRAHMS FESTIVAL ^{Mar. 27, 1930}

Scenes of overwhelming enthusiasm marked the end last night of the Boston Symphony orchestra's Brahms Festival. Not only did cordial and evidently spontaneous applause indicate the audience's appreciation of the fine quality of last night's performance, but Dr. Koussevitzky, at the close of the concert, was treated to perhaps the most remarkable ovation that he has ever received in Boston. Frantic applause, the banging of seats, shouts of approval, and an enormous bouquet of red roses rewarded him for the devotion and energy with which he had planned and conducted the festival—one both interesting as an experiment and memorable for the admirable work of orchestra, chorus, and the exceptionally well-chosen soloists who have graced the occasion.

Last night's program—the fourth and last of the series—offered the following works: Rhapsody from Goethe's "Harzreise in Winter," for alto, male chorus, and orchestra, Op. 53; Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra in D minor, Op. 15; Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Op. 68. Mme. Matzenauer and Mr. Schnabel were the soloists; the Harvard Glee Club lent its aid in the performance of the "Rhapsody."

Few of those who heard the Rhapsody last night can have disagreed with

292

Brahms's high opinion of its quality, which led him to sleep with it under his pillow, "so as to have it always with him." Nor can one fail to applaud his conscious abandonment of the slightly complacent, if not necessarily trivial, 3-4 time for the flexible "common time" that here prevails. This music has a depth and movingly sombre expressiveness, a freedom of movement, that ranks it high among Brahms's choral compositions, though it never attains the ecstatic beauty of the best parts of the Requiem. Mme. Matzenauer sang the prominent solo part with marvellous beauty of tone, with delightfully flexible and expressive phrasing. The Harvard Glee Club performed its share with its customary fine taste and with excellent balance of tone.

In the D-minor concerto, a work of more immediate appeal than that in B flat, Mr. Schnabel once more demonstrated his outstanding musicianship and his brilliant technical qualities. The superb vitality of his rhythm, his power of giving structural unity and logical cohesion to a work of large scale, the brilliance of his climaxes, were as striking as ever. In addition, there was a new emotional intensity felt, especially in the beautiful adagio, which must have given pleasure to those listeners who had heretofore suspected a certain coldness and purely intellectual fire in his playing.

Dr. Koussevitzky's reading, and the orchestra's performance, of the C minor symphony was of surpassing brilliance and expressive force. This is perhaps the most "symphonic" of the Brahms four experiments in the form; it has the largest share of the "grand manner" in whose evocation Dr. Koussevitzky excels. He succeeded eloquently in drawing forth its full majesty, its deep beauty, though the andante, with a slightly faster tempo, might have gained in grace.

So ended the festival. It will be interesting to note its effect on the local appreciation of the composer. S. S.

Brahms Academic Festival Overture, Op. 80
(Gabrilowitsch and the Detroit Symphony Orchestra.)

Brahms Symphony No. 3 in F Major, Op. 90
(Stokowski and the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra.)

Brahms Symphony No. 2 in D Major, Op. 73
(In preparation—Stokowski and the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra.)

The Festival Adds Brahms's Master Work

In Full-Rounded Performance

The "German Requiem" for

Choral Concert

March 25, 1930

THIS generation of the concert-hall knows Brahms best, honors him most, as composer of symphonic music. A glance around Symphony Hall last evening affirmed as much. For the "German Requiem" not every seat was taken; whereas for the Concerto and the Symphony of Sunday afternoon hardly a place stood empty. Next, for most of us, stands Brahms the composer of songs. Publicly, we hear him as such in too standard a repertory. Privately, we cultivate him according to our own choice. Third, place the composer of chamber-music. The pianists and the violinists have their favorite Sonatas; the foursomes (as Mr. Grainger likes to call them) their favorite Quartets; the virtuosi-musicians risk on their programs even the later Intermezzi, Caprices, Rhapsodies. We shall hear Mr. Schnabel play four of them this evening. Fourth and last, in the general ear, sounds Brahms the composer of choral music. The catalogues of his "collected works" list a page or two of such pieces; but, outside Germany and Austria, we are fortunate if we hear aught else than the "German Requiem" and the "Song of Destiny"—and them not too often. To these two at the current festival, by happy exception, the Rhapsody for Alto and Men's Chorus will be added.

Every one of the Symphonies bears marks of the labor that Brahms spent upon it. They were conceived and accomplished in mental and spiritual travail. The choral vein flows more freely, more amply. By instinct, predilection and habit, Brahms is composer of music for choirs variously constituted and variously accompanied. He read of a morning in Hölderlin's eighteenth-century poetry and that same afternoon began the making of the "Song of Destiny." Composers nowadays, unless like Stravinsky, they throw back to Handel, achieve their choral pieces by will and application, as part of their duty to the whole art of music. Only Holst comes readily to mind as possessed, like Brahms, of the choral instinct.

Mozart wrote a Requiem Mass because the dread of death and of the undiscovered country haunted him, and he would dispel it. Berlioz wrote another because he would transform the Roman office into a grandiose spectacle in tones. Verdi wrote a third that he might clothe that office in Italian fervors, infuse into it the tradition that he honored and would practise of Italian song demanding out of liturgy and madrigal. Small blame to him if the theater in which he had worked a lifetime occasionally had the better of it. The venerable editor of the program-sheet noted last evening the "abundant proof" that Brahms intended the "German Requiem" as "a last great funeral rite for Schumann." In the text and the music themselves, the "proof" seems quite as "abundant" that Brahms looked in the Scriptures, looked in his heart, and wrote.

293

In spite of the learned discourse—page and chapter and book of it—about the Protestantism, the Germanism, the backgrounds and environment of the "German Requiem," the years resolve it more and more into the meditation of Johannes Brahms, a devout mind and a believing spirit, upon the life of this world and of the world to come, of the death and resurrection and judgment that may be bridge between. Brahms put together his text out of a Bible that he read and knew in the faith of a truly religious and Christian man. Run through it hastily and it seems a congeries of detached verses awkwardly thrown together. Conned more closely, it becomes a carefully matched mosaic not only to serve a musical design but to bear witness to an inner continuity, contrast, significance. "Blessed are they that mourn; for they shall be comforted." . . . "All flesh is as the grass; but the redeemed of the Lord shall come rejoicing into Zion." . . . "Lord, make me know the measure of my days; but the righteous souls are in the hand of God." . . . "Here on earth have we no continuing place; but blessed are the dead which die in the Lord." . . . They rest from their labors." Pervasive these contrasts, yet with two Intermezzi and one masterful transition. The first Intermezzo sings "the courts of the Lord"; the second expatiates on sorrow and solace. The transition traverses death and resurrection. Brahms's poetry dwells usually in his tones. In itself the verse of his songs seldom engages the mind or quickens the heart. Yet into this text for the "German Requiem," he has infused a veritable poetry of scheme and word.

And what a text for such a music as Brahms would make! Earthly sorrow and woe and lamentation, the brevity and the emptiness of human living, touched his imagination—and he wrote the anguished pages, yet not without a recurring undertone of compassion. He saw in vision the tribulation and the struggle of men and the sight evoked the tortured music that falls to the baritone with chorus. This human fate was inexorable—in the Christian Brahms, composing, there lurked often the fatalist—and he wrote the rigid march of the second chorus to be as the endless stream of human suffering. He meditated upon death and resurrection, upon the trumpets of the Judgment Day—and rose to the close-packed, darksome imagery of the sixth division. The light came upon him and he saw the "courts of the Lord" in a music in which the evening stars sing as well as the human voices. Deep pity possessed him and he added the Brahms's high opinion of its quality, which led him to sleep with it under his pillow, "so as to have it always with him." Nor can one fail to applaud his conscious abandonment of the slightly complacent, if not necessarily trivial, 3-4 time for the flexible "common time" that here prevails. This music has a depth and movingly sombre expressiveness, a freedom of movement, that ranks it high among Brahms's choral compositions, though it never attains the ecstatic beauty of the best parts of the Requiem. Mme. Matzenauer sang the prominent solo part with marvellous beauty of tone, with delightfully flexible and expressive phrasing. The Harvard Glee Club performed its share with its customary fine taste and with excellent balance of tone.

In the D-minor concerto, a work of more immediate appeal than that in B flat, Mr. Schnabel once more demonstrated his outstanding musicianship and his brilliant technical qualities. The superb vitality of his rhythm, his power of giving structural unity and logical cohesion to a work of large scale, the brilliance of his climaxes, were as striking as ever. In addition, there was a new emotional intensity felt, especially in the beautiful adagio, which must have given pleasure to those listeners who had heretofore suspected a certain coldness and purely intellectual fire in his playing.

Dr. Koussevitzky's reading, and the orchestra's performance, of the C minor symphony was of surpassing brilliance and expressive force. This is perhaps the most "symphonic" of the Brahms four experiments in the form; it has the largest share of the "grand manner" in whose evocation Dr. Koussevitzky excels. He succeeded eloquently in drawing forth its full majesty, its deep beauty, though the andante, with a slightly faster tempo, might have gained in grace.

So ended the festival. It will be interesting to note its effect on the local appreciation of the composer. S. S.

Brahms Academic Festival Overture, Op. 80
(Gabilowitsch and the Detroit Symphony Orchestra.)

Brahms Symphony No. 3 in F Major, Op. 90
(Stokowski and the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra.)

Brahms Symphony No. 2 in D Major, Op. 73
(In preparation—Stokowski and the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra.)

The Festival Adds Brahms's Master Work

In Full-Rounded Performance
The "German Requiem" for Choral Concert

March 25, 1930

THIS generation of the concert-hall knows Brahms best, honors him most, as composer of symphonic music. A glance around Symphony Hall last evening affirmed as much. For the "German Requiem" not every seat was taken; whereas for the Concerto and the Symphony of Sunday afternoon hardly a place stood empty. Next, for most of us, stands Brahms the composer of songs. Publicly, we hear him as such in too standard a repertory. Privately, we cultivate him according to our own choice. Third, place the composer of chamber-music. The pianists and the violinists have their favorite Sonatas; the foursomes (as Mr. Grainger likes to call them) their favorite Quartets; the virtuosi-musicians risk on their programs even the later Intermezzi, Caprices, Rhapsodies. We shall hear Mr. Schnabel play four of them this evening. Fourth and last, in the general ear, sounds Brahms the composer of choral music. The catalogues of his "collected works" list a page or two of such pieces; but, outside Germany and Austria, we are fortunate if we hear aught else than the "German Requiem" and the "Song of Destiny"—and them not too often. To these two at the current festival, by happy exception, the Rhapsody for Alto and Men's Chorus will be added.

Every one of the Symphonies bears marks of the labor that Brahms spent upon it. They were conceived and accomplished in mental and spiritual travail. The choral vein flows more freely, more amply. By instinct, predilection and habit, Brahms is composer of music for choirs variously constituted and variously accompanied. He read of a morning in Hölderlin's eighteenth-century poetry and that same afternoon began the making of the "Song of Destiny." Composers nowadays, unless like Stravinsky, they throw back to Handel, achieve their choral pieces by will and application, as part of their duty to the whole art of music. Only Holst comes readily to mind as possessed, like Brahms, of the choral instinct.

Mozart wrote a Requiem Mass because the dread of death and of the undiscovered country haunted him, and he would dispel it. Berlioz wrote another because he would transform the Roman office into a grandiose spectacle in tones. Verdi wrote a third that he might clothe that office in Italian fervors, infuse into it the tradition that he honored and would practise of Italian song descending out of liturgy and madrigal. Small blame to him if the theater in which he had worked a lifetime occasionally had the better of it. The venerable editor of the program-sheet noted last evening the "abundant proof" that Brahms intended the "German Requiem" as "a last great funeral rite for Schumann." In the text and the music themselves, the "proof" seems quite as "abundant" that Brahms looked in the Scriptures, looked in his heart, and wrote.

In spite of the learned discourse—page and chapter and book of it—about the Protestantism, the Germanism, the backgrounds and environment of the "German Requiem," the years resolve it more and more into the meditation of Johannes Brahms, a devout mind and a believing spirit, upon the life of this world and of the world to come, of the death and resurrection and judgment that may be bridge between. Brahms put together his text out of a Bible that he read and knew in the faith of a truly religious and Christian man. Run through it hastily and it seems a congeries of detached verses awkwardly thrown together. Conned more closely, it becomes a carefully matched mosaic not only to serve a musical design but to bear witness to an inner continuity, contrast, significance. "Blessed are they that mourn; for they shall be comforted." . . . "All flesh is as the grass; but the redeemed of the Lord shall come rejoicing into Zion." . . . "Lord, make me know the measure of my days; but the righteous souls are in the hand of God." . . . "Here on earth have we no continuing place; but blessed are the dead which die in the Lord." . . . They rest from their labors." Pervasive these contrasts, yet with two Intermezzi and one masterful transition. The first Intermezzo sings "the courts of the Lord"; the second expatiates on sorrow and solace. The transition traverses death and resurrection. Brahms's poetry dwells usually in his tones. In itself the verse of his songs seldom engages the mind or quickens the heart. Yet into this text for the "German Requiem," he has infused a veritable poetry of scheme and word.

And what a text for such a music as Brahms would make! Earthly sorrow and woe and lamentation, the brevity and the emptiness of human living, touched his imagination—and he wrote the anguished pages, yet not without a recurring undernote of compassion. He saw in vision the tribulation and the struggle of men and the sight evoked the tortured music that falls to the baritone with chorus. This human fate was inexorable—in the Christian Brahms, composing, there lurked often the fatalist—and he wrote the rigid march of the second chorus to be as the endless stream of human suffering. He meditated upon death and resurrection, upon the trumpets of the Judgment Day—and rose to the close-packed, darksome imagery of the sixth division. The light came upon him and he saw the "courts of the Lord" in a music in which the evening stars sing as well as the human voices. Deep pity possessed him and he added the measures in which the soprano voice forgets grief in consolation. He heard the great hosts of "the redeemed of the Lord" and he wrote the upswelling choral fugues, one above a vast pedal-point, that end three movements. Before his eyes swam the majesty and the mercy of God, the celestial peace and healing. Toward them mounts the final chorus.

Under such inspiration—for it is nothing less—Brahms's invention runs ready and full; the musical thought glows into musical emotion; the achieving hand seldom flags. The books say that Brahms worked at the score through five years. Yet of his larger works none sounds more spontaneous; none seems more nearly accomplished in a long, white heat of creation. His melodies unfold in breadth, warmth and vitalized motion. Each goes characterized. At one end of the range set the tortured song of the baritone; at the other the suffused compassion of the soprano's measures. Or array the black tense-rhythmed march of the human souls against the luminous harmonies that clothe the house of the Lord. In surge and power the fugues descend from Bach and Handel.

When he will, Brahms can infuse into his measures either the exaltation which is never mere eloquence or the tenderness which is seldom mere sentiment. And these are his own attributes. The heavens open and he declares the mercy of God. The earth is outspread and he comforts the sorrows of men. The glow within him burns away any thickness, any awkwardness in the orchestral voices. For once they do his imaginative bidding. The designing, the up-rearing of the choruses seem less a studious technical mastery than an ardor of accomplishment. The symphonies and the concertos are the symphonies and the concertos; but here in the Requiem is the masterpiece in which Brahms sloughed his inhibitions away. As long as nineteenth-century music sounds in the ears of men, it will hold them fast.

The performance last evening came nearer to the full accomplishment of the music and text than any within Bostonian memory. It fell short conspicuously only in Miss Vreeland's singing of the soprano part which was both superficial and marred by technical shortcoming; whereas the large, bold, graphic style, the rough-textured tones of Mr. Gange were the very medium for the baritone measures. The clear timbre of the Radcliffe women-chorus released Brahms's notes from the bondage of the printed page. The clean thrust of its singing gave them life. There were tenor tones to be heard from the Harvard choir; no sluggishness in the deeper voices stayed the rhythmic movement. Once the first chorus had steadied the full choir, the unity of attack and release, of phrasing and accent were but the outer expression of an inner unity of understanding and of feeling. In the antiphonal passages choir matched choir; while the larger sonorities suffered hardly at all from voices all youthful.

The end indeed crowned the work of Dr. Davison and Mr. Woodworth. The youth of Harvard and Radcliffe have at least learned to do one thing well for the sake of the doing, which is rather what makes life worth while. For their elders, the orchestra was alive to Brahms's changeful rhythms; measured its tone to his subdued colorings; darkened in or opened out his instrumental patterns. An elder generation recalls Nikisch as the conductor who first upon their ears released and vitalized Brahms's symphonies. We, their children, will say as much and think as high of Dr. Koussevitzky with the "German Requiem."

H. T. P.

Schnabel's Brahms In New York Ears

Praise and Also Question for His Playing Through

Ap 19, 1930
ELSEWHERE these columns report toward the Boston Orchestra and Dr. Koussevitzky at their final concert for the season, in New York. At both, Mr. Schnabel was the "assisting artist," playing the piano-part in each of Brahms's Concertos. Newcomer in the present note and powers, making inevitably large and deep impression, he shared with the conductor the laurels of the evening and the matinée. He encountered as well questioning and dissenting voices. He himself and his playing of Brahms are so fresh in Bostonian memory that both praise and blame deserve quotation.

Light and Leading

Mr. Schnabel's performance of the Concerto in B-flat was memorable. It would be difficult to conceive of an exposition in which soloist and conductor were more closely united in delivering to an audience not only the large moods but all the details of the composition and the deeply significant relation of the solo instrument to the whole and the orchestra as an equal partner in the drama.

Mr. Schnabel eschews sentimentality in all its forms, and this perhaps chills his tone, which is admirable for crystalline quality rather than for liquidity. On the other hand his delicate sense of the curve of every phrase and his fine perception of its place in the general scheme impel him to the use of nuances of ravishing gradation. Some of his crescendi and diminuendi were so unerringly placed and so matchlessly executed as to lift the pages in which they occurred into an unusually beautiful and radiant glow of life. Particularly in the last movement did the pianist not only interpret Brahms but play the piano as only a master can.

The concerto was revealed in all its splendor, which is not the splendor of pageantry but of the last and most precious moments of the sunset. Here is beautiful music filled with nobility of thought and royalty of style. The applause was very warm and the pianist was recalled several times. The whole orchestra should have been recalled also. [The Sun]

Mr. Schnabel . . . has pre-eminent-ly that "high seriousness" which issues from absolute sincerity. The crowd, as a thing to be tickled or enticed or over-awed, apparently does not exist for him. He is concerned only with the music before him; all else is irrelevant. Against this background of belief and practice he shows us the application of ideas to poetry—of the shaping, governing, proportioning will exerting itself upon the emotional stuff of beauty. Always they constitute an exhibition of reason confederate with loveliness, of logic warmed with sensibility.

The Concerto in B-flat gave Mr. Schnabel occasion and to spare for the influential exhibition of these traits. This abidingly wonderful music he helped us to understand in all its moods, from the vernal horn-call of the opening, with its keyboard echo that is the very voice of prodigality and fervor, as of some magnetic southern Noontide made articulate, to the exquisite musing of the piano at the close of the magical Andante, where the music seems to drift upward into a hovering silence, reminding us of that woman of whom Conrad wrote, "in whose precise saying there were enigmatical prolongations that vanished somewhere beyond the reach." [The Tribune]

Doubt and Dissent

It was not a performance, however, to alter materially critical valuations made when Mr. Schnabel was last here. With power, clarity and a prehensile mastery of structure went more than a little harshness, chill and practicality. Though deep and intense absorption were not to be denied this playing, its effect only occasionally possessed atmosphere or romance, as in the closing measures of the slow movement. More often its earnestness seemed pedagogical, its emphasis heavily cerebral. Sturdy technical achievements were brought about in a manner that often implied subjugation of the music by main force rather than an unfoldment from within by means of the interpreter's imposing technique.

The concert otherwise was one which tended to the harshness of forced sonorities. In both the [Academic] Overture and the [Fourth] Symphony, there was which seemed to be a relentless questing after the sort of vitality which results from playing at once bright and edged, taut and loud. It was playing that smote the ear aggressively throughout—"energico e passionato," according to the letter of the passacaglia finale of the Fourth Symphony.

The impression left on this reviewer was one of the most efficient performances of the concerto he had ever heard. This was, indeed, efficiency raised to art. Mr. Schnabel played every note of the music with unheard-of precision.

Equally precise was the pianist's rhythm and his presentation of the themes and their developments. Employing a rather unyielding tone, Mr. Schnabel laid bare the concerto as uncompromisingly as a surgeon engaged in an important operation. When he relented at times for the expression of the lyrical element he gave one the feeling that he was inwardly chafing at the necessity, so grudging was he of the softer qualities of the work—the poetic flights, the tender interludes. It was a remorseless performance, one which placed the concerto in an entirely new light. [The World]

The Ayes Again

In the Concerto in D minor, Mr. Schnabel, of course, made light of the stupendous technical difficulties. For once the truly orchestral piano-part did not sound

puny when contrasted with the tutti. The chain octave trills in the first movement were delivered with Herculean energy. His reading altogether was cast in an Olympian mold. The aristocratic phrasing, the absolute faithfulness to the spirit of the composer, the undeviating fidelity of good taste, revealed once more the great stature of the Austrian pianist. There are those who find his playing cool and intellectual, without the glow of imagination. Perhaps the explanation is to be found in the integral masculinity of Mr. Schnabel's style. His art has none of those androgynous elements often to be found in interpretive as well as creative talents. [The Tribune]

Mr. Schnabel again showed [on Saturday] that he could play beautifully when he chose, as in the slow movement of the D-Minor Concerto. It is worth while to remember this, and also to place by it in the memory the gigantic proclamation over roaring drums and in response to different instruments of the orchestra, of the theme that flashes like lightning through the instruments. When that passage came—at the beginning with the orchestra, and at the outset of the recapitulation, with all the power and grandeur of which piano and orchestra were capable—it conferred something to remember. But the fire and nobility of Mr. Schnabel's interpretation and his complete contempt for any device merely calculated to please an audience or provoke applause could hardly be gainsaid. His performances will remain one of the notable climaxes of the season that is drawing to an end. [The Times]

Boston's Week of Brahms

March 29, 1930

Monitor

By L. A. SLOPER

JOHANNES BRAHMS wrote no music for the theater. Perhaps the fact requires no elaborate explanation. It is difficult to imagine the irreproachable Brahms enriching the lyric stage with the charm of a Mozart, the fervor of a Wagner or the dramatic genius of a Verdi. Mr. Fuller Maitland surmises that Brahms realized at once the sterility of conservative stage music and his own incapacity to write in the style of Wagner. But need we be sad because Brahms paused before the frivolous portals of the theater? There is ample dramatic content in the music he did write. All he needs is a Koussevitzky, a Schnabel or a Matzenauer for interpreter. All these, and more, he had for the six-day festival of his music given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Of course Dr. Koussevitzky, who never can be persuaded that things are well enough as they are, was primarily responsible. Having already directed celebrations for the centenaries of Beethoven and Schubert, he cast about for another composer to honor. There was no centenary of a master in 1930, but that did not deter the conductor. He admires Brahms, and excels as an interpreter of his music, just as Nikisch—as we are told—did. Sufficient reasons for a Brahms Festival. Thus large numbers of Bostonians have listened to a series which included the four symphonies, the two piano concertos, the "German Requiem," the "Song of Destiny," some of the Liebeslieder Waltzes, the "Academic Festival" Overture, the Piano Quintet, some songs and the piano pieces of op. 119.

Extraordinary Enthusiasm

As John N. Burk reminded us, in an admirably balanced pamphlet issued by the orchestra in preparation for the festival, Boston has been as slow as other capitals of music to embrace Brahms. His conclusion that "the composer's genius, lifted free and clear of routine, was never so keenly and generally alive in this town" as at present, was justified by the response to these concerts. As one young person from the middle West remarked: "And they call Boston a cold town!" The enthusiasm at all the concerts was quite extraordinary, and on the final evening (March 26) there was an ovation for Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra which has hardly been duplicated during the six years of his Boston seneschalship, unless at the close of the Beethoven Festival. No one, surely, will begrudge the tribute to leader or men. The conductor, who never does anything halfheartedly, labored devotedly in preparation and performance, and the orchestra's work was quite up to its standard.

It was not to be expected that all the results would be equal in value. You can hardly give a Brahms Festival without including some of the chamber pieces. But Symphony Hall holds more than 2500 persons; scarcely the place for intimate music. No one should have been surprised, then, that the Piano Quintet, with Arthur Schnabel and the Burgin String Quartet, was not the most successful item in the cycle. Heard in a small hall, this music has the power to stir admiration and emotion; in these vast reaches, the piano overwhelmed the strings and the finest effects were lost.

On the program with the quintet, however, the three Intermezzi and the Rhapsody of op. 119 came to entrancing utterance at the hands of Mr. Schnabel; who then, with a fine gesture of unselfed artistic devotion, became the unobtrusive accompanist for Margaret Matzenauer in four songs. His superb fellow-artist was heard to better advantage in "Von Ewig Liebe" and "Meine Liebe ist Grüne" than in the "Sapphische Ode" or the "Immer Leiser." Opening this program there was a charming performance of some of the Liebeslieder Waltzes by a small chorus from the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, with their respective conductors. Dr. Archibald T. Davison and G. Wallace Woodworth, at the piano.

The Collegiate Chorus

These young collegians, by the way, although their personnel changes annually, remain one of the most satisfying choral bodies of our experience. Trained to uncompromising ideals, they place their fresh voices and their inspiring fervor at the service of art. And when their part in the program is finished, they add immeasurably to the volume of applause for the more famous artists, constituting themselves, without in the least being aware of it, a volunteer clique in thrall to music.

Mme. Matzenauer joined a group of the singers in a moving interpretation of the "Harzreise" Rhapsody. In the Requiem the choruses were augmented by Jeanette Vreeland, soprano, and Fraser Gange, baritone. They had the choral field to themselves in the "Song of Destiny."

Another acclaimed hero of the series was of course Mr. Schnabel, whose playing of the concertos for piano not only was authoritative but brought these works to pulsing life. Where, by the way, originated the tradition that the first of these concertos is finer than the second. Hearing them in close proximity, from the hands of an exponent whose readings can hardly be challenged, we feel the superiority of the B flat major, pianistically and musically, to be evident.

The Symphonies

Finally the symphonies, played in this order: Nos. 3, 2, 4 and 1. Under this test the F major seemed clearly entitled to less and the D major to more consideration than is usually accorded. We shall not presume to sit as judge upon the merits of the other two. Nor shall we seize upon the occasion to pronounce a conclusive estimate of the music of Johannes Brahms, nor to forecast the effect of the six-day examination upon his reputation. Attention no doubt has been drawn by it to his learning. His romantic characteristics have been set forth in the most persuasive manner. In retrospect of the six days he seems more a romanticist than a classicist, closer to Beethoven and to Schumann than to Bach or Mozart. Further, from this fresh review, we are impressed less by his material than by his handling of it, and we find even in the handling more cerebration than inspiration. It seems to us, too, that there is wisdom in those who say that the Brahms of the songs, the piano pieces and the chamber ensembles is greater than he of the symphonies and of the bigger choral compositions. After so protracted a bout, we see Brahms as a big fellow who, not realizing his own strength, should not be allowed too heavy implements to play with.

Is it possible that Brahms, like Wagner, is doomed, after a struggle of long years for recognition, to fall back at last to a plane below that of the greatest masters? At all events, we render thanks to Dr. Koussevitzky and his associates for the opportunity to survey his work.

From Boston

To New York

Exceptionally

Ap 14, 1930
Dr. Koussevitzky Continues

The Brahms Festival

To Loud Plaudits

AT the final concerts in New York—for the season the Boston Orchestra and Dr. Koussevitzky were applauded by the audiences and praised by the reviewers beyond current custom or recent precedent. The concerts befell in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon last; were indeed a renewal, or a continuance, of the Brahms Festival lately ended in Boston. On Thursday the program essembled his "Academic Overture," his Piano-Concerto in B-flat, his Symphony in E Minor. On Saturday it again contained the "Academic Overture"; added to it the Concerto in B minor and the Symphony in C minor. On both occasions Mr. Schnabel was the pianist. Another column records the praise, and also the dispraise, that his playing provoked. For the moment orchestra and conductor are the matter in hand. Writing in The Tribune, Mr. Gilman gave them adept and amusing introduction.

"It may be recalled by those who have been privileged to witness or to read Mr. Connelly's inimitable 'Green Pastures' that the Lawd, complaining of an insufficiency of firmament in the seasoning of his custard, is informed that Paradise is at the moment all out of firmament. 'Dey ain't,' reports the custard-maker, 'a drap in de jug.' Whereupon the Lawd determines to make good the deficiency by a miracle. 'Let it be some firmament!' he commands. 'An' when I say let it be some firmament, I don't want jest a little bitty dab o' firmament . . . Let it be a whole mess o' firmament!'

"Mr. Koussevitzky, Lawd of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, appears to have concluded that both musical Boston and musical New York lacked an ingredient essential to their symphonic diet, and he decreed a while ago, 'Let it be some Brahms!' Apparently he added the warning, 'Not jest a little bitty dab o' Brahms. Let it be a whole mess o' Brahms!' . . . And Brahms there was forthwith—a whole mess o' Brahms, a firmament of Brahms, in fact, filled with choiring stars and glorious with symphonic suns.

"Apparently Mr. Koussevitzky, like Mr. Connelly's Lawd, is a benevolently despotic individualist, satisfying his own taste when he feels impelled to do so. There was, admittedly, firmament in the Lawd's custard. And, indisputably, there was Brahms in our musical cus-

298
lard. Was there enough? Ah, that was for the imperious Mr. Koussevitzky to say. But apart from the suiting of his taste, there was really no particular occasion for a Brahms Festival, either in Boston or in New York. There is at the moment no Brahmsian anniversary to celebrate (though there will be one in 1933, when Mr. Koussevitzky may regret that he came in a few bars too soon). And certainly our condition differs from that of the heavenly larder; for there is plenty of Brahms in the jugs of our conductors, and they add it freely to our musical food.

Consequently

"But no matter: Mr. Koussevitzky wanted more Brahms, and he provided it. For the Bostonians, he contrived six all-Brahms concerts, exhibiting samples of the Olympian Johannes as composer of orchestral, choral and chamber works, with the aid of the Harvard and Radcliffe choruses and such luscious soloists as Mme. Matzenauer and the fabulously fashionable Mr. Artur Schnabel the imported pianist who has made inflectualism in music almost as popular (for the moment) as ankle-length skirts.

"In New York we are not being quite so lavishly provided by Mr. Koussevitzky with Brahmsian firmament. Yet the Lawd of the Bostonian heaven is doing very well by us. [Last] Thursday evening in Carnegie Hall he set before his people if not a whole mess of Brahms, certainly much more than a little bitty dab. He gave us one of the greatest of the symphonies, an overture, and the most persuasive, if not the weightiest of the piano-concertos, with Mr. Schnabel as the pianistic Gabriel, sounding his clarion through Johannes's keyboard evocation of a vernal earth.

"That everyone was happy there can be little doubt. Brahms is proper Festival material, with or without an anniversary pretext. He has the fullness and variety of content, the volume, the power, the greatness of style, the imaginative reach and depth, to justify and reward an unqualified disclosure of his works. A first-rate genius, a Maker (as the mystically daring Emerson might have called him), he is fecund and inexhaustible. Thursday we had him in two of his major phases: the Brahms who in the Concerto in B-flat is chiefly the poet of southern amplitudes and fervors, radiant, expansive, sensitive and magical, and the austerer Brahms of the Symphony in E minor, the Northern Brahms, bardic, magisterial, and prevaillingly dark hued."

Having passed the Concerto in review, Mr. Gilman ventured this final reflection:

"After this, the Fourth Symphony, for all its blend of Gothic magnificence, and bardic speech, was an experience necessarily less revealing. The evening was Mr. Schnabel's, and the Brahms that he conveyed to us. For this our thanks, however, are really due to Mr. Koussevitzky. It was he, let it not be forgotten, who ordained this beneficent enrichment of our Brahmsian skies. If there were any who murmured, like the Paradisaical witnesses in 'The Green Pastures,' 'Now, look, Lawd, dat's too much firmament, their voices were not audible.'"

The Conductor's Share

The Times was like-minded as to Concerto and Symphony, saying: "It was not only a pianist and interpreter of symphonic intent who sat before us but a colorist who matched every tint of Brahms's orchestration with one of his own; or, better say, a musician who realized with unexampled felicity the harmoniousness of Brahms's palette, and made his instrument take its place, with infallible intuition for the right shading in the color scheme. In view of the result it is easy to believe that Mr. Schnabel and Mr. Koussevitzky had labored with special care and mutual zeal to achieve the best possible coherence and balance of all the elements of a work which is less a piano-concerto in the accepted sense of the term than it is one of Brahms's greatest symphonies. Mr. Koussevitzky's exposition of the score and the manner in which he supplemented, as it were, every thought and wish of the soloist was a lesson, from a master of interpretation."

And again: "The orchestral pieces were taken from the best Brahms—the 'Academic' Overture, which is youth itself and the wine of life, and the Fourth Symphony. Perhaps the reading of the Overture, played with balance and clarity by the magnificent orchestra, was a trifle deliberate and over-attentive to detail. Or, again, one might not agree with every tempo, nuance, crescendo and decrescendo of the symphony as the conductor contrived them; but on the whole these were great readings of works none the less great because they are familiar. Mr. Koussevitzky, who came here heralded as a virtuoso conductor not to be esteemed a reader of the classics, proved in this as in so many other concerts his innate understanding of the works of classic masters and his constantly ripening grip of his medium. [The Times

Climax

Once more, of the matinee on Saturday: "On Thursday Mr. Schnabel had a triumph with the Concerto in B-flat. This triumph was but the half of the ovation he received when he finished the Concerto in D minor Saturday afternoon, when he was cheered and applauded and called back to the stage many times. At the end of the concert Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra received an even more tumultuous demonstration. All this was testimony to the powers of a magnificent orchestra, conductor, and pianist, but above all it was testimony to the amazing and the increasing appeal to the public imagination of Brahms."

"The performance of the First Symphony was admirably proportioned and had the fine sustained line that the performance of the much more unpretentious 'Academic' Overture had not. Reservations concerning the Overture were recorded here after the first performance.

299
These reservations gained strength under repetition. There was the tendency which is possibly a recurrent weakness of Mr. Koussevitzky to over-refine the music, dress up a simple and vigorous-spirited piece with a series of nuances which make it episodic and deprive it of a measure of its movement, spontaneity and vigor. Owing to the same cause, the peroration of the Overture, when it came, was not sufficiently imposing. The symphony, however, was played with a fine continuity and cumulative power. . . . Familiar as the music is, it is not easy, even for the oldest hands, to present it so powerfully and coherently. The testimony of the audience showed how deeply this performance was felt and appreciated. These two concerts have been for Mr. Koussevitzky and his men a special triumph."

Schnabelana

Op 8, 1930
Sayings from An Interview in the Newest Mails from London

I ASKED him what he thought of those artists who "play down" to an audience. "They never do," he replied. "They like the music they play, although they may wish they didn't. When they play better things it is because they ascend for the time being. I judge a man's musical taste by his habitual level, not by his occasional heights."

THE career of the popular virtuoso, who obtains that popularity largely by lowering his musical standards, arouses no envy in Schnabel. "They live poor and die rich," he remarked. And of a certain well-known performer he said: "He would genuinely like to be a great artist, but his moral character won't afford it."

I AGREE that we have no Beethoven, said Schnabel. "But don't forget that the mediocrities of Beethoven's day are dead and forgotten, whereas ours are alive and insistent. The general level in Beethoven's time may have been no higher than in our own, but we see his time in a perspective where only the peaks remain. There are serious artists living even today." [The Observer

302

YOUNG PEOPLE'S CONCERTS

THE AFTERNOONS OF

Tuesday, January 28, and Wednesday, January 29, 1930

at 4 o'clock

BY THE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Dr. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor

W. H. BRENNAN, Manager

G. E. JUDD, Asst. Manager

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and Richard Burgin will conduct.
There will be brief explanatory remarks with stereoptican slides, by Alfred H. Meyer

PROGRAMME FOR BOTH CONCERTS

Rameau Ballet Suite from "Acante et Cephisse" (Edited by H. Kretzschmar)
I. Musette. II. Rigaudon and Minuet. III. Gavotte.
Tournier "Fairie," for Harp and Orchestra
Harp Solo—BERNARD ZIGHERA
Prokofieff March from the "Love of Three Oranges" Saint-Saëns "The Animals' Carnival"
a. Cocks and Hens.
b. The Elephant. (Solo double-bass—M. Kunze.)
c. Aquarium.
d. Personages with long ears.
e. The Cuckoo in the depth of the forest.
f. Aviary. (Solo Flute) G. Laurent.
g. The Swan. (Solo Violoncello) Jean Bedetti.

Pianos, Jesús María Sanromá, Arthur Fiedler.

Wagner The Ride of the Valkyries.

Three hundred desirable floor seats have been reserved, to be sold directly to individuals for their children. These special reserved tickets are available to Symphony Subscribers at the Symphony Hall box office at $1.00 each.

No adult will be admitted unless accompanied by one or more children. The balance of the seats will, as before, be offered the schools of Greater Boston at 35 cents each.

Ernest Schelling, called "The Pied Piper of Music," photographed in the Audiographic room of the Aeolian exhibit at the United Parents' Exposition held in New York city. Mr. Schelling's charming manner with children is plainly shown in this picture; his talks about music are as fascinating to the boys and girls as fairy stories of tales of adventure.

PEOPLE'S RTS

3 OF

nesday, January 29,

ORCHESTRA

, Conductor

i. E. JUDD, Asst. Manager

urgin will conduct.

atican slides, by Alfred H. Meyer

4 CONCERTS

suite from "Acante et Cephisse"

iet. III. Gavotte.

"Fairie," for Harp and Orchestra

HERA

n the "Love of Three Oranges"

"The Animals' Carnival"

ss—M. Kunze.)

forest.

ent.

an Bedetti.

hur Fiedler.

The Ride of the Valkyries.

reserved, to be sold directly to ved tickets are available to ffice at $1.00 each.

or more children. The balance eater Boston at 35 cents each.

CHILDREN'S CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a concert for young people yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. Dr. Koussevitzky and Richard Burgin conducted. Alfred H. Meyer's comments on the program were read by Carlos E. Pinfield. Stereopticon slides were shown. The program was as follows: Rameau-Kretzschmar, ballet suite from "Acante et Cephisse." Tournier, "Fairje," for harp (Bernard Zighera), and orchestra. Prokofieff, march from "The Love for Three Oranges." Saint-Saens, "The Animals' Carnival—Cocks and Hens, The Elephant (M. Kunze, double bass), Aquarium, Personages with Long Ears, The Cuckoo in the Depth of the Forest, Aviary (E. Laurent, flute), The Swan (J. Bedetti, violoncello); Messrs. Sanroma and Fiedler, pianists. Ravel, Bolero.

The question arises whenever a concert is given for children, what compositions are the better suited to their musical instincts (if they have any)—music that has pronounced and stirring rhythm, music of action, or music of obvious melody. In these concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra there is no deliberate plan of instruction. Mr. Meyer's interesting comments are upon the pieces then and there performed. There are no long explanations of the various instruments and various forms, as in Mr. Schilling's concerts, with music to illustrate now the strings, now the wood-wind instruments and so on. The "education" is to be derived from the music heard. It has been shown in previous concerts in Symphony hall that the young people show little interest in slow movements of the composers called "classic." A lively piece, provided it is obviously melodious, pleases the young. It is safe to say that they would enjoy Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps," or Carpenter's "Skyscrapers" more than a slow movement by Mozart or Beethoven. Nor is this to be greatly deplored. The realization of Mozart's greatness will come later in the children's musical life.

Early in this month a concert for children was given in London, and what was the program? Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro"; Elgar's transcription of Bach's C minor fantasia and fugue; Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony and the overture to "Tannhauser." Even the English children take their pleasures sadly. The program presented yesterday was much more to the point; a program that should please children from 10 to 80 years of age. Take this ballet music of Rameau's, for example. The fact that Rameau in this "heroic pastoral" was the first to introduce clarinets in the Paris Opera House would not interest children, nor would they be thrilled if they were told that as the first performance was in celebration of the birth of the Duke of Burgundy, Rameau endeavored in the overture to express the popular joy "as far as it is possible in music." Surely the music itself would be enough. Nor are children, unlike some of their elders, frightened by the name Prokofieff, nor do they argue that his music must be of a barbaric nature. And what music is more appropriate for a concert of this nature than Saint-Saens's Animals and Ravel's Bolero.

The hall was filled from top to bottom. The children were much more appreciative, more enthusiastic than on certain preceding occasions. Some of the slides amused them greatly. What would the comedians and ballet dancers of Rameau's time have said had they known that their costumes and poses would have excited laughter when shown to children of Boston in the 20th century? Yesterday the audience enjoyed the heavy tread of the elephantine double-bass, the virtuosity of Mr. Laurent, and the song of the swan so beautifully sung by Mr. Bedetti's violoncello. Unsophisticated, they applauded Rameau, Prokofieff, Tournier and Ravel with delightful impartiality.

The order of the program was changed from that given above. Mr. Burgin conducted the ballet suite and Saint-Saens's zoological music. He was succeeded by Dr. Koussevitzky, who conducted the remaining numbers with the care and interest that he would display at one of the Friday afternoon or Saturday evening concerts.

The final pair of young people's concerts this season will be given on April 23 and 24. The concert of yesterday will be repeated this afternoon.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S CONCERTS

Wednesday, April 23, and Thursday, April 24, at 4

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Dr. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and Richard Burgin will conduct.

There will be brief explanatory remarks with stereopticon slides, by Alfred H. Meyer

PROGRAMME FOR BOTH CONCERTS

Beethoven	First Movement from the Fifth Symphony, in C minor
Haydn	Finale from the Symphony in D major (B. & H. No. 31)
Ravel	"Beauty and the Beast," from the "Mother Goose" Suite
Strauss	"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," after the Old-fashioned, Roguish Manner, in Rondo Form
Wagner	The Ride of the Valkyries

Three hundred desirable floor seats have been reserved, to be sold directly to individuals for their children. These special reserved tickets are available to Symphony Subscribers at the Symphony Hall box office at $1.00 each.

YOUNG FOLKS' CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a concert for young people yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. Dr. Koussevitzky and Richard Burgin were the conductors. The program was as follows: Beethoven, First Movement of the Fifth Symphony. Haydn, Finale of Symphony in D major (with the Horn Call); Ravel, "Beauty and Beast" from "Mother Goose." Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel." Wagner, "Ride of the Valkyries." Alfred H. Meyer made explanatory remarks, giving the necessary information about the pieces in a clear and interesting manner. His telling the story of "Beauty and the Beast" with the accompanying amusing pictures on the screen aided greatly in the children's enjoyment of Ravel's charming music. There were pictures for the other compositions. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted the music by Strauss and Wagner; Mr. Burgin the other numbers.

As the children were entering Symphony hall, other children were skipping the rope near the door. One might have asked whether those entering envied those in joyful exercise; or whether the rope-skippers wished that they, too, could enter. Children do not invariably appreciate what are loosely described as educational advantages. Too much stress, by the way, is put on music as an educational force. Possibly some of the contemporaneous compositions being purely cerebral, or reminding one of the Pythagorean theory of music, might be called educational—at least its admirers hope that the general public will be educated up to this advanced art, but the music played yesterday appealed to the emotions and the fancy. And so the children, not unduly impressed by the name of Beethoven, did not sit reverentially as in a concert of prayer, but honestly enjoyed what they heard with their ears. They also enjoyed the skill of the soloists in Haydn's Variations and Mr. Piller's double bassoon voicing the amorous pleading of the Beast. They would have gladly joined with Till in his merry pranks; they mourned his fate when he was brought to judgment by stern men without a sense of humor; and at the end the children rode gaily with the Valkyries. Truly a real entertainment. The concert will be repeated this afternoon.

CHILDREN'S CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a concert for young people yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. Dr. Koussevitzky and Richard Burgin conducted. Alfred H. Meyer's comments on the program were read by Carlos E. Pinfield. Stereopticon slides were shown. The program was as follows: Rameau-Kretzschmar, ballet suite from "Acante et Cephisse." Tournier, "Fairje," for harp (Bernard Zighera), and orchestra. Prokofieff, march from "The Love for Three Oranges." Saint-Saens, "The Animals' Carnival—Cocks and Hens, The Elephant (M. Kunze, double bass), Aquarium, Personages with Long Ears, The Cuckoo in the Depth of the Forest, Aviary (E. Laurent, flute), The Swan (J. Bedetti, violoncello); Messrs. Sanroma and Fiedler, pianists. Ravel, Bolero.

The question arises whenever a concert is given for children, what compositions are the better suited to their musical instincts (if they have any)—music that has pronounced and stirring rhythm, music of action, or music of obvious melody. In these concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra there is no deliberate plan of instruction. Mr. Meyer's interesting comments are upon the pieces then and there performed. There are no long explanations of the various instruments and various forms, as in Mr. Schilling's concerts, with music to illustrate now the strings, now the wood-wind instruments and so on. The "education" is to be derived from the music heard. It has been shown in previous concerts in Symphony hall that the young people show little interest in slow movements of the composers called "classic." A lively piece, provided it is obviously melodious, pleases the young. It is safe to say that they would enjoy Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps," or Carpenter's "Skyscrapers" more than a slow movement by Mozart or Beethoven. Nor is this to be greatly deplored. The realization of Mozart's greatness will come later in the children's musical life.

Early in this month a concert for children was given in London, and what was the program? Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro"; Elgar's transcription of Bach's C minor fantasia and fugue; Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony and the overture to "Tannhauser." Even the English children take their pleasures sadly. The program presented yesterday was much more to the point; a program that should please children from 10 to 80 years of age. Take this ballet music of Rameau's, for example. The fact that Rameau in this "heroic pastoral" was the first to introduce clarinets in the Paris Opera House would not interest children, nor would they be thrilled if they were told that as the first performance was in celebration of the birth of the Duke of Burgundy, Rameau endeavored in the overture to express the popular joy "as far as it is possible in music." Surely the music itself would be enough. Nor are children, unlike some of their elders, frightened by the name Prokofieff, nor do they argue that his music must be of a barbaric nature. And what music is more appropriate for a concert of this nature than Saint-Saens's Animals and Ravel's Bolero.

The hall was filled from top to bottom. The children were much more appreciative, more enthusiastic than on certain preceding occasions. Some of the slides amused them greatly. What would the comedians and ballet dancers of Rameau's time have said had they known that their costumes and poses would have excited laughter when shown to children of Boston in the 20th century? Yesterday the audience enjoyed the heavy tread of the elephantine double-bass, the virtuosity of Mr. Laurent, and the song of the swan so beautifully sung by Mr. Bedetti's violoncello. Unsophisticated, they applauded Rameau, Prokofieff, Tournier and Ravel with delightful impartiality. The order of the program was changed from that given above. Mr. Burgin conducted the ballet suite and Saint-Saens's zoological music. He was succeeded by Dr. Koussevitzky, who conducted the remaining numbers with the care and interest that he would display at one of the Friday afternoon or Saturday evening concerts.

The final pair of young people's concerts this season will be given on April 23 and 24. The concert of yesterday will be repeated this afternoon.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S CONCERTS

Wednesday, April 23, and Thursday, April 24, at 4

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Dr. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and Richard Burgin will conduct.

There will be brief explanatory remarks with stereopticon slides, by Alfred H. Meyer

PROGRAMME FOR BOTH CONCERTS

Beethoven	First Movement from the Fifth Symphony, in C minor
Haydn	Finale from the Symphony in D major (B. & H. No. 31)
Ravel	"Beauty and the Beast," from the "Mother Goose" Suite
Strauss	"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," after the Old-fashioned, Roguish Manner, in Rondo Form
Wagner	The Ride of the Valkyries

Three hundred desirable floor seats have been reserved, to be sold directly to individuals for their children. These special reserved tickets are available to Symphony Subscribers at the Symphony Hall box office at $1.00 each.

YOUNG FOLKS' CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a concert for young people yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. Dr. Koussevitzky and Richard Burgin were the conductors. The program was as follows: Beethoven, First Movement of the Fifth Symphony. Haydn, Finale of Symphony in D major (with the Horn Call); Ravel, "Beauty and Beast" from "Mother Goose." Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel." Wagner, "Ride of the Valkyries." Alfred H. Meyer made explanatory remarks, giving the necessary information about the pieces in a clear and interesting manner. His telling the story of "Beauty and the Beast" with the accompanying amusing pictures on the screen aided greatly in the children's enjoyment of Ravel's charming music. There were pictures for the other compositions. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted the music by Strauss and Wagner; Mr. Burgin the other numbers.

As the children were entering Symphony hall, other children were skipping the rope near the door. One might have asked whether those entering envied those in joyful exercise; or whether the rope-skippers wished that they, too, could enter. Children do not invariably appreciate what are loosely described as educational advantages. Too much stress, by the way, is put on music as an educational force. Possibly some of the contemporaneous compositions being purely cerebral, or reminding one of the Pythagorean theory of music, might be called educational—at least its admirers hope that the general public will be educated up to this advanced art, but the music played yesterday appealed to the emotions and the fancy. And so the children, not unduly impressed by the name of Beethoven, did not sit reverentially as in a concert of prayer, but honestly enjoyed what they heard with their ears. They also enjoyed the skill of the soloists in Haydn's Variations and Mr. Piller's double bassoon voicing the amorous pleading of the Beast. They would have gladly joined with Till in his merry pranks; they mourned his fate when he was brought to judgment by stern men without a sense of humor; and at the end the children rode gaily with the Valkyries. Truly a real entertainment. The concert will be repeated this afternoon.

SCHELLING CONCERTS

No one understands the psychology of children better than Ernest Schelling, who will again conduct a series of four concerts in Jordan Hall next season.

"There is no use," says Mr. Schelling, "having a series of great symphonic concerts all over the country if we are to be forever fighting for audiences. The real lover of symphonic music in most cases will not be the person who has gained his first acquaintance with music in adult years. The time to begin is with children, and the interest must be aroused not by the mere dragging of children to concerts but by more active and more direct means. The greatest possible danger is that a child should be bored!"

"The desire for song, for melody, harmony and rhythm exists in most of us. It is only a matter of awakening good taste at as early an age as possible. You may be sure that children who are having their interest aroused by concerts especially prepared for them will develop such a genuine love for symphonic music that they will always be patrons of symphony concerts. Giving concerts for children is not at all like giving concerts for adults. In the first place, children must be kept at attention every minute, from the beginning to the end of the performance, which lasts about an hour and a quarter. There is no intermission and there are hardly any pauses. The affair must be what the children call 'snappy,' or they are likely to grow restless. You must never watch children play. You must get right down on the floor and play with them. It is for this reason that I talk to the children at my concerts, and ask them to answer, that we sing themes and that we look over the different instruments of the orchestra. "Of course I feel that the lantern slides I use play quite a role and I try to find as many beautiful and inspiring pictures as possible. For instance, in giving Scheherazade, I spent hours at the Metropolitan Museum and discovered many Persian miniatures which I had made into colored slides. Then for the MacDowell 'To a Water Lily' I found a beautiful Claude Monet. I also have an irresistible Monet of a little boy playing the fife.

"Children have an inborn love of the beautiful, an unconscious natural feeling for rhythm. And do not let us make the mistake of believing that they are not up to an appreciation of the finest in art and of what is real beauty. We cater entirely too much to the cheap side of children's natures. Let us give them a chance. Their instinct usually tells them the good from the bad, unless the bad is foisted upon them, or made especially attractive to them. Let a child's first impression in whatever domain it be, be one of beauty!"

"I feel that we cannot have too many children's concerts in this country. When I say children's concerts, I mean children's concerts given in many different ways, because where I make an appeal in certain directions, concerts given in another way may appeal to another group of children. To awaken in a child at an early age an interest in the best in music, to stimulate curiosity as to the way in which it is created and performed, these are to me the main objects in symphony concerts for children."

The renewal of subscription for next season's series of four Saturday morning Ernest Schelling concerts is well under way. The first concert will take place early in December. The remaining three, in January and February. No concerts will be given during the period of the Chicago Opera visit to Boston. Mr. Schelling will again be assisted by a large contingent of players from the Boston Symphony Orchestra and occasional soloists. He is already at work on a new collection of stereopticon slides. Applications for renewals, as well as inquiries from new subscribers, should be addressed to Aaron Richmond, 208 Pierce building.

May 11, 1930

Boston Symphony Programs

The program book of the final pair of Boston Symphony concerts each season contains elaborate lists and summaries of the works performed that year. Similar statistics are published in Chicago, Philadelphia, and New York for the great orchestras in those cities. Some comparisons and comment on these programs may tend to show whether the current remarks about the music Boston is permitted by Dr. Koussevitzky to hear have any justification. Do we hear too few classics? Is the American composer neglected? Do we hear too much modern music?

First, about the classics. A fair test of these is the performances of symphonies by Beethoven, Mozart, and Brahms. In Boston we had in the subscription series of 24 Fridays and 24 Saturdays the fourth, fifth, and sixth of the Beethoven symphonies, the first, second, and third of the Brahms symphonies, and from Mozart the E flat and an early symphony in C.

In Philadelphia, in 30 pairs of concerts, the audiences heard the third, fifth, seventh and eighth of the Beethoven symphonies; the first, second, and fourth by Brahms, and by Mozart only an early one in D major (K 385).

In Chicago, in 28 pairs of concerts, the audiences heard only two Beethoven symphonies; and of the Mozart symphonies only the E flat.

A comparison more extended in scope of the programs in these three cities would only confirm what this brief one shows, that Dr. Koussevitzky gave his audiences as much, if not more, music by the great classic composers than Mr. Stock in Chicago, or Mr. Stokowski and his colleagues in Philadelphia.

The New York concerts of the Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra are arranged in series much shorter than those in the other three cities, and do not lend themselves to exact comparison. In 10 different subscription series in New York and Brooklyn, including 99 concerts in all, Mr. Tescanini, Mr. Mengleberg, and guest conductors, gave 13 different works by Beethoven (not all symphonies) and nine works by Mozart, and six by Brahms.

American Compositions

Next, the case of the American composer. In Boston Dr. Koussevitzky included in the 24 pairs of concerts these American compositions, of which those marked * were first performances here. Sinfonietta in D major, G. W. Chadwick; "Java,"* and "Burma,"* Henry Elchheim; "Chants Negres,"* Blair Fairchild "Broadway,"* Samuel Gardner; "The Enchanted Isle," "Jazz Suite,"* Eugene Gruenberg; "Lilacs,"* E. B. Hill; "Jungle,"* Werner Josten; "Canticum Fratris Solis,"* C. M. Loeffler; Suite for Orchestras,* Walter Piston; or 11 works by nine different composers.

In Philadelphia Mr. Stokowski, Mr. Gabrilowitsch and guest conductors led the following American compositions, in the 30 pairs of subscription concerts. "Java,"* Henry Elchheim; "Masquerade,"* Carl McKinley; "Morocco,"* Ernest Schelling; "Jurgen,"* Deems Taylor; Concerto for quarter tone piano, Hans Barth; Concerto for piano, Abram Chasins, or six pieces by six composers.

In Chicago, Mr. Stock's 28 programs included these American works. Suite from "The Birthday of the Infanta,"* John Alden Carpenter; "Jazz Suite,"* Eugene Gruenberg; Overture, "In Bohemia,"* Henry Hadley; "A Pagan Poem" and "Canticum Fratris Solis,"* C. M. Loeffler; Concerto No. 2 for piano, Edward MacDowell; "Morocco,"* Ernest Schelling; Suite "From the Northland,"* Leo Sowerby; Concerto for violin, and "Psalmic Rhapsody" for chorus and orchestra, Frederick Stock; making 10 different works by eight composers.

In New York, Mr. Toscanini included no American works on his programs, nor has he put any on the programs for the European tour of the New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra, now in progress, an omission even more serious. Other conductors included works by two recently naturalized Americans, and that was all. Obviously, Dr. Koussevitzky is more generous than his rivals to American composers, if the past season's programs are to be the test.

Provincial New York

New York, which hears much less music by American composers at its orchestral concerts than is played in Boston, Chicago and Philadelphia, not to mention several lesser musical capitals, can hardly claim to be the chief musical center of the United States judged by what in other Nations has always been the chief test, the performance of new works by the composers of the Nation.

It is not, by the way, always clear just which composers are to be counted as Americans. In the tables above resident composers like Bloch and Goossens, who grew up and won reputations abroad before coming here, are omitted and only Americans by birth or by residence for most of their lives in the United States are counted as American.

Finally, about modern music by foreigners. In Boston we had in the regular series performances of works by living composers not Americans as follows. If the title is given for a work that indicates the first Boston performance. Symphony No. 2 Bax (played at two pairs of concerts, "Schelomo,"* Bloch; two works by de Falla; Second Symphony, Dukelsky; three works by Glazunov (all conducted by the composer); Concertino, Goossens; Concerto grosso, Lazar; "Assylian Bas Reliefs,"* Martelli; Prelude and Fugue, Pick-Mangliagalli; Piano Concerto No. 2, and another work ("Scythian Suite") Prokofeff; Bolero (repeated) and three other works, Ravel; "Feste Romane,"* and another work ("Pines of Rome"), Respighi;

308
Sixth Symphony and two other works, Sibelius; Interlude from "Intermezzo," and four other works, Richard Strauss. Two works by Stravinsky; "Feerie," Tournier; an overture by Walton; Symphonic Dance, Wetzler.

In Chicago the composers and number of works were as follows: Atterberg, 1; Bloch, 3; Bessl, 1; Dohnanyi, 1; Enesco, 1; Glazunov, 5; Gramatte, 2; Holst, 1; Honegger, 2; d'Indy, 2; Kodaly, 1; McEwen, 1; Miaskovsky, 2; Pederewski, 1; Pick-Mangiagalli, 1; Pizzetti, 1; Prokofieff, 2; Rachmaninoff, 1; Ravel, 5; Respighi, 2; Georg Schumann, 2; Richard Strauss, 5; Stravinsky, 1; Szymanowski, 1; Tansman, 2; Tommassini, 1; Walton, 1.

Stock the Modernist

In Philadelphia the composers and number of works were as follows: Charpentier, 1; Bloch, 1; Coppola, 1; Elgar, 1; Enesco, 1; Grammatte, 3; Glazunov, 1; Krehn, 1; Miaskovsky, 1; Pizzetti, 1; Prokofieff, 2; Ravel, 1; Roussel, 1; Schoenberg, 2; Sibelius, 3; Richard Strauss, 4; Stravinsky, 2; Wetzler, 1.

To summarize, Boston heard 33 works, by 18 living foreign composers; Chicago heard 49 works by 27 living composers not Americans; and Philadelphia heard 28 works, by 18 such composers. It is Mr Stock in Chicago, and not Dr Koussevitzky, who offers his audiences the greatest amount, and one may add, the most wide ranging and impartial choice of modern pieces. Philadelphia heard less than any of the other cities enumerated. Again New York has no claim to be the principal musical center in the United States, since such cities as Cincinnati and Minneapolis listen each year to as much or more modern orchestral music as our beautiful metropolis hears at its orchestral concerts. Were it not that the Philadelphia and Boston orchestras perform some of their modern pieces, which their own cities hear beforehand, of course, at their respective series of 10 New York concerts, Manhattan would be even worse off. Like Washington it is at the mercy of visiting orchestras, since it has none of its own willing to play much modern music.

This is the list of modern novelties played by the New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra, not including repetitions of works already given in New York. Under Mr Mengelberg, Sinfonietta, Bernard Wagenaar; under Mr Molinari, Suite from the opera "Guilietta e Romeo," Zandonai; under Mr Tescanini; excluding arrangements from the classics, Symphonic Variations, Castelnuovo, Tedesco; Sinfonietta, Goossens; "Summer Evening," Kodaly; Venetian Ronde, Pizzetti; Bolero, Ravel; Venetian Carnival, Tommassini or in all, only eight works by eight composers, as against, to count only novelties, 22 works by 22 composers in Boston.

Dr Koussevitzky's programs, judged by those of his rivals, have this season steered a careful middle course between the wide ranging moderns of Mr Stock and the hidebound conservatism that rules in New York.

Dr. Koussevitzky For First "Monday"

LAST evening at Symphony Hall, Dr. Koussevitzky led the Boston Symphony Orchestra through the first of the series of supplementary concerts that are given on Monday evenings. As on Fridays and Saturdays, and on Mondays in recent years, a house that appeared to be fully "sold-out" was present to greet him. And the term "greet him" is on this occasion no idle phrase. For when Dr. Koussevitzky appeared, a great wave of hand-clapping welled up, which persisted through his numerous bows, and refused to subside until he made signs of turning his back on the audience and addressing himself to the music of the evening.

As at the first Friday and Saturday concerts of this year, Dr. Koussevitzky began with Beethoven's "Egmont" overture and ended with the same composer's fifth symphony. Between the two came moderns, Strauss with an interlude from the opera, "Intermezzo," Stravinsky with the suite from the ballet "Firebird."

Much comment and favorable has been made upon the conductor's Beethoven. Mr. Newman, here at the Beethoven festival of a few years ago, paid high tribute to it. One wonders what he would say to these performances with which the year 1929-30 is beginning. Last evening there were those in the halls who showed little enthusiasm at the prospect of hearing again the fifth symphony. Some of the same, seen again after the concert, said that they would not have missed this present fifth for anything that might have been substituted for it. Its high points are the last portions of the first movement and most of the last movement. The first movement grows and grows until it ends with a full-blooded weightiness that words cannot well describe. (After all, is it not the function of music to utter something that is crying for utterance, but which words cannot express?). And the last movement is nothing short of a blaze of glory. Between stands, of course, the expressive song of the cellos with its triumphant answer from winds, both repeated more and more elaborately; the scherzo with its humors variously; and that long, tense, subdued ascent which leads to the blinding, overpowering exceedingly pleasant bit of music—the interlude from Strauss's opera "Intermezzo." It is love-music,—of the kind which makes a wife thinking of her absent husband just before the arrival of the letter will make her so suspicious, so nervous. But it is far from being a music of youthful passion. Domestic contentment, conjugal satisfactions, a feeling that all is well with the world as long as this and this husband remain "one", these emotions emanate from the music. Once Strauss is a painter in tones of music of domesticity—not from many composers a theme for musical treatment. The strings sing, other instruments sing, there are rich smooth harmonies, expansive positions. And one says, "Isn't it nice? Strauss can write," and passes on to the next number in the program book.

309

That next number last evening happened to be Stravinsky's "Firebird." A suggestive music was never written. The story stands plain upon the pages of the score for those who can read,—and those who can hear. And last evening surely more than an average number must have been among "those who can hear." Surely there were none who did not experience the very feel of the greyness before the dawn, with its spooks, its tings of fireflies, its unexpected weirdness, its uncanny mystery; who did not see gravely with the gorgeous bird; who did not join him (perhaps better her) supplicating entreaty to be freed from his hands and the embrace of the reconquering stranger; who could not see in music the flashing golden apples and princesses, released for the moment from the wicked sorcerer, at their innocent play with them. And then the play elops into a dance. (A tune to hum those who desire it.) Music suave and graceful and sedate. Not a riotous piece, this. Riot indeed, is reserved for the final "Infernal Dance of all the Subjuncts of Katschei." All the hellish brood that sorcerer is let loose. It is nothing but a riot of bedlam. Pictorial music, all in misty gray dawn to final rout; and ended with as vivid a power of suggestion as though the orchestral palette were for eye rather than for ear.

A. H. M.

308
Sixth Symphony and two other works, Sibelius; Interlude from "Intermezzo," and four other works, Richard Strauss. Two works by Stravinsky; "Feerie," Tournier; an overture by Walton; Symphonic Dance, Wetzler.

In Chicago the composers and number of works were as follows: Atterberg, 1; Bloch, 3; Bessi, 1; Dohnanyi, 1; Enesco, 1; Glazunov, 5; Gramatte, 2; Holst, 1; Honegger, 2; d'Indy, 2; Kodaly, 1; McEwen, 1; Miaskovsky, 2; Pederewski, 1; Pick-Mangialalli, 1; Pizzetti, 1; Prokofieff, 2; Rachmaninoff, 1; Ravel, 5; Respighi, 2; Georg Schumann, 2; Richard Strauss, 5; Stravinsky, 1; Szymanowski, 1; Tansman, 2; Tommassini, 1; Walton, 1.

Stock the Modernist

In Philadelphia the composers and number of works were as follows: Charpentier, 1; Bloch, 1; Coppola, 1; Elgar, 1; Enesco, 1; Grammatte, 3; Glazunov, 1; Krehn, 1; Miaskovsky, 1; Pizzetti, 1; Prokofieff, 2; Ravel, 1; Roussel, 1; Schoenberg, 2; Sibelius, 3; Richard Strauss, 4; Stravinsky, 2; Wetzler, 1.

To summarize, Boston heard 33 works, by 18 living foreign composers; Chicago heard 49 works by 27 living composers not Americans; and Philadelphia heard 28 works, by 18 such composers. It is Mr Stock in Chicago, and not Dr Koussevitzky, who offers his audiences the greatest amount, and one may add, the most wide ranging and impartial choice of modern pieces. Philadelphia heard less than any of the other cities enumerated. Again New York has no claim to be the principal musical center in the United States, since such cities as Cincinnati and Minneapolis listen each year to as much or more modern orchestral music as our beautiful metropolis hears at its orchestral concerts. Were it not that the Philadelphia and Boston orchestras perform some of their modern pieces, which their own cities hear beforehand, of course, at their respective series of 10 New York concerts, Manhattan would be even worse off. Like Washington it is at the mercy of visiting orchestras, since it has none of its own willing to play much modern music.

This is the list of modern novelties played by the New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra, not including repetitions of works already given in New York. Under Mr Mengelberg, Sinfonietta, Bernard Wagenaar; under Mr Molinari, Suite from the opera "Guilietta e Romeo," Zandonai; under Mr Tescanini, excluding arrangements from the classics, Symphonic Variations, Castelnuovo, Tedesco; Sinfonietta, Goossens; "Summer Evening," Kodaly; Venetian Ronde, Pizzetti; Bolero, Ravel; Venetian Carnival, Tommassini or in all, only eight works by eight composers, as against, to count only novelties, 22 works by 22 composers in Boston.

Dr Koussevitzky's programs, judged by those of his rivals, have this season steered a careful middle course between the wide ranging moderns of Mr Stock and the hidebound conservatism that rules in New York.

Dr. Koussevitzky For First So

LAST evening at 8 Koussevitzky led the phony Orchestra of the series of suppers that are given on Mondays and Saturdays in recent years, appeared to be fully "so" to greet him. And he is on this occasion no when Dr. Koussevitzky great wave of hand which persisted through bows, and refused to made signs of turning audience and address music of the evening.

As at the first Friday concerts of this year, began with Beethoven's fifth symphony. Between moderns, Strauss with the opera, "Intermezzo," the suite from the ball. Much comment and made upon the conduct Mr. Newman, here at the festival of a few years ago to it. One wonder say to these performances the year 1929-30 is beginning there were those showed little enthusiasm of hearing again the Some of the same, seen concert, said that they missed this present fit that might have been it. Its high points are of the first movement last movement. The grows and grows until full-blooded weightiness not well describe. (After function of music to that is crying for utter words cannot express? movement is nothing of glory. Between stand expressive song of the triumphant answer from repeated more and more scherzo with its humor men

Lobby

Rac

Idea
by Dr

Wash ate lobb into rep Republic Southern hibits p under th of the cussing ern poli roduced to give council, Republic
through to Cong Harlem matter
The address the tar tion of asked A zation was pr hold in testified formati

Curtis

The
"I w Vice Pr of our it was 309

then that long, tense, subdued ascent which leads to the blinding, overpowering finale.

An exceedingly pleasant bit of music is the Interlude from Strauss's opera "Intermezzo." It is love-music,—of the musing wife thinking of her absent husband just before the arrival of the letter that will make her so suspicious, so jealous. But it is far from being a music of youthful passion. Domestic contentment, conjugal satisfactions, a feeling that all's well with the world as long as this wife and this husband remain "one", these emanate from the music. Once again Strauss is a painter in tones of a music of domesticity—not from many composers a theme for musical treatment. Cellos sing, other instruments sing, there are rich smooth harmonies, expansive transitions. And one says, "Isn't it nice? Indeed Strauss can write;" and passes on to the notes on the next number in the program book.

That next number last evening happened to be Stravinsky's "Firebird". A more suggestive music was never written. The story stands plain upon the pages of the score for those who can read,—and those who can hear. And last evening surely more than an average number must have been among "those who can hear." Surely there were none who did not experience the very feel of the greyness just before the dawn, with its spooks, its dartings of fireflies, its unexpected weird sounds, its uncanny mystery; who did not dance gravely with the gorgeous bird; who did not join him (perhaps better her) in supplicating entreaty to be freed from the hands and the embrace of the reconnoitering stranger; who could not see in the music the flashing golden apples and the princesses, released for the moment from the wicked sorcerer, at their innocent play with them. And then the play develops into a dance. (A tune to hum for those who desire it.) Music suave and graceful and sedate. Not a riotous dance, this. Riot indeed, is reserved for the final "Infernal Dance of all the Subjects of Katschei." All the hellish brood of that sorcerer is let loose. It is nothing short of bedlam. Pictorial music, all, from misty gray dawn to final rout; and played with as vivid a power of suggestion as though the orchestral palette were for eye rather than for ear.

A. H. M.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The third concert in the Monday night series of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conductor, took place last evening in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Vivaldi-Siloti, Concerto in D minor for orchestra with organ; Moussorgsky, Prelude to the opera "Khovanstchina"; Ravel, Bolero; Sibelius, Symphony No. 2, D major.

Dr. Koussevitzky has acquainted his audiences with several of Vivaldi's, the red-haired priest's, concertos. Hearing them, one fails to see the justice of opinions expressed by solemn writers, as Sir Hubert Perry, who spoke of Vivaldi's slow movements as showing "glibness" and a certain mastery of technique, but added that the musical ideas are little more than "poses"—whatever that may mean. This music has lived, for it has nobility and beauty. Not without cause did Dr. Koussevitzky put this concert on the first program he prepared for Boston.

The Prelude to "Khovanstchina" undoubtedly owes in great measure its charm to Rimsky-Korsakov who edited the pages that Moussorgsky left and orchestrated them. It matters little whether the hearer is acquainted with the scene on the stage; as pure and absolute music, this Prelude has a peculiar charm if only for sheer euphony and atmosphere.

Ravel's "Bolero" excites at a first hearing, it pleases by the monotony of repetitions, which exerts a hypnotic influence. The clever trick of the composer, a veritable tour de force, does not surprise one after first acquaintance. The "Bolero" shows technical skill in the establishment of a long crescendo and in the sudden, unanticipated storm modulation; and this is all.

It cannot be said by way of praise that Sibelius's Second Symphony is "characteristic" of him, for he is himself in all his music, an imposing figure in his loneliness, his deep-seated melancholy, his rage and passion suggestive of landscapes and seascapes of his beloved Finland.

The various moods of these four compositions were fully appreciated by the accomplished and magnetic conductor, and the performance by the superb instrument on which he plays was of the highest order.

Symphony Concert

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conductor, gave the fourth concert of the Monday night series last evening in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Mozart, Eine Kleine Nachtmusik. Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." Honegger, concerto for violoncello and orchestra. Dvorak, symphony No. 5, E minor, "From the New World."

The soloist was Maurice Marechal, for whom Honegger wrote the concerto played last night for the first time anywhere. Mr. Marechal, born at Dijon, was awarded a first prize for playing the violoncello at the Paris Conservatory in 1911. For some years he was the first cellist of several Parisian orchestras, but of late years he has led the life of a virtuoso.

Honegger composed this concerto in 1928-9. The performance was delayed until it could take place in Boston under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction, with Mr. Marechal, violoncellist. Honegger wrote a little note about the work; a short but sufficient argument to the effect that the three movements, enchainé without a pause, are in the traditional form. The first movement has two contrasting elements: one a suave melodic line; the other a rhythmic pattern. The former is a more sustained and emotional song than one is accustomed to associate with the composer's instrumental compositions; the latter has little distinction except for its unusual contents, which are for the display of technical proficiency, but the orchestral portion of this movement is interesting even when some combinations and effects excite surprise rather than whole-hearted admiration. Mr. Honegger says that the second movement is a song in imitation of a North American Indian chant. This is not the first time he has looked kindly on this racial music. One of his earliest orchestral pieces with North American themes was performed here when he visited Boston. The present song is charming in its melancholy and it was simply presented. In the finale we preferred the second sentimental theme to the "gay and rhythmical" main body of the movement. Again there was singular instrumentation as when the wind instruments apparently mocked the sentimental song, impatient to have their say. Mr. Marechal is an accomplished artist, having a beautiful, rich, but not cloying tone in song passages; a violoncellist of fine taste, possessing a fluent and accurate technique. He was recalled several times.

The remaining numbers on the program were of a popular nature, nor is the word "popular" here used in the obnoxious sense. The delightful music by Mozart; the dazzling brilliance shown by the orchestra in Strauss's admirable tone-poem, and the symphony, with its direct appeal, justly aroused the enthusiasm of the very large audience.

The next concert of the series will be on Monday, March 17. Renee Longy-Miquella, pianist, will be the soloist.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE
The fifth concert of the Monday

evening series given by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, took place last night in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Bach, prelude and fugue in E flat major arranged for orchestra by Arnold Schoenberg; Mozart, piano concerto in D minor; Strauss, an Alpine symphony.

Schoenberg's arrangement of the prelude and of the fugue, known in England and this country as the "St. Anne's," and Strauss's symphony have been performed here so recently that there is no need of extended comment. It might be justly said that there is little of Bach and a great deal of Schoenberg in the transcription, which might be regarded as a study in orchestration, based on music by Bach. As a study, it is entertaining; as a reproduction of Bach's spirit and manner it is preposterous. As performed under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction the music is often imposing, often exciting, also irritating at times to the student of Bach.

The Alpine symphony, in spite of its thunder storm, cannot be ranked among Strauss's greater works. There are agreeable measures—whenever there are reminiscences of "Till Eulenspiegel"—but much of the thematic material is a common streak, which the bombastic treatment does not conceal. As to the length of the work!—a length broken by brilliant flashes of silence, not an oasis to refresh the ears. Doubt the symphony, like some of Bruckner's and Mahler's, belongs to a class of works that might be called music for conductors who find a joy in performance and even in rehearsal.

Mme. Longy-Miquella gave a clear, crisp and thoroughly musical interpretation of Mozart's concerto. The music calls for elegance in its simplicity, apparent simplicity in the bravado passages. There is little or no emotion as emotion is understood today, nor Mozart's day and generation of passionate outbursts to be expected desired in instrumental music. A tinge of melancholy, yes; tender sentiment, yes; but no more. Mme. Longy-Miquella, who was heartily applauded and for her own sake, not merely for recollection of her father—is to be thanked for not inflicting on the audience Reinecke's cadenza for the movement—the cadenza that so longer than the movement itself. We are informed that the one she chose commendably short, is by Al. Casella.

Koussevitzky's Monday Farewell

In Symphony Hall last evening, the final concert of the Monday series for this season ascended through a steadily developing climax of applause. An upward trend began with Stravinsky's ballet, "Apollo Musagetes," continued with the Prelude and Closing from Wagner's "Tristan" and came to a consummation at the end of the Second Symphony of Brahms. It was in that the audience desired to manifest its appreciation for the six evenings of pleasure spent largely among accepted standard works. Dr. Koussevitzky recalled to the stage many times during the course of the concert, and after the concluding number, a lingering audience extended its expressions of approval. Those inclined to the study of psychology may have found convenient aids for the response to each number. Thus, the applause for Stravinsky's ballet music seemed inspired principally by the "Tristan," by affection; and that for the

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The third concert in the Monday night series of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conductor, took place last evening in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Vivaldi-Siloti, Concerto in D minor for orchestra with organ; Moussorgsky, Prelude to the opera "Khovanstchina"; Ravel, Bolero; Sibelius, Symphony No. 2, D major.

Dr. Koussevitzky has acquainted his audiences with several of Vivaldi's, the red-haired priest's, concertos. Hearing them, one fails to see the justice of opinions expressed by solemn writers, as Sir Hubert Perry, who spoke of Vivaldi's slow movements as showing "glibness and a certain mastery of technic," but added that the musical ideas are little more than "poses"—whatever that may mean. This music has lived, for it has nobility and beauty. Not without cause did Dr. Koussevitzky put this concerto on the first program he prepared for Boston.

The Prelude to "Khovanstchina" undoubtedly owes in great measure its charm to Rimsky-Korsakov who edited the pages that Moussorgsky left and orchestrated them. It matters little, whether the hearer is acquainted with the scene on the stage; as pure and absolute music, this Prelude has a peculiar charm if only for sheer euphony and atmosphere.

Ravel's "Bolero" excites at a first hearing, it pleases by the monotony of repetitions, which exerts a hypnotic influence. The clever trick of the composer, a veritable tour de force, does not surprise one after first acquaintance. The "Bolero" shows technical skill in the establishment of a long crescendo and in the sudden, unanticipated stormy modulation; and this is all.

It cannot be said by way of praise that Sibelius's Second Symphony is "characteristic" of him, for he is himself in all his music, an imposing figure in his loneliness, his deep-seated melancholy, his rage and passion suggestive of landscapes and seascapes of his beloved Finland.

The various moods of these four compositions were fully appreciated by the accomplished and magnetic conductor, and the performance by the superb instrument on which he plays was of the highest order. H. F. B.

Symphony Concert

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conductor, gave the fourth concert of the Monday night series last evening in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Mozart, Eine Kleine Nachtmusik. Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." Honegger, violinello and orchestra. Symphony No. 5, E minor, New World."

was Maurice Marechal, Honegger wrote the concerto for the first time any—Marechal, born at Dijon, a first prize for playing at the Paris Conservatory. For some years he was first of several Parisian orchestras of late years he has led virtuoso.

composed this concerto in performance was delayed take place in Boston under Koussevitzky's direction, with Honegger's note about the work; sufficient argument to at the three movements, without a pause, are in the form. The first movement strasting elements: one a line; the other a rhythm. The former is a more emotional song than one to associate with the instrumental compositions; a little distinction except contents, which are for technical proficiency, but portion of this movement resting even when some and effects excite surthan whole-hearted ad-

Honegger says that the piece is a song in imitation American Indian chant. The first time he has looked racial music. One of his stral pieces with North mes was performed here Boston. The present ing in its melancholy and presented. In the finale the second sentimental "gay and rhythmical" movement. Again regular instrumentation as instruments apparently ntimental song, impatient say. Mr. Marechal is an artist, having a beautiful, cloying tone in song pascellist of fine taste, position and accurate technic. several times. numbers on the popular nature, nor is here used in the

The delightful music dazzling brilliance orchestra in Strauss's poem, and the sym-direct appeal, justly nusiiasm of the very rt of the series will be ch 17. Renee Longy-will be the soloist.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Herald By PHILIP HALE 18, 1930

The fifth concert of the Monday evening series given by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, took place last night in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Bach, prelude and fugue in E flat major arranged for orchestra by Arnold Schoenberg; Mozart, piano concerto in D minor; Strauss, an Alpine symphony.

Schoenberg's arrangement of the prelude and of the fugue, known in England and this country as the "St. Anne's," and Strauss's symphony have been performed here so recently that there is no need of extended comment. It might be justly said that there is little of Bach and a great deal of Schoenberg in the transcription, which might be regarded as a study in orchestration, based on music by Bach. As a study, it is entertaining; as a reproduction of Bach's spirit and manner it is preposterous. As performed under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction the music is often imposing, often exciting, also irritating at times to the student of Bach.

The Alpine symphony, in spite of the thunder storm, cannot be ranked among Strauss's greater works. There are agreeable measures—whenver there are reminiscences of "Till Eulenspiegel"—but much of the thematic material has a common streak, which the bombastic treatment does not conceal. And the length of the work!—a length unbroken by brilliant flashes of silence; not an oasis to refresh the ears. No doubt the symphony, like some of Bruckner's and Mahler's, belongs to a class of works that might be called music for conductors who find a joy in performance and even in rehearsal of it.

Mme. Longy-Miquelle gave a clear, crisp and thoroughly musical interpretation of Mozart's concerto. The music calls for elegance in its simplicity, and apparent simplicity in the bravura passages. There is little or no emotion, as emotion is understood today, nor in Mozart's day and generation were passionate outbursts to be expected or desired in instrumental music. A tinge of melancholy, yes; tender sentiment, yes; but no more. Mme. Longy-Miquelle, who was heartily applauded—and for her own sake, not merely from recollection of her father—is to be thanked for not inflicting on the audience Reinecke's cadenza for the first movement—the cadenza that seems longer than the movement itself. We are informed that the one she chose, commendably short, is by Alfredo Casella.

Koussevitzky's Monday Farewell

Symphony Hall last evening, the final concert of the Monday series for this season ascended through a developing climax of applause. upward trend began with Stravinsky's ballet, "Apollo Musagetes," concluded with the Prelude and Closing Scene from Wagner's "Tristan" and came a consummation at the end of the Monday Symphony of Brahms. It was that the audience desired to manifest its appreciation for the six evenings' pleasure spent largely among accepted standard works. Dr. Koussevitzky recalled to the stage many times during the course of the concert, and after concluding number, a lingering audience extended its expressions of approval. Those inclined to the study of psychology may have found convenient aids for the response to each number. As the applause for Stravinsky's ballet, the music seemed inspired principally by "Tristan," by affection; and that for the symphony of Brahms, by genuine love and enthusiasm.

he reactions to the "Apollo" music in a Monday audience no less than in a Saturday and a Tuesday audience natural and to be expected. There those who will not accept Stravinsky matter what guise he appears in, and as far as this composer is concerned, he himself as Little Red Riding Hood before a wolf in grandmother's shoes. Then, too, even to his most enthusiastic disciples Stravinsky is not to be himself in this music. Of course, may be argued plausibly enough that s never more himself than when writing like somebody else; yet in his more significant pieces, whether dealing in eschewed or modern idioms, he has led to expect an unmistakable individuality.

In the case of "Apollo," what individuality there is comes very close to mass and monotony. The music is sweet and as inoffensive as the ballet of Delibes and Chaikovsky; yet in duously avoiding the frank melodies clear contrasts which characterize music of these earlier composers, he ns himself to the charge of insincerity. s apparent insincerity, however, is not much in the avoidance of what is obvious as in the accompanying sweetness of timbres and harmonies. The tonal effect is always pleasing, but it appears to e been made so unnaturally and de-rately. For his artifice and intellect composer wins admiration but not as no enthusiasm.

The Prelude and Closing Scene from "Tristan" is familiar even to a Monday audience. Hence, it is affectionately received as an old and well-liked friend, however inappropriately the phrase may seem to apply to the music in question. Into these close-packed sonorities, Dr. Koussevitzky plunges with the all consuming fervor with which he approaches any composer from Frank to Stravinsky. There is no shading, no preparatory tenseness, no exotic surge or intoxicating quiver which escapes him. All efforts drive toward the ultimate in emotional exaltation. Orchestrally, the performance is magnificent and perhaps beyond comparison. Whether it is over-accentuated in detail, we shall leave to those who can recall the accomplishments of Dr. Muck and other exponents of German master works.

From the enthusiasm of the audience, from the excited delight of individual disciples of Brahms and from the brightness, vigor and "aliveness" of the performance itself, one is inclined in the belief that Dr. Koussevitzky surpassed himself in the Symphony. Here were contrasts, piquancies and thematic vitalities which appeared lacking in the first two pieces. The "genial" Brahms is an apt term as far as the Second Symphony is concerned. And as for Dr. Koussevitzky, he whipped the final movement to a conclusion that was exhilarating beyond memory. N. M. J.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The third concert in the Monday night series of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conductor, took place last evening in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Vivaldi-Silotti, Concerto in D minor for orchestra with organ; Moussorgsky, Prelude to the opera "Khovanstchina"; Ravel, Bolero; Sibelius, Symphony No. 2, D major.

Dr. Koussevitzky has acquainted his audiences with several of Vivaldi's, the red-haired priest's, concertos. Hearing them, one fails to see the justice of opinions expressed by solemn writers, as Sir Hubert Perry, who spoke of Vivaldi's slow movements as showing "glibness" and a certain mastery of technic," but added that the musical ideas are little more than "poses"—whatever that may mean. This music has lived, for it has nobility and beauty. Not without cause did Dr. Koussevitzky put this concert on the first program he prepared for Boston.

The Prelude to "Khovanstchina" undoubtedly owes in great measure its charm to Rimsky-Korsakov who edited the pages that Moussorgsky left and orchestrated them. It matters little whether the hearer is acquainted with the scene on the stage; as pure and absolute music, this Prelude has a peculiar charm if only for sheer euphony and atmosphere.

Ravel's "Bolero" excites at a first hearing, it pleases by the monotony of repetitions, which exerts a hypnotic influence. The clever trick of the composer, a veritable tour de force, does not surprise one after first acquaintance. The "Bolero" shows technical skill in the establishment of a long crescendo and in the sudden, unanticipated storm modulation; and this is all.

It cannot be said by way of praise that Sibelius's Second Symphony is "characteristic" of him, for he is himself in all his music, an imposing figure in his loneliness, his deep-seated melancholy, his rage and passion suggestive of landscapes and seascapes of his beloved Finland.

The various moods of these four compositions were fully appreciated by the accomplished and magnetic conductor, and the performance by the superb instrument on which he plays was of the highest order. H. F. B.

Symphony Concert

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conductor, gave the fourth concert of the Monday night series last evening in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Mozart, Eine Kleine Nachtmusik. Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." Honegger, concerto for violoncello and orchestra. Dvorak, symphony No. 5, E minor, "From the New World."

The soloist was Maurice Marechal, for whom Honegger wrote the concerto played last night for the first time anywhere. Mr. Marechal, born at Dijon, was awarded a first prize for playing the violoncello at the Paris Conservatory in 1911. For some years he was the first cellist of several Parisian orchestras, but of late years he has led the life of a virtuoso.

Honegger composed this concerto in 1928-9. The performance was delayed until it could take place in Boston under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction, with Mr. Marschal, violoncellist. Honegger wrote a little note about the work; a short but sufficient argument to the effect that the three movements, enchainé without a pause, are in the traditional form. The first movement has two contrasting elements: one a suave melodic line; the other a rhythmic pattern. The former is a more sustained and emotional song than one is accustomed to associate with the composer's instrumental compositions; the latter has little distinction except for its unusual contents, which are for the display of technical proficiency, but the orchestral portion of this movement is interesting even when some combinations and effects excite surprise rather than whole-hearted admiration. Mr. Honegger says that the second movement is a song in imitation of a North American Indian chant. This is not the first time he has looked kindly on this racial music. One of his earliest orchestral pieces with North American themes was performed here when he visited Boston. The present song is charming in its melancholy and it was simply presented. In the finale we preferred the second sentimental theme to the "gay and rhythmical" main body of the movement. Again there was singular instrumentation as when the wind instruments apparently mocked the sentimental song, impatient to have their say. Mr. Marechal is an accomplished artist, having a beautiful, rich, but not cloying tone in song passages; a violoncellist of fine taste, possessing a fluent and accurate technic. He was recalled several times.

The remaining numbers on the program were of a popular nature, nor is the word "popular" here used in the obnoxious sense. The delightful music by Mozart; the dazzling brilliance shown by the orchestra in Strauss's admirable tone-poem, and the symphony, with its direct appeal, justly aroused the enthusiasm of the very large audience.

The next concert of the series will be on Monday, March 17. Renee Longy-Miquella, pianist, will be the soloist.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Herald By PHILIP HALE Mch. 18, 1930
The fifth concert of the Monday

evening series given by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, took place last night in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Bach, prelude and fugue in E flat major arranged for orchestra by Arnold Schoenberg; Mozart, piano concerto in D minor; Strauss, an Alpine symphony.

Schoenberg's arrangement of the prelude and of the fugue, known in England and this country as the "St. Anne's," and Strauss's symphony have been performed here so recently that there is no need of extended comment. It might be justly said that there is little of Bach and a great deal of Schoenberg in the transcription, which might be regarded as a study in orchestration, based on music by Bach. As a study, it is entertaining; as a reproduction of Bach's spirit and manner it is preposterous. As performed under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction the music is often imposing, often exciting, also irritating at times to the student of Bach.

The Alpine symphony, in spite of the thunder storm, cannot be ranked among Strauss's greater works. There are agreeable measures—whenever there are reminiscences of "Till Eulenspiegel"—but much of the thematic material has a common streak, which the bombastic treatment does not conceal. And the length of the work!—a length unbroken by brilliant flashes of silence; not an oasis to refresh the ears. No doubt the symphony, like some of Bruckner's and Mahler's, belongs to a class of works that might be called music for conductors who find a joy in performance and even in rehearsal of it.

Mme. Longy-Miquella gave a clear, crisp and thoroughly musical interpretation of Mozart's concerto. The music calls for elegance in its simplicity, and apparent simplicity in the bravura passages. There is little or no emotion, as emotion is understood today, nor in Mozart's day and generation were passionate outbursts to be expected or desired in instrumental music. A tinge of melancholy, yes; tender sentiment, yes; but no more. Mme. Longy-Miquella, who was heartily applauded—and for her own sake, not merely from recollection of her father—is to be thanked for not inflicting on the audience Reinecke's cadenza for the first movement—the cadenza that seems longer than the movement itself. We are informed that the one she chose, commendably short, is by Alfredo Casella.

Koussevitzky's
Monday Farewell

Symphony Hall last evening, the final concert of the Monday series for this season ascended through a developing climax of applause. An upward trend began with Stravinsky's ballet, "Apollo Musagetes," connected with the Prelude and Closing Scene from Wagner's "Tristan" and came to a consummation at the end of the Second Symphony of Brahms. It was in that the audience desired to manifest its appreciation for the six evenings' pleasure spent largely among accepted standard works. Dr. Koussevitzky recalled to the stage many times during the course of the concert, and after concluding number, a lingering audience extended its expressions of approval. Those inclined to the study of psychology may have found convenient aids for the response to each number. As, the applause for Stravinsky's ballet music seemed inspired principally by admiration; that for the excerpt from "Tristan," by affection; and that for the symphony of Brahms, by genuine love and enthusiasm.

The reactions to the "Apollo" music in a Monday audience no less than in a Saturday and a Tuesday audience are natural and to be expected. There are those who will not accept Stravinsky matter what guise he appears in, and, as far as this composer is concerned, give themselves as Little Red Riding Hoods before a wolf in grandmother's hes. Then, too, even to his most enthusiastic disciples Stravinsky is not to be himself in this music. Of course, may be argued plausibly enough that he never more himself than when writing like somebody else; yet in his more significant pieces, whether dealing in established or modern idioms, he has led to expect an unmistakable individuality.

In the case of "Apollo," what individuality there is comes very close to stiness and monotony. The music is sweet and as inoffensive as the ballets of Delibes and Chaikovsky; yet in studiously avoiding the frank melodies and clear contrasts which characterize music of these earlier composers, he has exposed himself to the charge of insincerity. His apparent insincerity, however, is not much in the avoidance of what is obvious as in the accompanying sweetness of timbres and harmonies. The tonal effect is always pleasing, but it appears to have been made so unnaturally and deliberately. For his artifice and intellect, the composer wins admiration but not enthusiasm.

The Prelude and Closing Scene from "Tristan" is familiar even to a Monday audience. Hence, it is affectionately received as an old and well-liked friend, however inappropriately the phrase may seem to apply to the music in question. Into these close-packed sonorities, Dr. Koussevitzky plunges with the all-consuming fervor with which he approaches any composer from Frank to Stravinsky. There is no shading, no preparatory tenseness, no exotic surge or intoxicating quiver which escapes him. All efforts drive toward the ultimate in emotional exaltation. Orchestrally, the performance is magnificent and perhaps beyond comparison. Whether it is over-accentuated in detail, we shall leave to those who can recall the accomplishments of Dr. Muck and other exponents of German master works.

From the enthusiasm of the audience, from the excited delight of individual disciples of Brahms and from the brightness, vigor and "aliveness" of the performance itself, one is inclined in the belief that Dr. Koussevitzky surpassed himself in the Symphony. Here were contrasts, piquancies and thematic vitalities which appeared lacking in the first two pieces. The "genial" Brahms is an apt term as far as the Second Symphony is concerned. And as for Dr. Koussevitzky, he whipped the final movement to a conclusion that was exhilarating beyond memory. N. M. J.

310

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conductor, gave the fourth concert of the Monday night series last evening in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Mozart, Ein Kleine Nachtmusik. Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." Honegger

The next concert of the series will be on Monday, March 17. Renee Long Miquella, pianist, will be the soloist.

performance and e Mme. Longy-Mi
crisp and thorough tation of Mozart's calls for elegance the state, PR apparent simple forming of passages. There gentlemen as emotion is unday, March Mozart's day "The act passionate outbur in concep desired in ins of the tem tinge of melanch said Gov.
ment, yes; but people who Miquelle, who wgenal mann and for her own spiritual de recollection of organizations thanked for not in no countr ence Reinecke's vigor or c movement—the power. Tra longer than this spirit sti are informed in the Former A commendably shingrosby re Casella.

311

From the enthusiasm of the audience, from the excited delight of individual disciples of Brahms and from the brightness, vigor and "aliveness" of the performance itself, one is inclined in the belief that Dr. Koussevitzky surpassed himself in the Symphony. Here were contrasts, piquancies and thematic vitalities which appeared lacking in the first two pieces. The "genial" Brahms is an apt term as far as the Second Symphony is concerned. And as for Dr. Koussevitzky, he whipped the final movement to a conclusion that was exhilarating beyond memory.

BOSTON SYMPHONY MONDAY CONCERT

Dec 3, 1929
Martha Baird Soloist in
Schumann Concerto

Last night, in Symphony Hall, occurred the second Symphony concert of the Monday evening series, Serge Koussevitzky conducting. As usual there was a large and enthusiastic audience.

Opening the program with Handel's "Concerto Grosso" for string orchestra, the conductor drew from his men their customary smoothness of tone and beauty of color. There are, however, those to whom Dr Koussevitzky's conducting is a thing unpleasingly studied, too definitely planned and posed. With not a note from the orchestra, the full emotional content of the music would have been vividly portrayed, now tensely dramatic, now languid. Surely music is enough in itself; it cannot need additional interpretation through plastic expression. The orchestra, however, admirably sustained the mood of the Lento, and to the Allegro it brought enticing grace.

The soloist of the evening was Martha Baird, already known to her Boston public thorough Jordan Hall programs. This time she was heard in the Schumann Concerto in A minor for pianoforte and orchestra. Unfortunately Miss Baird is not possessed of a tone of sufficient body to be altogether successful in appearance with so large an orchestra and in so large a hall. Again, one felt that her music was confined to two planes only. Gently she did her work, with a certain continuity, a certain tonal beauty. Occasionally she rose to bigger moments, but for the most part, it remained on a single level. However, she had the good taste to refrain from forcing, even if such restraint meant the sacrifice of interest.

The program closed with the Tchaikovsky "Symphony in B minor" (Pathetic), long a favorite with Symphony audiences. Here was emotionalism at its darkest. Sheer pathos against a background of storm and stress. Emotion grippingly sensuous;

morbid sullen, relentless and inevitable, tearing its way along towards poignant climaxes. Rich and full was the Allegro con grazia, stormy the Allegro molto vivace. Well equipped, both technically and temperamentally were conductor and orchestra for an interpretation vivid and moving. A spell-bound audience waited breathlessly for a final note, then gave its customary tribute of delighted approval.

SIX TUESDAY AFTERNOON CONCERTS

December 10 January 7 February 11 February 25 March 11 April 22

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

(110 Musicians)

Dr. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor

OPENING PROGRAMME

(December 10)

BACH	Brandenburg Concerto No. 3
MOZART	Symphony in E-flat
BEETHOVEN	Symphony No. 5, in C minor

LAST CONCERT OF THE TUESDAY AFTERNOON SERIES

Tuesday Afternoon, April 22, at 3 o'clock

PROGRAMME

Beethoven	Overture to "Leonore" No. 3, Op. 72
Beethoven	Symphony No. 6 in F major, Op. 68, "Pastorale"
Brahms	Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Op. 98

BOSTON SYMPHONY MONDAY CONCERT

Dec 3, 1929
Martha Baird Soloist in
Schumann Concerto

Last night, in Symphony Hall, occurred the second Symphony concert of the Monday evening series, Serge Koussevitzky conducting. As usual there was a large and enthusiastic audience.

Opening the program with Handel's "Concerto Grosso" for string orchestra, the conductor drew from his men their customary smoothness of tone and beauty of color. There are, however, those to whom Dr Koussevitzky's conducting is a thing unpleasingly studied, too definitely planned and posed. With not a note from the orchestra, the full emotional content of the music would have been vividly portrayed, now tensely dramatic, now languid. Surely music is enough in itself; it cannot need additional interpretation through plastic expression. The orchestra, however, admirably sustained the mood of the Lento, and to the Allegro it brought enticing grace.

The soloist of the evening was Martha Baird, already known to her Boston public thorough Jordan Hall programs. This time she was heard in the Schumann Concerto in A minor for pianoforte and orchestra. Unfortunately Miss Baird is not possessed of a tone of sufficient body to be altogether successful in appearance with so large an orchestra and in so large a hall. Again, one felt that her music was confined to two planes only. Gently she did her work, with a certain continuity, a certain tonal beauty. Occasionally she rose to bigger moments, but for the most part, it remained on a single level. However, she had the good taste to refrain from forcing, even if such restraint meant the sacrifice of interest.

The program closed with the Tchaikovsky "Symphony in B minor" (Pathetic), long a favorite with Symphony audiences. Here was emotionalism at its darkest. Sheer pathos against a background of storm and stress. Emotion grippingly sensuous;

morbid sullen, relentless and inevitable, tearing its way along towards poignant climaxes. Rich and full was the Allegro con grazia, stormy the Allegro molto vivace. Well equipped, both technically and temperamentally were conductor and orchestra for an interpretation vivid and moving. A spell-bound audience waited breathlessly for a final note, then gave its customary tribute of delighted approval.

SIX TUESDAY AFTERNOON CONCERTS

December 10 January 7 February 11 February 25 March 11 April 22

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

(110 Musicians)

Dr. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor

OPENING PROGRAMME

(December 10)

BACH	Brandenburg Concerto No. 3
MOZART	Symphony in E-flat
BEETHOVEN	Symphony No. 5, in C minor

LAST CONCERT OF THE TUESDAY AFTERNOON SERIES

Tuesday Afternoon, April 22, at 3 o'clock

PROGRAMME

Beethoven	Overture to "Leonore" No. 3, Op. 72
Beethoven	Symphony No. 6 in F major, Op. 68, "Pastorale"
Brahms	Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Op. 98

Dr. Koussevitzky And the "Classics"

Trans — Dec. 11, 1930

THE classics. Thus have the programs for Tuesday afternoons come to be known at Symphony Hall; to play "classics" at that time is Dr. Koussevitzky's intent. And for the hearing of them there is an audience in Boston both ripe and ready. Yesterday they assembled for the season's first concert of this, the most youthful series of the orchestra. In one aspect this audience is like every other audience for Symphony concerts in Boston—it fills all the available seats. Aside from this, the Tuesday audience is its distinctive own. It has not the hearers, who surfeited from much hearing of the "masterpieces," turn a "superior" front toward them; nor those whose chief joy in music is the repeated hearing and re-hearing of these same works (though such would find themselves admirably at home on Tuesdays); nor yet those who, with sophisticated mind and sharpened ears, are always lying in wait, ready to drink in the delights of the latest novelty. In the main, it is an assemblage of "the people," a company to whom the spreading fame of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the report that on Tuesdays are played only things long tried and fully proven, has brought the desire to add to their lives the hearing of such music. An eager company, healthily active in their listening.

To them yesterday Dr. Koussevitzky brought three works which are classic of the classic. In every one of the debated senses of the word do they deserve the much-used and much-abused adjective. No composers have won greater approbation than Bach, Mozart and Beethoven. Bach's Brandenburg concertos, the third of which was yesterday's, are upon the heights of his orchestral work; Mozart's symphony in E-flat is among the three "great" ones of the year 1788; Beethoven's "Fifth" is the symphony which by general consent our schools and colleges, doing their bit toward musical "appreciation," first feed the youth of the land.

The glories of Bach have been expounded in season and out of season. They are real glories still. They survive even their friends. Who would not warm to that sea of sonorities which in great billows surged toward him which again glintingly receded, yesterday afternoon? Who could remain unaffected by the drive of the rhythm, the sparkle of the figures? This was a Bach, not of dry-as-dust commentators, but a living and very vital "modern." And an audience unspoiled rose to him.

kind. Three works yesterday the orchestra in three parts. Bach the strings grouped conductor, 'cellos taking the occupied by wood-winds. Those wood-wind players one upon the 'cello also, were passed 'cellists. For Mozart, ing to Dr. Koussevitzky's by little more than half a orchestra, double-basses came (seaball fans would say) to be of the diminished strings. Parent lightness of Mozart double transparency after Bach.

with Beethoven, the their usual places. The "te" sounded; and in its body answered. Again, sang that most lovely ems so spontaneous and ch cost Beethoven so winds and brasses provided. Further, winds and ended the humors of a ble-basses with agility which their brethren had possible. And finally, a m brasses ended the the glories of strings
A. H. M.

TUESDAY SYMPHONY

The sixth and last of the Tuesday series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted. The program comprised Beethoven's "Leonore" overture No. 3 and "Pastoral" symphony; also Brahms's symphony, E minor, No. 4.

Some might say that this was a stiff program; others might welcome it as a relief from programs devoted largely to contemporaneous music of the extreme radical variety. There was no difference of opinion yesterday as to the quality of the performance or the dramatic and poetic interpretations.

The Tuesday audiences have fared well this season. The older masters were represented by a concerto of Bach, a concerto by Handel, Mozart's symphony in E flat major; Haydn's symphony (with the horn call); Beethoven came in with two symphonies and an overture; Schubert, with the "Unfinished" and music from "Rosamunde"; Schumann with a symphony and the overture to "Manfred."

There was a symphony by Brahms; Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic"; Cesar Franck's symphony. The brilliant performance of Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel" again awakens enthusiasm, there were four Wagnerian numbers; Debussy's "The Sea," Ravel's Bolero.

Admirable programs that gave the receptive but not too easily pleased audiences great pleasure; audiences that expected the best and have not been disappointed.
F. S. L.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The second of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Tuesday series of concerts took place yesterday in Symphony hall. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted. The program was as follows: Schumann, Overture to Byron's "Manfred"; Schumann, symphony No. 2, C major; Wagner, prelude to "Lohengrin." The Ride of the Valkyries from "Die Walkure"; introduction to the third act of "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"; prelude to "The Mastersingers." Schumann and Wagner, both romantics; yet the juxtaposition is ironical to those who recall the mutual attitude of the two men: one towards the music of the other. It is true that Schumann did not know any of Wagner's works after "Tannhaeuser," of which he at first said that Wagner, this clever fellow, full of mad ideas, was incapable of conceiving and writing four beautiful measures, indeed hardly good ones in succession. But soon afterward Schumann found deep and original things in the opera and thought Wagner could be of great importance to the stage. Wagner, on the other hand, called Schumann's D minor symphony "banal." He formally inspired Joseph Rubinstein to write a malignant article against Schumann's compositions. Nor did the two men when they met find their meeting agreeable. Schumann complained that Wagner talked incessantly; Wagner found it impossible to discuss music with a man who would hardly open his mouth.

It was a pleasure to hear the overture to "Manfred" again. It has not been put on a program of the Friday and Saturday concerts for almost a dozen seasons. The overture has interest outside of its musical quality; reminding one, as it does, of the poet who exerted a mighty influence on European literature and even the conduct of life; also reminding one of the unsavory discussion that has followed the publication of Mrs. Stowe's article. It is strange that no psycho-analyst in music—say Richard Strauss—has treated the subject, laying morbid stress on the Astarte Episoda. By the way, will not Dr. Koussevitzky at some concert in the future conduct fragments from Tchaikovsky's "Manfred"? We say "fragments" for the movements of the symphony are of unequal worth.

SECOND TUESDAY SYMPHONY CONCERT

Schumann and Wagner

Fill Program

Gluck Jan. 1930

The second program of the Tuesday afternoon Symphony concert series consisted of the overture to Byron's "Manfred" and the Second Symphony of Schumann, and four Wagner excerpts—the "Lohengrin" prelude, the "Ride of the Valkyries," the prelude and the introduction to Act 3 of "Die Meistersinger."

Schumann's orchestral works are interesting solely because seldom played. Hearing these two compositions of his, it is evident that he never fully grasped the orchestral and symphonic concept. His attitude is too thoroughly pianistic to permit him to go farther from his naturale genre than chamber music. He seems to find no necessity for contrast and color.

When he does try original combinations of instruments, they are often bizarre. The kettledrum strokes in the overture stand out like the proverbial sore thumbs; though in the first movement of the symphony they fit in admirably. Schumann's instrumentation is insecure and erratic.

The musical substance of both the overture and the symphony is so original that it stands out in spite of the clumsy scoring. The principal motive in the symphony is, curiously enough, identical both rhythmically and melodically with the beginning of the introduction to Haydn's D-major symphony.

Unfortunately Dr Koussevitzky substituted for the "Siegfried Funeral Music," originally announced, the more obvious "Ride of the Valkyries." It is a question whether such an excerpt as the introduction to Act 3 of "Die Meistersinger" is suitable for concert performance. The other three Wagner excerpts played were more or less self contained units. The beautiful music of the introduction became almost uninteresting taken out of its proper context. The "Meistersinger" prelude, while played with a great attention to detail, did not have the plasticity it inherently possesses.

Dr Koussevitzky quite outdid himself, particularly in the Schumann Symphony. This should have raised the level of the performance to unusual heights, but unfortunately the orchestra showed the ill effects of either scanty rehearsal or carelessness. There were several unfortunate slips, noticeably in the "Meistersinger" prelude, and in the end of the "Lohengrin" prelude.

Dr. Koussevitzky And the "Classic"

Trans. — Dec. 11, 1930

THE classics. Thus have the programs for Tuesday afternoons come to be known at Symphony Hall as play "classics" at that time is Dr. Koussevitzky's intent. And for the hearing them there is an audience in Boston both ripe and ready. Yesterday they seemed for the season's first concert this, the most youthful series of the orchestra. In one aspect this audience is like every other audience of Symphony concerts in Boston—it fills all the available seats. Aside from this, the Tuesday audience is its distinctive own. It has not the hearers, versed from much hearing of "masterpieces," turn a "superior" front toward them; nor those whose chief in music is the repeated hearing and hearing of these same works (though such would find themselves admirably at home on Tuesdays); nor yet those with sophisticated mind and sharper ears, are always lying in wait, ready to drink in the delights of the latest novelty. In the main, it is an assemblage "the people," a company to whom the spreading fame of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the report that on Tuesdays are played only things long tried and fully proven, has brought the desire to add to their lives the hearing of such music. An eager company, healthily active in their listening.

To them yesterday Dr. Koussevitzky brought three works which are classic of the classic. In every one of the debated senses of the word do they deserve the much-used and much-abused adjective. No composers have won greater approbation than Bach, Mozart and Beethoven. Bach's Brandenburg concertos, the third of which was yesterday's, are upon the heights of his orchestral work; Mozart's symphony in E-flat is among the three "great" ones of the year 1788; Beethoven's "Fifth" is the symphony which by general consent our schools and colleges, doing their bit toward musical "appreciation," first feed the youth of the land.

The glories of Bach have been expounded in season and out of season. They are real glories still. They survive even their friends. Who would not warm to that sea of sonorities which in great billows surged toward him which again glintingly receded, yesterday afternoon? Who could remain unaffected by the drive of the rhythm, the sparkle of the figures? This was a Bach, not of dry-as-dust commentators, but a living and very vital "modern." And an audience unspoiled rose to him.

For each, its kind. Three works yesterday assembled the orchestra in three seatings. For Bach the strings grouped around the conductor, cellos taking the place usually occupied by wood-winds. Indeed from those wood-wind players one or two, adept upon the cello also, were added to the massed cellists. For Mozart, played according to Dr. Koussevitzky's wise custom by little more than half a "modern" orchestra, double-basses came "in close" (as baseball fans would say) to be near the rest of the diminished strings. And the transparent lightness of Mozart came with a double transparency after the resounding Bach.

And finally, with Beethoven, the orchestra in their usual places. The "knocking of fate" sounded; and in its time, lyric melody answered. Again, cellos and violas sang that most lovely melody which seems so spontaneous and natural but which cost Beethoven so much labor; and winds and brasses proclaimed in reply. Further, winds and strings alike sounded the humors of a scherzo; and double-basses with agility played passages which their brethren had once declared impossible. And finally, a burst of glory from brasses ended the concert, even as the glories of strings had begun it. A. H. M.

TUESDAY SYMPHONY

The sixth and last of the Tuesday series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted. The program comprised Beethoven's "Leonore" overture No. 3 and "Pastoral" symphony; also Brahms's symphony, E minor, No. 4.

Some might say that this was a stiff program; others might welcome it as a relief from programs devoted largely to contemporaneous music of the extreme radical variety. There was no difference of opinion yesterday as to the quality of the performance or the dramatic and poetic interpretations.

The Tuesday audiences have fared well this season. The older masters were represented by a concerto of Bach, a concerto by Handel, Mozart's symphony in E flat major; Haydn's symphony (with the horn call); Beethoven came in with two symphonies and an overture; Schubert with the "Unfinished" and music from "Rosamunde"; Schumann with a symphony and the overture to "Manfred."

There was a symphony by Brahms; Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic"; Cesar Franck's symphony. The brilliant performance of Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel" again awakens enthusiasm, there were four Wagnerian numbers; Debussy's "The Sea," Ravel's Bolero.

Admirable programs that gave the receptive but not too easily pleased audiences great pleasure; audiences that expected the best and have not been disappointed. F. S. L.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The second of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Tuesday series of concerts took place yesterday in Symphony hall. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted. The program was as follows: Schumann, Overture to Byron's "Manfred"; Schumann, symphony No. 2, C major; Wagner, prelude to "Lohengrin." The Ride of the Valkyries from "Die Walkure"; introduction to the third act of "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"; prelude to "The Mastersingers." Schumann and Wagner, both romantics; yet the juxtaposition is ironical to those who recall the mutual attitude of the two men: one towards the music of the other. It is true that Schumann did not know any of Wagner's works after "Tannhaeuser," of which he at first said that Wagner, this clever fellow, full of mad ideas, was incapable of conceiving and writing four beautiful measures, indeed hardly good ones in succession. But soon afterward Schumann found deep and original things in the opera and thought Wagner could be of great importance to the stage. Wagner, on the other hand, called Schumann's D minor symphony "banal." He formally inspired Joseph Rubinstein to write a malignant article against Schumann's compositions. Nor did the two men when they met find their meeting agreeable. Schumann complained that Wagner talked incessantly; Wagner found it impossible to discuss music with a man who would hardly open his mouth.

It was a pleasure to hear the overture to "Manfred" again. It has not been put on a program of the Friday and Saturday concerts for almost a dozen seasons. The overture has interest outside of its musical quality; reminding one, as it does, of the poet who exerted a mighty influence on European literature and even the conduct of life; also reminding one of the unsavory discussion that has followed the publication of Mrs. Stowe's article. It is strange that no psycho-analyst in music—say Richard Strauss—has treated the subject, laying morbid stress on the Astarte Episoda. By the way, will not Dr. Koussevitzky at some concert in the future conduct fragments from Tchaikovsky's "Manfred"? We say "fragments" for the movements of the symphony are of unequal worth.

SECOND TUESDAY SYMPHONY CONCERT

Schumann and Wagner

Full Program

Globe Jan. 1930

The second program of the Tuesday afternoon Symphony concert series consisted of the overture to Byron's "Manfred" and the Second Symphony of Schumann, and four Wagner excerpts—the "Lohengrin" prelude, the "Ride of the Valkyries," the prelude and the introduction to Act 3 of "Die Meistersinger."

Schumann's orchestral works are interesting solely because seldom played. Hearing these two compositions of his, it is evident that he never fully grasped the orchestral and symphonic concept. His attitude is too thoroughly pianistic to permit him to go farther from his naturale genre than chamber music. He seems to find no necessity for contrast and color.

When he does try original combinations of instruments, they are often bizarre. The kettledrum strokes in the overture stand out like the proverbial sore thumbs; though in the first movement of the symphony they fit in admirably. Schumann's instrumentation is insecure and erratic.

The musical substance of both the overture and the symphony is so original that it stands out in spite of the clumsy scoring. The principal motive in the symphony is, curiously enough, identical both rhythmically and melodically with the beginning of the introduction to Haydn's D-major symphony.

Unfortunately Dr. Koussevitzky substituted for the "Siegfried Funeral Music," originally announced, the more obvious "Ride of the Valkyries." It is a question whether such an excerpt as the introduction to Act 3 of "Die Meistersinger" is suitable for concert performance. The other three Wagner excerpts played were more or less self contained units. The beautiful music of the introduction became almost uninteresting taken out of its proper context. The "Meistersinger" prelude, while played with a great attention to detail, did not have the plasticity it inherently possesses.

Dr. Koussevitzky quite outdid himself, particularly in the Schumann Symphony. This should have raised the level of the performance to unusual heights, but unfortunately the orchestra showed the ill effects of either scanty rehearsal or carelessness. There were several unfortunate slips, noticeably in the "Meistersinger" prelude, and in the end of the "Lohengrin" prelude.

SYMPHONY IN 2ND MATINEE

Romantic List Played for

Tuesday Series

Jan 8, 1930, Pub

